P R E F A C E.

THIS Dictionary covers the canonical books of the Old and New Testaments, in both the Authorized and Revised Versions, together with the First Book of the Maccabees in the Revised Version. The Cambridge edition of 1857, minion 24mo, has been the standard of reference for the canonical books of the Authorized Version. The inclusion of one book of the Apocrypha, and only one, was determined by its unique intrinsic worth, the First Book of the Maccabees being conspicuous among the apocryphal writings for its value to the historian and the biblical student as throwing much light upon an important period of Jewish history between the death of Ezra and Nehemiah at the close of the Old Testament dispensation and the birth of Christ, which inaugurated a new order of things. The other books of the Apocrypha have by no means been neglected: they have been laid under constant contribution, and their available material has been employed; but it was not deemed desirable to devote an article to every proper name, or to register every divergent spelling, which occurs in these writings. To have done so would have encumbered the pages with material of slight value at most, and of no use to the student of the Bible.

The book aims to be a dictionary of the Bible, not of speculation about the Bible. It seeks to furnish a thorough acquaintance with things biblical. To this end it has been made a compendium of the facts stated in the Scriptures, and of explanatory and supplementary material drawn from the records of the ancient peoples contemporary with Israel; it has been adequately furnished with authoritative illustrations, not pictures drawn from the imagination, but actual delineations of the very things themselves; and it has been fully equipped with accurate maps, all recent, and most of them drawn specially for this work from the latest authorities. The interpretation of Scripture which is frequently involved in the statement of the facts will, it is believed, be found to be sober, fair, and just.

The variations in the orthography of Scripture proper names have been noted in the respective articles. Neither the Authorized Version nor the Revised Version is thoroughly consistent. When several methods of spelling the same name exist, the choice will depend upon individual taste. The writer may perchance prefer one orthography, the reader another. There may also be circumstances which make a rare spelling preferable in particular cases. The reader may rest assured that no form has been admitted to the pages of the Dictionary which is not supported by authority. What that authority is may be seen by turning to the proper article.

The pronunciation of anglicized Scripture proper names is still in a chaotic state. In the majority of names the syllabification and accentuation have never been settled. Even the systems of pronunciation most in vogue are unnecessarily inconsistent. A chief reason for this is that the pronunciation has been so largely based on the forms which the Greek and Latin translators gave to the Hebrew names. These translators did not transliterate the names in accordance with any fixed rule; and, as a result, names of similar formation and pronunciation in Hebrew appear in different forms in the Greek and Latin; and often, when quite similar in appearance in English, retain the divergent Greek or Latin pronunciation. In many cases this is intolerable. The present work follows in the main the system of Webster in the division into syllables and the position of the accent. The departures are confined almost exclusively to certain classes of words. The pronunciation adopted is always supported by good authority, and is in the interest of consistency. When once the syllables and the accent of the anglicized biblical name have been determined, its correct pronunciation in the mouth of every person of true English instinct follows as a matter of course. The letters are sounded as they would be under similar circumstances in an ordinary English word. The exceptions are that the g is soft in only one name, Bethphage (pronounced Beth'pha-je), and ch is always hard and sounded like k, except in Rachel and cherub. The latter word is scarcely an exception, for it is not a proper name. The proper name Cherub, a place in Babylonia, is pronounced according to rule (Ke'rub).

The meaning of proper names has been given whenever it is known. The cases are many where it has been necessarily omitted or stated cautiously. Even where there is no note of caution, the reader must be on his guard; for although the general signification of the name may be perfectly clear, the shade of meaning which lent the name flavor among those who bestowed it may elude discovery. Judah means an object of praise; but it might be an expression either of thankfulness on the part of the parents to God, or satis-fiction in the child ; either God or the child might be thought of as praise-worthy. Jehovah-jireh means Jehovah doth see ; but the special sense may be, Jehovah doth provide.

In regard to the modern names of places in Palestine, the orthography of the Palestine Exploration Fund has been adopted, except that the elevated comma is employed to represent the Arabic consonant alif, and the inverted comma to represent the guttural ain ; compare ALPHABET. This is the rule ; but occasionally, for special reasons, the etymology is more fully indicated by the diacritical points conventionally used by Semitists. These points will cause no inconvenience to the uninitiated, and will utter their own voice to the philologist.

Persons are genealogically described as far as possible according to the method of registration which was employed by the Hebrews, namely, by the tribe, family, and father's house. This is a minor feature, but it is a novel one, and it adds materially to the proper identification of personages and to a correct understanding of the genealogies.

In the preparation of the Dictionary the author has had the coöperation of his colleagues the Reverend Professors Benjamin Breckinridge Warfield, D. D., LL. D., and George Tybout Purves, D. D., LL. D., who have furnished the articles pertaining to New Testament introduction and several others on important related subjects. To each of these articles the initials of its author are appended.

PREFACE TO THE THIRD REVISED EDITION.

THE Dictionary has been revised throughout, somewhat enlarged, and greatly enriched. The orthography of the proper names according to the American revision of the Bible has been noted. The articles on geography, history, and chronology reflect the light that has come during the decade that is just closing. Most of the articles on the books of the Old and New Testaments have been elaborated and often materially enlarged, chiefly in order to show the place which the books have occupied in the life of the church, to exhibit the personal traits of the writers, and to reveal the large outlook of these men upon God and the world. New articles have been introduced, without, however, changing the scope of the work; and other articles have been recast or rewritten, when by doing so greater simplicity and clearness seemed attainable; and they have been enlarged whenever experience in the use of the book during the past twelve years has shown that its practical utility would be increased. The maps with which the Dictionary is furnished, both in the midst of the text and as an appendix, are designed to meet the needs of biblical students. They are accurate, they illustrate the statements and discussions in the geographical articles, and they are free from eccentricities in the identification of sites.

A DICTIONARY

OF

THE BIBLE.

Aa'ron [etymology doubtful. The name possibly means bright, shining].

The brother of Moses and his senior by three years (Ex. vii. 7). He was a descendant of Levi through Kohath and Amram (Ex. vi. 14-27). As we do not read of perils attending his infancy, it may be inferred that he was born before the promulgation of the nefarious Egyptian edicts dooming the Hebrew male children to death. He was younger than his sister Miriam (q. v.). He married Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab and sister of Nahshon, of the tribe of Judah, who bore him four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Ex. vi. 23; Num. iii. 2). When Moses at Horeb was called to stand forth as the deliverer of his oppressed countrymen, and, wishing to escape the mission, complained that he was "slow of speech, and of a slow tongue," God repelled the objection, and said, "Is not Aaron the Levite thy brother? I know that he can speak well." Aaron was forthwith instructed to go out and meet Moses in the wilderness. He did so. The brothers met and embraced each other (Ex. iv. 10-16, 27). Returning to Egypt, they gathered together the elders of Israel and intimated to them the approaching deliverance (29-31). Aaron acted as the spokesman and agent of Moses and carried the rod in the first interviews with the elders and with Pharaoh, and during the first three plagues (iv. 30; vii. 2, 9, 19 [by the command of Moses and hence Moses' act, xvii. 5]; viii. 5, 16). But soon afterwards Moses partly dispensed with the agency of Aaron, and thenceforth, whenever the rod was used symbolically, it was in the hand of Moses himself (ix. 23; x. 13, and cp. 22; xiv. 16, 21; xvii. 5; Num. xx. 11). Aaron and Hur supported Moses' arms during the battle with Amalek (Ex. xvii. 12). When the covenant between Jehovah and Israel was entered into at mount Sinai, the ceremony of its ratification was concluded, as usual, by a common meal spread for the contracting parties. Aaron and two of his sons with Moses and seventy elders of Israel were appointed to partake of this meal as the legal representatives of the nation and to behold the vision of the God of Israel at the ceremony (Ex.

xxiv. 1, 9, 10). During the prolonged stay of Moses in the mount, the people became impatient at the absence of their leader and turned to Aaron with the demand that he make them gods to go before them. Aaron weakly yielded and made the golden calf (Ex. xxxii.). According to instructions which Moses received, Aaron and his sons were to fill the office of priest. Accordingly, after the tabernacle had been completed, and was ready for actual services to begin, Aaron and his four sons were solemnly consecrated to the priesthood by being anointed with oil and clothed in splendid typical official vestments (Ex. xxviii.; xl. 13-16; Lev. viii.). Aaron was thus the first high priest, an office which he filled for nearly forty years. Shortly after leaving Sinai, he joined with Miriam in finding fault with Moses for having married a Cushite woman (Num. xii. 1-16). The rebellion of Korah was directed as much against the exclusive priesthood of Aaron and his sons as against the civil authority of Moses. The divine appointment of Moses and Aaron to their respective offices was attested by the destruction of the rebels; and Aaron's right to the priesthood was further and specially vindicated by the budding of the rod taken for Levi and inscribed with Aaron's name (Num. xvi. and xvii.). Toward the close of the journey in the wilderness, when the people were encamped for the second time at Kadesh, Aaron and Moses dishonored God by their conduct when they smote the rock. For this sin they were denied the privilege of entering the promised land (Num. xx. 1-13). Soon afterwards, when the Israelites were encamped at Moserah, by divine direction Aaron was led by Moses up mount Hor and stripped of his sacred vestments, which were transferred to his son Eleazar. There he died, at the age of one hundred and twenty-three years. The nation publicly mourned for him thirty days (Num. xx. 23-29; xxxiii. 37-39; Deut. x. 6). See PRIEST and HIGH PRIEST.

Aa'ron-ites, in the Hebrew text simply Aaron, the name being used collectively.

The priestly descendants of Aaron (1 Chron. xii. 27; xxvii. 17, A. V.).

A-bad'don [destruction, ruin].

1. Destruction, ruin (Job xxxi. 12); the place of the dead, synonymous with the grave (Ps. lxxxviii. 11), Sheol (Job xxvi. 6; Prov. xv. 11, R. V.), and death (Job xxviii. 22).

2. A name of the angel of the abyss, who is called in Greek Apollyon (Rev. ix. 11).

A-bag'tha.

One of the seven chamberlains of the Persian king Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10). These chamberlains, guardians of the harem, ministered in the presence of the king (i. 10, 11). They were eunuchs, as the Hebrew title denotes and custom required; and hence were probably foreigners and liable to bear foreign names.

Ab'a-nah, R. V., in A. V. Abana; in margin of R. V. Amanah (q. v), of A. V. Amana [The name probably means stony].

One of the two rivers of Damascus; presumably the more important, for Naaman, of that city, mentions it first (2 Kin. v. 12). It is probably the Barada, the Chrysorrhoas of classical writers, which rises in a large blue pool of unfathomable depth on the high plain south of Zebedány on Anti-Lebanon, twenty-three miles from Damascus, rushes in a southeasterly course down the mountain, and then, turning eastward, runs along the north wall of the city, to be lost finally in an inland lake, the middle one of three existing. It flows sluggishly through the plain, but on its passage through Damascus it has a rapid course. Not less than nine or ten branches are taken from it, yet to the end it continues both deep and broad. It is the chief cause of the beauty and fertility of the plain of Damascus. A canal drawn off from it, Nahr Baniyas, still preserves the memory of its old name.

Ab'a-rim [those beyond].

A mountain range on the east side of Jordan, sloping abruptly from the plateau of Moab to the Dead Sea and the Jordan valley. On it was a station of the Israelites just before they reached the low plains of Moab, opposite Jericho (Num. xxxiii. 47, 48). It was from mount Abarim and the peak of it called Nebo that Moses was directed to look across at the promised land (Num. xxvii. 12; Deut. xxxii. 49; xxxiv. 1). In the R. V. Abarim is mentioned in Jer. xxii. 20, with Lebanon and Bashan; in the A. V. it is rendered "passages."

Ab'ba [Aramaic, father].

A term borrowed from childhood's language to express filial address to God (Mark xiv. 36; Rom. viii. 15; Gal. iv. 6). The corresponding Hebrew word is Ab; it is common in compound proper names in the forms Ab and Abi, as Abimelech, Abner or Abiner, Eliab.

Ab'da [Aramaic, servant, probably meaning servant of God].

1. The father of Adoniram (1 Kin. iv. 6).

2. A Levite, the son of Shammua (Neh. xi. 17). See OBADIAH 12.

Ab'de-el [servant of God].

The father of Shelemiah (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

Ab'di [servant of, a contraction of servant of God].

1. A Levite of the family of Merari. He was the son of Malluch, and father of Kishi (1 Chron. vi. 44). The Abdi of 2 Chron. xxix. 12 seems to be the same man.

2. Son of a certain Elam (Ezra x. 26).

Ab'di-el [servant of God].

A Gadite, resident in Gilead (1 Chron. v. 15)

Ab'don [servile].

1. The son of Hillel, a native of Pirathon, in the tribe of Ephraim. He judged Israel, or a portion of it, eight years, and is the eleventh judge in the order of enumeration. He had forty sons and thirty sons' sons, who rode on as many ass-colts—a sign of rank in days when the Hebrews did not yet have horses. He was buried in his native place (Judg. xii 13-15).

2. Head of a father's house of Benjamin, a son of Shashak, dwelling in Jerusalem (1 Chron. vii 23, 26, 28).

3. A Benjamite, the firstborn of Jehiel of Gibeon and an ancestor of king Saul (1 Chron. viii. 30; ix. 35, 36). See KISH 2.

4. An official of king Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 20); see ACHBOR.

5. A town in the territory of Asher, given, with its suburbs, to the Levites of the Gershon family (Josh. xxi. 30; 1 Chron. vi 74) Abdon is perhaps identical with the ruins of 'Abdeh, ten miles north of Acre.

A-bed'ne-go [servant of Nego, probably the same as Nebo].

The name given by the prince of the eunuchs at Babylon to Azariah, one of the three faithful Jews, afterwards miraculously saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. i. 7; iii. 12-30; 1 Mac. ii. 59).

A'bel, I. [breath, vapor; applied to Abel apparently from the shortness of his life; or perhaps the name means son].

A younger son of Adam, and by calling a shepherd. Abel was a righteous man (Mat. xxiii. 35; 1 John iii. 12); one of the Old Testament worthies whose conduct was controlled by faith (Heb. xi. 4). He offered to God a lamb from his flock, which was accepted. It was not the kind of offering, but the character of the offerer that God respected. As brought by Abel, the offering showed the surrender of the heart to God. The offering of the best further revealed the sense of obligation and gratitude to God as the sole bestower of the good, to whom all thanks were due. It expressed the consciousness in the offerer of entire dependence upon God for daily blessing and the desire for the continuance of God's favor. In one in whom the sense of sin was deep, it set forth the entire dependence of the sinner upon God's unmerited mercy. Cain's character was different from Abel's; and being rejected he at the promptings of envy slew Abel (Gen. iv). The ultimate ground of Abel's acceptance by God was the atoning blood of Christ.

Ab'el, II. [a grassy place, a meadow].

1. The same as Abel-beth-maachah (2 Sam. xx. 14, 15, 18).

2. In 1 Sam. vi. 18 it is apparently an erroneous reading for 'Eben, stone; see R. V.

Ab'el-beth-ma'a-cah and Abel of Beth-maachah, in A. V. written Maachah [Abel, i. e. Meadow near Beth-maachah]

A fortified town in the tribe of Naphtali (1 Kin. xv. 20; 2 Kin. xv. 29). It was renowned for wisdom (2 Sam. xx. 18). During Sheba's revolt Joab was about to assault it, but "a wise woman" flung the rebel's head over the wall, and saved the town (14-22). It was one of the places captured by Ben-hadad at the instance of Asa (1 Kin. xv. 20). Tiglath-pileser II took it with other Naphthalite towns, carrying the inhabitants captive to Assyria (2 Kin. xv. 29). Its site was probably at Abil-el-Kamh, a small Christian village on a rising ground west of the Jordan, about twelve miles north of lake Huleh and almost directly opposite Dan. The Derdara flows swiftly along at the bottom of the western side of the mound on which the village stands, and the country on every side is well watered and very fertile. In 2 Chron. xvi. 4, it is called Abel-maim, Abel by the water.

Ab'el-cher'a-mim [meadow of vineyards].

A place east of the Jordan to which Jephthah pursued the Ammonites (Judg. xi. 33, R. V.).

Ab'el-ma'im. See ABEL-BETH-MAACHAH.

Ab'el-me-ho'lah [meadow of dancing].

A town, apparently in the Jordan valley, where Elisha was born (Judg. vii. 22; 1 Kin. iv. 12; xix. 16). It was fixed by Jerome ten Roman miles south of Scythopolis, the Scripture Bethshean. Conder places it at 'Ain Helweh.

Ab'el-mis-ra'im. See ATAD.

Ab'el-shit'tim [meadow of acacias]. See SHITTIM.

Ab'ez, in R. V. Ebez [whiteness, tin].

A town of Issachar (Josh. xix. 20) Not identified

Ab'i. See ABIJAH 6.

Ab-i'a. See ABIJAH.

Ab-i'ah [Jehovah is a father].

The Hebrew name is usually rendered Abijah in the English version of the Old Testament, with but two exceptions in E. R. V. (1 Chron. ii. 24; vi. 28), and always so in A. R. V. See ABIJAH.

Ab-i-al'bon [fath r of strength].

One of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 31. The Septuagint supports the reading Abiel in this passage, which is the name he bears in 1 Chron. xi. 32.

Ab-i'a-saph, or Ebiassaph [father of gathering, perhaps in the sense of removing reproach].

A descendant of Levi through Korah (Ex. vi. 16, 18, 21, 24; 1 Chron. vi. 23; ix. 19).

Ab-i'a-thar [father of abundance].

A priest, the son of Ahimelech, of the line of Eli. On the slaughter by Doeg at the instance of king Saul of the priests at Nob, Abiathar escaped, carrying the ephod with him; and, as was natural, cast in his lot with David (1 Sam. xxii. 20-23). When David at length ascended the throne, Zadok and Abiathar apparently shared the high-priesthood between them (cp 1 Chron. xv. 11, 12; 2 Sam. xv. 24 seq; xv. 35, etc.). The mention of Ahimelech, son of Abiathar, as priest with Zadok in 2 Sam. viii. 17, is regarded by some as a copyist's error, whereby the names of father and son were transposed. But the number of allusions to Ahimelech, the son of Abiathar, as priest, is so great that an error is improbable (1 Chron. xviii. 16, Septuagint; xxiv. 3, 6, 31). A simpler explanation is that, since Abiathar was becoming quite old (he was about seventy years of age at the time of Absalom's revolt), his son and legal successor assumed the burdensome priestly functions and was called priest, as Phinehas served during the lifetime of Eli and was called priest (1 Sam. i. 3; ii. 11). The aged Abiathar remained faithful to the king during Absalom's rebellion, and rendered the fugitive monarch great service (2 Sam. xv. 24, 29, 35, 36; xvii. 15; xix. 11); but when later Adonijah sought to wrest the succession to the throne from Solomon, Abiathar cast his priestly influence with the military influence of Joab, another old man, in favor of the attractive aspirant (1 Kin. i. 7). Though this attempt failed, he again favored Adonijah after David's death (1 Kin. ii. 12-22). For this he was deposed from the high-priesthood, and Zadok, a priest of approved loyalty, but of the other branch of the Aaronic family, was put into his place (1 Kin. ii. 26, 35). His deposition involved that of his sons, Ahimelech and Jonathan; and thus the rule of the house of Eli came to an end, according to prophecy (1 Sam. ii. 31-35). The passage in 1 Kin. iv. 4 probably refers to the time immediately prior to his deposition. Abiathar is alluded to by our Lord in the New Testament (Mark ii. 26).

Ab'ib [an ear of corn].

The month which the Hebrews were directed to make the first of the year in commemoration of their departure from Egypt (Ex. xii. 1, 2; xiii. 4). Harvest began in it. The feast of unleavened bread or the pass-over fell during the month (Ex. xii. 1 seq; xxiii. 15; Deut. xvi. 1). The Jewish months following the moon, and burs being fixed, the two cannot be made exactly to correspond.

Abib most nearly approaches our month of March, though in some years its end moves some distance into our April. After the captivity the name Abib gave place to Nisan (Neh. ii. 1; Esth. iii. 7). See YEAR.

A-bi'da, in A. V. once Abidah (Gen. xxv. 4) an inconsistency from which the original edition of A. V. is free [father of knowledge].

A descendant of Abraham through Midian (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chron. i. 33).

A-bi'dan [father of a judge, or the father judgeth].

The representative prince of the tribe of Benjamin in the wilderness. His father's name was Gideon (Num. i. 11; ii. 22; vii. 60, 65; x. 24).

A-bi'el [father of strength, or God is a father].

1. A Benjamite, the father of Kish and of Ner, and the grandfather of Saul and of Abner (1 Sam. ix. 1; xiv. 51). See KISH 2

2. An Arbathite, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 32), called in 2 Sam. xxiii. 31 Abi-albon (q. v.).

A-bi-e'zer [father of help].

1. A descendant of Manasseh through Machir, and founder of a family (Josh. xvii. 2; 1 Chron. vii. 18); abbreviated in Num. xxvi. 30 to Iezer (A. V. Jeezer). The judge Gideon belonged to this family (Judg. vi. 11).

2. Collectively, the family of Abiezer (Judg. vi. 34; viii. 2).

3. One of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 27; 1 Chron. xi. 28; xxvii. 12).

A-bi-er'rite.

One belonging to the family of Abiezer (Judg. vi. 11, 24; viii. 32). In Num. xxvi. 30 abbreviated, and R. V. has Iezerite, A. V. Jeezerite; but the spelling should rather be Iezerite to accord with the Hebrew and be consistent with Abiezerite.

Ab'l-gall, in R. V. once Abigal [perhaps, father of exultation].

1. The wife of Nabal. She was a woman of good understanding, and of a beautiful countenance, and on the death of her first husband became one of David's wives (1 Sam. xxv. 3, 14-44; xxvii. 3; 2 Sam. ii. 2). When the Amalekites captured Ziklag they took her captive, but she was rescued by her husband after he had defeated the enemy (1 Sam. xxx. 5, 18). She bore to him a son called Chileab (2 Sam. iii. 3) or Daniel (1 Chron. iii. 1).

2. A sister of David (1 Chron. ii. 16); not, however, a daughter of Jesse, but of Nahash (2 Sam. xvii. 25, in R. V. Abigal). She was the mother of Amasa.

Ab-i-ha'il [father of strength]. In the Hebrew text the h is a different letter in the name of the men and in that of the women. The difference is commonly attributed to an early misreading of the text.

1. A Levite of the family of Merari (Num. iii. 35).

2. Wife of Abishur (1 Chron. ii. 29).

3. A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 14).

4. Wife of king Rehoboam and a descendant of Eliab, David's brother (2 Chron. xi. 18).

5. Father of queen Esther (Esth. ii. 15).

A-bi'hu [He, i. e. God, is father].

A son of Aaron. He shared in the privileges, in the sin, and in the fate of Nadab the eldest son, and like him died childless (Ex. vi. 23; xxiv. 1; xxviii. 1; Lev. x. 1-7; Num. iii. 2).

A-bi'hud [probably, father of praiseworthiness].

A descendant of Benjamin through the family of Bela (1 Chron. viii. 3).

A-bi'jah, in A. V. of O. T. four times Abiah (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chron. ii. 24; vi. 28; vii. 8), in A. V. of N. T. Abia [Jehovah is a father].

1. The wife of Hezron, a man of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 24, A. R. V.). See ABIAH.

2. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and was made the eighth of the twenty-four courses into which David divided the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 6, 10). See 8 below.

3. A descendant of Benjamin through Becher (1 Chron. vii. 8).

4. The younger son of Samuel, appointed by his father a judge in Beersheba, but who proved corrupt (1 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chron. vi. 28). See ABIAH.

5. A son of Jeroboam. While yet a child he fell dangerously sick. Jeroboam sent his queen in disguise to the prophet Ahijah, who had predicted that he should obtain the kingdom, to inquire what the issue of the sickness would be. The prophet recognized the queen, notwithstanding her disguise, denounced judgment against Jeroboam for his apostasy from Jehovah, and added that the child would die at once, and that alone of all that household he would obtain honorable burial, because in him was found some good thing toward the Lord God. All came to pass as the seer had foretold (1 Kin. xiv. 1-18).

6. The name given in Chronicles to the son and successor of Rehoboam, called in Kings Abijah (2 Chron. xii. 16; xiii. 1-xiv. 1); see ABIJAH.

7. The mother of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 1). In 2 Kin. xviii. 2 she is called with great brevity Abi.

8. A chief of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. iii. 4, 7). Possibly he was a representative of the old course of Abijah, but the connection cannot be established, and in view of Ezra ii. 36 seq. is not probable. In the next generation, a father's house among the priests bore this name (Neh. xii. 17). The father of John the Baptist belonged to this family (Luke i. 5).

9. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, signed the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. x. 7).

A-bi'jam [possibly, father of the sea].

The son and successor of Rehoboam on the throne of Judah. His mother's name was Maacah, a descendant of Absalom (1 Kin. xv. 2; 2 Chron. xiii. 2). He sinned after the manner of his father, and had not a heart true to Jehovah. The kings of Judah had not yet become reconciled to the revolt of the ten tribes, and Abijam continued the war with Jeroboam which his father had waged (1 Kin. xv. 6, 7). According to 2 Chron. xiii. 3, compared with 2 Sam. xxiv. 9, the whole population "able to go forth to war" was under arms. In the slaughter which accompanied the warfare, half a million men of Israel were slain (2 Chron. xiii. 16-20). Abijam had fourteen wives, twenty-two sons, and sixteen daughters (2 Chron. xiii. 21). He reigned three years, and died, leaving his son Asa to succeed him in the kingdom (1 Kin. xv. 1-8; 2 Chron. xiv. 1). Abijam is called in Chronicles Abijah Ab-i-le'ne (Greek 'Abilene, so called from Abila, its capital, and that again probably from the Semitic 'abel, a meadow).

A tetrarchy near Anti-Lebanon. Its capital Abila lay upon the Barada, 18 or 20 miles N. W. from Damascus, in part upon the site of the modern village of es-Suk. There is a romantic gorge, with a Roman road cut in the cliff, a cemetery, a number of tall pillars, a stream below and the so-called "tomb of Abel" above. The local tradition that Abel was buried here doubtless originated in the similarity of sound between Abel and Abila. Of the formation of the tetrarchy Josephus makes no mention. In Luke iii. 1 it is referred to as separate from the tetrarchy of Philip, and as governed by Lysanias in the fifteenth year of Tiberius. Likewise an inscription at Abila, dating from the reign of Tiberius, mentions Lysanias as tetrarch of Abilene at that time. Some years later the two tetrarchies are still distinct; for Caligula, 790 A. V. C. bestowed the "tetrarchy of Philip," now dead, and the "tetrarchy of Lysanias" upon Herod Agrippa, the Herod of the book of Acts (Antiq. xviii. 6, 10), and Claudius confirmed to him "Abila of Lysanias" (xix. 5, 1).

There was an Abila in Perea, east of Gadara, but it is not mentioned in Scripture.

A-bim'a-el [composition of the name still unknown].

A name in the genealogy of Joktan. It may denote a person, a tribe, or a locality, and is to be sought in Arabia (Gen. x. 28; 1 Chron. i. 22).

A-bim'e-lech [father of the king].

1. The personal name or official title of a king of Gerar, at whose court Abraham attempted to pass Sarah off as his sister (Gen. xx. 1-18). The king and the patriarch at a later period entered into a covenant with each other (xxi. 22-34).

2. A king of the Philistines at Gerar, at whose court Isaac attempted to pass off Rebekah as his sister, and with whom he also, like his father, at last formed a covenant (Gen. xxvi. 1-33).

3. The son of the judge Gideon by a concubine. This woman was a native of Shechem, where her family had influence. One natural penalty of polygamy is that the sons by one mother tend fiercely to quarrel with those by another; and Abimelech, obtaining assistance from his mother's relatives, killed seventy sons of his father on one stone at Ophrah, the native city of the family. One son only, Jotham, escaped from the massacre. Then Abimelech was elected king of Shechem. Before he had ruled three years he and his subjects were at variance, and his throne, founded in blood, had begun to totter. A plot against him was formed by Gaal. It came to the ears of Zebul, Abimelech's second in command. Gaal was defeated and driven out of Shechem, the city being afterwards destroyed and sowed with salt. A thousand men and women who had taken refuge in its tower were burnt to death. When Abimelech shortly afterwards was besieging Thebez, he was mortally wounded by a millstone dropped on his head from the city wall by a woman. Regarding it as dishonorable to be killed by a female, he ordered his armor-bearer to draw his sword and slay him, which he did (Judg. ix. 1-57).

4. See ACHISH.

5. A priest, a son of Abiathar (1 Chron. xviii. 16). The spelling is doubtless a copyist's error for Ahimelech. The Septuagint reads Ahimelech; see also 1 Chron. xxiv. 6, etc.

A-bin'a-dab [father of liberality].

1. A man of Kirjath-jearim, who when the ark was sent back by the Philistines gave it accommodation in his house for twenty years, his son Eleazar being set apart as a priest to act as its custodian (1 Sam. vii. 1, 2; 2 Sam. vi. 3; 1 Chron. xiii. 7).

2. The second son of Jesse and an elder brother of David (1 Sam. xvi. 8; xvii. 13).

3. A son of Saul, killed with his father in the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 2).

4. Father of a son-in-law of Solomon and tax-gatherer for the region of Dor (1 Kin. iv. 11, A. V.). See BEN-ABINADAB.

A-bin'o-am [father of sweetness or grace]. The father of Barak (Judg. iv. 6; v. 12).

A-bi'ram [legitimate variant of Abram]. For meaning see ABRAHAM.

1. A Reubenite, a brother of Dathan and fellow conspirator with Korah (Num. xvi.).

2. The firstborn son of Hiel, who rebuilt Jericho (1 Kin. xvi. 34). His death, when its foundations were laid, in part fulfilled a curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. vi. 26).

A-bish'ag [perhaps, father of wandering]. A beautiful girl from Shunem, employed to attend upon king David when he was old and declining in vitality (1 Kin. i. 1-4). Adonijah wished to marry her after David's death, and made application for the needed permission to Solomon, who not merely refused his request, but interpreted it to mean an insidious claim for the crown, and put him to death (1 Kin. ii. 13-25).

A-bish'a-i and Abshai (1 Chron. xviii. 12 margin) [possessor of all that is desirable].

A son of David's sister Zeruiah, and brother of Joab and Asahel (2 Sam. ii. 18; 1 Chron. ii. 15, 16). When David found Saul and his followers asleep, Abishai asked permission to kill the king; but David would not sanction his doing harm to "the Lord's anointed" (1 Sam. xxvi. 5-9). He served under Joab in David's army (2 Sam. ii. 18; x. 10). When Abner, fleeing from the battle at Gibeon, was compelled to kill Asahel, the two brothers of the latter, Joab and Abishai, pursued the homicide, but without effect (2 Sam. ii. 18-24). He was loyal to David during the revolts of Absalom and Sheba (2 Sam. xvi. and xx). He desired to slay Shimei for cursing David, even when Shimei asked forgiveness (2 Sam. xvi. 9; xix. 21). He was one of David's mighty men who had lifted up his spear against three hundred and slain them (2 Sam. xxiii. 18; 1 Chron. xi. 20). He defeated the Edomites also in the valley of Salt, slaying eighteen thousand of them and garrisoning their country (1 Chron. xviii. 12, 13). He succored David in the fight with Ishbi-benob (2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17).

A-bish'a-lom. See ABSALOM.

A-bish'u-a [father of salvation].

1. A Benjamite of the family of Bela (1 Chron. viii. 4).

2. The son of Phinehas the priest (1 Chron. vi. 4, 5, 50; Ezra vii. 5).

A-bi'shur [father of a wall].

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 28, 29).

A-bi'tal [apparently, father of dew, perhaps in the sense of refreshment].

One of David's wives. Her son was Shephatiah (2 Sam. iii. 4; 1 Chron. iii. 3).

A-bi'tub [father of goodness].

A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hushim (1 Chron. viii. 8-11).

A-bi'ud [the Greek form, probably, of Hebrew Abihud].

A member of the royal line of Judah (Mat. i. 13). The name is omitted in 1 Chron. iii. 19.

Ab'ner [father of light]. A legitimate variant form, Abiner, is used in the Hebrew text of 1 Sam. xiv. 50, and in the margin of some editions of the English version.

The son of Ner, king Saul's uncle. During the reign of that monarch Abner was commander-in-chief of the army (1 Sam. xiv. 51). He first became acquainted with David when that youth offered to meet Goliath in combat (1 Sam. xvii. 55-58). On the death of Saul, Abner availed himself of the tribal feeling adverse to Judah, and turned it to the advantage of the house to which he was related by blood, and to which he had owed allegiance. He proclaimed Saul's son Ish-bosheth king at Mahanaim (2 Sam. ii. 8). During the war between the house of Saul and David which followed, in an interview which he held at Gibeon with Joab, David's commander-in-chief, Abner proposed what he seems to have intended for a tournament between twelve young men picked from Ish-bosheth's supporters and as many taken from the followers of David, but mutual animosities converted the mimic combat into a real battle; and the two armies being drawn into the struggle, that which Abner led was defeated with great slaughter (12-32). During the retreat from this battle Abner was pertinaciously followed with hostile intent by Asahel, one of Joab's brothers, and after repeatedly warning him off, had at last to strike him dead in self-defence (18-24). Soon afterwards Abner had a serious charge brought against him by Ish-bosheth, which so irritated him that he intimated his intention of transferring his allegiance to David, and was as good as his word. First he sent messengers to David, and then sought an interview with him, and was graciously received. But Joab, believing or pretending to believe that Abner had come simply as a spy, went after him, invited him to a friendly conversation, and stabbed him dead. The ostensible reason for this assassination was revenge for the death of Asahel, who, however, had died in fair fight. An unavowed motive probably was fear that Abner might one day displace him from the command of David's army. The king was justly incensed against the murderer, and conspicuously showed the people that he had no complicity in the crime. He attended the funeral, lamented the unworthy fate of the prince and great man who had fallen in Israel, and finally left it in charge to his successor to call Joab to account for the crime (iii. 6-39; 1 Kin. ii. 5). Abner had at least one son, Jaasiel (1 Chron. xxvii. 21), and seems to have had a regard for the house of God, for he dedicated to it some of the spoils which he had taken in battle (xxvi. 28).

A-bom-i-na'tion of Des-o-la'tion.

Idolatry with its blighting effect upon man, its degradation of the divine ideal, and its violent outward, as well as its less visible insidious, opposition to the kingdom of God. To Daniel was revealed: "For the half of the week, he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease; and upon the wing of abominations shall come one that maketh desolate" (ix. 27, R. V.): "and they shall profane the sanctuary, even the fortress, and shall take away the continual burnt offering, and they shall set up the abomination that maketh desolate" (xi. 31, R. V.); and "from the time that the continual burnt offering shall be taken away, and the abomination that maketh desolate set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days" (xii. 11, R.V.). These prophecies depict outstanding features of the development of the kingdom of God, which are typical for all time. A notable fulfillment of xi. 31, which the Jews were quick to discern, was the stoppage of the daily sacrifice by Antiochus Epiphanes in June, 168 B.C., and the erection on the brazen altar of an idolatrous one, on which sacrifices were offered to Jupiter Olympius (1 Mac i 54; vi. 7; 2 Mac. vi. 2; Antiq. xii 5, 4; 7, 6). But the prophecy of the abomination of desolation was not exhausted by this fulfillment.

Son of Terah, progenitor of the Hebrews, father of the faithful, and the friend of God (Gen. xi. 26; Gal. iii 7-9; Jas. ii. 23). The name was in vogue among the Semites of Babylonia at least two generations before the reign of Hammurabi, who is commonly believed to be Amraphel of Gen. xiv.

Is Abraham a tribal name? Is he the personification of a tribe? The justification for raising this question is the fact that many names in the genealogical registers of the Hebrews denote tribes and not individuals (Gen. x.; xxv 1-4). It is not always easy, at times it is impossible, to decide whether a people or a person is meant. But it is important to note, further, that a tribal name and history often include persons whose deeds are recorded in the name of the tribe and as the acts of the tribe (see CHRONOLOGY I. 3). Noah, for example, may be the name of a tribe; but if so, in the narrative of the flood it denotes likewise an individual member of that tribe, who was saved with his family in the ark. In the case of Abraham, Gen. xi. 26, 27, and the first ten verses of the twelfth chapter might readily be read as the story of a tribe's origin and migration, in fact, it does recount the movement of a sheik and his people; the separation of Abram and Lot might also be tribal, and so too the treaty with Abimelech. But though the tribal element may enter into the narrative, the history is not exclusively tribal. The majority of the deeds recorded in it cannot be explained as tribal movements without violence and improbable interpretations. They are the acts of an individual (Gen. xv. 1-18; xvi. 1-11; xviii. 1-xix. 28; xx. 1-17; xxii. 1-14; xxiv.). Moreover, the passages just cited belong to the earliest literature of Israel, as all schools of criticism agree; and during all the centuries that followed the Hebrews themselves regarded Abraham as an individual (Is. xxix. 22; xli. 8; li. 2; Jer. xxxiii. 26; Ezek. xxxiii. 24; Mat. viii. 11).

'Traditional Oak of Abraham at Mamre

The prophecy belongs to Messianic times (Dan. ix. 27), and yet more generally to the conflict of the kingdom of God until its final triumphant establishment (xii. 7, 11 with vii 25-27; cp. xii. 2). Christ reiterated the prophecy, enjoining those to flee to the mountains who should see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the holy place (Mat. xxiv. 15, etc.).

A'bra-ham, at first Abram [in Hebrew, Abram denotes exalted father: the change to Abraham appears to consist merely in strengthening the root of the second syllable, in order to place increased emphasis on the idea of exaltation].

I. Chronology.—1. His life before his arrival in Canaan, 75 years. In his early life Abraham dwelt with his father and his brethren in Ur of the Chaldees. He married Sarai, his half-sister. After the death of his brother Haran, he, his wife, and Lot his nephew migrated, under the headship of Terah, from Ur to go to the land of Canaan (Gen. xi. 27-31). The motive which led the family to change its habitation is not stated in Gen. xi. Josephus inferred from the narrative that Terah was actuated by a desire to escape from associations which reminded him of the son who had died (Antiq. i. 6, 5). It has also been suggested that the migration of the family may have been prompted by the wish to better their condition in a new and freer country, or have been incited by political disturbances in Chaldea, such as an invasion of the Elamites. Stephen understood Gen. xii. 1 to refer back to this time, and to be the initial command, given while the family was yet in Ur, for he says: "God appeared unto Abraham, when he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Haran" (Acts vii. 2, R. V.). Stephen's interpretation is countenanced by Gen. xv. 7 and Neh. ix. 7; although these passages might refer to God's providence. All the various causes suggested may have cooperated; and the natural motives may have been the means providentially employed by God to persuade the party to obey the heavenly vision. The family departed from Ur and, taking the customary route, followed the Euphrates toward the northwest. On reaching Haran, the party temporarily abandoned the purpose of journeying to Canaan and took up residence where they were. When Abraham was 75 years old, he departed from Haran to go to Canaan. This move may have been due to God's will as revealed by him in Ur, or to a command now first received. Stephen, as already said, adopts the former interpretation and the wording of the details in Gen. xii 1 well suits, with our present meager knowledge of the community at Haran, this explanation. The departure is related after the record of Terah's death. It does not follow, however, from this that Abraham tarried at Haran until his father died. The narrator as usual concludes what he has to say of Terah before taking up the detailed history of Abraham. Still it is a plausible conjecture that Abraham did tarry so long; for the same party that left Ur now, with the exception of Terah, leaves Haran; and this also is the interpretation of Stephen. But if so, Abraham was born when Terah was at least 130 years old, and not 70, as is often unnecessarily inferred from Gen. xi 26. In this passage Abraham is mentioned first, either because he was the firstborn and born in Terah's 70th year, or else, if he was a younger son and born after Terah's 70th year, because he was the progenitor of the chosen people (cp. Gen. v. 32 with ix. 22, 24). From Haran Abraham went to Canaan. What route did he take? Probably the road by way of Damascus, for a great highway led from Mesopotamia past that city to Canaan; and later mention is made of Abraham's steward, Eliezer of Damascus. Abraham did not stop long at any place along the way, but properly speaking journeyed continuously; for he was 75 years old when he left Haran, and he spent ten years in Canaan before he took Hagar to wife (Gen. xvi. 3), and he was 86 years old when Hagar bore Ishmael (16); so that not more than a year elapsed between the departure from Haran and the arrival in Canaan.

I. 2 Unsettled life in Canaan, at most 10 years. He encamped at Shechem (Gen. xii. 6), at Beth-el (8), journeyed to the south country (9), and was driven by famine into Egypt. In Egypt, through fear for his life, he represented Sarah merely as his sister (10-20). He returned to the south country (xiii. 1), was again at Beth-el (3). He and Lot now separated on account of their increasing possessions. Lot chose the plain of the Jordan (5-12). Abraham afterwards moved his tent to the oaks of Mamre at Hebron (18).

I. 3. Residence at the oaks of Mamre, at least 15, perhaps 23 or 24 years. Abraham is in treaty with the Amorite chieftains of the vicinity (Gen. xiv. 13), pursues Chedorlaomer (1-16), is blessed by Melchizedek (17-24). The promise of an heir is given him and is believed; and the promise of Canaan as an inheritance is confirmed by covenant (xv.).

Birth of Ishmael (xvi.). After an interval of 13 years (16; xvii. 1), the promise is unfolded. Man's attempt to fulfill God's promise does not alter God's intention; not the bondwoman's child, but the free woman's; not the child of the flesh, but the child of promise. On this occasion the covenant sign of circumcision is appointed, and the name Abram is changed to Abraham (Gen. xvii.). Sodom is destroyed (xviii. and xix.).

I. 4. Residence in the south country, some 15 years during the childhood of Isaac. Sarah taken to the court of Abimelech (Gen. xx.). When Abraham is 100 years old, Isaac is born, and a little later Ishmael is expelled (xxi. 1-21). At a well owned by Abraham, Abimelech and he conclude a treaty, and Abraham names the well Beer-sheba (22-34). When Isaac was somewhat grown (xxii. 6; Josephus conjectures 25 years, Antiq. i. 13, 2), Abraham's faith was put to an open test by the command to sacrifice his only son. In obedience to this command, he and Isaac repaired to the mountains of Moriah, when a ram was graciously substituted for Isaac. They returned to Beer-sheba (xxii. 1-19).

I. 5. Again at Hebron, after an uneventful interval of 20 years. Here Sarah died, aged 127 years (Gen. xxiii.).

I. 6. Probably in the south country with Isaac, about 38 years. After the death of Sarah, when Abraham was 140 years old (xxii. 67; xxv. 20), he sends to Mesopotamia to obtain a wife from his own people for Isaac. Rebekah is brought back and meets Isaac at Beer-lahai-roi, perhaps 'Ain Muweilih (xxiv). That Abraham took Keturah to wife is next recorded (see KETURAH). Abraham died, aged 175 years, and was buried in the cave of Machpelah (xxv. 1-9).

II. The size of the community under Abraham.

Abraham departed from Haran with his wife, his nephew, and the souls that they had acquired (Gen. xii. 5), and in Canaan he obtained additional servants by purchase, by gift and doubtless by birth (xvi. 1; xvii. 23, 27; xviii. 7; xx. 14). He was rich in flocks and herds and their necessary accompaniment, men-servants and maidservants (xii. 16; xiii. 2, 7; xxiv. 32, 35, 59; xxvi. 15). He led 318 trained men, born in his house, to the rescue of Lot (xiv. 14). He was recognized by the neighboring chieftains as a mighty prince (xxiii. 6), with whom they do well to make alliances and conclude treaties (xiv. 13; xxi. 22 seq.). Yet when deprived of the aid of his allies, as when he went to sojourn in Egypt, his sense of insecurity triumphed over his better self, and he repressed part of the truth in regard to Sarah. He desired peace and was a man of peace (xiii. 8), yet like many other hardy settlers would in time of need brave hardship and danger and do battle for relatives and friends (xiv.).

III. The religious belief of Abraham. His nearer ancestors served other gods (Josh. xxiv. 2). Their worship was at least corrupted by the prevalent animism of Babylonia, which assigned a spirit to every object in nature, and which led to the conception of eleven great gods besides innumerable minor deities. The great gods were the deities of the majestic and impressive objects in nature: of the sky, of earth's surface, of the ocean and all subterranean waters: of the moon, the sun, and the storm; and of the five planets visible to the naked eye. The gods were powerful, were active in nature, bestowed special care on favorite individuals and communities, heard and answered prayer. Abraham's faith was distinguished from the belief of the great majority of his contemporaries of whom we have any knowledge, in that Abraham believed in God the almighty (Gen. xvii. 1), the everlasting (xxi. 33), the most high (xiv. 22), the possessor or maker of heaven and earth, i. e. the actual and lawful Lord of all (ibid., xxiv. 3), the righteous Judge, i. e. the moral governor of all the earth (xviii. 25); and in accordance with the faith of his contemporaries, Abraham believed in this God as the disposer of events, who seeth and taketh knowledge of what occurs on earth, and who giveth and withholdeth as he will. In this faith Abraham obeyed, worshiped, and guarded the honor of God. How came Abraham by this faith? 1. Reason lent its aid, as it still helps the intelligent Christian. Polytheists have often arrived at henotheism; and there are traces of henotheism among Abraham's countrymen in Babylonia. A clear, logical mind, such as Abraham exhibits, would tend to pass from henotheism to monotheism. Melchizedek had come to worship the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth; and his religious conceptions and practices called forth profound recognition from Abraham. Monumental evidence seems to show that occasionally an individual among the Assyrians and Babylonians arrived at a speculative belief in the unity of God, but without influencing the people at large. It is no more unique for Abraham to believe in one God, Lord over all, than for Hosea or Amos to do so. 2. The religious inheritance, which he received from his forefathers, aided Abraham. In support of this source of religious information may be urged, (a) the reasons for believing in a primitive revelation; (b) the existence of the line which began with Adam and included such true worshippers of God as Seth (see Gen. iv. 26), Enoch, and Noah, and (c) the historical fact of the transmission to the Hebrews of traditions like that of the creation and the flood. 3. Special revelation was granted to Abraham by dreams, visions, and theophanies (xii. 7; xv. 1, 12, 17, xvii. 1; xviii. 1, 2; xxii. 1, 2). Theophanies are as conceivable in Abraham's time as is the manifestation of Christ at a later age.

IV. Harmony between the Hebrew record and contemporary history. 1. The language of Canaan. Before the conquest of the country by the Israelites under Joshua not a few places and persons bore Semitic names. Abimelech and Urushalim, i. e. Jerusalem, were in vogue.

IV. 2. The narrative of Abraham fits into Egyptian history. Biblical chronological data place the arrival of Abraham in Canaan about 645 years before the Exodus. This date explains at once Abraham's willingness to go to Egypt when famine prevailed in Canaan and his kindly reception by Pharaoh for the date of his journey falls within the period when Asiatics, the so-called shepherd kings, held the throne of Egypt. The biblical data place not only Abraham's visit to the Nile country, but also the descent of Jacob and his sons to Egypt, within the period of the shepherd rule: a strong confirmation both of the chronological data and of the authenticity of the narrative.

IV. 3. The narrative fits into Babylonian history. (1) About the time assigned by the Hebrew record to Abraham and the invasion of the west, the populous plain at the mouth of the Tigris was ruled by an Elamite dynasty. (2) Under the Elamite sovereign vassal kings exercised sway, as described in Genesis. (3) The Babylonian kings in preceding centuries and during this period made expeditions into the far west and often held Canaan in subjection (cp. Lugalzaggisi, Sargon, Gudea, Kudurmagab probably, Hammurabi, and Ammisatana). (4) Chedorlaomer, the name assigned to the king of Elam, is a genuine Elamite name. Chedor, i. e. Kudur, is constantly used in the composition of Elamite royal names, and Laomer, i. e. Laganai, is the name of an Elamite god. Thus the Hebrew record gives an accurate and somewhat detailed picture of the political condition of Babylonia as well as of Canaan. On the theory, generally accepted, that Amraphel, king of Shinar, is identical with Hammurabi, who was king of Babel from about 1775 to 1721 B. C., a valuable synchronism is afforded with the life of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 1. 13), and the date of Abraham is established within narrow limits.

A'bra-ham's Bo'som.

The Jews fondly thought of being welcomed by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob to Paradise (4 Mac. xiii. 17); and of having fellowship with Abraham, even resting as it were on his breast (Luke xvi. 22). In the rabbinical speech of the third century A. D., to say that a person was sitting in Abraham's bosom meant that he had entered Paradise.

Ab'sa-lom and Abishalom (1 Kin. xv. 2, 10) [father of peace].

1. The third son of David, king of Israel. He was born in Hebron, and had for his mother Maacah, the daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, in Aram (2 Sam. iii. 3). He was of faultless form, and had long, fine hair, of which he was inordinately vain. His beauty was shared by his sister Tamar, who so fascinated her half-brother Amnon that he criminally dishonored her, for which two years afterwards he was treacherously assassinated at the instance of Absalom, whose guest he was at the time. Though Absalom was his father's favorite, his crime was too gross to be overlooked even by his indulgent parent. He had to go into exile, and remained three years with his maternal connections in Geshur, and two more at Jerusalem, before he was allowed to return to the court or see his royal father. He soon afterwards deliberately set himself to win the hearts of the people away from the king his father, and when the plot was ripe, repaid, under false pretences, to Hebron, and raised the standard of rebellion. The perfection of his bodily frame marked him out for rule of the highest kind. Probably he had heard that Solomon was to succeed David, and considered the arrangement unfair to himself, as he was the elder of the two brothers, and, unlike Solomon, was by the mother's as well as the father's side of royal blood. Whether or not he was aware that it was by the divine choice, as recorded in 1 Chron. xxii. 7-10, that Solomon was designated to the sovereignty, is less certain; if he did know it, then in a theocracy like the Jewish, the enormity of his rebellion was further heightened. It is noticeable, in connection with this point, that the priests and Levites sided with David, and brought him much moral as well as material support; but the mass of the people seem to have gone against him, and he had to escape with a few faithful followers from Jerusalem to save his life. Of David's two chief counselors, the abler one, Ahithophel, had gone over to Absalom; the other, Hushai, was faithful to David, and went after the fugitive king. David sent him back to Jerusalem to pretend adherence to Absalom, and thwart the counsel of Ahithophel. When the time arrived for offering advice to Absalom, Ahithophel astutely recommended that he should be allowed to take 12,000 men that very night and follow David before David recovered from his depression. He would kill only the king, and the people would then come over to Absalom. Before the scheme was carried out, Hushai was asked if he adhered to it, and of course he raised objections, and proposed a rival scheme of his own, so preposterous that it does not say much for Absalom's penetration that he did not see it was meant to effect his ruin. Hushai counseled long delay, a course which would really tend to make Absalom weaker and David stronger. He flattered Absalom's self-conceit by proposing that he should be commander, which would give the army a poor leader. When victory was achieved, which he assumed to be a certainty, he provided that there should be extensive and unnecessary bloodshed, a serious political blunder as well as a great crime. Hushai's absurd scheme, however, recommended itself to Absalom and the people, and Ahithophel, seeing that it was all over with the rebellion, went home and committed suicide. Hushai, understanding that the danger was not yet over, sent David counsel immediately to cross the Jordan, which he did. Absalom and the rebel army were beginning to revert to the policy of Ahithophel; and ultimately a compromise was made between his plan and that of Hushai, i. e. hostilities should be immediate, but Absalom should be the commander-in-chief. The battle took place in the wood of Ephraim, apparently near Mahanaim, where David was then residing. The rebel host, undisciplined and badly led, went down at once before David's veterans, handled by three skillful commanders. When the rout took place, Absalom, riding furiously on a mule, got his head entangled among the spreading branches of an oak, great disservice being done him by the long hair of which he was so vain. The animal ran away, leaving him hanging helplessly, but alive. Joab, one of the three commanders, thrust three darts through the heart of the unhappy prince, and ten of Joab's immediate followers surrounding him completed the slaughter. David had given express directions that Absalom should not be injured, and on hearing of his death he gave himself up to excessive grief (2 Sam. xiii. 1-xix. 8). Absalom was buried near the place where he died, in a pit under a great cairn of stones. He had reared for himself a pillar at Jerusalem to keep his name in remembrance (xviii. 17, 18). What is now called Absalom's tomb is in the valley of the Kidron. In the beginning of the fourth century A. D., however, it seems to have been regarded as the tomb of Hezekiah (Bordeaux Pilgrim), but scarcely in agreement with 2 Chron xxxii 33. The decorations of the monument date from the Greco-Roman period, but the chamber itself may be older. According to the title, Ps iii. was composed by David during Absalom's rebellion; perhaps also Ps. vii.

2. Father of Mattathias and probably of Jonathan, captains of the Jewish army under the Maccabees Jonathan and Simon (1 Mac. xi 70; xiii. 11; Antiq. xiii. 5, 7, 6, 4).

Ab'shai. See ABISHAI.

A-bu'bus.

Father of that Ptolemy who was the governor of the district about Jericho (1 Mac. xvi 11, 15)

A-byss' [bottomless].

Hades, the place of the dead (Rom. x. 7, R. V.); in particular the dwelling of evil spirits, presided over by Apollyon, that is, Satan (Rev. ix. 11; xvii. 8; xx 1-3, in A. V. bottomless pit; cp. Luke viii. 31, in A. V. the deep)

A-ca'ci-a. See SHITTAH.

Ac'cad.

An ancient city in the land of Shinar and one of four towns which constituted the original kingdom of Nimrod (Gen. x 10). It is also mentioned by Nebuchadnezzar called the First, who reigned at Babylon about 1150 B. C. (VR 56, 50). The name was extended to denote a district called the land of Accad. This district, at one period at least, embraced northern Babylonia, adjacent to Assyria, and included within its bounds the cities of Babylon and Cutha.

Ac'co, in A. V. ACCHO [hot sand].

A city on a small promontory of the coast of Palestine, about 25 miles south of Tyre. The town looks across the bay of its own name to mount Carmel, about 8 miles to the south. It was assigned to the tribe of Asher, but was not occupied by the Hebrews (Judg. i. 31). In the time of Hoshea it submitted to Shalmaneser, king of Assyria (Antiq. ix. 14, 2); and it suffered from the same nation in the reign of Ashurbanipal. A century or so before Christ its name was changed to Ptolemais, in honor of one of the early Ptolemies. It acquired importance politically as the key of Galilee and as a seaport at the end of commercial routes to Decapolis and Arabia (1 Mac. v. 15, 21, 55; x. 1; Antiq. xiii. 12, 2 seq.). Jonathan Maccabæus was treacherously slain there (1 Mac. xii 48; Antiq. xiii. 6, 2). A large number of Jews found a home within its walls (War, ii. 18, 5), and a Christian community early grew up here. On his last journey to Jerusalem, Paul spent a day here with the brethren (Acts xxi.

7). Later the town became the seat of a Christian bishop. The Arabs restored the old name, which the Franks corrupted into Acre. It was taken in A. D. 1191 by Philip Augustus, king of France, and Richard I., king of England. From A. D. 1229 it was held by the Knights of St John, and was often called in consequence St Jean d'Acre. Prior to 1799 it was strongly fortified by Jezzar Pasha, who ruled with energy, but with such cruelty that he was nicknamed "the Butcher." In that year it was attacked by Napoleon, who was baffled, and at once began his retreat from Syria. Jezzar's victory was largely due to English sailors, who had been landed to give him aid. In 1832 it was wrested from the Turkish sultan by one of his subjects, Ibrahim Pasha, son of Mohammed Ali, the ruler of Egypt. On November 3, 1840, it was bombarded by the British and Austrian fleets, until the day was decided by the explosion of the powder magazine, which caused the death of from 1700 to 2000 Egyptian soldiers. The place was given back to the sultan, under whose rule it still remains. It is now a walled town, with a single land gate at the southeast angle and a sea gate leading to the shipping in the harbor. Its ramparts, injured by the bombardment of 1840, have not been repaired. Its inhabitants number about 8000. Grain and cotton are exported.

Ac'cos [Greek form of Hakkoz (1 Chron. xxiv. 10)]

The priestly family Hakkoz, probably (1 Mac. viii 17).

Ac-cur'sed.

Anything on which a curse has been pronounced, devoting it to destruction (Josh vi. 18; vii 1, 11, 13, 15; xxii. 20) See ANATHEMA.

A-cel'da-ma. See AKELDAMA.

A-cha'ia.

Originally a state of Greece situated in the northern part of the Peloponnesus (now the Morea), and comprehending Corinth and its isthmus. After Greece had been conquered by the Romans, the emperor Augustus Cæsar divided that country with the adjacent regions into two provinces, Macedonia and Achaia. The latter comprehended the whole of the Peloponnesus, with continental Greece S. of Illyricum, Epirus, and Thessaly. Corinth was the capital, and was the residence of the proconsul by whom the province was ruled. It is in the second or comprehensive sense that the word Achaia is used in the New Testament (Acts xviii. 12, 27; xix. 21; Rom. xv 26; 2 Cor. i. 1; ix. 2; 1 Thess. i. 7, 8).

A-cha'i-cus [belonging to Achaia].

A Christian who came with two others from Corinth to Paul (1 Cor. xvi. 17).

A'chan and Achar [trouble; or, he has troubled].

A son of Carmi, of the house of Zimri, family of Zerah, tribe of Judah. At the capture of Jericho he appropriated to his own use and hid in his tent a Babylonish garment and a wedge of gold, part of the spoil of Jericho, which had been devoted to utter destruction. He thereby troubled Israel. His transgression led to the defeat of the Israelites before Ai. Lots were then cast to discover the culprit who had brought on the catastrophe, and Achan was pointed out as the individual. He made confession of his guilt, but this did not avert his fate. He was stoned to death in the valley of Achor (Josh. vii. 1-26; xxii. 20; 1 Chron. ii. 7).

A'char. See ACHAN.

A'chaz. See AHAZ.

Ach'bor [a mouse].

1. The father of Baal-hanan, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 38; 1 Chron. i. 49).

2. The son of Michaiah and father of Elnathan. He was a trusted officer at the court of Josiah (2 Kin. xxii. 12, 14; Jer. xxi. 22; xxxvi. 12). Called Abdon in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20.

A'chim [Greek, from Hebrew Jachin or Jakim, Jehovah will establish]

An ancestor of Jesus in the line of Joseph, who lived after the exile (Mat. i. 14).

A'chish [Philistine name, meaning is unknown].

The son of Maach and the king of Gath, to whom David twice fled during the time that he was persecuted by Saul (1 Sam. xxi. 10-15; xxvii. 1-12, xxviii. 1, 2; xxix. 1-11). He is probably the Achish who was king of Gath at the beginning of Solomon's reign: for the latter was the son of Maachah, a name which is radically identical with Maach the father of the Achish already known. The reign of about fifty years required by this assumption is not extraordinary (cp. among many others the reigns of Uzziah and Manasseh). Achish survived his contemporary, David, at least three years (1 Kin. ii. 39). In the title of Ps. xxxiv. he is called Abimelech, which appears to have been an official designation of the Philistine kings as Pharaoh was a title of the Egyptian monarchs.

Ach'me-tha [Median Hanqmatāna].

A city in the province of the Medes. When the Jews asserted that Cyrus had issued a decree permitting them to build the temple, their adversaries sent to Babylon to inquire if the document were in existence. Darius ordered an investigation. The house of the archives where the treasures were laid up in Babylon was first searched, but in vain. The quest was continued in Achmetha in the province of the Medes, and the decree was found in the palace (Ezra v. 6-vi. 2). There is no reason to doubt that Achmetha was Ecbatana, the capital of Media, the summer residence of the Persian kings, and a treasure city (Herod. i. 98; iii. 64; Xenophon, Cyropæd. viii. 6, 22). It is the modern Hamadan.

A'chor [trouble].

The valley near Jericho where the unhappy Achan was stoned to death (Josh. vii. 24-26; Is. lxxv. 10; Hos. ii. 15). It lay south of Jericho, for it formed part of the northern boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 7), whereas Jericho was a city of Benjamin.

Ach'sah, in A. V. once Achsa (1 Chron. ii. 49), an inconsistency from which the original edition of A. V. was free [a leg-band, an anklet].

A daughter of Caleb, son of Jephunneh, who promised her in marriage to anyone who should capture Kirjath-sepher. Othniel, his younger brother or half-brother, took the town, and received the maiden. At her request her father gave her the upper and nether springs (Josh. xv. 16-19; Judg. i. 12-15; 1 Chron. ii. 49). See DEBIR.

Ach'shaph [fascination]

A border town of Asher, originally Canaanite, with a king, conquered by Joshua (Josh. xi. 1; xii. 20). To judge from Josh. xix. 25 it lay not far from Acco.

Ach'zib or Che'zib, as it was with equal correctness pronounced by the Hebrews [deceitful].

1. A town of southern Palestine eventually included in Judah (Gen. xxxviii. 5; Josh. xv. 44; Mic. i. 14). Probably the same place as Chozeba (1 Chron. iv. 22). It is commonly identified with ruins at the spring 'An Kezbeh, which is apparently a corruption of the old name.

2. A town on the seacoast of Asher (Josh. xix. 29), but from which the people of that tribe did not drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. i. 31). It was known as Ekdippa to the Greeks and Romans (War, i. 13, 4); and has been identified as Zib, eight and a half miles north of Acre.

Acts of the A-pos'tles, The.

The fifth book of the N. T. The common title, which is as old as the second century, does not mean that the book relates all the acts of the apostles. Its purpose was to show the establishment by the Spirit through the apostles of gentile Christianity. At first Peter and afterwards Paul are most prominent; but frequently the apostles as a body are represented as taking action (Acts i. 23-26; ii. 42; iv. 33; v. 12, 29; vi. 2; viii. 1, 14; xv. 6, 23). The book is addressed to a certain Theophilus, probably a gentile Christian of distinction. The author refers (i. 1) to a previous treatise by him concerning the life and teachings of Christ, which was clearly our Third Gospel, because (1) it was addressed to Theophilus; (2) it consists of a narrative of Christ's life and teaching until his ascension (Luke xxiv. 51); (3) it presents the ministry of Christ with special reference to its universal mission, which would naturally be the point of view adopted by the author of The Acts; (4) the vocabulary and style of the two books are notably alike. Further, while the author does not name himself in either book, he uses the first person plural in certain portions of the narrative of Paul's journeys (Acts xvi. 10-15; xx. 5-xxi. 18; xxvii. 1-xxviii. 16), and by this intimates that he was a companion of the apostle: that he joined him on his second journey at Troas and accompanied him to Philippi, again rejoined him at Philippi in the third journey and went with him to Jerusalem, and traveled with him from Cæsarea to Rome. The earliest tradition of the post-apostolic age assigns both the Third Gospel and The Acts to Luke, and the allusions to Luke in Paul's epistles accord with the above references to his movements in The Acts, while no other of Paul's known companions will fit into them. From Col. iv. 14, Philem. 24, we learn that Luke was with Paul in Rome, and no mention of him occurs in epistles written when, according to The Acts, its author was not with the apostle. Moreover, the use of medical terms (see Hobart, The Medical Language of St. Luke) and the classical elements in his style, as well as his evident acquaintance with the Roman world, indicate that the author was an educated man such as a physician would be likely to be. There should be no doubt, therefore, that Luke wrote both the third Gospel and The Acts. The purpose of The Acts has been already stated. Chap. i recounts Christ's last interviews with the apostles through forty days, his promise of the Spirit and his command to preach to all the world (ver. 8), followed by his ascension and the actions of the disciples until Pentecost. Then follows an account of the church in Jerusalem after Pentecost (ii. 1-viii. 3), in which certain representative facts are described (the first conversions, the first opposition, the first discipline, the first persecution, the first organization, the first martyrdom), and, after each, a brief notice of its effect upon the Church (see ii. 41-47; iv. 23-37; v. 11-16, 41, 42; vi. 7; viii. 1-3). Here Peter is most prominent, though the first martyr and the man who prepared for the following period was Stephen. Next we have an account of the transition of the Church to a missionary religion, offering salvation by faith alone to all men (viii. 4-xii. 25). Here five significant events are described: (1) Philip's work in Samaria and the Ethiopian steward's conversion (viii. 4-40); (2) Saul's conversion and earliest preaching (ix. 1-30); (3) Peter's missionary work in Syria, leading to the conversion of Cornelius and the conviction of the Church that the gospel was for gentiles (ix. 31-xi. 18); (4) the founding of the gentile church of Antioch, a new center for further gentile work (xi. 19-30); (5) the Herodian persecution whereby the Jewish state finally repudiated Christianity (xii). Then follows the establishment of Christianity, chiefly through Paul, in the principal centers of the empire (xiii. to the end). This was done in three great journeys: the first, to Cyprus and the interior of Asia Minor (xiii.; xiv.), led to the Council of Jerusalem (xv. 1-35), when the standing in the Church of uncircumcised gentiles was formally recognized; the second, to Macedonia and Greece (xv. 36-xviii. 22); the third, to Ephesus as well as Greece (xviii. 23-xx. 3), followed by Paul's last visit to Jerusalem (xx. 4-xxi. 26), where he was arrested, and, after defending himself before the Jews, Felix, Festus, and Agrippa, and after two years' imprisonment in Cæsarea (xxi. 27-xxvi. 32) was sent, on his appeal to the emperor, to Rome (xxvii. 1-xxviii. 16), where he preached for two years (xxviii. 17-31). Many think that The Acts was written just at the close of these "two years" (i. e. A. D. 63). Others think Luke ended there because his object was attained in bringing Paul, as an apostolic preacher, to Rome, or because he intended to write a third book descriptive of later events, and that The Acts should be dated a few years later than 63. The remarkable historical accuracy of The Acts has been proved by modern research (see e. g. Ramsay's Church in the Roman Empire). Its harmony with Paul's epistles has been much debated and successfully defended. It is written with much artistic power, and supplies the information necessary to explain the rise of Christianity as a universal religion during the thirty-three years from the death of Christ covered by its narrative. G. T. P

Ad'a-dah [holiday, festival]

A town on the extreme south of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 22). It has not been identified, unless Adada is a misreading of 'Ar'ia (cp. Septuagint). See AKOER 3

A'dah [as a Hebrew word, means adornment, beauty]

1 One of Lamech's wives, and mother of Jabal and Jubal (Gen. iv. 19-21, 23).

2 One of Esau's wives, daughter of Elon, the Hittite (Gen. xxxvi. 2, 4); in Gen. xxvi. 34 called Bashemath. Double names are frequent among men; and it is stated that women in the East more frequently adopt new names than do men, and are apt to alter their name if they re-marry or change their religion.

A-da'iah [Jehovah has adorned].

1. A man of Bozkath, father of Josiah's mother (2 Kin. xxii. 1, R. V.).

2 A Levite descended from Gershom (1 Chron. vi. 41, 42).

3. A priest, descended through Jeroham from Malchijah (1 Chron. ix. 12; Neh. xi. 12).

4. A Benjamite, son of Shimhi (1 Chron. viii. 21).

5 and 6. Two men descended from Bani, each of whom was induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 29, 39).

7. A son of Joiarib (Neh. xi. 5).

8. Father of Maaseiah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

A-da'li-a.

One of Haman's ten sons (Esth. ix. 8).

Ad'am [human being, meaning etymologically either ruddy or formed].

1. The first human being. Mankind was made, as were all other created things, by God (Gen. i. 26): and was made male and female (27; Mat xix 4-6), the man being first formed, then the woman (Gen. ii 7, 20-23; 1 Tim. ii. 13). Like other animals and later men, his body was formed of the ordinary materials of the universe and life was granted by God (Gen ii 7; cp 19; vi 17, vii 22, Job x 8-12; xxvii. 3; xxxiii 4). He was made in the image of God (Gen i 26, 27). Paul describes the similarity as consisting in knowledge, or, more completely, in knowledge, righteousness, and true holiness (Eph iv. 22-25; Col. iii. 9, 10). Mankind was invested with dominion over the inferior animals (Gen. i 26-28), was exhorted to be fruitful and to multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it (28); and shared in the approval when God pronounced that everything which he had made was very good (31).

Adam, the first of mankind, was placed with Eve in the garden of Eden to dress it and keep it in order. A command was laid upon him, in the nature of a covenant of life and death (Gen. ii 16, 17). On his transgression, sentence of death was passed upon him, toil and undesired results were annexed to labor, and he was expelled from the garden (iii 1-24; 2 Esdr. iii 4-7, 21, 22). Afterwards he had children, Cain, Abel, and, when he was 130 years old, Seth. He lived 800 years more, at last dying at the age of 930. See CHRONOLOGY. Paul draws a double parallel between Adam and Christ, calling our Lord the last Adam (Rom. v 12-21, 1 Cor. xv 22, 45).

2. A city in the Jordan valley beside Zarethan (Josh. iii 16). Its identification with ed-Damieh on the western bank of the river, less than a mile below the mouth of the Jabbok and eighteen miles above Jericho, must be received with caution.

Ad'a-mah [soil].

A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. xix 36). The Palestine explorers place it at ed-Damieh, five miles southwest of Tiberias.

Ad'a-mant [in Greek, unconquerable].

An extremely hard metal or mineral, especially the diamond. It is the traditional rendering of the Hebrew Shamir, a hard substance compared with flint and the stony heart (Ezek. iii. 9, Zech. vii 12), and used to point graving tools (Jer. xvii. 1, where it is rendered "diamond").

Ad'a-mi [human], in R V Adami-nekeb [perhaps, Adami of the pass].

A frontier town of Naphtali (Josh. xix 33), called Adam of the pass, in distinction probably from Adam of the ford (cp. Josh. iii. 16); perhaps the ruin ad-Damieh, five miles S. W. of Tiberias, at the mouth of a pass on the old caravan route from Gilcad to Acre. Conder, however, suggests the ruined village of Admah on the table-land midway between Tiberias and Beth-shean, and overlooking the Jordan from the west. See NEKEB.

A'dar, I. [perhaps, amplitude].

A town of Judah, better written Addar (q. v.).

A'dar, II. [Assyro-babylonian adaru and addaru, probably dark, cloudy].

The later name of the twelfth month of the Jewish year, borrowed by the Jews from the Babylonian calendar during the exile (Ezra vi 15, Esth. iii. 7, 13; ix. 15). It extended from the new moon in February to that in March. See YEAR.

Ad'a-sa.

A town near Beth-horon (1 Mac. vii 40, 45, cp. 39, Antiq. xii 10, 5), at the junction of the two main lines of advance on Jerusalem from the north.

Ad'be-el [perhaps, a miracle of God].

A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv 13, 1 Chron. i 29). In the eighth century before Christ a tribe called Idiba'il dwelt in northern Arabia, at no great distance from the frontier of Egypt.

Ad'dan or Addon; the pronunciation with a, which appears to be Aramaic or Babylonian, being exchanged for its regular Hebrew modification [Babylonian, native form and meaning unknown].

A place in Babylonia from which persons who could not prove their Israelitish descent went to Palestine after the captivity (Isa. 59; Neh. vii 61).

Ad'dar [perhaps, largeness].

1. A town of Judah, on the southern boundary line of Palestine (Josh. xv. 3, in V written Adar, and Num. xxxiv 4). In the latter passage it is called Hazar-adda, a village of Addar. See HEZRON, 1.

2. A Benjaminite. See ARD.

Ad'der.

The rendering of four Hebrew words referring probably to four distinct species of venomous snake.

1. Shaphphon, the creeper. Probably Vipera cerastes, the Horned Sand-snake of Arabia and Egypt. At Thebes it was regarded as sacred (cp. Herod. ii 74). It is a venomous viper, three to six feet long, of a gray color, and with a horn above each eye. It hides in the sand, and may well bite the serpent which bites the horses' heels so that the rider falls backward (Gen. xlix. 17).

2. Pethen, a species of serpent incapable of being affected by the voice of the snake-charmer, and therefore called the deaf adder (Ps. lviii. 4, 5). It is very venomous (Isa. 13). It is the asp of Deut. xxxii. 3, Job xx. 14, 16; and Isaiah xi. 8. Probably the Naja haje of Egypt; see ASP.

3. Akshub (Ps. cxl. 3). In the Septuagint and in the quotation in Rom. iii. 1 it is translated "asp." Bochart considers it the Common Adder (Pelias berus), and Cuvier Hamilton Smith the Puff Adder of the Cape Colonists, Vipera arietans, but there is as yet no certainty as to the identification.

4. Siph'ons (Prov. xxiii. 32), translated in Is. xi. 8; xiv 29; lix. 5, cockatrice or basilisk; see these words.

Ad'di [a Greek form of Iddo].

An ancestor of Christ who lived several generations before Zerubbabel (Luke iii. 23).

Ad'don. See ADDAN.

A'der. See EDER.

Ad'i-da. See ADITHAIM and HADID.

Ad'i-el [ornament of God].

1. A Simeonite (1 Chron. iv. 36).

2. A priest, son of Jahzerah (1 Chron. ix. 12).

3. Father of the supervisor of David's treasures (1 Chron. xxvii 25).

Ad'in [soft, delicate].

Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 15) and Ezra (viii. 6). Its chief signed the covenant made by Nehemiah to serve Jehovah (Neh. x. 16).

Ad'i-na [delicate].

A Reubenite, one of David's military officers (1 Chron. xi. 42).

Ad'i-no.

One of David's mighty men, an Eznite; the same as Josheb-basshebeth (2 Sam. xxiii. 8 A. V., and A. V. margin and R. V.). The verse as it stands is defective. Luther and most modern interpreters change the text, altering the words "Adino the Eznite" to accord with 1 Chron. xi. 11.

Ad-i-tha'im [perhaps, double booty-town].

A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 36). Sometimes identified with Adida, but Adida is rather Hadid.

Ad'lai [justice, or possibly justice of Jehovah].

Father of a herdsman of David (1 Chron. xxvii. 29).

Ad'mah [perhaps, redness].

One of the cities of the plain (Gen. x. 19; xiv. 2, 8) which was destroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen. xix. 25, 28, 29; Deut. xxix. 23; Hos. xi. 8).

Ad'ma-tha [Persian name of doubtful meaning].

One of the seven princes of Persia and Media under Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 14) See PRINCE.

Ad'na [Aramaic, pleasure].

1. A priest, head of the father's house Harim in the second generation after the exile (Neh. xii. 15).

2. A son of Pahath-moab, induced by Ezra to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra x. 30).

Ad'nah [pleasure].

1. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 20).

2. A man of Judah, of high military rank under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 14).

Ad-o-ni-be'zek [lord of Bezek].

A king of Bezek, conquered by the warriors of the tribe of Judah, who inflicted on him a cruel mutilation. This he regarded as a divine requital for similar cruelties perpetrated by him on seventy kings (Judg. i. 4-7).

Ad-o-ni'jah [Jehovah is lord].

1. A son of David by Haggith, one of his wives. He was the fourth son born to the king at Hebron (2 Sam. iii. 2, 4). He was a goodly, probably meaning a handsome, young man, and apparently his father's next favorite after Absalom. Blinded by foolish fondness, David never rebuked him for a misdeed. When David was stricken in years Adonijah attempted to seize the throne. He was doubtless aware of his father's intention that Solomon should be king (1 Kin. i. 13; 1 Chron. xxiii. 1; xxviii. 5); but since the first and third born sons of David, and probably the second born also, were dead, Adonijah as the eldest remaining son doubtless felt that he had a claim to the crown, although neither law nor custom required the succession to go to the eldest. He won Joab to his cause, who, he hoped, would bring with him the army; and Abiathar, the priest, who, he expected, would bring with him the priests and the Levites. But Zadok the priest, Benaiah, commander of the royal bodyguard, and Nathan the prophet he did not gain. He invited his partisans to a great open-air feast at the stone of Zoheth by the fountain of Rogel, and had himself proclaimed king. But Solomon had been divinely chosen to be the successor to David, and Bath-sheba, Solomon's mother, supported by Nathan the prophet, waited on the aged king to remind him of his promise concerning Solomon, report the proceedings of Adonijah, and ask instructions. Promptly, by David's order, Solomon was proclaimed king; the open-air feast came to an abrupt termination, the guests took to flight, and Adonijah sought asylum at the altar (1 Kin. i. 5-50). Solomon pardoned him for the time; but when Adonijah asked that the maid Abishag be given him to wife and thereby justified the belief that he was again aiming at the kingdom, Solomon ordered that he be put to death (vs. 51-53; ii. 13-25).

2. One of the Levites whom Jehoshaphat sent to instruct the people of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 8).

3. For Neh. x. 16, see ADONIKAM

Ad-o-ni'kam [the Lord arises].

Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon both with Zerubbabel and with Ezra (Ezra ii. 13; viii. 13; Neh. vii. 18). The head of this family, apparently, sealed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (Neh. x. 16), but is called Adonijah.

Ad-o-ni'ram [the Lord is exalted].

An officer who was over the tribute during the reigns of David and Solomon. He was the son of Abda, and was called also Adoram (2 Sam. xx. 24) and Hadoram (2 Chron. x. 18). When the ten tribes revolted, Rehoboam sent him to treat with the rebels, who, however, instead of listening to him, stoned him to death (2 Sam. xx. 24; 1 Kin. iv. 6; xii. 18; 2 Chron. x. 18).

A-do'ni-zedek, in A. V. Adonizedec [lord of righteousness].

A king of Jerusalem who, on learning that Ai had been captured by the Israelites, and that the Gibeonites had made peace with Joshua, formed a confederacy with four other Amorite kings to punish Gibeon. He and his confederates were defeated, taken, and slain (Josh. x. 1-27). In the Septuagint called Adonibezek.

A-dop'tion.

The act of taking a stranger to be one's own child, as in the case of Moses and Esther (Ex. ii. 10; Esth. ii. 7).

In the N. T. the word is used to denote:

1. The choice by Jehovah of the Jewish nation to be his special people (Rom. ix. 4).

2. The reception of all true Christians to be in a special sense the sons of God (Gal. iv. 5; Eph. i. 4). The spirit of adoption enables us to feel to God as children to a loving father. It is distinguished from the spirit of bondage, which compels one to feel to him as a slave to a master (Rom. viii. 14-21).

3. The redemption of the body; its deliverance from sin, pain, and death in the glorified state (Rom. viii. 23).

A-do'ra. See ADORAIM.

Ad-o-ra'im [perhaps, two mounds].

A city of Judah fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 9). It is probably identical with Adora, shortened into Dora, a town of the interior, near Idumaea, and after the exile reckoned as belonging to the latter country (Antiq. xiii. 9, 1; 15, 4; xiv. 5, 3, War, i. 2, 5; 1 Mac. xiii. 20). Since Robinson's researches, it is identified with Dura, a village on a hillside five miles west of Hebron.

A-do'ram. See ADONIRAM.

A-dram'me-lech [god Adar is king].

1. A deity to whom the colouists of Samaria, who had been brought from Sepharvaim, burnt their children in the fire (2 Kin. xvii. 31). The god Adar was the sun worshiped under a particular attribute.

2. A son of Sennacherib. With another brother he murdered his father, and afterwards escaped to Armenia (2 Kin. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38).

Ad-ra-myt'ti-um.

A maritime city in Æolia. Under the Romans it belonged to the province of Asia. The vessel in which Paul embarked at Cæsarea for Rome was a ship of Adramyttium, about to sail to the places on the coast of Asia (Acts xxvii. 2).

A'dri-a.

A part of the Mediterranean (Acts xxvii. 27). The name was derived from the commercial town of Adria on the lower Po, and in the narrowest sense it denoted only the neighboring part of the sea. But the name was extended to include the expanse of sea as far as the extreme southern points of Greece and Italy (Ptolemy iii.; Pausanias, Eliac. v.; Procopius, Bell. Vand. i. 14).

A'dri-el [flock of God].

A Meholathite, to whom Saul gave his daughter Merab in marriage, though he had previously promised her conditionally to David (1 Sam. xviii. 19).

A-dul'lam [enclosure].

A town in the Shephelah, in the territory of Judah, mentioned between Jarmuth and Socoh (Josh. xv. 35). It was in existence, inhabited by Canaanites, as early as the time of Jacob (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 2). A petty king ruled over it at the time of the conquest (Josh. xii. 15). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 7), continued to flourish in the time of Micah the prophet (Mic. i. 15), and was inhabited after the exile (Neh. xi. 30; 2 Mac. xii. 38). In its vicinity was the cave which David at one period of his wanderings made his headquarters, and whither his father and his brethren and many other adherents went down to join him (1 Sam. xxii.; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13; Antiq. vi. 12, 3). M. Clermont-Ganneau is possibly right in hearing an echo of the name still lingering in 'Aid el-Miyeh. This name belongs to a hill which is crowned with a fortress and has caves in its sides. The hill stands on the south side of a ravine at its junction with the southern extension of the valley of Elah (es-Sunt), and is about two miles from the place where the fight took place between David and Goliath.

A-dul'ter-y.

1. In a special sense, sexual intercourse of a married man with a female not his wife, or that of a married woman with a man not her husband. Polygamy, with inferior wives and concubines, is not adultery. Under the Mosaic law adultery was punished with death (Lev. xx. 10).

2. In a general sense, all sexual impurity in thought, word, or deed, or whatever tends thereto. This is the sense in the seventh commandment, interpreted on the principles of the Sermon on the Mount (Ex. xx. 14; Deut. v. 18, Mat. v. 27, 28).

3. Figuratively, the worship of false gods or other infidelity to the covenant with Jehovah (Jer. iii. 8, 9, Ezek. xxiii. 37, 43; Hos. ii. 2-13), God claiming our undivided affections, as a husband does the undivided regard of the woman who has sworn him fidelity.

A-dum'mim [red objects].

The ascent of Adummim is a pass leading up from the Jordan valley to the hill country.

The boundary between Judah and Benjamin passed near it (Josh. xv. 7; xviii. 17), and the shortest and most traveled road from Jerusalem to Jericho ran through it. According to Jerome, the name belonged to a hamlet, which in his day was lying in ruins, and which was still called Maledomim, apparently the full Hebrew phrase Ascent of Adamim. Jerome ascribes the origin of the name to the blood frequently spilled there by robbers (cp. Luke x. 30); but it more probably arose from the red marl of the neighborhood. An echo of the name is still heard in Tala'at ed-Dumm, Ascent of Blood, the name given to a hill and fortress half way between Jerusalem and Jericho, and to the wady which the road follows downward.

E'ne-as [Latin from N. T. Greek Aineas, classic Greek Aineias; the name of a Trojan hero].

A man at Lydda bedridden eight years with palsy. His restoration by the power of the risen Jesus resulted in large increase of the Church in that region (Acts ix. 32-35).

E'non [Greek, probably from Aramaic 'enan, fountains].

A village, or merely a locality of perennial springs, near Salim, where John at one time at least baptized because there was there much water (or, as in Greek, many waters) (John iii. 23). The site has not been identified. But according to Jerome, E'non and Salim were situated in the Jordan valley, eight Roman miles south of Scythopolis. The names have ceased to be heard. Measurement indicates either the place now called ed-Deir, in the neighborhood of which are seven springs and extensive ruins, or Umm el-'Amdan, hard by on the east, or the ruins and spring at the base of Tell Ridghah, which, however, is only seven Roman miles from Scythopolis.

The modern map can, indeed, show villages bearing the names of 'Ainun and Salim. A town called Salim is situated four miles east of Shechem, on an extensive plateau south of the wady Far'ah. 'Ainun is a ruin on the eastern slope of the wady Tubas, about ten miles northeast of Shechem and four miles north of the Far'ah valley. The objection to identifying 'Ainun with Enon mentioned by John is that 'Ainun is not near Salim. The villages are distant from each other about eight miles, and the great wady Far'ah lies between. 'Ainun is but little farther from the important city of Shechem than from Salim, and is more closely connected with Shechem by road. Rejecting 'Ainun, one thinks of the plentiful waters of the Far'ah valley but three miles distant from Salim, or even the two living springs which supply Salim with water; but a place of fountains near this Salim would be in Samaria, and it is scarcely probable that John the Baptist was laboring among the Samaritans (cp. Mat. iii. 5; x. 5; Luke iii. 3).

The only other site proposed, which offers any attractions, is Shilhim, in the Septuagint Seleim, in the wilderness in the extreme south of Judah, near which was a place called Ain (Josh. xv. 32); but Ain is constantly connected with Rimmon and not with Shilhim.

Ag'a-bus [meaning is uncertain].

A Christian prophet of Jerusalem. He went to Antioch and predicted a great famine which took place in the days of the emperor Claudius (Acts xi. 28; see Antiq. xx. 2, 6; 5, 2). When Paul passed through Cæsarea on his last journey to Jerusalem, Agabus, who was there, bound his own hands and feet with Paul's girdle, and announced that this would be done also to the owner of the girdle when he reached the capital (Acts xxi. 10, 11).

A'gag [perhaps, flaming].

Whether Agag was a title of the kings of Amalek, as Pharaoh was for those of Egypt, or was a recurring name in the royal line, is unknown. Specially 1 A king of Amalek whose greatness was alluded to by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 7).

2 The king of Amalek slain by Samuel, after he had been spared by Saul (1 Sam. xv. 9-33).

A'gag-ite.

An appellation given to Haman, the great enemy of the Jews (Esth. iii. 1, 10, viii. 3-5). Its reference to his Amalekite descent (Antiq. xi. 6, 5, and see AGAG) is extremely doubtful.

A'gar. See Hagar.

Ag'ate [named from a river in Sicily near which the agate abounded].

A precious stone composed of various kinds of colored quartz, especially of amethyst, chalcedony, and jasper. Two Hebrew words are so rendered.

1 Kadkod, which means sparkling (Is. liv. 12; Ezek. xxxv. 16, in A. V.). This characteristic ill accords with the agate, which in its natural state is wanting in lustre, hence the R. V. translates it Ruby, and the margin of the A. V. Chrysoprase.

2 Shbo; perhaps from shabah to lead captive, or less probably from Sheba, from which it may have been brought. It was the middle stone in the third row of gems on the high priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 19; xxxix. 12).

Age.

1. The time counted by years, or more precisely by years, months, and days, that one has lived in the world. Extraordinary age is ascribed to men in the registers of Gen. v. and xi., dwindling as the genealogy becomes more particular as it approaches Abraham; see CHRONOLOGY. Abraham died at the age of 175 (Gen. xxv. 7), and his wife Sarah at 127 (xxiii. 1), Isaac at 180 (xxxv. 28), Jacob at 147 (xlvii. 28), Joseph at 110 (l. 26), Moses at 120 (Deut. xxxiv. 7), and Joshua at 110 (Josh. xxiv. 29). The ordinary length of human life is reckoned at 70 years, or, by reason of strength, 80 years, in the prayer of Moses (Ps. xc. 10). David died an old man at 70 (2

Sam. v. 4; 1 Kin ii 11). Veneration for old age is inculcated in the Bible (Lev. xix 32; Prov. xx 29), and old age itself is considered a blessing (Ex. xx 12; Deut. v 16).

2. A frequent rendering in the N. T. of the Greek αἰών, the later Latin Æon:

(a) A certain specified period of the world's history, past or to come (1 Cor. x 11, in A V. world; Eph. ii 7; iii 9; Col. i. 26, Heb vi 5—all R V.) More frequently it signifies an indefinitely long period of time, eternity past or to come; "unto the ages," being equivalent to "forever" (cp text and margin of R V of Luke i 33; Rom i 25; ix. 5; xi 36, Heb. xiii 8), or "for evermore" (2 Cor xi 31) "The age of the ages" is "for ever and ever" (Eph iii 21) "Unto the ages of ages" is also "for ever and ever" (Gal i 5, Phil iv. 20; Rev i 18).

(b) The world literally (Heb i 2, R V. margin); or figuratively (Mat xiii 22, Luke xvi 8, xx 34, Rom xii 2; 1 Cor i 20; ii. 6, 7, 8; 2 Cor iv 4; Gal i 4, 2 Tim iv. 10, Titus ii 12—all R V. margin) The connecting link between a and b is when the world means the duration of this world (Mat xii 32, xiii 40, xxiv 3, and of that to come (Mark x 30; Luke xviii 30 Heb ii 5).

(c) The course of the world (Eph ii 2, R V. text and margin)

Ag'e-e [perhaps, a fugitive]

A Hararite, the father of one of David's mighty men (2 Sam xxiii 11)

Ag'ri-cul-ture.

The cultivation of the soil. The word does not occur in Scripture, but the idea does; and the analogous term husbandry is found both in the O T and N T, while husbandman is common. Adam was expected to dress the garden of Eden (Gen i 15); Cam cultivated the soil (iv 2), Noah planted a vineyard (ix. 20); and Isaac sowed (xxvi 12). Agriculture was in an advanced stage among the ruling race in the delta of the Nile at the time of the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt. Cereals of various kinds were cultivated and exported (Gen xi 49, 57; xiii. 2). Wheat, rye, or rather spelt, and barley, are mentioned, besides which there were crops of flax (Ex. ix 31, 32). The crops cultivated by the Israelites were sometimes summed up as corn and wine (Gen xxvii. 37; Ps. iv. 7). If a third agricultural product was named it was generally olives (Deut. vi 11). When the enumeration was more ample, the list was increased to "wheat, barley, vines, fig-trees, pomegranates, and olives" (viii 8), not to speak of honey, which was from wild bees (cp also xi. 14; xii. 17). To this list Isaiah adds fitches (Is. xxviii 25, 27), and Ezekiel beans, lentils, and millet (Ezek iv 9). The Israelites had ploughs drawn by oxen (1 Kin. xix. 19; Is. ii. 4), and pruning-hooks, sickles, etc. (ibid.; Deut. xvi. 9; Joel iii. 13, etc.). The purpose now effected by rotation of crops was carried out by letting the land lie fallow during the seventh year (Ex. xxiii. 10, 11).

As a rule, good crops were reaped, and they would have been so to a larger extent had proper attention been paid to the storing of water in reservoirs, so that absence of rain should not result, as it generally did, in famine. Agriculture and the keeping of flocks and herds continued, through all the period of scriptural history, the staple industries of Palestine, which was not to any considerable extent a commercial land.

A-grip'pa. See HEROD.

A'gur [garnered, hired, or collector].

Son of Jakch, and author of the maxims contained in Proverbs xxx (see ver 1).

A'hab [a father's brother].

1. A king of Israel and son and successor of Omri. He began to reign about 874 B C, in the thirty-eighth year of Asa, king of Judah (1 Kin. xvi 29). He married an idolatress of masculine temperament, Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Sidon. She worshipped Baal, and her husband being weak and irresolute, she ruled over him and made him also a Baal-worshipper (30-33). This was a revolution in the national religion of Israel. When Jeroboam set up the two golden calves, he still desired to worship Jehovah nominally, using them as helps for the purpose. But Ahab under Jezebel's influence, wholly gave up the adoration of Jehovah, Baal being a rival god. The intolerant Jezebel did not stop with Ahab's perversion, but attempted to force the whole people to adopt her faith. The prophets of Jehovah were sought out and slain. Only a remnant escaped, being hidden in a cave by a high functionary, Obadiah. Now, however, appeared the most formidable prophet known in the history of Israel, Elijah the Tishbite. He was sent to Ahab to predict years of drought and famine as the punishment of Ahab's sin. Toward the close of the drought, which lasted three years and six months (1 Kin xviii 1; Luke iv 25, Jas v 17), Elijah, by the divine command, again confronted Ahab, and demanded that the prophets of Baal and he should meet on the top of mount Carmel and submit the question between them to a decisive test. The meeting took place, Jehovah vindicated himself by sending fire from heaven to consume Elijah's sacrifice. By direction of the prophet the people who had witnessed the event and acknowledged Jehovah took the 450 prophets of Baal and 400 prophets of the Asherah down to the brook Kishon, and slew them. Jezebel, on learning what had been done, uttered imprecations against herself if Elijah were alive by the morrow. The prophet fearing for his life, fled to mount Horeb. God sent him back with the charge to anoint Hazael to be the king of Damascus and the scourge of idolatrous Israel, Jehu to be the king of Israel to supplant the family of Ahab and put down the worship of Baal by the power of the state, and Elisha to be prophet to destroy idolatry.

by moral suasion. The cup of iniquity of Ahab and Jezebel was made full to overflowing by the affair of Naboth's vineyard. About this time Ahab had won a victory over Benhadad of Damascus, king of Syria, and had permitted that potentate, who had been captured, to escape with a treaty. The approach of Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, led to an alliance between Ben-hadad of Damascus, Ahab of Israel, and other neighboring kings, to resist the invader. Ahab furnished 2000 chariots and 10,000 infantry. The allies were defeated at Karkar, in the district of Hamath, in 854 B. C. The war with Damascus was soon afterwards renewed, and Ahab, taking advantage of a visit from Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, proposed a joint expedition for the recovery of Ramoth-gilead, beyond Jordan. The prophets of Baal spoke well of the enterprise. Micaiah, the only prophet of Jehovah obtainable, foreboded the death of Ahab. The man of doom resolved to go into the battle disguised, while proposing that the king of Judah should put on his royal robes, thus becoming a mark for every missile. But a certain man drew a bow at a venture and smote Ahab between the joints where the plates of his armor met. Ahab died that evening, and the siege of Ramoth-gilead was raised. Ahab's chariot and armor were washed in the pool of Samaria, the dogs, as Elijah had predicted, licking his blood. Ahab died after a reign of twenty-two years, and was succeeded by his son Ahaziah (1 Kin. xvi. 29-xxii. 40, 2 Chron. xviii. 1-34).

2. A lying and immoral prophet, a son of Kolaiah. Jeremiah predicted that Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, would roast him in the fire (Jer. xxix. 21-23).

A-har'ah.

A son of Benjamin, probably the founder of a family (1 Chron. viii. 1), who is called Ehi (Gen. xlv. 21) and Ahiram (Num. xxvi. 38).

A-har'hel [possibly, strength hath tarried].

A son of Harum, founder of a family which was enrolled in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 8).

A'has-al. See AHZAI.

A'has'bai [perhaps a foreign name].

A Maacathite, the father of Eliphelet, one of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 34).

A'has-u-e'rus [from Persian K'hshaya, king].

1. The father of Darius the Mede (Dan. ix. 1). See DARIUS.

2. A Persian king, the husband of Esther (Esth. i. 2, 19; ii. 16, 17). Ahasuerus is Khshayarsha, whom the Greeks called Xerxes. The book of Esther tells of his sensuality, his fickleness, his lack of forethought, his despotism, and his cruelty. Greek history presents essentially the same picture of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 35, 37; ix. 107).

He was the son of Darius Hystaspis, whom he succeeded on the Persian throne, 486 B. C. His mother was Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus. In the second year of his reign he subdued the Egyptians, who had revolted against his father Darius. After about four years' preparation, he led an immense host to invade Greece; but fled back to Persia on seeing his great fleet defeated (480 B. C.) by a much smaller number of Greek ships at Salamis. The next year (479 B. C.) his general, Mardonius, whom he had left behind with an army, allowed his camp at Platea to be forced by the Greeks, when such a slaughter ensued as rendered the Persian invasion hopeless. In 466, after a reign of twenty years, Xerxes was murdered by two of his courtiers, and was succeeded on the throne by his son, Artaxerxes Longimanus. Xerxes is probably again mentioned as Ahasuerus in Ezra iv. 6, where the author completes the history of Samafitan machinations at the Persian court against the Jews, resuming in ver. 24 the narrative which he interrupted at ver. 5. The older interpreters thought that Ahasuerus in this passage referred to Cambyses, son of Cyrus; but there is no evidence that Cambyses was ever called Ahasuerus.

A-ha'va.

A locality in Babylonia, doubtless to the north of Babylon (Ezra viii. 15). It serves to indicate the river or canal in its vicinity on which Ezra assembled the people who proposed to go to Jerusalem with him (vii. 28 with viii. 31). It appears to have been distant about nine days from Babylon (vii. 9; viii. 15, 31). On mustering the Jews who were present and finding no Levites, except priests, among them, Ezra sent for and secured a number of these ministers for the house of God. Here also a fast was kept, and the protection of God supplicated for the journey.

A'haz, in A. V. of N. T. Achaz [he has sustained].

1. A king of Judah who was probably proclaimed king about 741 B. C., when 20 years old, and who succeeded his father Jotham about 734 B. C. He was an idolater, causing his son to pass through the fire, and sacrificing and burning incense on high places and under green trees (2 Kin. xvi. 3, 4). He was unsuccessfully besieged in Jerusalem by the army of Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel (5; Is. vii. 1). In connection with this crisis, before the invading force arrived, Isaiah was sent to exhort him to rely upon Jehovah and not call in foreign aid. He did not believe, and refused to ask a sign. Thereupon the prophet uttered the celebrated prophecy relative to the birth of Immanuel (Is. vii. 1-16); see IMMANUEL. Ahaz turned to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, and purchased his aid with the treasures of the temple and the palace. Tiglath-pileser marched to his assistance. The approach of the Assyrians ians seems to have led Rezin and Pekah to raise the siege of Jerusalem. Tiglath-pileser attacked Philistia, overran Samaria, took Damascus and slew Rezin, and connived at the murder of Pekah and enthronement of Hoshea as king of Israel. With other vassals of Assyria, Ahaz went to Damascus to do homage to Tiglath-pileser (2 Kin xvi.; 2 Chron. xxviii.; Assyrian inscriptions). While there he admired a heathen altar, and had a facsimile of it made at Jerusalem. Ahaz died about the year 726 B. C., after reigning 16 years, and left his son Hezekiah to ascend the throne. Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah prophesied during the whole of Ahaz's reign, zealously witnessing for Jehovah (Is. i. 1, vii. 1-16, Hos. 1. 1).

Ahaz is mentioned on the Assyrian monuments by the name Yauhazi, corresponding to the Hebrew Jehoahaz, the full form of Ahaz. Ahaz means "He has sustained," while Jehoahaz signifies "Jehovah has sustained."

2. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 35, 36, ix. 42).

A-ha-zi'ah [Jehovah hath sustained]

1. A king of Israel who was apparently placed on the throne when his father Ahab marched with the allies against Shalmaneser in 854 B. C. He succeeded his father on the latter's death. His entire reign lasted only two years (1 Kin xvii. 40, 51). He joined with Jehoshaphat in fitting out ships of Tarshish to go to Ophir for gold, but the vessels were wrecked at Ezion-geber. Ahaziah proposed a second attempt, but Jehoshaphat, warned by a prophet, declined (1 Kin xxii. 48, 49; 2 Chron. xx. 35-37). After the death of Ahab, Moab rebelled; but Ahaziah took no steps to reduce it to subjection (2 Kin i. 1, iii. 5). Ahaziah fell through a lattice in his palace, and was seriously injured. He sent to consult Baal-zebub, the god of Ekron, as to the result. Elijah intercepted the messengers, and sent them back with the message that the injury would prove fatal (2 Kin. i. 2-17). Ahaziah left no son to succeed him, so the throne passed over to his brother Jehoram (17).

2. A king of Judah, who began to rule the kingdom in 843 B. C. (2 Kin. ix. 29), apparently during his father's sickness (2 Chron. xxi. 18, 19), and succeeded his father Joram or Jehoram the next year (2 Kin. viii. 25). He was then twenty-two years old, and reigned only a year. His mother, Athaliah, was his evil genius (2 Chron. xxii. 3). He went with Joram, king of Israel, to fight with the Syrians at Ramoth-gilead. Joram returned to Jezreel wounded, Ahaziah paid him a visit, was with him during the revolt of Jehu, and was killed with him by that ruthless soldier (2 Kin. viii. 25-29; ix. 16-29; 2 Chron. xxii. 1-10). By a reversal of the constituent parts of his name, he is called Jehoahaz in 2 Chron. xxi. 17. "Azariah" in 2 Chron. xxii. 6 has probably arisen from

Ahaziah through corruption of the text

Ah'ban.

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 29).

A'her [another]

A Benjaminite (1 Chron. vii. 12). R. V. margin identifies him with Ahiram. See AHARAH.

A'hi [brother of, or a brother is (Jehovah)].

1. Chief of the Gadites in Gilead in Bashan (1 Chron. v. 15).

2. An Asherite, son of Shamer, of the family of Beriah (1 Chron. vii. 34).

A-hi'ah. See AHIAH.

A-hi'am.

One of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 33).

A-hi'an [perhaps, brotherly]

A Manassite of the family of Shemida (1 Chron. vii. 19).

A-hi-e'zer [brother of help]

1. Son of Ammishaddai, and head of the tribe of Dan in the wilderness (Num. i. 12, ii. 25, vii. 66).

2. A man of Gibeah who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 31).

A-hi'hud [probably, brother of praiseworthiness, or a brother is the praiseworthy one]

1. The prince representing the tribe of Asher on the commission to divide the land (Num. xxxiv. 27).

2. Head of a father's house in Geba of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 7).

A-hi'jah, in A. V. sometimes Ahiah (viz. 1, 3, 6) [brother of, or a brother is Jehovah]

1. A Benjaminite apparently, who assisted Gera in carrying off inhabitants of Geba (1 Chron. viii. 7).

2. A man of Judah descended through Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 25).

3. A son of Ahitub, and great-grandson of Eli. He at one time in the reign of Saul performed the functions of high priest at Gibeah (1 Sam. xiv. 3, 18). He was elder brother of Ahimelech, or possibly that priest himself under another name.

4. A Pelonite, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 36).

5. A Levite who in David's reign was over the treasures of the tabernacle and the dedicated offerings (1 Chron. xxvi. 20; but see R. V. margin).

6. A scribe in Solomon's reign (1 Kin. iv. 3).

7. A prophet belonging to Shiloh, who, meeting Jeroboam, rent his own garment in twelve pieces, and directed Jeroboam to take ten, as an indication that he should be king over ten tribes (1 Kin. xi. 29-39). After Jeroboam had become king, he sent his queen disguised to the now aged and half-blind prophet to inquire whether their child who was sick would recover. Ahijah recognized her under her disguise, and predicted that the child would die (xiv. 1-18). He committed his prophecies to writing (2 Chron. ix. 29).

8. The father of Baasha, king of Israel (1 Kin. xv. 27, 33).

9 A chief of the people who set his seal to the covenant to keep the law of God (Neh. x 26, in R. V. irregularly Ahiah)

A-hi'kam [brother of him who riseth, or a brother hath appeared]

Son of Shaphan and a prince of Judah (2 Kin xxii. 12) He protected Jeremiah when priests and false prophets demanded Jeremiah's death (Jer xxvi 24) He was the father of Gedaliah (2 Kin xxv 22).

A-hi'tud [perhaps, brother of one born, or brother of the son]

Father of the recorder Jehoshaphat (2 Sam. viii 16; xx 24; 1 Kin iv 3), and quite likely one with the father of Solomon's purveyor Baana (1 Kin iv 12).

A-him'a-az [brother of nascibility]

1. Father of Ahnoam, Saul's wife (1 Sam. xiv 50).

2 A son of Zadok, high priest in David's time He and Jonathan, Abiathar's son, maintained communication between David and the loyal party in Jerusalem during Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam xv 27, 36, xvii 20). He was the first to bring David intelligence of the victory over Absalom (xxviii 19-30) It may have been he who was afterwards Solomon's purveyor in Naphtali (1 Kin iv 15).

A-hi'man [brother of a gift]

1 A son of Anak, and probably founder of a family of Anakim (Num xiii 22), stalwart men (33, see GIANT), driven from Hebron by Caleb (Josh xv 14; Judg. i 10)

2 A Levite who acted as porter of the house of God (1 Chron ix 17).

A-him'e-lech [brother of a king]

1 A son of Ahitub, and chief priest at Nob David, fleeing from Saul, but pretending to be on the king's business, being in great want of food, received from him the show-bread, which, by the law, was a perquisite of the priests He also obtained the sword which had formerly belonged to Goliath (1 Sam. xxi 1-9; in Mark ii. 26 the event is dated in the time of Abiathar, Ahimelech's son). Doeg the Edomite reported the occurrence to Saul, who, interpreting it as a proof that Ahimelech and the other priests were treacherous, gave orders that they should be slain. One inhabitant of Nob—Abiathar, a son of Ahimelech—escaped from the massacre (1 Sam. xxi. 7; xxii. 7-23; title of Ps lvi).

2. The son of the Abiathar who escaped from the slaughter at Nob, and the grandson of Ahimelech, son of Ahitub. He was one of two high priests during David's reign (2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chron. xxiv. 3, 6, 31). Ahimelech in 1 Chron. xviii. 16 is probably a copyist's error for Ahimelech

3. A Hittite, and follower of David (1 Sam. xxvi. 6).

A-hi'moth [brother of death].

A Levite, a son of Elkanah (1 Chron. vi. 25).

A-hin'a-dab [brother of liberality].

Solomon's purveyor in Mahanaim (1 Kin. iv. 14).

A-hin'o-am [brother of grace].

1. Saul's wife, a daughter of Ahimaaz (1 Sam. xiv. 50).

2 A woman of Jezreel, one of David's wives (1 Sam. xxv 43; xxvii. 3), taken captive at Ziklag by the Amalekites (xxx. 5). She was the mother of Amnon (2 Sam. iii. 2).

A-hi'o [fraternal].

1 A son of Abinadab and brother of Uzzah. The two drove the cart on which David was taking the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi 3, 4)

2 A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (1 Chron viii 14)

3 A Benjamite, son of Jehiel by his wife Maachah (1 Chron. viii 29, 31; ix 35, 37)

A-hi'ra [brother of evil]

A son of Enan, and head of the tribe of Naphtali during the early journeyings in the wilderness (Num i 15, ii 29; vii 78, x 27)

A-hi'ram [exalted brother, or brother of the high one]

A Benjamite, founder of a family (Num xxxi 38) Aharah (1 Chron viii 1) doubtless, represents the same name, and Ehi (Gen xlii 21) is either an abbreviation or more probably a corruption, as the last syllable of Ahiram was easily overlooked by a copyist by reason of the recurrence of similar Hebrew letters in the two following names

A-his'a-mach [brother of support].

A Danite, the father of the craftsman Aholiab (Ex xxxi 6)

A-hish'a-har [brother of the dawn]

A man descended from Benjamin through Jedaiel and Bilhan (1 Chron vii 10)

A-hi'shar [brother of a singer]

An official who was over Solomon's household (1 Kin iv 6).

A-hith'o-phel [brother of folly]

A resident of Giloh in southwestern Judah, one of David's counselors (2 Sam xv 12), father of one of David's mighty men (xxiii 34), and perhaps the grandfather of Bathsheba (xi 3 with xxiii 34) So uncaring was his sagacity that his advice was "as if a man had inquired at the oracle of God" (2 Sam xvi. 23), but he was morally untrustworthy Absalom found him ready to betray David, and to point out how he might be destroyed When Absalom preferred the absurd counsel of Hushai, who was secretly in David's interest, Ahithophel, foreboding that it was therefore all over with the rebellion, committed suicide (2 Sam. xv. 12, 31-34; xvi. 15; xvii. 23), offering thus a strange O. T. type of Judas, both in his treachery and his fate.

A-hi'tub [brother of benevolence].

1. A son of Phinehas, and grandson of Eli (1 Sam. xiv. 3), and father of Ahimelech, the priest (xxii. 9).

2. A son of Amariah, and father of Zadok, the priest (2 Sam. viii. 17; 1 Chron. vi. 7, 8).

3. A later priest in the same family, son of another Amariah, and grandfather of another Zadok, also a priest (1 Chron. vi. 11, 12; Neh. xi. 11).

Ah'lab [a fat, fertile place].

A town within the territory of Asher, but from which that tribe did not drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. i. 31). Gush Halab of the Talmud, the Giscala of Josephus, five miles northwest of Sated on the road to Tyre, lies too far eastward to have been within the territory of Asher. Not unlikely Ahlab is a textual corruption of Mahlab, a town on the coast between Achzib and Tyre.

Ah'lai [O that!]

A descendant, namely a daughter of She-shai (1 Chron. ii. 31, 34, and perhaps an ancestress of Zabad (xi. 41)).

A-ho'ah [heat]

A Benjamite of the family of Bela (1 Chron. viii. 4), perhaps Ahijah (7). See AHOHITE.

A-ho'hite.

A descendant of Ahoah (2 Sam. xxiii. 9, 28; 1 Chron. xi. 12, 29).

A-ho'lah. See OHOLAH.

A-ho'li-ab. See OHOLIAH.

A-hol'i-bah. See OHOLIBAH.

A-hol-i-ba'mah. See OHOLIBAMAH.

A-hu'mai [perhaps, brother of water]

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb (1 Chron. iv. 2 with ii. 18, 19, 50).

A-huz'zam, in A. V. Ahuzam [possession]

A man of Judah, son of Ashhur of the family of Hezron (cp. 1 Chron. iv. 5, 6 with ii. 24).

A-huz'zath [possession]

A friend of Abimelech, king of Gerar, in Isaac's time (Gen. xxvi. 26). See FRIEND OF THE KING.

Ah'zai, in A. V. Ahasai [possession, or perhaps clear-sighted]

A priest descended from Immer through Meshillemoth (Neh. xi. 13); probably not the person called Jahzerah in 1 Chron. ix. 12, but a different link in the genealogy.

A'i, in A. V. in Genesis Hai, with retention of the Hebrew article [rums]. Aya and Aiath (Neh. xi. 31. Is. x. 28) are feminine forms of the word.

1. A town east of Bethel and near Bethaven, with a valley on its north (Gen. xii. 8. Josh. vii. 2; viii. 11). It lay north of Michmash, if Aiath is the same as Ai, as is in every way probable (Is. x. 28); a location which excludes such sites as el-Hai, half a mile southeast of Michmash, and a name, moreover, radically different from Ai. Its site was apparently near the modern Derr Diwan, on the ancient road between Michmash and Bethel, about midway between the two places. Three-quarters of a mile northwest of Derr Diwan is the ruin et-Tell, the heap (cp. Josh.

viii. 28); and one-third of a mile south, and less definitely in the gardens extending one-half mile southwestwardly to el-Kadeirah, is the ruin el-Haiyan. Each of these three sites has its advocates. The name Haiyan, it may be noted, is an entirely different word from Ai, and Josephus' name for Ai scarcely forms the connecting link, for the Greek texts of the historian do not show the nominative case Anna. At first Ai was unsuccessfully attacked by Joshua (Josh. vii. 2-5). When it was found that the defeat was caused by the sin of Achan, and when he had suffered for it, Ai was again attacked, and this time was taken by stratagem. Its inhabitants, numbering about 12,000, were slaughtered, its king was hanged on a tree, and the city was burned (vii-viii). It lay in ruins until some time after the account in Joshua was written (viii. 28), but ultimately was rebuilt (Is. x. 28, Ezra ii. 28).

2. A city of the Ammonites, apparently not far from Heshbon (Jer. xlix. 3).

A-i'ah, in A. V. once Ajah [bird of prey]

1. A Horite, son of Zabeen and brother of Anah (Gen. xxxvi. 24. 1 Chron. i. 40).

2. The father of Rizpah, Saul's concubine (2 Sam. iii. 7, xxi. 8, 10, 11).

A-i'ath. See AI.

A-i'ja. See AI.

Ai'ja-lon, in A. V. occasionally Ajalon [place of larks]

1. A village of the Shephelah, near a valley (Josh. x. 12, 2 Chron. xxviii. 18), mentioned as Aialuna in letters of the fifteenth century before Christ found at Tell el-Amarna. It corresponds to Yalo, a village thirteen miles northwest of Jerusalem, on a low spur, looking northward over a beautiful plain. It was assigned to the tribe of Dan, but they did not expel the Amorite inhabitants (Judg. i. 34, 35). Ajalon was designated to be a Levitical city for the Kohathites (Josh. xxi. 20, 24; 1 Chron. vi. 69). After the secession of the ten tribes, it was included in Benjamin, and was fortified by Rehoboam (1 Chron. viii. 13, 2 Chron. xi. 10), but in the time of Ahaz it was captured by the Philistines (xxviii. 18).

2. A place in the tribe of Zebulun, where the judge Elon was buried (Judg. xii. 12). Exact site unknown. The ruin Jallun, nine and a half miles east of Acre and one and a half miles southwest of Mejd el-Kerum, seems too far north for Zebulun, and like 'Ailut, another proposed site two and a half miles by road northwest of Nazareth, is a radically different word.

Ai'je-leth hash-Sha'har, in A. V. with omission of the Hebrew article, Aijeletl Shahar [land of the dawn].

Probably a tune, to which the chief musician was directed to set the twenty-second Psalm (Ps. xxii. R. V., title).

A'in [an eye, and a natural spring].

1 The sixteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, originally in outline an eye. English O comes from the same source, but is used as a vowel, whereas ain is a consonant of peculiar guttural sound. In anglicizing Hebrew names which contain ain, the letter is sometimes not represented at all, at other times it appears as g, rarely through the Greek as h. In the original, ain stands at the beginning of the words Amalek, Eli, Gomorrah, and perhaps Heli. It heads the sixteenth section of Ps cxix, in which section each verse of the Hebrew begins with this letter.

2 A place on the northern boundary-line of Palestine west of Riblah (Num xxxiv. 11).

3 A town in the territory of Judah, toward Edom and near Rimmon (Josh xv. 32; 1 Chron. iv. 32), and as it were forming one town with it (Neh. xi. 29). It was transferred with Rimmon to Simeon, and assigned to the priests who resided with that tribe (Josh. xix. 7; xxi. 16; but see ASHAN). It is identified with extensive ruins at Bir Khuweilieh, a large well of perennial water about three-quarters of a mile north of the probable site of Rimmon.

A'jah. See AIAH.

Aj'a-lon. See AIJALON.

A'kan. See JAAKAN.

A'-kel'da-ma, in A. V. Aceldama [field of blood].

A parcel of ground known as the potter's field. The priests purchased it with the thirty pieces of silver which Judas cast down in the temple. They designed it to be a burial place for strangers (Mat. xxvii. 7); and, as it was intended for a cemetery, it was named the field of sleep (akeldamach, Acts i. 19, Greek; other authorities, however, such as the fifth century codex C, the Syriac, and the Ethiopic, have akeldama or its equivalent). The argument has, indeed, been pressed that the Greek form akeldamach is a mere unessential variation of akeldama, field of blood. But the case where a Greek chi represents a final aleph is extremely rare. An isolated instance is the form of Seira for the Aramaic Sira', in the name of Sira, who was the father of the author of Ecclesiasticus (Ecclus. i. 27). Probably, therefore, the form akeldamar stands for Aramaic h'kal d'mak, field of sleep; but this sound is very like that of h'kal d'ma', field of blood, and was too suggestive of the latter to escape the popular fancy. Hence the plot of ground by a play upon this name, and as bought with the price of blood, and because Judas hanged himself in it, was popularly called the field of blood, akeldama (Mat. xxvii. 8; Acts i. 19). Peter alludes to Judas as acquiring the field (Acts i. 18, 19). Probably he does not mean that it was purchased by Judas in person, but by the priests with Judas' ill-gotten money. The traditional site, dating from the time of Jerome in the fourth century, is on the southern side of the valley of Hinnom. This identification is not improbable, for the locality is one which can furnish potter's clay, and has long been surrendered to burial purposes. Many crusaders were subsequently buried there. Its modern name is Hakked-Dumm.

Ak'kub [cunning, artful].

1 A descendant of Shecaniah through Elioenai (1 Chron. iii. 21, 24).

2 A Levite who founded a family of temple porters known by his name (1 Chron. ix. 17; Ezra ii. 42; Neh. viii. 7, xi. 19, xii. 25).

3 One of the Nethinim (Ezra ii. 45).

Ak-ra-bat-ti'ne.

A place in Idumaea (1 Mac. v. 3), probably Akrabbin.

A-krab'bin, in A. V. once Acrabbim (Josh. xv. 3) [scorpions].

An ascent on the southeast frontier of Judah near the southern point of the Dead Sea, and not far from the desert of Zin (Num. xxxiv. 4, Josh. xv. 3, Judg. i. 36). Apparently, the boundary between Canaan and Edom on leaving the Dead Sea followed wady el Fikreh.

Al'a-bas-ter [without a handle (labas); or else derived from a place called Alabastrum].

The material of which the cruse was made from which Jesus was anointed at Bethany (Mat. xxvi. 7; Mark. xiv. 3; cp. Luke vii. 37). Alabaster commonly denotes massive gypsum of a fine-grained variety, white in color, and delicately shaded. Being more easily worked than marble, it can be made into columns or turned on the lathe into cups, boxes, basins, or vases. Anciently alabaster denoted any stone suitable for working into such utensils. Most of the extant ancient ointment flasks are made of a light gray, translucent limestone.

A-la'meth. See ALEMETH.

A-lam'me-lech. See ALLAMELECH.

Al'a-moth [maidens].

A musical term (1 Chron. xv. 20, Ps. xlv. title). It probably refers to maiden or treble voices.

Al'ci-mus.

A high priest appointed by Antiochus Eupator (2 Mac. xiv. 3, 7; Antiq. xii. 9, 7), confirmed by Demetrius I. in 162 B. C. (1 Mac. vii. 5-9), and installed by Bacchides at the head of an army (10-20). He was entirely Greek in sympathy, and was abhorred by the Jews. He was driven out of Palestine by Judas Maccabaeus (21-25); but was brought back by Bacchides (ix. 1), and destroyed the inner wall of the temple, 160 B. C. (54). His sudden death soon afterwards was regarded by the Jews as a punishment for the impious act (55, 56).

Al'e-ma.

A town in Gilead (1 Mac. v. 26), conjectured to be Beer-elim (Is. xv. 8).

Al'e-meth, in A. V. once Alameth, the Hebrew pronunciation, in this instance, due merely to the position occupied by the name in the sentence (1 Chron. vii. 8) [covering].

1 A Benjamite, descended through Becher (1 Chron. vii. 8).

2. A descendant of king Saul (1 Chron. viii. 36, ix. 42)

3 A town (1 Chron. vi. 60) See ALMON.

Al'eph.

The first letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The English letter A has the same origin; but the Hebrew letter is a consonant, having no representative in the speech of the English people. In the spelling of Hebrew names in the English versions it does not appear. It is the initial letter, for example, in the original of the words Edom, Ophir, and Ur.

Al'eph stands at the head of the first section of Ps. cxix in many versions, since in the original each verse of the section begins with this letter.

Al-ex-an'der [defending men]

1 Alexander the Great, king of Macedonia, who followed his father Philip (1 Mac. i. 1). He began to reign 336 B. C. After quelling some disturbances at home, he crossed the Hellespont to attack the Persians, whom he met and defeated at Granicus, and again at Issus on the northeastern corner of the Mediterranean Sea. After the battle of Issus, Alexander took Damascus, which contained great treasure, and Sidon, and laid siege to Tyre. From there he sent to the Jewish high priest Jaddua, demanding his allegiance and supplies for his army. Jaddua refused on the ground of being subject to the Persian king. Angry at this answer, Alexander set out in person for Jerusalem as soon as he had reduced Tyre. According to Josephus, the Jews were in terror at his approach, but Jaddua threw open the gates and went in full in priestly robes to meet the conqueror, who fell at his feet in worship of the God whom Jaddua represented.

Head of Alexander the Great

He explained that before he left Macedonia he had seen in a dream the Deity in the garb of this high priest, and had been promised victory over Persia. He granted the Jews many special privileges (Antiq. xi. 8, 5). From Palestine he went on to Egypt, where he founded Alexandria; he then returned through Palestine to Persia, where he overthrew the Persian king Darius. After further conquests he died in Babylon in 323 B. C., aged 33. After his death, his generals made some show of holding the empire for his infant son, his widow and brother being set up as regents. But dissensions soon arose among the generals. All the members of Alexander's family were made away with, and the ruling generals were reduced from seven to four, these four then assumed the title of king, and founded four royal houses—Ptolemy in Egypt, Seleucus in Syria, Antipater in Macedonia, and Philetaerus in Asia Minor.

In the first division of Alexander's empire, before the final reduction to four kingdoms Syria and Palestine formed an independent satrapy under Laomedon, but they were soon annexed to Egypt by Ptolemy Lagus. This rich province was coveted also by others, and was twice taken by Antigonus another of Alexander's generals, who was then master of the greater part of Asia Minor, but in the final partition into four kingdoms, after the battle of Ipsus it passed into Egyptian hands, and remained so from that time, 320 B. C., until 203 B. C., when it became part of the Syrian kingdom of Antiochus the Great.

2 Alexander Balas, a pretender, who claimed to be the son of Antiochus Epiphanes. By the help of Ptolemy, king of Egypt, whose daughter Cleopatra he married, he reigned over Syria 150-146 B. C. He proved incapable of holding the kingdom and, betrayed by Ptolemy, was easily driven out by Demetrius II. He made treaties with Jonathan Maccabæus, and sued for the help of the Jews (1 Mac. x. 1, 18-20, Antiq. xiii. 2, 1; 4, 8).

3 A son of Simon of Cyrene (Mark xv. 21).

4 A leading man at Jerusalem when Peter and John were tried there (Acts iv. 6).

5. A defender brought forward by the Jews during the tumult at Ephesus (Acts xix. 33).

6 One who made shipwreck of his faith, blasphemed, and was excommunicated by Paul (1 Tim. i. 19, 20). He perhaps was the same as Alexander the coppersmith, who did the apostle and his associates much injury (2 Tim. iv. 14, 15).

Al-ex-an'dri-a [named after its founder].

A city founded by Alexander the Great, in the year 332 B. C., on the north coast of Egypt, of which it was designed to be the Greek metropolis. A site was fortunately selected west of the mouths of the Nile, and the Mediterranean current which sweeps from the west carries the mud of the river away from the harbor and prevents silting.

The city was built on a tongue of land lying between the Mediterranean Sea and lake Mareotis, and connected by a mole with the isle of Pharos, on which there was a celebrated lighthouse. The city was admirably situated for commercial purposes. It became the great port for the export of Egyptian wheat, cargoes destined for Rome being carried direct to Puteoli, unless unfavorable winds compelled the vessels to coast along Asia Minor (Acts xxvii. 6; xxviii 11-13, Philo, in Flac v). It was also the mart of interchange between the Orient and the Occident. The city flourished greatly under the Ptolemies, and subsequently under the Romans, until it extended along the coast fifteen miles by a breadth of one. During the time that the old Roman empire was dominant, Alexandria was considered the second city of the empire, having a population of 600,000 or 700,000. Its inhabitants were drawn from many nationalities, Greeks, Egyptians, Jews, Romans, who used the Greek language as the medium of communication. The different peoples occupied, as a rule, different quarters of the city. The Jews resided in the north-eastern part, enjoyed equal rights with the other citizens, and were governed by their own ethnarch (Antiq xix 5, 2. War, ii. 18, 7). The Ptolemies founded a museum with a renowned library of several hundred thousand volumes, and the city was looked upon as one of the greatest intellectual centers in the world. The translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek was begun in Egypt, probably in this city, in the third century, and completed by the second century, B. C. Here, too, the spirit of Greek philosophy permeated Judaism, and exegetes like Philo arose who excessively allegorized Scripture. The Jews of Alexandria had their own synagogue in Jerusalem, and were among the persecutors of Stephen (Acts ii. 10; vi. 9); but the teaching of John the Baptist and the knowledge of Jesus also gained entrance into Alexandria, and under God produced such men as Apollos (Acts xviii. 24, 25). Tradition ascribes the planting of the Christian Church in Alexandria to the evangelist Mark. In the early Christian ages the city was the seat of a celebrated Christian catechetical school with such teachers as Clement and Origen, and the home of bishops like Hesychius and Athanasius. In A. D. 616, Chosroes II, king of Persia, took Alexandria, and in 640 it was captured by Amr, the general of Omar I, the Arab caliph. With the exception of a few brief intervals, it has since remained under Mohammedan government. The French, under Napoleon I, captured it in 1798, but were driven out by the British in 1801, after which it reverted to the Mohammedans. On July 11, 1882, the Alexandrian forts were bombarded by the British fleet, and the British occupation of Egypt began. In that year Alexandria contained 227,064 inhabitants.

Al'gum. See ALMUG.

A-li'ah. See ALVAH.

A-li'an. See ALVAN.

Al-lam'me-lech, in A. V. Alammelech [perhaps, king's oak].

A village of Asher (Josh xix. 26). The wady el-Melech, which drains the waters of the plain of el-Buttauf into the Kishon opposite mount Carmel, may possibly echo the name.

Al-le-lu'ia. See HALLELUJAH.

Al-le'meth. See ALMON.

Al'lon [an oak]

A Smeonite, descended from Shemaiah (1 Chron iv 37).

In Josh xix 33 Allon is not a proper name, as in A. V., but a common noun, the oak or terebinth of Bezaanannim (Judg iv 11, R. V., where in A. V. plain should be oak). See ZAAANANIM.

Al'lon-bac'uth, in A. V. Allon-bachuth [oak of weeping].

An oak near Bethel under which Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried (Gen. xxxv. 8).

Al-mo'dad.

A people descended from Shem through Joktan (Gen x 26, 1 Chron i 20). They doubtless settled in the south of Arabia.

Al'mon [something hidden].

A village within the territory of Benjamin, assigned to the priests (Josh xxi 18). In 1 Chron vi 60 it is called Alemeth, or, following the traditional Hebrew pronunciation more closely, Allemeth. Both names have the same origin and meaning, and differ merely in outward form. Its site is the ruin 'Almit, a low, naked mound between Geba and Anathoth.

Al'mon-dib-la-tha'im [probably the district included between Almon and Diblathaim].

A station of the Israelites between the Arnon and Shittim (Num xxxiii 46), probably identical with Beth-diblathaim.

Alm'ond.

A tree and its fruit (Gen xliii 11; Ecc. xii 5), called in Hebrew Shaked, the awaker, probably because it is the first tree to blossom in the spring. It is the Amygdalus communis of botanists, a tree about 20 feet high, originally, it is believed, from Barbary, but now introduced into many lands. In Palestine it is found on Lebanon, Hermon, and in most of the region beyond Jordan. The town of Luz in the hill country of Ephraim derived its name from the almond. The tree grew also in Mesopotamia (Gen. xxx 37, R. V.). There are two varieties, the bitter and the sweet; the former has white flowers, the latter roseate. Almonds were sent by Jacob to the Egyptian dignitary (Gen. xliii 11). The cups on the branches of the golden candlestick were modeled after almond blossoms (Ex. xxv. 33, 34). When the rod marked with Aaron's name budded it brought forth almond blossoms (Num xvii. 8) The rod of an almond tree, which Jeremiah saw in his earliest vision, signified Jehovah's wakefulness (Jer i. 11, 12) The white hairs on the head of the aged are probably compared to the white flower of the bitter almond tree (Ecc xii. 5)

Almond Tree

Al'mug, in 2 Chron. Algum [perhaps from Sanscrit calgu, calgum (Lassen, Max Muller)]

A timber brought in abundance by sea from Ophir during the reign of Solomon. It was used to make pillars or balustrades, as also harps and psalteries (1 Kin x. 11, 12, 2 Chron ix. 10, 11) According to Josephus, it resembles the wood of the fig tree, but is whiter and shines more (Antiq viii. 7, 1) It is commonly believed to be sandal wood, the Santalum album of botanists, and the type of the order Santalaceae. The tree is small, much-branched, in aspect somewhat resembling a myrtle, a native of India and the eastern islands. If found on Lebanon (2 Chron ii. 8) it must have been introduced there. The wood, which is odoriferous, is burnt to perfume temples and private houses both in India and China. It is well adapted for the purpose for which it was used by Solomon.

Al'oos.

Not the botanical genus Aloe, consisting of succulent plants belonging to the order Liliaceae, and furnishing a bitter purgative medicine. The chief value of the scriptural plant is evidently its fragrance (Ps xlv. 8; Prov. vii. 17; Song iv. 14) It seems to be Agalocha, called in various Indian dialects agar, agau, and agru, of which the Hebrew words 'ahalim and 'ahaloth are probably a corruption. The species Aquilua agallocha grows in Sylhet, in the east of Bengal, and at Tenneserim, in the Eastern Peninsula. It is a large tree, having alternate lanceolate leaves, a leathery calyx, no petals, ten stamens, and a two-celled seed-vessel. The wood contains a resin, and an essential oil, which constitutes the perfume for which it is prized in the East. It is the lign-aloes of Num xxiv. 6, and the aloes of John xix. 39, one of the kinds of spice with which Nicodemus designed to anoint the body of our Lord.

Lign-aloes (Aquilaria agallocha)

A'loth [yielding milk]

A place of which, according to the Hebrew text, the name may just as well be Bealoth, known only as constituting with Asher one of the twelve districts from which Solomon drew provisions (1 Kin iv. 16)

Al'pha.

The first letter in the Greek alphabet, derived from the Phœnician, and corresponding to the Hebrew letter Aleph. Omega is the last letter of the Greek alphabet. "I am Alpha and Omega" means "I am the first and the last" of beings (Rev. i. 8, 11, xxi. 6; xxii. 13, cp. Is. xlv. 6).

Al'pha-bet [from Greek Alpha, Beta, the first two letters of the Greek alphabet]

The letters used in writing or printing a language, these being arranged in a conventional order. The English alphabet is borrowed from the Latin, which in turn came from the Greek. The Greek was derived from the Phœnician, the tradition that Cadmus brought letters into Greece, if not true in its details, being yet essentially historical. The Phœnicians, Hebrews, Moabites, and Arameans used a common alphabet at least as early as the eighth century B. C. The same alphabet, in more primitive form, was employed centuries earlier by the Mînæans of southern Arabia. In their original form these letters were pictures of familiar objects, bore the names of these objects, and had the initial sound of these words; thus, Gimel had the sound of g and depicted a camel, which was called gamalu. The names of the several letters in the Hebrew alphabet and the order in which they are arranged have long been familiar to the English reader, from their having been used to mark the divisions of the 119th Psalm. The R. V. gives in addition the later forms of the letters themselves, i. e. the square characters introduced after the beginning of the Christian era. It will be seen that they are twenty-two in number. The Hebrew Bible has other alphabetical psalms than the 119th, though the fact is not ascertainable from the English versions; see PSALMS and LAMENTATIONS. To transliterate the Hebrew letters is to substitute for them as nearly as possible the equivalent Roman characters. There are different methods of transliterating some of the letters. In the present work Aleph is represented by the smooth breathing ' and Ain by the rough breathing ' , Heth by h, Teth by t, Jod when a consonant by y, Tzaddi by s, Koph by k, Shin by sh. The other letters require neither explanation nor diacritical point. In the N T two letters of the Greek alphabet are mentioned, Alpha, the first, and Omega, the last. In translating this alphabet, Epsilon is represented by ĕ, Eta by ě, Theta by th, Xi by x, Omikron by ô, Upsilon by u, Phi by ph, Chi by ch, Psi by ps, and Omega by ô.

Al-phæ'us [perhaps, transient]

1 The husband of one of the Marys, and father of James the less and Josès (Mat x 3, Mark xv. 40). He was scarcely Clopas, in A. V. Cleophas (John xix 25, with Mark xv. 40), for Clopas cannot be shown to be, like Alphæus, a Greek modification of the Hebrew name Halpay. See JAMES 2.

2. The father of Levi or Matthew (Mark ii 14; cp. Mat. ix 9).

Al'tar.

An elevated structure on which incense is burned or sacrifice offered to the deity. It might be a mound of earth, or a huge stone or a platform built of several stones, dressed or undressed; or an object of similar shape made of metal. In patriarchal times, worshippers reared altars wherever they pitched their tents or had special occasion to sacrifice to God (Gen. viii 20; xii. 7; xxi 9, xxxv 1, 7; Ex. xvii 15; xxiv. 4). The fundamental law of the Hebrew altar, which was embodied in the theocratic covenant and was given at Sinai before the tabernacle was built, enjoined the erection of an altar of earth or stone wherever Jehovah should manifest himself. This law was the primary warrant for the altars at the tabernacle and temple, where Jehovah's presence continually was, and for the transient altars and sacrifices on occasions of theophanies (Judg. ii. 5, etc.).

The tabernacle had two altars: 1. The brazen altar or altar of burnt offering, which stood in the outer court and directly in front of the door of the tabernacle. It was 5 cubits square and 3 high. It consisted of a hollow frame of acacia wood overlaid with brass, and it was furnished with rings and staves that it might be transported from place to place. On its upper corners were projections called horns. It was without steps, but had a ledge round about it, midway between the bottom and the top for the priests to stand on. It was probably intended to be filled with earth. All sacrifices were offered at this altar. Its position at the very threshold taught distinctly that man has no access to Jehovah except as a sinner atoned for by blood (Ex xxvii. 1-8, xxx 28, xxxviii 30, xl 29, cp 1 Kin i 50, Ps cxviii. 27) 2 The golden altar, or altar of incense, which stood in the holy place before the veil that hung before the mercy seat. It was a cubit square and two cubits high, and was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold, with a border of gold about its top, horns at its corners, and two golden rings at each side for staves. Incense of prescribed ingredients, lighted by fire from the brazen altar, was burned on it morning and evening when the light of the candlestick was seen to. It symbolized the obligatory and acceptable adoration of God by his people (Ex xxx 1-10, 28, 34-37; xl 5, cp Heb. ix. 4 and 1 Kin vi. 22; Lev xvi. 18, 19). When Solomon's temple was built, the new brazen altar had nearly four times the dimensions of the old (1 Kin viii 64, 2 Chron. iv 1). A new golden altar was also made (1 Kin. vii. 48, 2 Chron iv. 19).

These were the only permanent altars on which sacrifices or incense could be acceptably offered (Deut. xii 2, 5, 6, 7). But the rearing of altars and offering of sacrifice in other places where God manifested himself was authorized by the fundamental law; and the privilege was embraced, as for example, by the Israelites at Bochim, by Gideon, by Manoah (Judg ii. 1-5; vi 20-25; xiii. 15-23). And Joshua erected an altar on mount Ebal to serve for a single occasion. As the twelve tribes of Israel were assembled for a national function, and the ark of the covenant was present, this altar was for the time being the national altar (Josh. viii. 30-35), and quite in the spirit of the Deuteronomic legislation (Deut. xxvii. 5-8). The law of the altar was necessarily in abeyance twice. 1. When God forsook the tabernacle and the ark was in the hands of the Philistines, or in dreaded seclusion at Kirjathjeairim, there was no place where Jehovah manifested himself (Ps. lxxviii. 60-64; 1 Sam. vi. 20-vii. 4). Samuel, as the prophet and representative of Jehovah, erected an altar at Ramah and sacrificed in several places (1 Sam. vii. 9, 17). Out of the confusion of worship caused by the capture of the ark, the domination of the Philistines, and the political complications connected with Saul and David, there arose and continued for a time two high priests and two altars, the original altar at the original tabernacle and a new altar near the ark in Jerusalem (1 Kin. iii 2, 4, 15; 2 Chron. i. 3-6). 2 When the Ten Tribes revolted, the pious Israelites of the north who were debarred the pilgrimage to Jerusalem were compelled either to abstain from worshipping Jehovah by sacrifice, or else to erect local altars. They chose in some instances the latter alternative (1 Kin. xviii. 30, 32; xix. 10).

After the exile, at a time when the insistence of Deuteronomy upon one central, national altar had long been known, the Jews who were living at Yeb in Upper Egypt in the sixth century before Christ, and in the second century before Christ those Jews dwelling near Leontopolis, ventured to build in each of these places a local temple to Jehovah and to erect an altar and offer sacrifices on it to the God of heaven (Elephantine papyri, Antiq. xiii 3, 1 War, vii 10, 2 and 3).

Altars were not always intended for sacrifices or for the burning of incense, the two and a half tribes who settled east of the Jordan built an altar designed to be a memorial of their affinity in blood to the other tribes, who crossed the river (Josh xxii. 10-34).

Al-tash'heth, in A V less accurately Altaschith [do not destroy].

A compound word occurring in the titles of Psalms lvii., lviii., lix., and lxxv., all R V. It probably refers, like Ajeleth Shahar, to the name of some Hebrew melody to the tune of which those psalms were to be sung.

A'tush [tumult of men]

An encampment of the Israelites between Egypt and mount Sinai (Num xxxiii. 13, 14)

Al'vah or A-li'ah [high, tall, thick]. For variation in spelling perhaps cp VAU

A duke of Edom, descended from Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 40, 1 Chron. i 51). He probably bears the name of his district (43).

Al'van or A-li'an [high, tall]. For variation in form perhaps cp VAU

A Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 23; 1 Chron. i 40).

A'mad [people of duration or, better, station, domicile]

A frontier village of Asher (Josh xix. 26). Not identified.

A'mal [labor, sorrow].

An Asherite, son of Helem (1 Chron vii. 35).

Am'a-lek.

Son of Elphaz, Esau's son, by his concubine Timna (Gen. xxxvi. 12); or, collectively, the Amalekites (Ex. xvii. 8; Num. xxiv. 20; Deut. xxv. 17; Judg. v. 14, etc.).

Am'a-lek-ites.

The descendants of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 12). For a long time they were centered about Kadesh-barnea. In this neighborhood they dwelt at the time of the exodus (Num. xiii. 29; xiv. 25). The territory occupied by them was visible from the mountains of Abarim (Num. xxiv. 20, Deut. xxxiv. 1-3). They were among the foremost people of their time in that part of the world (Num. xxiv. 20) A writer after the era of the exodus, referring to ancient events which occurred in that region, could speak proleptically of the country of the Amalekites. Hence in the narrative of the campaign of Chedorlaomer and his allies in this region, it is said that these eastern invaders "came to Kadesh and smote," not the Amalekites (as one would expect the writer to say, after the manner of his context, had that people been in existence), but in guarded phrase "all the country of the Amalekites" (Gen. xiv. 7). From their center near Kadesh, the people roamed and their camps radiated. They harassed the rear of the Israelites soon after the Hebrews had left Egypt and entered the wilderness; and at Rephidim on the west of Sinai they engaged with Israel in battle and were defeated. Because of their hostility to Israel, their utter destruction was authorized (Ex. xvii 8-16; Deut xxv 17-19). A year later, when Israel had reached Kadesh, and in defiance of God attempted to push northward into Canaan, the Amalekites opposed and repulsed them (Num xiv 43-45). About that date perhaps or later, their name became attached to a hill district in Ephraim (Judg xii. 15; cp v 14). Soon after the time of Moses and Joshua, they aided Eglon, king of Moab, to wrest Jericho from the Israelites; and a few generations later they were allied with the Midianites in oppressing northern Israel (Judg. iii 13, vi 3, 33). Evidently they had been working their way eastward, in friendly intercourse with other inhabitants of the desert; and in Saul's time their bands were found roaming through a stretch of perhaps five or six hundred miles of wilderness from the border of Egypt, near their original seat, to Havilah, a designation which includes northern central Arabia (1 Sam. xv. 7, xxvii. 8). They suffered crushing defeat from Saul, their king was captured and slain, and they presently disappeared from Hebrew history.

A'mam [perhaps, collection or conjunction].

A village of Judah in the southland (Josh. xv. 26).

Am'a-na [firmness, a treaty].

The mountains of Anti-Lebanon, doubtless those in which the Abanah or, as it is also called, Amanah takes its rise (Song iv. 8).

Am-a-riah' [Jehovah hath said or promised].

1 Son of Meraioth, a priest descended from Phinehas (1 Chron. vi. 7)

2. A priest in the same high-priestly line of descent, a son of Azariah (1 Chron. vi. 11; Ezra vii. 3).

3. A chief of the priests, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 2, 7) A father's house bore his name in the next generation (ver. 13)

4. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house, who sealed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (Neh. x. 3).

5. A man who had taken a foreign wife, whom Ezra made him divorce (Ezra x. 42).

6. A man of Judah family of Perez (Neh. xi. 4).

7. A son of Hezekiah, and an ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i. 1, R. V.)

8. A chief priest in Jehoshaphat's time (2 Chron. xix. 11)

9. A Levite, descended through Kohath and Hebron (1 Chron. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23)

10. An assistant distributor of the freewill offerings of God in Hezekiah's time (2 Chron. xxxi. 14, 15).

Am'a-sa [a burden]

1 The son of David's half-sister Abigail and Jether an Ishmaelite (1 Chron. ii. 17) He was Joab's cousin (2 Sam. xvii. 25). Absalom appointed Amasa captain of his army (ibid.). After Absalom's defeat and death Amasa was forgiven by David and appointed commander-in-chief in supersession of Joab (2 Sam. xix. 13) On the breaking out of the revolt headed by Sheba, Amasa received orders to have an army in readiness to start in three days. He was behind his time, and Abishai was sent with troops, among whom Joab was, after Sheba. The two companies united at Gibeon; and Joab, under pretext of greeting Amasa with a kiss, stabbed him (2 Sam. xx. 1-13). Compare AMASAI 2

2. A prince of Ephraim and son of Hadlai. When captives from Judah were being carried off by the Israelite army under Pekah, he aided in securing their release (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

Am'a-sai [burdensome].

1. A Levite of the Kohathite family, descended through Abiasaph and an ancestor of Heman the singer (1 Chron. vi. 35). Amasai in ver. 25 is perhaps a different person of the same family and name, but descended from the brother of Abiasaph (Ex. vi. 24).

2. A chief who early joined David and at one time was a prominent captain (1 Chron. xii. 18). Perhaps he was David's nephew Amasa.

3. A Levite who blew a trumpet before the ark in David's reign (1 Chron. xv. 24).

4. A Kohathite whose son aided in the religious revival in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 12).

Am'a-shai, in R. V. Amashsai [perhaps, two variant spellings of Amasai combined].

A priest, the son of Azareel. He lived in Jerusalem, at Nehemiah's request (Neh. xi. 13).

Am-a-si'ah [Jehovah hath borne]

A son of Zichri, and high military officer under Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 16).

Am-a-zi'ah [Jehovah is strong].

1. A king of Judah who, about 804 B. C., at the age of twenty-five years, undertook the conduct of the government in behalf of his father Joash, who had become incapacitated by reason of sore disease. On the murder of his father in 802 B. C., he succeeded to the throne (2 Kin. xiv. 1, 2 Chron. xxiv. 25-27). When he found himself firmly established in power, he put the murderers of his father to death; but spared their children, in conformity with the principle laid down on the subject in the Mosaic law (Deut. xxiv. 16). He hired 100,000 Israelitish mercenaries to accompany him on an expedition against the Edomites, but at the command of a man of God he dismissed them and, taking the forces of Judah alone, defeated the Edomites in the Valley of Salt and captured their capital, Selah. But he brought back idols of the Edomites, and set them up for his gods. The dismissed Israelites on their way home plundered the cities of Judah north of Beth-horon. Amaziah, following bad advice, challenged Jehoash, king of Israel, to fight, but he was defeated in a battle at Beth-shemesh, taken prisoner, and carried to Jerusalem. Part of the wall of Jerusalem, his capital, was broken down by Jehoash, and treasure and hostages were taken by him to Samaria. About the year 787 B. C. a conspiracy was formed against Amaziah in Jerusalem. He fled to Lachish, but twelve years later was sought out there and murdered. He reigned twenty-nine years (2 Kin. xiv. 1-20; 2 Chron. xxv. 1-27).

2. A Simeonite (1 Chron. iv. 34).

3. A Levite of the family of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 45).

4. Priest of Bethel, who tried to silence the prophet Amos (Amos vii. 10-17).

Am'ber.

The hardened or fossilized resin of a now extinct pine tree (Pinus succinifer) allied to the Norway spruce or to the Silver fir. That it was originally fluid is plain from the fact that it is found to enclose numerous remains of plants and of insects. The pines producing it grew in the southeastern part of what is now the bed of the Baltic Sea, and it is still picked up on the southern shore of that sea. It was regarded as a gem, and early became an object of commerce over regions very remote from the Baltic Sea. It is generally yellow, and that is the color of amber referred to in Ezek. i. 4, 27; vii. 2. A. V., E. R. V., and margin of A. R. V. It is mentioned on the margin of Ex. xxviii. 19, R. V.

A'men' [firm, established]

1. Jesus, as the faithful and true One (Rev. iii 14, cp. Is lxxv 16, R. V. margin)

2. An interjection, "So be it," "May it be" as has been asked, said, promised, or threatened (Mat. vi 13; Deut. xxvii. 16-26; 2 Cor. i. 20). To render it more emphatic, it is sometimes redoubled (Num. v. 22). Jesus begins many of his sayings with this word, which is then translated "verily." This idiom is peculiar to him.

Am'e-thyst [the Hebrew name suggests dream-stone].

A precious stone, believed to be intended by the Hebrew name for the last gem in the third row on the Jewish high priest's breast-plate (Ex. xxviii 19; xxxix 12). The amethyst formed the twelfth foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi 20). It is a glassy, clear, purple or bluish violet variety of quartz, the color, it is believed, being produced by manganese. The Hebrews could obtain it in Edom, Egypt, Galatia, or Cyprus, but finer specimens came from India and Spain.

A'mi. See AMON I, 3.

A-min'a-dab. See AMMINADAB.

A-mit'tai [truthful].

The father of Jonah the prophet (2 Kin. xiv. 25, 1 Jonah i. 1).

Am'mah [mother of anything in a figurative sense; beginning, foundation]

A hill near Giah, on the road from Gibeon through the wilderness to the Jordan (2 Sam. ii 24, cp. 16, 29). Exact situation unknown.

Am'mi [my people] (Hos. ii 1)

Am'mi-el [one of the family, or a devoted ally, is God]

1. Son of Gemalli, and representative of the tribe of Dan on the commission to spy out Canaan (Num. xiii 12).

2. A man of Lo-debar, and father of Machir (2 Sam. ix. 4, 5, xvii 27).

3. A son of Obad-edom (1 Chron. xxvi. 5).

4. Father of Bath-sheba (1 Chron. iii 5); see ELIAM.

Am-mi'hud [kinsman of praiseworthiness, or an ally is the praiseworthy one]

1. An Ephraimite, descended through Tahan, and father of Elishama (Num. i 10; 1 Chron. vii 26).

2. A man of Simeon, and father of Shemuel (Num. xxxiv 20).

3. A man of Naphtali, and father of Pedahel (Num. xxxiv 28).

4. Father of Talmi, king of Geshur (2 Sam. xiii 37). In the Hebrew text the name is written with h and r instead of h and d, but is traditionally pronounced Ammihud.

5. A descendant of Judah through Perez (1 Chron. ix. 4, R. V.).

Am-mi'hur [perhaps, kinsman of nobility] See AMMIHUR 4.

Am-min'a-dab, in A. V. of N. T. Aminadab [the people or kinsman is generous]

1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Ram (1 Chron. ii 10). He was the father of Nahshon, the prince of Judah (Num. i. 7), father-in-law of Aaron the priest (Ex. vi. 23), and an ancestor of David (Ruth. iv 19, Mat. i 4, Luke. iii. 33).

2. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel. He was head of his father's house in David's reign (1 Chron. xv 10, 11; cp. Ex. vi. 18, 22).

3. A Levite, family of Kohath (1 Chron. vi 22). The genealogies of Kohath, however, regularly have the name Izhar in this place (vs. 37, 38, Ex. vi 18, 21, 24), so that Amminadab is probably either another name of Izhar or a corruption of the genealogy.

Am-min'a-dib [my princely willing people, or the people is generous]

If a proper name, which is doubtful, then it is some one famous for his chariots (Song. vi 12; cp. text and margin).

Am'mi-shad'dai [an ally or kinsman is the Almighty].

A Danite, father of Ahiezer (Num. i 12, ii 25).

Am-miz'a-bad [the kinsman hath endowed].

A son of David's mighty man Benaiah (1 Chron. xxvii 6).

Am'mon [pertaining to the nation]

An adjective which paraphrases the name of Ben-ammi, Lot's younger son, ancestor of the Ammonites (Gen. xix 38).

Am'mon-ites.

A people descended from Ben-ammi, Lot's second son (Gen. xix 38). They dispossessed the Zamzummim of the territory between the Arnon and the Jabbok (Deut. ii. 20, 21, iii. 11), but were in turn driven out by the Amorites and compelled to keep on the border of the eastern desert, with the upper Jabbok as their western boundary (Num. xxi 24, Deut. ii 37, Judg. xi. 13, 22). For having joined the Moabites in hiring Balaam to curse the Israelites, they were excluded from the congregation of the Lord to the tenth generation (Deut. xxiii 3-6). They aided Eglon, king of Moab, in subjugating a portion of the Israelites (Judg. iii 13). In the time of Jephthah they again oppressed the Israelites east of Jordan (Judg. x. 6, 9, 18). Just before Saul became actual king, Nahash, the Ammonite king, besieged Jabesh-gilead. Saul came to the assistance of the beleaguered citizens, and totally defeated Nahash (1 Sam. xi 1-11). Nahash befriended David; doing this, perhaps, because both were enemies of Saul. On the death of Nahash, David sent an embassy to his son, Hanun; but the ambassadors were insulted, and war supervened.

In the first campaign, the confederate Syrians and Ammonites were defeated by the Israelites, led by Joab and Abishai (2 Sam. x. 1-19; 1 Chron. xix. 1-19). In the second, the Israelites captured Rabbah, the Ammonite capital (2 Sam. xi., xii.; 1 Chron. xx. 1-3). Solomon took several Ammonite women as wives (1 Kin. xi. 1). In the time of Jehoshaphat Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites unsuccessfully invaded Judah (2 Chron. xx. 1-30). To Uzziah and Jotham the Ammonites sent tribute (xxvi. 8; xxvii. 5). Ammonites joined with others in vexing Jehoiakim (2 Kin. xxiv. 2); and after the fall of Jerusalem, they frustrated the attempt of the Jews to form a new community (xxv. 25; Jer. xl. 11-14). As inveterate enemies of Israel, they were denounced by the prophets (Jer. xlix. 1-6; Ezek. xxi. 20; xxv. 1-7, Amos i. 13-15; Zeph. ii. 8-11). They opposed the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem by the returned exiles (Neh. iv. 3, 7); yet intermarriages between them and the Israelites took place, which were censured by Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra ix. 1, 2; Neh. xiii. 23-31). Judas Maccabeus, under strong provocation, made war against them (1 Mac. v. 1-8). They are mentioned as late as the second Christian century. Their chief deity was Milcom, another designation of Molech (1 Kin. xi. 7, 33). In the time of Jephthah they were worshiping Chemosh, the Moabite god (Judg. xi. 24).

Am'non [faithful].

1. A son of David by Ahinoam, the Jezreelitess; born at Hebron while that was his father's capital. He behaved scandalously to Tamar, his half-sister, and was in consequence murdered by her full brother Absalom (2 Sam. xiii and 1 Chron. iii. 1).

2. A son of Shimon, registered with the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

A'mok [deep].

A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 7). In the next generation a father's house bore this name (ver. 20).

Am'mon, I. [security or handicraftsman].

1. Governor of the city of Samaria under Ahab (1 Kin. xiii. 10, 26).

2. A king of Judah who at the age of twenty-two succeeded his father Manasseh. He followed his father's bad example. In two years his servants murdered him in his palace. The people of the land put the murderers to death, and placed his son Josiah on the throne (2 Kin. xxi. 19-26; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 21-25).

3. One of the class known as the children of Solomon's servants (Neh. vii. 59), called Amni in Ezra ii. 57.

Am'mon, II. [Egyptian Amen, the hidden one, the unseen being].

The chief divinity of Thebes, named after him No-amon, the capital of Upper Egypt (Jer. xlvi. 25, R. V., Nah. iii. 8, R. V.). The Hyksos were expelled from Egypt under his ensign, and he consequently became head of the pantheon, and was called the successor of Ra. He was represented as wearing two plumes of hawk's feathers, a disk, and a red cap.

The Egyptian God Amon

Am'o-rites [commonly explained as "mountaineers," but this explanation is questionable].

One of the tribes who occupied Canaan before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews (Gen. x. 16; xv. 21; Ex. iii. 5). At the time of Abraham, they dwelt at least on the western shore of the Dead Sea and back on the mountain (Gen. xiv. 7, 13). Even then they were the most powerful tribe in the hill country, and their name was used as synonym for the inhabitants of that region generally (xv. 16), if not, as later when their power had further increased, for the inhabitants of Canaan generally (xxxiv. 2 with xlviii. 2; Josh. vii. 7: ix. 7 and xi. 19 with 2 Sam. xxi. 2; Judg. vi. 10; Amos ii. 10). At the time of the exodus they were still in the hill country (Num. xiii. 29; Deut. i. 7, 19, 20, 44; they could of course be called Canaanites, Num. xiv. 45); but before this date they had carried their conquests to the east of the Jordan (Num. xxi. 26-30), and taken possession of the land from the Arnon to mount Hermon and from the wilderness to the Jordan (Deut. iii. 8; iv. 48; Josh. ii. 10; ix. 10).

Judg. xi. 22). At this time they occupied the entire hill country west of Jordan from Jerusalem to Hebron, and westward to and inclusive of the Shephelah (Josh. x 5, 6) as far north as Ajlun and even the territory of Ephraim (Judg. i. 35; Josh. xi. 3, xiii. 4). For their wickedness they were devoted to destruction; but a strong remnant remained in the land after the conquest (Judg. i. 35; iii. 5), with whom in Samuel's day there was peace (1 Sam. vii. 14), and who with other survivors of the earlier races were made bondservants by Solomon (1 Kin. ix. 20, 21; 2 Chron. viii. 7).

A'mos [burden; burden-bearer].

1 A prophet, a citizen of Tekoa, in the territory of the tribe of Judah, about six miles south of Bethlehem (Amos i. 1). He belonged to the humbler class. He was a herdsman; one of a number of shepherds who had their home at Tekoa, but doubtless spent their lives out in the wilderness that extends from the village eastward to the Dead Sea, engaged in raising and tending sheep. In some sheltered spot in this wild region, down on the lower level toward the sea, he found further humble employment as a dresser of sycamore trees (i. 1, vii. 14, 15). From the acquaintance which he displays with distant places and events, it seems probable that he had driven sheep or carried hides and wool as far as Egypt and Damascus. Although a man of Judah, he was called to prophesy in the kingdom of the ten tribes. He appeared at Bethel, then the king's sanctuary and a royal house, which still had within it one of the two golden calves reared by Jeroboam I as objects of worship (viii. 14, Hos. viii. 5, 6, x. 5). Amos spoke with such freedom and faithfulness against the sin of the king and the people that Amaziah, the idolatrous priest at Bethel, sent word to king Jeroboam II that Amos was conspiring against him in his own kingdom (Amos vii. 10). The time and circumstances of Amos' death are unknown.

Amos knew God as omnipotent, the God of creation and providence, the sovereign ruler of individuals and nations, inflexible in justice, whose power reaches unto sheol and who knows the thoughts of men. And Amos was a shrewd observer of men and manners, and able to reflect upon what he saw, and to generalize and look at it in its relation to God.

The prophecy of Amos is a fine example of pure Hebrew style. The diction is simple, and yet the speech is dignified and impressive. The prophet uses imagery with moderation, but with effect; and he has coined not a few striking phrases that have gained currency in modern speech (e. g. iii. 3, 6 iv. 11, 12; vi. 1). Amos is not so tender in his entreaty or so full of feeling as Hosea is at times, who belonged to the people among whom he labored; but there is a certain air of aloofness about Amos, natural enough in a prophet from another tribe and kingdom, and he pronounces the impersonal judgment of one whose ties of blood are not close with the people whom he addresses.

The book of Amos is the third of the minor prophets. Amos prophesied after the time of Hazael and Benhadad (i. 4), in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam, son of Joash, king of Israel, two years before the earthquake (i. 1, vii. 10; cp. Zech. xiv. 5), and probably while the kingdom was at its greatest extent (Amos vi. 14; cp. 2 Kin. xiv. 25). He uttered his message before Hosea delivered the discourses embodied in Hos. iv-xiv: for the social and religious condition of Israel, as reflected in the pages of Amos, seems not to be so desperate as Hosea depicts during the years of assassination, conflict, and misrule which ensued upon the death of Jeroboam II; and Amos does not, like Hosea in chaps. iv-xiv., allude to the Assyrian invasions, probably because they had not begun.

The theme of the prophecy is the judgment of the Lord (i. 2, cp. Joel iii. 16); and the book consists of three parts: 1. Introductory (i-ii). 2. Three discourses (iii-vi), followed by a series of five visions (vii-ix. 7). These first two parts of the book are denunciatory, and each subdivision ends with the announcement of judgment to come. 3. Promissory (ix. 8-15). 1. In the introductory section (i. 2-ii. 16) the prophet denounces judgment upon six neighboring gentile nations, upon Judah, and finally upon Israel. The first seven denunciations are embraced in seven stanzas of precisely the same structure, are opened and closed in the same way, and are linked to the introductory denunciation of Israel, to which they lead up, by the familiar opening formula. The argument seems to be: If these heathen nations are to be punished, how much more should Judah be, which has sinned against light; and if Judah is punished, how much more should Israel be, which has sinned more deeply. 2. Denunciation of Israel occupies the body of the book (iii. 1-ix. 7). There are three discourses, each beginning with the formula "Hear this word" (iii. 1; iv. 1, v. 1), followed by five visions. In the first vision devouring locusts are seen; but at the prayer of the prophet God forgives Israel and ends the work of devastation. In the second vision fire is seen, which devours the waters and would have destroyed the land; but again at the prophet's prayer God makes the evil to cease. Perhaps an actual invasion of locusts occurred during the ministry of the prophet Amos, and was followed by a season of intense heat and the resulting drought (cp. JOEL). At any rate the two visitations represent every past judgment which has befallen Israel; the locusts denoting destructive invaders, either devouring insects or hostile armies, and the fire being a symbol of God's righteous indignation burning against sin. Most probably Amos sees in these visions the past calamities, upon which he has already discoursed, which were sent to warn Israel and were checked by God's grace, but failed to bring the nation to repentance (iv. 6-11). Therefore the people must prepare to meet their God in judgment (iv. 12); and the third vision, that of the plumbline, shows that a desolating judgment is certain to come and is according to rectitude (vii. 7-9). At this point the prophet was interrupted by the priest of Bethel, and forbidden to prophesy; but he resumes his recital. In the fourth vision a basket of summer fruit is seen, indicating that Israel is ripe for judgment, yea, in God's sight is already plucked (viii. 1-3). In the fifth vision Jehovah is seen standing beside the altar, doubtless that at Bethel (cp iii. 14), and commanding to smite and slay; showing that the order is being issued for the judgment to begin (ix 1-4). 3 The prophecy concludes with promises (ix. 8-15) the exile only a sifting (8-10), restoration of the royal house of David to its former glory (11); extension of the kingdom over Edom and other heathen nations (12); restoration of Israel from captivity (13-15).

The text of Amos has been transmitted in excellent condition. The genuineness of several passages, however, especially of ii. 4, 5; iv. 13, v. 8, 9, ix. 5, 6 and 8^b-15, has been questioned. Against the genuineness of ii. 4, 5, it is urged, first, that the thought and diction are Deuteronomic, and, secondly, that the indictment against Judah is conventional and general in contrast with the specific charges brought against the other nations. But 1. The Deuteronomic features, seen in the references to the rejection of the law of Jehovah, failure to keep his statutes, and walking after other gods, are found in the writings of contemporaries of Amos and earlier (Ex. xv. 26, xviii 16; Is. v. 24; Hos. ii. 7, 15; iv. 6). 2 Regarding the indictment, it has the formal structure of each arraignment in the series, and it is so far specific as that disobedience to Jehovah's commands and idolatry are conceptions definite enough in prophetic thought to be specific charges (cp Is. i. 2-4; Hos. viii 1; Jer. i. 16; ii. 4-8). And 3. These two verses (Amos ii. 4, 5) cannot be removed, and the accusation against Judah omitted, without altering the nature of the argument and disturbing its progress (Driver, Joel and Amos, p. 117; Vos, Presb and Ref. Rev., ix. 226). The three passages, iv. 13; v. 8, 9; and ix. 5, 6, of which also the genuineness has been called in question, are descriptive of Jehovah; and they are rejected on the theory, first, that the doctrine of God which finds expression in these verses does not become prominent in Hebrew literature until the period of the exile, secondly, such ejaculations in praise of Jehovah's power are in the manner of the later style of Is. xl-lxvi.; and, thirdly, two of these passages, iv. 13 and ix. 5, 6, are not closely connected with the argument of the context, while v. 8, 9 actually interrupts it. The reply is made 1. It is true that these passages "might be omitted without causing a perceptible gap; but the same is true of a great number of passages whose genuineness is doubted by none. In all three places they serve to lend force to the prediction of judgment by declaring the transcendent greatness of him whose the judgment is" (Vos, loc. cit., p. 227). 2 "The ejaculatory form of the appeal, especially at critical points of the prophet's discourse, is 'not surprising under the general conditions of prophetic oratory'" (Driver quoting Robertson Smith), and 3 "The doctrine of Jehovah's lordship over nature is in agreement with Amos' teaching elsewhere (iv. 7ff., vii. 1, 4, ix. 3)" (Driver), and, it may be added, with teaching that antedates the prophecy of Amos and found, for example, in Gen. ii-viii, xi, xviii, Ex. vii-xiv. Of the promises of good, with which the book closes, ix. 8^b-15, it has been asserted that the passage can scarcely have been the original conclusion of Amos' vision of judgment, because it differs from the rest of the prophecy in phraseology, conception, and outlook. It is, of course, a matter of small moment whether it was written by Amos at the time he penned the visions or later. No ground has been found for rejecting its genuineness. The prophets frequently annexed to the prediction of judgment a prophecy of hope. The godly needed encouragement, and it was necessary to show the congruity between the overwhelming judgment and God's long-standing promise of the stability of David's throne and the perpetuity and triumph of God's kingdom on earth.

2 An ancestor of Christ (Luke iii. 25)

A'moz [powerful, brave]

The prophet Isaiah's father (Is. i. 1, etc.).

Am-phil'o-lis [a city pressed on all sides]

A city of Thrace, situated at the mouth of the Strymon on a bend of the river. It was founded by the Athenians in the fifth century B. C., and called Amphipolis because nearly surrounded by the river. Under the Romans it was the chief town of Macedonia prima. It was on the Via Egnatia, thirty-three miles southwest of Philippi, and Paul accordingly passed through it while traveling by that road from Philippi to Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 1). It is now called Empoli or Yamboli, is about three miles from the sea, and has a village, Neokhorio or Jeni Keui (New Town), on part of its site.

Am-pli-a'tus, in A. V. Am'pli-as [enlarged]

A Christian of Rome to whom Paul sent salutation (Rom. xvi. 8).

Am'ram, I. (1 Chron. i. 41). See HEM-DAN.

Am'ram, II. [perhaps, inexperience]

1 A Levite, son of Kohath, husband of Jochebed and founder of the father's house of the Amramites, who in the time of Moses numbered approximately two thousand males (Num. in 17, 19, 27, 28). He was an ancestor of Aaron and Moses, and lived to the age of 137 years (Ex. vi 20; for form of expression cp Gen. xlvii 16-18, 19-22, 23-25, Mat. i 5, 6, 8, 11).

2 A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 34).

Am'ram-ites.

The descendants of Amram, constituting a subdivision of the Levites (Num. in 27, 1 Chron. xxvi 23).

Am'ra-pher.

King of Shinar, ally of Chedorlaomer in the invasion of the west (Gen. xiv 1, 9). Evidence goes far to identify him with Hammurabi or Ammuriabi, as the name is also written, who became king of Babel about 1775 B. C. and reigned fifty-five years. At first he held sway over a small district only; but about the thirtieth year of his reign he wrested Larsa from the Elamites, and made himself lord of all Babylonia. He sought the welfare of his subjects, repaired old canals and cut new ones in order to bring fertility to both northern and southern Babylonia, strengthened fortifications, embellished and erected temples, superintended the administration of justice and codified the laws of the land. He richly deserved the title which he gave himself, father to his people. Hammurabi is the earliest known codifier of law; the first name in the list which includes Moses and Justinian and Napoleon. He was doubtless himself a legislator, but beyond enacting legislation, he discerned the importance of collecting the laws of the realm which pertained to the social life of the people, grouping the related ones, and giving them the widest publicity.

These ancient laws of Babylonia bear a close resemblance to the enactments in the Book of the Covenant by which justice was administered in Israel (Ex. xx 23-xxiii 33, cp xxiv 7). Not only are they codified, like the later body of Hebrew legislation (see THEOCRACY), but they are like many of those Hebrew statutes in beginning with the word "if." Besides this outward likeness, there is material resemblance. In twenty-four or twenty-five instances the two bodies of legislation treat of the same injury to person or property. This coincidence is, of course, not surprising, since just these mishaps and misdeeds occur in every community of men and must receive notice in any code of law's dealing with civil life. It is more remarkable that in so many instances the same classes of people, particularly the less fortunate members of society, were regarded by both Babylonians and Israelites as possessing rights that could be recognized by the state. But what is most remarkable is that in fourteen instances at least the Babylonian and Hebrew law imposes the same, or practically the same, penalty for the same offence. To a remarkable degree the two peoples shared the same conception of justice. It is not probable that the Hebrew legislator had the laws of Hammurabi before him, but it is certain that Israel inherited from some source the conceptions of justice and the judicial customs which existed among the Babylonians in the days of Hammurabi. See MOSES.

Am'u-let.

Anything worn as a protection against sorcery. It often serves at the same time as an ornament (Is. in 20, R. V.; cp Gen. xxxv 4).

Am'zi [robust]

1 A Levite, a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. vi 46).

2 A priest of the course of Malchijah (Neh. xi 12 R. V.).

A'nab [probably, fruitful in grapes]

A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xi 21, xv 50). Two runs still bear the name, one is twelve miles southwest of Hebron, and the more extensive is one and a half miles farther southwest.

A'nah [perhaps, hearkening to, granting]

A tribe of Horites (Gen. xxxvi 20, R. V.), organized under a chief (29). The tribe bore the name of its progenitor, who was descended from Zibeon and expanded to a branch tribe (20, 24). Anah discovered warm springs in the wilderness (24). From this circumstance he probably received the name Beeri, man of the well (2 with xxxvi 34, where, if Hittite does not include Hivite, the two names may be confused for in the Septuagint of xxxvi. 34 Elon is a Hivite but in the Hebrew text a Hittite). A daughter of the tribe, traced back also to Zibeon, became a wife of Esau (xxxvi 2, 14, 25). Daughter of Zibeon (2, 14) may refer to Oholibamah, an emendation of the Hebrew text from bt, daughter, to bn, son, of Zibeon would not affect the foregoing statements. Many interpreters, however, discern three persons of the name—a woman (2, 14) and two men (20, 25, 29 and 24).

An-a-ha'rath [possibly, nostril or pass].

A frontier village of Issachar (Josh. xix 19). The position of en-Na'urah (possibly a corruption of the old name), five miles north-east of Jezreel, suits for the site.

A-na'iah [Jehovah hath answered].

One who stood by Ezra when he read the book of the law to the people (Neh. viii 4), and who afterwards sealed the covenant to serve God (x. 22).

A'nak [the long neck (with definite article, Num. xii. 22, 28, but not 33)]

Collective name of the Anakim (Num. xiii 22 with Deut. i. 28), who possibly, though not necessarily, were descended from Arba (Josh. xiv 15 with xv. 13).

An'a-kim; A. V. has Anakims, using both the Hebrew and the English plural ending.

A stalwart race, connected with the Rephaim (Num. xiii. 33; Deut. ii 10, 11, 21). Three families of them settled at Hebron (Num. xiii. 22), and others were found in neighboring towns and elsewhere throughout the hill country (Josh. xi 21; xv 14. cp. Rephaim, xvii. 15, R. V.). They were cut off by the Israelites in the general campaign under Joshua (Josh. x. 36, 39; xi. 21), and particularly at Hebron, on the allotment of the land, by Judah under Caleb (xiv. 12; xv 13-19; Judg. i 10-15). A remnant was left in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod, in the Philistine country (Josh. xi. 22). The giant, Goliath of Gath, was probably one of the Anakim.

An Egyptian tribe, of which nothing is known (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chron. i 11).

A-nam'me-lech [god Anu is king, or Anu-king].

One of the deities worshiped by the people of Sepharvaim, a city of Babylonia (2 Kin xvii 31) Anu was god of the sky. When Sepharvites were brought to colonize Samaria, they burnt their children in the fire to him, worshipping Anu as Molech was worshiped.

A'nan [a cloud, or he hath covered].

One who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant to worship Jehovah (Neh. x 26).

A-na'ni [cloudy, or covered hath (God)]

A son of Elioenai (1 Chron. iii 24).

An-a-ni'ah [Jehovah hath covered].

1 The father of Maaseiah (Neh. iii 23)

2 A town of Benjamin (Neh. xi. 32). Despite the difference in spelling, it is commonly identified with Beit Hanina, about three miles north of Jerusalem toward Gibeon.

An-a-ni'as [Greek form of Hananiah, Jehovah hath been gracious].

1. A disciple of Jerusalem who, with his wife Sapphira, sold a piece of land, and taking a portion of the price, laid it at the apostles' feet (Acts v. 1 seq.). The Christian community held all things common. There was none among them that lacked, for as many as were possessors of lands or houses sold them and laid the price at the apostles' feet, and distribution was made unto each, according as any one had need. No one was under obligation to do this (ver. 4), and the end proposed did not demand that all property be sold, but forbade it. Property was sold as need required. Ananias brought part of the proceeds, and laid it at the apostles' feet ostensibly as the whole. Peter rebuked him for having lied unto the Holy Ghost, and he fell down and expired; as did his wife Sapphira, when, coming in three hours afterwards, in ignorance of what had taken place, she repeated her husband's falsehood, and had the same doom foretold her by Peter.

2. A Christian at Damascus who was informed in a vision of Saul's conversion, and sent to restore his sight and admit him to the Christian Church by baptism (Acts ix. 10-18).

3. A high priest appointed by Herod, king of Chalcis, about A. D. 48 (Antiq. xx 5, 2). Four years later he was sent to Rome by the governor of Syria to answer for violence done by the Jews to the Samaritans, but he was acquitted through the influence of Agrippa, and returned to Jerusalem (Antiq. xx. 6, 2 and 3; War ii. 12, 6 and 7). Jonathan, former high priest, was politically associated with him. In the year 58, Paul was arraigned before Ananias, and he appeared against the apostle before the procurator Felix (Acts xxiii. 2; xxiv. 1). Jonathan, his colleague, was now murdered, and about the year 59, toward the close of Felix's administration, Ananias himself was deposed by Agrippa (Antiq. xx 8, 5 and 8; War ii 13, 3). He appears to have resided on the southwestern hill of Jerusalem, in the upper city, near the palace of the Asmoneans. He was murdered in the year 67 (War ii 17, 6 and 9).

A'nath [a hearkening, a granting]

Father of the judge Shamgar (Judg. iii 31, v 6).

A-nath'e-ma [anything devoted]

In the N. T., a person or thing devoted to destruction. It corresponds to the Hebrew Herem (Rom. ix. 3, R. V.; 1 Cor. xii 3, R. V. and margin of A V.; Gal. i. 8, 9, R. V.; see Lev. xxvii 28, 29, Josh. vi 17, vii 1, R. V.).

A-nath'e-ma Mar-an-ath'a [Greek, one devoted to destruction, and Aramaic Maran'atha, the Lord cometh]

One accursed at the coming of the Lord (1 Cor. xvi 22, A V.) R. V. regards Maran'atha as a distinct sentence.

An'a-thoth [answered prayers; or perhaps, as the name of a town, the plural of Anath, who was a goddess (cp. Beth anath, and the plural, Ashtaroth)].

1. Head of a father's house of Benjamin, family of Becher (1 Chron. vii 8).

2. Head and representative of the men of Anathoth, whom in their name sealed the covenant to worship Jehovah (Neh. x 19).

3. A city in the territory of Benjamin, assigned to the priests (Josh. xxi. 18; 1 Chron. vi. 60). It was the home of Abiathar the high priest (1 Kin. ii 26), and the birthplace of Jeremiah, and the prophet's life was also endangered here (Jer. i 1; xi. 21). The town was re-peopled after the exile (Ezra ii 23). It was twenty stades distant from Jerusalem (Antiq. x 7, 3). Its site is represented by the modern 'Anata, which is about 3 miles northeast of Jerusalem. It was once a fortified town. Portions of the wall still remain, built of large hewn stone, apparently ancient.

An'a-thoth-ite, in A. V. Anethothite, Anethothite, and Antothite.

A native or inhabitant of Anathoth (2 Sam. xxiii. 27; 1 Chron. xi 28; xxvii. 12).

An'drew [manliness].

The brother of Simon Peter, of Bethsaida on the sea of Galilee (John i. 44). By vocation he was a fisherman like his brother (Mat iv 18, Mark i. 16-18), and with his brother had a house at Capernaum (Mark i. 29). He was a disciple of John the Baptist, but being directed by John to Jesus as the Lamb of God, he obtained an interview with Jesus and became convinced that Jesus was the Messiah. Forthwith he found his brother and induced him to visit Jesus (John i. 35-42). He was afterwards called to permanent fellowship with Jesus (Mat iv 18, 19; Mark i. 16, 17, cp. John vi 8), and appointed an apostle (Mat x 2, Mark iii 18, Luke vi 14, Acts i 13). He joined with his brother and James and John in inquiring regarding the destruction of the city and temple, and the second advent of Christ (Mark xiii 3, 4), and with Philip he presented the request of the Greeks to Jesus (John xii 22). Nothing trustworthy is known of his subsequent life. According to tradition, he suffered martyrdom in Achaia by crucifixion on a cross shaped like the letter X. This is now called St. Andrew's Cross. It is also related that a ship bearing two relics of him was wrecked in a bay of Scotland, afterwards called St. Andrew's Bay. The mariners who reached the shore introduced the gospel into the region. St. Andrew, therefore, became the patron saint of Scotland, and gave name to St. Andrew's town. His festival is kept by the Greek and Roman churches on the 30th of November. In the Church of England it has become customary on that day to preach on the subject of missions. The Acts of St. Andrew, an alleged gospel from his pen, is spurious.

An-dro-ni'cus [conquering men].

A Jewish Christian, and once fellow-prisoner of Paul, to whom at Rome Paul sent greeting (Rom xvi. 7).

A'ner [two fountains].

A town in the territory of Issachar, given with its suburbs to the sons of Gershom (1 Chron vi 73). Probably a corruption of the text out of En-gannim (Josh. xxi. 29; cp. xix 21).

A'ner.

1. An Amorite, resident at Mamre, and one of Abraham's confederates in the battle with the eastern kings (Gen. xiv. 13, 24).

2. A town of Manasseh west of the Jordan. It was given with its suburbs to the Kobathites (1 Chron vi. 70). In Josh xxi. 25, R V, Taanach appears in its stead. Either name, as it stands in the text, might easily be misread as the other.

An'e-thoth-ite or Anetothite. See ANATHOTHITE.

Angel [messenger, envoy].

1. A celestial being a little higher in dignity than man (Ps. viii. 5; Heb. ii. 7). They are spiritual beings (Heb. i. 14), and they neither marry nor are given in marriage (Mat xxii 30). From their worship of God as well, probably, as from their nature they are called, at least in poetry, sons of God (Job i 6; xxxviii 7); and from their character, holy ones (Job v 1, R V; Ps lxxxix. 5, 7, R V). Their office is denoted by the term angel. In the later books differences among angels in rank and dignity are implied, for there are archangels (chief angels), as well as those of a more ordinary kind (1 Thess. iv 16, Jude 9). This twofold distinction does not seem to be all. Both among fallen angels and angels unfallen there are thrones, dominions, principalities, and powers (Rom viii 38, Eph i 21; i Cor. i 16; ii 15). Cherubim and Seraphim seem also to belong to the angelic order. The innumerable powers of nature, by which the ordinary economy of the universe is carried on, are God's messengers (Ps. civ 4, R V); but pestilence and death, when acts of the divine government, are represented as under angelic charge (2 Sam xxiv 16, 2 Kin xix 25; Zech i 7-17). Unseen they encamp round about them that fear God (Ps xxxiv 7, Gen xxviii 12, xlviii. 16; 2 Kin vi 17; Is lxiii 9). The angel of the Lord came in human form to Abraham, Hagar, and Lot, to Moses and Joshua, to the Israelites at Bochim, to Gideon and Manoah. An angel came to Elijah and to Daniel. Angels are fittingly prominent in the history of Jesus, announcing his birth and that of his forerunner, heralding his advent to the shepherds, ministering unto him after his victory over temptation and in the garden (Luke xxii 43, a passage omitted in many old copies), and bearing tidings to his disciples at the resurrection and ascension. An angel also aided Peter and stood by Paul. The names of some angels or archangels are mentioned, namely, Gabriel (Dan viii. 16; ix. 21; Luke i. 19, 26), and Michael (Dan x. 13, 21; xii. 1, Jude 9; Rev xii 7). The Apocrypha adds Raphael and Uriel, see MICHAEL 11. The old Persians and the modern Parsees have recognized the existence of angels of different rank and assigned names to some of them.

While any angel sent to execute the commands of God might be called the angel of the Lord (2 Sam xxiv 16, 1 Kin xix 5, 7), yet mention is made of an angel, and under the circumstances one is justified in always thinking of the same angel, who is distinguished from Jehovah, and yet is identified with him (Gen. xvi 10, 13; xviii. 2-4, 13, 14, 33, xxii 11, 12, 15, 16; xxxi. 11, 13; Ex iii 2, 4, Josh v. 13-15; vi 2; Zech. i. 10-13; iii 1, 2), who revealed the face of God (Gen. xxxii 30), in whom was Jehovah's name (Ex. xxxii 21), and whose presence was equivalent to Jehovah's presence (Ex. xxxii. 34; xxxiii. 14, Is lxiii. 9). The angel of the Lord thus appears as a manifestation of Jehovah himself, one with Jehovah and yet different from him. See THEOPHANY.

2. The representative of a church; but hether this is the board of elders which rected the affairs of the local church, or the stor, or a celestial being of the angelic order atching over the church, is by no means ear (Rev. i. 20; ii. 1, 8, 12, 18; iii. 1, 7, 14).

A'ni-am [sighing of the people]

A Manassite, family of Shemida (1 Chron. i. 19; cp Num xxvi 32).

A'nim [a contraction of "yanim, fountains]. A town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned immediately after Eshtemoth (Josh. xv. 9). It is apparently identical with the ruin huwein, about eleven miles south of Hebron d three south of Semûa, i. e. Eshtemoth.

An'ise.

An umbelliferous plant (Pimpinella anisum) mewhat like caraway in appearance, occasionally cultivated in the East for its seeds. hich are used as a seasoning and as a carinative. The English versions render the eek word anêthon (Mat xxiii 23) in the xt by anise, on the margin by dill. The tter is Anethum graveolens of the same order mbelliferous) as anise, resembles anise in pearance and properties, and is more comonly grown in gardens.

An'kle Chain.

A chain binding together the two ankles a female, so as to compel her to take short ps, and, especially when they were comed with anklets, to make a tinkling sound hen she walked (Num. xxxi. 50. Is iii 20, th R V.; in A V called simply chains and naments of the legs).

Ank'let.

An ornament for the ankles, consisting of etallic or glass rings, and corresponding to acelets on the wrists. Anklets are often orn by boys as well as women in the East; iii. 18, R V., in A V. called tinkling ornaents about the feet): see ANKLE CHAIN

An'na [Greek form of Hannah, grace].

A widow, daughter of Phanuel of the tribe Asher. Her married life had lasted seven ars. At the age of eighty-four she visited e temple daily, and was there when the int Jesus was brought to be dedicated. A ophetess, she recognized and proclaimed m to be the Messiah (Luke ii 36-38).

An'nas [a Greek form of Hananiah, Jeho-h hath been gracious].

A high priest at Jerusalem, as was Caiaphas, the year when John the Baptist began his nstry (Luke iii 2), it is thought about D. 26. He is called Ananos by Josephus, icht is nearer the Hebrew form of the me than is Annas. He was appointed high iest about A. D. 7 by Quirinius, governor Syria, and was deposed by the procurator Judæa, Valerius Gratus, about A. D. 16. ch of his five sons became high priest, and was father-in-law of the high priest Caias (Antiq. xviii. 2, 1 and 2; John xviii 13), though Annas was no longer officiating high priest when Jesus was arrested, he was yet the most influential priest and still bore the title (Luke iii. 2; Acts iv 6), and to him Jesus was first taken (John xviii. 13), and after being examined by him was sent bound to Caiaphas (24). When Peter and John were subsequently arrested, Annas was prominent among their examiners (Acts iv. 6).

A-noint'.

To pour oil upon the head, or in any other way apply it to a person, or to a thing. Among the Jews there were an ordinary, a sacred or official, and a medical or surgical anointing. The ordinary one was simply a matter of the toilet (2 Sam xii 20; Dan x. 3; Mat. vi. 17). The anointing of the head with oil in the time of Jesus was extended, as an act of courtesy, also to guests (Luke vii 46). The official anointing was conferred on prophets, priests, and kings. Eljah the prophet was directed to anoint Elisha, his successor (1 Kin. xix. 16). Aaron the high priest, and those who followed him in the same office, were anointed with a holy consecrating oil (Ex. xxviii 41; xxix 7; xxx 30; xl 13, 15). Saul (1 Sam ix 16, x 1), David (xvi 1, 12, 13, 2 Sam. ii 7; iii. 39, etc), Solomon (1 Kin. i. 34), Hazael of Syria (xix. 15), Jehu (16), Jehoash (2 Kin xi 12), and others, were anointed kings. Messiah and Christ mean the Anointed One. Jesus the Christ was anointed by the Spirit to be prophet, priest, and king. Of things, the altar (Ex xxix 36; xl 10), and the tabernacle (xxx 26, xl 9), the laver, etc (xl 9-11), were also anointed. The medicinal or surgical anointing, not necessarily with oil, was a customary remedy applied to the sick and wounded (Is i 6; Luke x 34, Rev iii 18). The Christian places reliance, not in the natural means in themselves, but in God who works through the means and renders them effectual (Jas. v. 14, 15).

Ant.

Any hymenopterous insect of the family Formicidæ. They are social insects like bees and wasps, to which they are not remotely akin. The species are numerous and widely diffused, the larger members, however, occurring in the tropics. The ant is held up as an example of industry and forethought, industriously providing food in summer and gathering grain in harvest (Prov. vi. 6-8; xxx. 24, 25). That the ants of Palestine store food on which to live in winter is not expressly asserted in Proverbs, but it is clearly stated in similar Arabic maxims. Dr. Thomson states that the ants of Palestine are great robbers of grain in harvest. Sykes in 1829 found an ant in India, at Poonah, storing grain, and called it Atta providens. Moggridge witnessed similar forethought exercised by certain ants in the south of Europe, and McCook by ants in Texas.

An'te-lope.

An animal, believed to be mentioned in Deut. xiv. 5 and Is. li. 20, R V. It was captured in nets, and was ceremonially fit for food. Targum, followed by A. V., renders wild ox; probably meaning the bubale, Antelope bubalis, of Egypt and Arabia, classed by the Arabs with wild oxen. In the Greek versions and the Vulgate, the word is generally rendered oryx, which refers to the Antelope leucoryx. This animal has horns which are long, slender, conical, and with ringlike ridges round. The animal is white, with the exception of a long tuft of hair under the throat, which is black. It is a native of Sennaar, Upper Egypt, and Arabia, and is said to be found in Syria.

An-tho-thi'jah, in A. V. Antothijah [answers of Jehovah].

A Benjamite descended through Shashak (1 Chron viii 24).

An'ti-christ [Greek antichristos, against or instead of Christ].

The word antichrist may mean, as the etymology shows, an enemy of Christ or a usurper of Christ's name and rights. The former was probably its primary meaning, though the other idea was also attached to it. In the N. T. St. John alone uses the term (1 John ii 18, 22; iv 3, 2 John 7). From 1 John ii 18, R. V., we learn that the Christians had been taught that "Antichrist" would appear in "the last hour," i. e. before the second advent of Christ. While not denying that Antichrist would be a single person, John lays stress on the spirit to be embodied in him, and declares that already many antichrists had come. The substance of the antichristian spirit, he says, is denial that Jesus is the Christ or the real incarnation of the Son of God, by which is meant not only denial of the doctrine, but moral antagonism to its religious implications. This opposition was already appearing in the Church in the persons of false teachers and false disciples, for Antichrist arises out of nominal Christianity itself. But while John alone uses the term, the doctrine it taught elsewhere. Jesus himself not only warned his apostles of "false Christs" (Mat. xxiv. 5, 23, 24; Mark xiii 21, 22)—by which, however, he meant primarily Jewish Messianic pretenders—but plainly intimated that apostasy would arise within the Church (see parables of tares, ten virgins, Mat vii 22, 23, xxiv 12, etc.). Paul more fully teaches (2 Thes. i 3-12) that before the second advent "the man of lawlessness" (R. V.) must be revealed, "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped," and "in the temple of God" (= probably the Church) claims to be God (to usurp the place of God). Paul, too, like John, represents this as the culmination of a process of apostasy (ver. 7; see, too, 1 Tim. iv 1). Many interpreters also see in the "beast" of Rev. xiii, a further description of Antichrist. Thus the N. T. declared that Christian history would not be a pure development of goodness and truth, but that within Christendom apostasy would arise, develop, have many representatives, and finally culminate in Antichrist proper (= either a person or an institution, perhaps both), of which the essential spirit would be antagonism to Christ and the impious claim of that allegiance from man's mind and life which is alone due to God and his Son. In different periods, various apostasies have seemed to believers to be Antichrist, and have more or less embodied the antichristian principle; but doubtless the full manifestation of Antichrist is yet to come, and will precede and be destroyed at the second advent of the Lord. An'ti-och [pertaining to Antiochus].

1 The metropolis of Syria under the Macedonian Greek dynasty (1 Mac in 37 et passim), founded about 300 B. C. by Seleucus Nicator, and named by him after Antiochus, his father. It was situated on the southern side of the Orontes, about twenty miles from its mouth, the river being navigable up to the city. Mount Casius approached it closely on the south, and the Amanus mountains were not far off on the west, whilst in front lay the valley of the Orontes, five or six miles across. The city became large and numerous inhabited. It remained the capital when the Roman province of Syria was erected in 64 B. C. Its population was a mixed one chiefly gentile, but also with not a few Jews (War vii 3, 3). Christians who fled from Jerusalem to avoid the persecution which arose upon the martyrdom of Stephen preached the gospel here, addressing at first only Jews who spoke the Aramaic tongue, then those who spoke Greek. Barnabas was despatched from Jerusalem to aid the work. After laboring there for a while he fetched as a coadjutor Paul from Tarsus. For a whole year these two great evangelists made the city the sphere of their labors and taught much people. The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch (Acts xi 19-26). Further reinforcements arrived in the persons of prophets (27). From Antioch Paul and Barnabas were sent on a missionary journey (xiii 2). On its completion they returned to the city (xiv 26). The disciples at Antioch kept up active intercourse with the brethren at Jerusalem. In time of famine, they sent relief to them (xi 28-30), and they submitted the question regarding the circumcision of gentile converts to a council at Jerusalem (xv). The second missionary journey of Paul, like the first, commenced with a departure from Antioch (35, 36), to which Paul returned, this time by the way of Caesarea (xviii 22). At Antioch Paul withstood Peter to the face because of his vacillating conduct with regard to the gentile converts (Gal ii 11). The city remained great, and the Church went on to develop while the Roman empire stood. In A. D. 538 Chosroes, the Persian king, took and destroyed it. It was rebuilt by the Roman emperor Justinian. In A. D. 635 it was taken by the Saracens, from whom it passed in 1084 to the Turks. Except between 1098 and 1269, when it was the seat of a Christian kingdom founded by the crusaders, it has remained in Mohammedan hands. It has in 190. By the terms of peace he was obliged to send twenty hostages to Rome, including his son, and pay an enormous tribute. While plundering a temple in Susiana he was mur-been all along very liable to earthquakes, one of which, occurring in 1822, damaged Justinian's walls. The place, still called 'Antákia, is now unimportant.

2 A town in Asia Minor, also founded by Seleucus Nicator and named after his father, Antiochus. It was situated in Phrygia, near the borders of Pisidia, and was accordingly designated Antioch toward Pisidia and Pisidian Antioch to distinguish it from Antioch in Syria. It was included within the Roman province of Galatia, and was the center of the civil and military administration of the southern part of the province. Jews dwelt there, and had a synagogue (Acts xiii 14; cp Antiq xii 3, 4). Barnabas and Paul visited it on their first missionary journey (Acts xiii 14-52, xiv 19-21; 2 Tim. iii 11). In 1833 Arundel identified the ruins of this Antioch near the modern town of Yalabatch.

AN-ti'o-chus [withstander, endurer].

1. ANTIOCHUS III. surnamed the Great, king of Syria and sixth ruler of the Seleucid dynasty, father of Seleucus IV. and Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac. i. 10; viii 6-8). He reigned from 223 to 187 B. C. He attempted to wrest Coele Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine from Ptolemy IV., but was defeated at Raphia 217 B. C. After the death of Ptolemy he renewed the attempt and was successful, gaining the decisive battle of Paneas in 198. He invaded Europe, but his victorious career was terminated at Thermopylae. On his retreat he was decisively defeated at Magnesia in Asia Minor. The Seleucid line was continued as follows.

2. ANTIOCHUS E-PIPH'A-NES, the eighth ruler of the house of Seleucidae, 175-164 B. C. (1 Mac. i. 10; vi 16). He passed fifteen years of his life as a hostage at Rome (1 Mac. i. 10). He was an energetic prince who extended and strengthened his kingdom, but enraged his subjects by religious intolerance. He stirred up the Jews by robbing the temple and setting up a statue of Jupiter in the holy of holies. He also pulled down the walls of Jerusalem, commanded the sacrifice of swine, forbade circumcision, and destroyed all the sacred books that could be found. It was these outrages which induced the revolt of the Maccabees (1 Mac. i. 41-53). He died between Elymais and Babylon, shortly after receiving news of the Jewish revolt (vi. 1-16).

3 ANTIOCHUS EU'PA-TOR, son of the above. As a minor he reigned two years under the regency of Lysias (1 Mac vi. 17-63). He was slain and succeeded by Demetrius Soter.

4 ANTIOCHUS VI, the young child of the pretender Alexander Balas. He was set up as king by the general Tryphon, who used him merely as a cloak for his own ambition, and slew him as soon as he felt himself established, 142 B C (1 Mac xi 39, 40, 54, xii 31, 32).

Head of Antiochus Epiphanes

5 ANTIOCHUS VII, brother of Demetrius II, who reigned in the stead of Demetrius during his imprisonment by Arsaces, 138-128 B C. He defeated Tryphon (1 Mac xv 1, 10-14), made first a treaty with Simon Maccabæus, but afterwards repudiated his help and tried to rob the temple. His attempt was frustrated by John and Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac. xvi 1-10).

6 A Jew known only as being the father of the counselor Numenius (1 Mac xii 16).

An'ti-pas [contraction of Antipater]

1. A Christian who suffered martyrdom at Pergamos, in Asia Minor (Rev. ii. 12, 13).

2. Son of Herod the Great, see HEROD 2.

An-tip'a-ter [in place of or like the father].

1. A Jew, son of Jason. He was a counselor, and one of two ambassadors sent by Jonathan and the elders to Rome to renew the alliance (1 Mac xii. 16; Antiq. xiii. 5, 8). His father was perhaps the Jason who had formerly gone on a similar mission (viii. 17).

2. Father of Herod the Great (Antiq. xiv. 7, 3).

An-tip'a-tris [belonging to Antipater].

A town founded by Herod the Great, in the fertile plain of Caphar Saba, on the site of that village, near the mountains, and called after Antipater, his father. It was surrounded by a river (Antiq. xiii. 15, 1; xvi. 5, 2, War i. 4, 7; 21, 9). It lay on the Roman military road between Jerusalem and Cæsarea, forty-two Roman miles from the former city and twenty-six from the latter. The old name lingers under the modern form Keif Saba, and its site is commonly sought at this village; but the conditions of the site are in all other respects fulfilled by Wilson and Conder's location of it at Ras el 'Am at the junction of the old Roman road from Jerusalem with that from Ramleh through Lydda to Cæsarea. The large mound is covered with ruins, from the sides of which on the north and west the river 'Aujah gushes forth a full-sized stream. It was the limit of Paul's journey the first night while he was being taken as a prisoner from Jerusalem to Cæsarea (Acts xxiii. 31).

An-to'ni-a, Tow'er of [pertaining to Antonius]

A castle connected with the temple at Jerusalem. It presumably occupied the site of the stronghold Biah, which appertained to the temple and was restored by Nehemiah (Neh. ii. 8). John Hyrcanus built the tower, and he generally dwelt in it and kept the priestly vestments there, for he was entitled to wear them (Antiq. xv. 11, 4, xviii. 4, 3). Until the time of Herod the Great it was known as the Baris, but Herod repaired it at vast expense, and fortified it more firmly than before in order that it might guard the temple, and named it Antonia in honor of Marc Antony (Antiq. xviii; War i. 21. 1; v. 5, 8; Tacitus, Hist. v. 11). It was situated at the north-western corner of the temple area, on a rock fifty cubits in height, the highest point in the neighborhood (War vi. 1, 5). Its presence there prevented the area from being foursquare (War vi. 5, 4). The fortress had the amplitude and form of a palace, with chambers, courts, barracks, and baths. Its walls rose forty cubits above the rock on which they rested. At the corners were turrets, three of which were fifty cubits high, while the fourth, which overlooked the temple, was seventy cubits (cp. Antiq. xx. 5, 3; War vi. 2, 5). It was separated by a deep trench from the hill Bezetha (War v. 4, 2), but was connected with the northern and western cloisters, at the junction of which it stood, with gates for the guards and a staircase (Acts xxi. 35 with 37, 40 with xxii. 24), and with the inner temple at its eastern gate by a subterranean passage (Antiq. xv. 11, 7), which seems to have existed in the Baris as built by Hyrcanus (Antiq. xiii. 11, 2). Over the temple end of this underground passage Herod erected a tower. The arrangement was intended to afford him a way of escape in case of a popular sedition. In the castle a Roman legion was stationed, which stood on guard in the cloisters, especially during the Jewish festivals, to prevent any excesses on the part of the populace (Antiq. xviii. 4, 3; War v. 5, 8). The castle was finally demolished by order of Titus in A. D. 70 (War vii. 1, 1; cp. vi. 2, 7; 5, 4; 9, 1 and 4).

The most tragic event in the history of the castle occurred during the reign of Aristobulus, son of Hyrcanus. The king lay sick in one of its chambers. His beloved brother Antigonus, returning from the war, hastened clad in armor and accompanied by his military escort to the temple to offer prayers for the recovery of the king. The act was misrepresented to Aristobulus; but he summoned his brother to his bedside, with the request that he come unarmed, and ordered soldiers to lie in the underground passage and slay him if he appeared in armor. The queen suppressed the message in part, and contrived to have Antigonus informed that the king desired to see his splendid armor. Suspecting nothing, he entered the passage clad in mail and was murdered. The deed was reported to the king, and the shock brought on a hemorrhage. A slave bore away the vessel in which the blood had been caught, but stumbled on the spot where Antigonus had been slain. The blood of the two brothers mingled on the floor. A cry of horror ran through the palace, and roused the king to inquire the cause. When he learned what had occurred he was filled with an agony of remorse and instantly expired (Antiq. xiii. 11).

Paul, when rescued from the infuriated mob who had dragged him out of the temple, was carried into this castle, and on the way was allowed to address the people from the stairs (Acts xxi 30 seq.)

An-to-thi'jah. See ANTHOTHIJAH.

An'toth-ite. See ANATHOTHITE

A'nub [joined together].

A man of Judah, son of Hakkoz (1 Chron. iv 8, R. V.).

Ape.

A quadrumanous animal. The Hebrew word kôph, which is rendered ape, is probably generic and includes apes, which are without tails, and monkeys, which possess them. In Greek kēpos denotes a monkey of Ethiopia. In Malabar and Sanscrit kapi or kefi signifies a monkey. There is no genuine ape either in Malabar or in any other part of India. If the animals which were brought to Palestine by the vessels that went to Ophir for gold (1 Kin. x 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21) came from India, they were a tailed monkey, perhaps that called Hanuman (Semnopithecus entellus), which is common throughout India, and is worshipped as a god.

A-pel'les.

An approved Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom xvi 10).

A-phær'e-ma.

A government district which in the time of Jonathan Maccabæus was separated from Samaria, annexed to Judæa, and placed under the authority of the high priest (1 Mac xi 34; cp x. 30, 38). The name is thought to be a Greek corruption of Ephraim, and to designate the most southern part of Samaria (cp. John xi. 54).

A-phar'sach-ites or Apharsathchites.

A tribe from beyond the Euphrates, settled by Asnapper in Samaria (Ezra iv. 9; v. 6).

A-phar'sites.

An eastern tribe, transplanted by Asnapper to Samaria (Ezra iv 9).

A'phek [strength].

1. A city apparently north of Zidon (Josh. xiii 4), and hence commonly identified with the ancient Aphaca, a place northeast of Beirut and famous for its temple of Venus. It is now known as Afka. The situation of this town so far north renders questionable its identity with Aphek, variant Aphik, which was situated within the territory of Asher, but not cleared of its Canaanite inhabitants (Josh xix 30; Judg. i 31).

2. A place near Ebenezer, not too far from Shiloh, and probably near Mizpah (1 Sam. iv 1, 12; vii 11; perhaps Josh. xii 17, 18). The Philistines pitched here before the battle in which they captured the ark.

3. A town apparently between Shunem and Jezreel. The Philistines pitched at Shunem, but soon discovered that the Israelites had occupied the heights of Gilboa. From Shunem they advanced to Aphek, and thence to Jezreel, where they attacked the Israelites who had descended to the spring at Jezreel, forcing them back to their former position on Gilboa and completing the slaughter on that mountain (1 Sam xxviii 4; xxix 1, 11, xxxi 1). Probably it is the town Apku mentioned by Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria, as "on the border of Samaria," and, by implication, on the military road to Egypt. It may also be the town of Aphek to which Benhadad advanced with the intention of giving battle to Ahab, and to which he and his army retreated after his defeat, and where a wall fell and killed 27,000 of his soldiers (1 Kin xx 26-30); and it may also be the town where Joash, king of Israel, should, according to prophecy, smite the Syrians till they were consumed (2 Kin xiii. 14-19). The situation presupposed in the narratives is fully met by a town west of the Jordan in the plain of Jezreel. Still the Aphek referred to in these two passages may be the town of that name beyond Jordan, about three miles east of the sea of Galilee, on the highway between Damascus and Beth-shean, and now represented by the village of Fik.

A-phe'kah [strong place, fortification].

A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh xv. 53); probably not the same as Aphek 2.

A-phî'ah [perhaps, refreshed, revived].

An ancestor of king Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1).

A'phik. See APHEK 1.

Aph'rah, in R. V. Beth-le-Aphrah [dust].

A town (Mic. i. 10), site unknown.

Aph'ses. See HAPPIZZEE.

A-poc'a-lypse [disclosure, revelation].

A name frequently given to the last book of the Bible. See REVELATION.

A-poc'ry-pha [Greek apokrypha, hidden things, used by ecclesiastical writers for (1) matters secret or mysterious, (2) of unknown origin, forged, spurious; (3) unrecognized, uncanonical]

The name generally given to the following sixteen books: 1 and 2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, The Rest of Esther, The Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, with the Epistle of Jeremiah, The Song of the Three Holy Children, The History of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, The Prayer of Manasses, 1, 2, 3, and 4 Maccabees. Sometimes the number is limited to fourteen, 3 and 4 Maccabees being omitted.

Unlike the books of the O T, which are in Hebrew, with the exception of a few verses in Aramaic, the apocryphal productions are in Greek, though at least Judith, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch 1-11, and 1 Maccabees were originally written in Hebrew. The Jewish church considered them uninspired, and some of their writers disclaim inspiration (Prologue to Ecclesiasticus, 1 Mac iv 46, ix 27, 2 Mac ii 23, xv 38). They are not found in the Hebrew canon; they are never quoted by Jesus; and it cannot with certainty be affirmed that the apostles ever directly allude to them. The early churches permitted them to be read for edification, and recommended them to the catechumens for study, but rejected them from the canon, their decision carrying authority during the middle ages, as it does now with the various Protestant churches. Thus the Church of England in the sixth of the Thirty-nine Articles published in 1562 calls the apocryphal treatises books which "the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; but yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine." The Westminster Confession of 1643 declares, as a matter of creed, that "The books, commonly called Apocrypha, not being of divine inspiration, are no part of the canon of Scripture, and therefore are of no authority in the Church of God, or to be any otherwise approved or made use of than other human writings." The Council of Trent at its sitting on April 15, 1546, declared eleven of the sixteen apocryphal books to be canonical, enumerating Tobit, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, and the two books of Maccabees and adding The Rest of Esther to the canonical Esther, and incorporating the History of Susanna, the Story of the Three Holy Children, and the History of Bel and the Dragon with Daniel. The Council pronounced an anathema against anyone who ventured to differ from it in opinion. This has since regulated the belief of the Roman Catholic Church. The Apocrypha was introduced into the English version by Coverdale in 1535, and was included in king James' version, but began to be omitted as early as 1629. When inserted, it was placed between the O. T. and N. T. A controversy on the subject was carried on between the years 1821 and 1826, which resulted in the exclusion of the Apocrypha from all Bibles issued by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

1. 1 ES'DRAS Esdras is simply the Greek form of Ezra, and the book narrates the decline and fall of the kingdom of Judah from the time of Josiah, the destruction of Jerusalem, the Babylonian captivity, the return of the exiles, and the share taken by Ezra in reorganizing the Jewish polity. In some respects it amplifies the biblical narrative, but the additions are of doubtful authority. It is followed by Josephus, A. D. 93 (cp 1 Esdras iii. 1-iv 44 with Antiq xi 3, 2-8, etc.) How much earlier than his time it existed, there is no evidence to show. Nor is its author known.

2. 2 ES'DRAS This is in quite a different style from 1 Esdras. It is not a history, but is a religious treatise, much in the style of the Hebrew prophets. Its kernel, consisting of chapters iii-xiv, purports to record seven revelations granted to Ezra in Babylon, several of which took the form of visions: the woman that mourned (ix. 38-x. 56), the eagle and the lion (xi 1-xii 39), the man that rose from the sea (xiii 1-56). The author of these chapters is unknown, but he was evidently a Jew, full of affection for his people (Jesus in vii 28 is wanting in the oriental versions). Since the vision of the eagle, which is expressly based on the prophecy of Daniel (2 Esdr xii 11), seems to refer to the Roman empire, a date from about A. D. 88 to about A. D. 117, is generally accepted. A date later than A. D. 200 is precluded by the citation of v. 35 in Greek by Clement of Alexandria, with the preface "Esdras the prophet says." The first two and the last two chapters of 2 Esdras (i, ii, xv, xvi.) are additions. They are lacking in the oriental versions and in a majority of the best Latin manuscripts. They date from a time after the Septuagint was in circulation, for the Minor Prophets are arranged in the order of the Greek version (i 39, 40). Chapters i and ii abound in reminiscences of the New Testament and justify the rejection of Israel and the substitution of the Gentiles (i 24, 25, 35-40, ii. 10, 11, 34), and accordingly were written by a Christian, not unlikely a Christian Jew.

3. TO'BIT. This is a narrative of a certain pious Naphtalite, Tobit by name, who has a son Tobias. The father loses his eyesight. The son, dispatched to obtain payment of a debt to Rages in Media, is led on by an angel to Ecbatana, where he makes a romantic marriage with a widow, who still remained a virgin, though she had been married to seven husbands, all of whom had been killed by Asmodeus, the evil spirit, on their marriage day. Tobias, however, is encouraged by the angel to become the eighth husband of the virgin-widow, and escapes death by burning the inner parts of a fish, the smoke of which puts the evil spirit to flight. Then he cures his father's blindness by anointing the darkened eyes with the gall of the fish which had already proved so useful. Tobit is manifestly a moral tale, and not serious history. The most probable date of the publication is about 350 B. C., or from 250 to 200 B. C.

4. JU'DITH. This is a narrative professing to be a history of the way in which Judith, a Jewish widow of masculine temperament, insinuated herself into the good graces of Holofernes, an Assyrian commander-in-chief, then besieging Bethulia, and seizing his sword when he was asleep, cut off his head. The narrative is full of misstatements, anachronisms, and geographical absurdities. It is doubtful if there is any truth in the story, which may possibly have been suggested to the author by the narrative of Jael and Sisera (Judg. iv. 17-22). The first distinct reference to the book is in an epistle of Clement of Rome, about the end of the first century A. D., but it may have existed as early as 175 to 100 B. C., say four or six hundred years after the event it professed to record. By that time to say that Nabuchodonosor, apparently Nebuchadnezzar, reigned in Nineveh, instead of Babylon (Judith i. 1), would not look so erroneous as it would to a contemporary of the great king.

5. THE REST OF THE CHAPTERS OF THE BOOK OF ESTHER, which are found neither in the Hebrew nor in the Chaldee. The canonical Esther ends with a short tenth chapter of three verses. The apocryphal production adds ten verses more, and six chapters (xi.-xvi). In the Septuagint this supplementary matter is distributed in seven portions through the text, and does not interrupt the history. It amplifies parts of the Scripture narrative, without furnishing a new fact of value, and it often contradicts the history as contained in the Hebrew. The common opinion is that the book was the work of an Egyptian Jew, and that he wrote about the time of Ptolemy Philometor, 181-145 B. C.

6. THE WIS'DOM OF SOL'O-MON. This is an ethical treatise in commendation of wisdom and righteousness, and in denunciation of iniquity and idolatry. The passages which point out the sin and folly of image-worship recall those on the same theme in the Psalms and Isaiah (cp. Wisd xiii 11-19 with Ps. cxv.; cxxxv. 15-18; and Is. xl 19-25; xlv. 9-20). It is remarkable to what extent the author, in referring to historical incidents illustrative of his doctrine, limits himself to those recorded in the Pentateuch. He writes in the person of Solomon; says that he was chosen by God as king of his people, and was by him directed to build a temple and an altar, the former on the model of the tabernacle. He was a man of genius and of piety, his religious character being sustained by his belief in immortality. He lived apparently between 150 and 50 B. C., and possibly between 120 and 80 B. C. Though never formally quoted or in any way referred to in the N. T., yet occasionally both the language and the trains of thought in the N. T. somewhat resemble those in the book of Wisdom (Wisd. v 18-20 with Eph. vi 14-17; Wisd vii. 26 with Heb. i 2-6, and Wisd. xiv. 13-31 with Rom. i 19-32).

7. EC-CLE-SI-AS-TI-CUS, called also the Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sinaich. This is a comparatively long work, extending to fifty-one chapters. In chap. i 1-21 great commendation is bestowed on Simon, the high priest, the son of Onias, probably the pontiff of that name who lived between 370 and 300 B. C., and the work may, therefore, have been written as early as 290 or 280 B. C. It was originally in Hebrew. The author, Jesus, son of Sinaich, of Jerusalem (Ecclus. i 27), was the grandfather or, taking the word in its wider sense, remoter ancestor of the translator. The translation was made in Egypt "in the eight-and-thirtieth year" "when Euergetes was king." The reference is either to Ptolemy III., surnamed Euergetes, who was king of Egypt from 247 to 222 B. C., or to Ptolemy Physcon, who was likewise surnamed Euergetes, and who reigned from 169 to 165 and 146 to 117 B. C. The great theme of the work is wisdom. It is a valuable ethical treatise, in places reminding one of the books of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and parts of Job, in the canonical Scriptures, and of the Wisdom of Solomon in the Apocrypha. It is generally quoted as Ecclus., to distinguish it from Ecc.—that is, Ecclesiastes.

8. BA'RUCH, with the Epistle of Jeremiah. Baruch was Jeremiah's friend. The first five chapters are made nominally to emanate from Baruch, while the sixth is headed "The Epistle of Jeremiah." After an introduction describing the origin of the work (Baruch i 1-14), the book of Baruch falls naturally into three divisions: 1. Israel's confession of sin and prayer for forgiveness and restoration to favor (i 15-iii 8). This part bears evidence of having been written originally in Hebrew. The use to be made of it, according to the introduction (i 14), also suggests that the language was Hebrew. It is generally dated fully three centuries before Christ. 2. Exhortation to return to the fountain of wisdom (iii 9-iv. 4), and 3. Encouragement, and promise of deliverance (iv 5-v. 9). These two latter sections, from the quality of the Greek, are believed to have been written in that language. They show, too, resemblances to the Septuagint. It is disputed whether the similarity between chap. v. and Psalm of Solomon ix indicates that the chapter was based upon the psalm, and hence written after A. D. 70; or that both writings rest independently on the Septuagint. The Epistle of Jeremiah warns the Jews in exile against Babylonian idolatry. Perhaps it was written about 100 B. C.

9. THE SONG OF THE THREE HO'LY CHILDREN was designed to fit into the canonical Daniel between iii. 23 and 24. Its author and exact date are unknown. (Cp. verses 35-68 with Ps. cxlviii.)

10. THE HISTORY OF SU-SAN'NA. This is also an apocryphal addition to Daniel, showing how the prophet sagaciously discovered an accusation against Susanna, a godly woman, to be a malignant slander. Its author and date are unknown.

11. THE IDOL BEL AND THE DRAG'ON. Yet another apocryphal addition to the canonical book of Daniel. The prophet proves that the priests of Bel and their families ate the food offered to the idol, and he kills a dragon, for which, a second time, he is put into a lions' den. Author and date unknown.

12. THE PRAYER OF MA-NA'SSES, king of Judah, when he was holden captive in Babylon (cp 2 Chron. xxxiii 12, 13). Author unknown, date probably the first century B C.

13. THE FIRST BOOK OF THE MAC'CA-BEES. A historical work of great value, giving an account of the Jewish war of independence, under the Maccabee family of Levites in the second century B C. see ANTIOCHUS 2 and MACCABEE. Its author whose name is unknown, was evidently a Jew belonging to Palestine. Two opinions exist as to its date: the one places it between 120 and 106 B C, the other, on better grounds, between 105 and 64 B C. It was doubtless translated into Greek from a Hebrew original.

14. THE SECOND BOOK OF THE MAC'CA-BEES is professedly an abridgment of the large work of Jason of Cyrene. It is concerned chiefly with Jewish history from the reign of Seleucus IV, 175 B C, to the death of Nicanor in 161 B C. It is much less valuable than the first book, and the author has a love of the marvelous which diminishes the credibility of his narrations, though they contain a good deal of truth. The book was written after 125 B C, and before the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70.

15. THE THIRD BOOK OF THE MAC'CA-BEES refers to events before the war of independence. The leading incident is the attempt of Ptolemy IV Philopator in 217 B. C. to penetrate into the holy of holies, and his subsequent persecution of the Jews in Alexandria. It was written shortly before or shortly after the beginning of the Christian era. It has even been dated as late as A. D. 39 or 40.

16. THE FOURTH BOOK OF THE MAC'CA-BEES is a moral treatise advocating the mastery of the passions, and illustrating its teaching by examples of constancy under suffering, drawn from Maccabean times. It was written after 2 Maccabees and before the destruction of Jerusalem.

Ap-ol-lo'ni-a [pertaining to Apollo, the youthful god of music, song, soothsaying, archery, etc.].

A town of Macedonia, on the Egnatian Way, thirty Roman miles west of Amphipolis.

Paul passed through it as he journeyed to Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 1).

Ap-ol-lo'ni-us [pertaining to Apollo]

1. An official under Antiochus Epiphanes, who was sent to Judæa to collect tribute, and who treacherously ordered a massacre at Jerusalem (1 Mac. 1 29-32; 2 Mac. v. 24-26; cp iv 21). He became governor of Samaria (Antiq. xii 5, 5). He was defeated and slain by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac. iii. 10; Antiq. xii 7, 1).

2. Governor of Cœlesyria, whom Demetrius II made general of his army. He was defeated in battle by Jonathan Maccabæus at Ashdod (1 Mac. x 69-85). Less credibly, Josephus speaks of him as on the side of Alexander Balas (Antiq. xiii 4, 3 and 4).

A-pol'los [a modification of Apollonius or Apollodorus].

A Jew born at Alexandria, eloquent and learned, and deeply versed in the O. T. Scriptures. He became a disciple of John the Baptist, and zealously taught concerning the Messiah, though knowing only the baptism of repentance. While itinerating in Asia Minor for this purpose, he met at Ephesus, Aquila and Priscilla, who instructed him more fully, and the brethren wrote letters of introduction for him to the brethren in Achaia. On arriving in Greece, he helped the Christians, publicly confuting the Jews, and showing from the Scriptures that Jesus is the Christ (Acts xviii 24-28). The disciples with whom Paul soon afterwards fell in at Ephesus, who knew only John's baptism, and had never heard that there was a Holy Ghost, were probably converts of Apollos (xix. 1-7). Apollos' preaching at Corinth raised a party in the church at that place (1 Cor. i. 12; iii. 4, 5, 6, 22; iv. 6). But Paul had all confidence in him, and urged him to revisit Corinth (xvi. 12). He also enjoined Titus to help Apollos, apparently then in or on his way to Crete (Titus iii. 13). It is thought by many scholars that Apollos was the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews.

A-pol'ly-on [destroying, a destroyer].

The angel of the abyss (Rev. ix. 11). The Greek synonym of Abaddon.

A-pos'tle [one sent forth, a messenger, an ambassador (John xiii 16, R. V. margin)].

1. One of the men selected by Jesus to be eye-witnesses of the events of his life, to see him after his resurrection, and to testify to mankind concerning him (Mat. x. 2-42; Acts i. 21, 22; 1 Cor. ix. 1). They were chosen in succession at a very early period of the Saviour's public life. First came Andrew and his brother Simon, the well-known Simon Peter (Mat. iv. 18-20; x. 2; Mark i. 16-18; Luke vi. 14; John i. 35-42); then apparently James and John, sons of Zebedee (Mat. iv. 21, 22; x. 2; Mark i. 19, 20; Luke vi. 14); then seemingly Philip and Nathanael, named also Bartholomew (John i. 43-51); and subsequently six more, viz., Matthew, called also Levi (Mat. ix. 9-13; Mark ii. 14-17; Luke v. 27-32); Thomas; James the son of Alphaeus; Simon the Zealot or Cananean; Judas, the brother of James; and Judas Iscariot (Mat. x 1-4; Mark ii 16-19; Luke vi. 13-16; Acts i 13, all R. V.). The apostles were regarded as illiterate men by the higher Jewish dignitaries who had before them Peter and John (Acts iv. 13). All they seem to have meant was that the apostles had received elementary rather than higher education. Jesus gave great attention to their spiritual training: yet to the last they failed to understand his mission, believing that he was about to set up a temporal rather than a spiritual kingdom (Mat. xx. 20-28; Mark x. 35-45; Acts i 6); they slept in the hour of his agony in the garden (Mat. xxvi. 40), and held aloof all the day of his death on the cross (Mat. xxvi. 56; Mark xiv. 50). They were often called disciples or pupils (Mat. xi 1; xiv. 26; xx. 17; John xx 2). Peter, James the son of Zebedee, and John, seem to have possessed a clearer comprehension of the teacher's instructions and a higher appreciation of him than the others. On three different occasions they were singled out from the rest for special privilege. They were in the room at the raising from the dead of Jairus' daughter (Mark v. 37; Luke viii. 51); they were present at the transfiguration (Mat. xvii. 1; Mark ix. 2; Luke ix. 28), and were in the garden of Gethsemane during the agony (Mat. xxvi 37; Mark xiv 33). Peter, though rash and impetuous in speech, was constitutionally the best fitted to lead. He is generally mentioned first, but not always (Gal. ii. 9). John was the disciple whom Jesus peculiarly loved (John xix. 26, xx. 2; xxi 7, 20). Thomas was scrupulous as to evidence, but yielded when the proof he sought was complete. Judas proved a traitor, who, betraying his divine Lord to death for lucre's sake, and then repenting, committed suicide. The step taken to fill his place showed that the number of the apostles, fixed originally at twelve, required, for a time at least, to be kept at that figure; the reason probably was that there might be as many apostles as there were tribes of Israel. Two men possessing the necessary qualifications were put forward, the one Joseph, called Barsabas and Justus, and the other Matthias. The lot fell upon Matthias, who was consequently elected in Judas' room (Acts i. 15-26; cp. with ver. 20, Ps cix. 8). The descent of the Holy Spirit on the day of Pentecost produced a spiritual transformation of the apostles, fitting them for the great work to which they were called, the evangelization of the world (Acts ii. 1-47). To this they at once addressed themselves, Peter and John taking the lead (iii. 1-v. 42; ix 32-xi 18). James was also zealous, for he became so obnoxious to the Jewish authorities that they slew him with the sword (Acts xii. 2). Paul was divinely chosen and called for the arduous work of preaching the gospel to the gentiles (Acts ix. 1-31, xxii 5-16; xxvi. 1-20). He had not itnerated with Jesus whilst our Lord was on the earth; but he possessed the apostolic qualification of having seen Jesus after his resurrection. On the way to Damascus Jesus appeared to him and spoke to him, changing his hostility into passionate devotion. He was able to say "Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?" (1 Cor ix. 1). Paul was a highly educated man, and able to address cultured audiences of the gentiles at Athens, Rome, and elsewhere. Nor did his intellectual acquirements lead him away from his proper work. His labors were so abundant that the record of them fills about half the book called The Acts of the Apostles. Where the several apostles labored, how they lived, and how they died, is in most cases known only by the doubtful evidence of tradition. One matter, however, and an all-important one, is placed by tradition on a secure foundation, namely, that no second Judas appeared among them; all were faithful to the end; and some at least, if not even the majority, sealed their testimony to Jesus with their blood.

2 The word is occasionally applied in a less restricted sense in the N. T. to men of apostolic gifts, graces, labors, and successes. It is so notably of Barnabas, who was sent forth with Paul (Acts xiii 3, xiv 4, 14). Similarly one still meets with such expressions, as Judson the Apostle of Burmah. The name is applied also to Jesus, in Heb. iii. 1.

Ap'pa-im [the nostrils]

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron ii 30, 31)

Ap'phi-a.

A Christian woman, probably the wife of Philemon (Philemon 2).

Ap'pi-i Fo'rum [market place of Appius].

A town in Italy, about forty-three Roman, or thirty-nine and a half English, miles from Rome, on the celebrated Appian Way from Rome to Capua. Its ruins exist near Triponti. Paul was met at this town by Christians from Rome, when he was being brought a prisoner to the capital (Acts xxviii. 15).

Ap'ple.

A tree and its fruit (Song ii. 3; viii. 5; Prov. xxv 11), the rendering of the Hebrew Tappuah. Tappuah seems akin to the Arabic tuffih, meaning an apple, and the one referred to in the O. T. is probably our English apple tree Pyrus malus, which Thomson found growing splendidly at Askalon in the Philistine country. The name may have included the quince as well. Tristram believes that the apricot is meant. The apple tree is enumerated with the vine, the fig tree, the pomegranate, and the palm tree, as one of the chief trees cultivated (Joel i. 12). There were several towns called Tappuah—in the low land (Josh. xv. 34), near Hebron (53), and on the border of Ephraim and Manasseh (xvii. 8), where doubtless many apple trees grew.

The apple of the eye is the eyeball or pupil (Deut. xxxii. 10. Ps xvii. 8; Lam. ii. 18, Zech. ii. 8). For apple of Sodom, see VINE

Aq'ui-la [eagle].

A Jew, born in Pontus, who with his wife, Priscilla, lived for a time at Rome, but had to leave that city when the emperor Claudius commanded all its Jewish inhabitants to depart. He removed to Corinth, where he worked at his craft, tentmaking. Paul, who was of the same occupation, lodged with him at Corinth, and formed a high opinion of him and his wife (Acts xviii. 1-3). They were his fellow-passengers from Corinth as far as Ephesus, on his way to Syria (Acts xviii. 18, 19). In the First Epistle to the Corinthians, the two join Paul in sending salutations from Asia, i. e. probably from Ephesus (1 Cor. xvi. 19). At Ephesus they met Apollos, and instructed him more completely in Christian doctrine (Acts xviii. 26). Afterwards they seem to have returned to Rome, for Paul sends them salutations in his letter to that church (Rom. xvi. 3). But they must again have left it, for in the apostle's second Epistle to Timothy, written from Rome, salutations are sent them anew (2 Tim. iv. 19).

Ar [city].

One of the chief cities of Moab, more fully called Ar of Moab (Isa. xv. 1). It lay on the northern boundary of Moab (Num. xxi. 15, Deut. ii. 18), in the midst of the Arnon valley (Num. xxii. 36, Deut. ii. 36, Josh. xiii. 9).

The Greeks connected the name with Ares, the god of war, the Roman Mars, and called it after him Areopolis, city of Mars. The Jews and others in the early Christian centuries named it Rabbath Moab, or simply Rabbah, i. e. capital, of Moab. It was destroyed by earthquake, probably in A. D. 342, and the name Areopolis was transferred to another Rabbah, about ten miles south on the plateau.

A man of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 38).

A'rab [ambuscade].

A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 52). Cp. ARBITE.

Ar'a-bah [arid region, desert].

1. The geographical name of that great depression of the land in which are found the sea of Galilee, the Jordan, and the Dead Sea (Josh. xi. 2; xii. 3, R. V.). The name apparently belonged also to the extension of the valley to the Red Sea (Deut. ii. 8, R. V.). In A. V. the word is translated, being generally rendered by plain, but also by wilderness or desert (Amos vi. 14; Ezek. xlvii. 8).

2. The same as Beth-arabah (Josh. xviii. 22).

A-ra'bi-a [Greek form of Arabic 'arab, arid region]

In modern geography the most westerly of the three great peninsulas in Southern Asia. It is bounded on the east by the Persian Gulf and the Gulf of Oman, on the south by the Indian Ocean, and on the west by the Red Sea. Northward it projects triangularly and passes insensibly into the Syrian desert. Its length from north to south is about 1500 miles; its average breadth from east to west, about 800; its area about 1,139,000 square miles. It consists mainly of an elevated table-land called Nejd, highest along the west and south near the coast, and sloping on the north toward the Syrian desert. It is separated from the coast by a low-lying sandy region, the western portion of which is called Hejaz, the southwestern and southern Yemen, and the eastern, Oman, Hejr, and Bahrein. Arabia lies athwart the enormous belt of desert, commencing near the Atlantic Ocean with the Sahara, and extending through Chinese Tartary, almost to the Pacific Ocean. Arabia is consequently largely desert. Among the Hebrews the name Arabian denoted the inhabitants of the desert portion (Jer. iii. 2), whether near Babylonia or Ethiopia (Is. xiii. 20; 2 Chron. xxi. 16), often as distinguished from the prominent settled tribes (Jer. xxv. 24; Ezek. xxvii. 21). Eventually Arabia came to denote the entire peninsula (Acts ii. 11; Gal. i. 17, iv. 25, cp. 2 Chron. ix. 14). Ptolemy, the geographer of Alexandria who wrote in the second century A. D., divided the country into three regions: Arabia Felix, the Happy or Fertile; Arabia Petraea, the Stony; and Arabia Deserta, the Desert. Arabia Felix was of indefinite extent. Arabia Petraea, having for its capital Petra, was the district between the Red and the Dead Seas; and Arabia Deserta the projecting angle on the northern boundary, sometimes called the Syrian desert. The streams are few and small, none navigable. The geology is little known, but gold and precious stones were obtained. The feature of the botany is the prevalence of aromatic plants, some of them furnishing valuable spices. Of its birds the most noted is the ostrich; of its quadrupeds the camel, the Arab horse, and the wild ass. The country was settled by Semites (Gen. x. 26-29; xxv. 2-4; 13-15), as physiognomy, traits, and language evidence; in part also by Hamites (Gen. x. 6, 7). As early as the time of the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt, there existed in southern Arabia a civilized power, the Minæan kingdom, with its capital at Ma'in, about thirty miles to the north of Mariaba. The names of thirty-three Minæan kings have been recovered. Even the Minæans used the familiar Semitic alphabet.

Bedouin Arab

The Minæan kingdom was ultimately superseded by the Sabeans, the scriptural kingdom of Sheba. Arab tribes often came into contact with the Hebrews (Gen xxxvii 28, 36; Judg. vi.-viii.). Solomon bought from the Arabs gold, silver, and spices (2 Chron ix 14). Jehoshaphat received tribute from them in flocks of sheep and goats (xvii 11). In the reign of Jehoram, Arabs with other marauders plundered Jerusalem (xxi. 16). They were after-

wards defeated by Uzziah (xxvi. 7). Isaiah and Jeremiah denounced judgments against their race (Is. xxi. 13-17; Jer. xxv. 24), and both used the wandering Arab in their poetic illustrations (Is. xlii. 20; Jer. iii. 2). Arabs were hired allies of the Syrians against Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac. v. 39). There were Arabs present on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 11), and Paul sojourned for a time in Arabia, before commencing his apostolic work (Gal. i. 17). The scantiness of water, the courage of the Arabs, and their wandering life, prevented even the greatest of the ancient empires from conquering Arabia and holding it in subjection. Both Judaism and Christianity had rooted themselves in Arabia when in the seventh century of the Christian era, Mohammed arose. Before his death (A D 632) his faith was everywhere dominant throughout the peninsula, and in a century more the Saracens, issuing thence, had put in danger the civilization and faith of the whole Christian world

A-ra'bi-an.

One of the Arab race; a native or inhabitant of Arabia (2 Chron. xvii 11).

A'rad [wild ass].

1. A town on the border of the south country and the wilderness of Judah (Num. xxi. 1; Josh. xii 14; Judg. i. 16). The site is marked by Tell 'Arad, on a barren-looking eminence sixteen miles south of Hebron. Its king fought against the Israelites when they were at mount Hor and took some of them captive, but the Israelites roused themselves to new trust in God, and devastated the territory of the king, and eventually he himself or his successor was vanquished by Joshua (ibid.)

2. A Benjamite, descended through Beriah (1 Chron. viii 15)

Ar'a-dus. See ARVAD.

A'rah [wayfarer].

1. Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 5; Neh. vii 10)

2. An Asherite, a son of Ulla (1 Chron. vii 39).

A'ram.

1. A person, or collectively a people, descended from Shem, who inhabited the region known as Aram (Gen. x. 22, 23; 1 Chron. i. 17).

2. The plain occupied by the Aramaeans, extending from the Lebanon mountains to beyond the Euphrates, and from the river Sagur on the north to Damascus and beyond on the south. The prophet Amos speaks of the Aramaeans as dwelling from Damascus to Beth-edon, in other words, from Lebanon on the southwest to mount Masius on the northeast (i. 5). Several districts were distinguished

(1) A'RAM-NA-HA-RA'IM, i. e. Aram of the two rivers, referring either to the Euphrates and Tigris, or, more probably, to the Euphrates and Chabor. It is commonly believed that in this region Paddan-aram was situated, Paddan being identified with the place near Haran called Tell Faddan (Gen. xxviii. 5 and xxiv. 10, 47, R V). This is the Aram where the patriarchs dwelt before they went to Canaan, where the ancient cities of Haran and Nisibis stood, where later Edessa the noted seat of Syrian culture arose, the Aram which the Hebrews speak of as "beyond the river" (2 Sam. x. 16)

(2) A'RAM-DA-MAS'CUS. The Hebrews during almost, if not quite, the entire period of their kingdom, found Aramaeans in Damascus (2 Sam. viii. 5, R V. margin; 1 Kin. xv. 18). The city became eventually the center of Aramaean influence west of the Euphrates, and waged intermittent warfare with the northern Israelites during their entire existence as a separate kingdom.

(3) A'RAM-ZO'BAH. In the days of Saul David, and Solomon, another powerful Aramaean kingdom flourished west of the Euphrates, namely the kingdom of Zobah (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii 3, cp. 2 Chron. viii 3), called Aram-zobah by Hebrew writers (2 Sam. x. 6). At one time its dominion extended as far as the borders of Hamath on the northwest (1 Chron. xviii 3, 2 Sam. viii. 10), had Damascus to the south or southwest, for one of its towns, Berothai, was situated between Hamath and Damascus (2 Sam. viii 5 and 8 with Ezek. xlvii 16), and during this prosperous period probably exercised sway well toward the Euphrates on the east and the Hauran on the south

(4) A'RAM-MA'A-CAH lay east of the Jordan within the contemplated bounds of Israel, hard by mount Hermon (Josh. xii 5, xiii. 11). From the description of Abel, which belonged to the tribe of Naphtali, as "Abel [in the neighborhood] of Beth-maacah," it may be inferred that Maacah extended as far west as the Jordan

(5) GE'SHUR in Aram was a small kingdom not far from Maacah, and like it east of the Jordan, near mount Hermon, and within the territory allotted to Manasseh (Deut. iii 14; 2 Sam. xv. 8, R V. margin, with xiii 37)

(6) A'RAM-BETH-RE'HOB (2 Sam. x. 6). The location is uncertain. If identical with the place mentioned in Num. xii. 21 and Judg. xviii. 28, it was near both Maacah and Dan.

3. A descendant of Asher (1 Chron. vii. 34).

4. A Greek form of Ram, the father of Aminadab (Mat. i. 3, Luke iii 33, and R. V. margin). See ARNI

Ar-a-ma'ic or the Ar-a-mæ'an or Aramaean Language.

A Semitic language spoken in Aram. It was written with the same alphabet as the Hebrew, and differs from this language chiefly in the system of vocalization and in the structure of a few grammatical forms. Before the inscriptions revealed that the Babylonian vernacular was Assyrian, Aramaic was incorrectly called Chaldee, a term not yet obsolete. Aramaic was used by Laban (Gen. xxxi. 47, R V. margin), it is seen in the proper names Tabrimmon, Hazael (1 Kin. xv. 18, R V., xix. 15), and Mari; it is found in inscriptions as early as the time of Shalmaneser and Saigon, showing that it was used by traders at Nineveh, it became the international language of business and diplomacy (2 Kin. xviii. 26, R V. margin); it was used by Jeremiah to state an address to idols (x. 11, R V. margin), and by Daniel and Ezra for certain portions of their books; it was adopted by the Jews who returned from Babylonia, and in the time of Christ was spoken by large numbers of the Jews colloquially (see HEBREW), and also by neighboring nations. The Hebrew Scriptures were translated into it; the Targum of Onkelos, a pupil of Gamaliel, comprising the Law and the Prophets, was the first work of the kind and a fine version. Syriac is a dialect which developed out of the Aramaic A'ram-beth-re'hob. See ARAM 2 (6).

A'ram-i'tess.

A woman of Aram (1 Chron. vii. 14).

A'ram-ma'a-cah. See ARAM 2 (4).

A'ram-na-ha-ra'im. See ARAM 2 (1).

A'ram-so'bah. See ARAM 2 (3)

A'ran [wild goat]

A descendant of Dishan or offshoot of that Horite tribe (Gen. xxxvi. 28; 1 Chron. i. 42).

Ar'a-rat.

A mountainous country north of Assyria, centering about the elevated plateau of the Araxes. In the time of Jeremiah it was the seat of a kingdom apparently adjacent to the boundary line between Russia and Turkey. It has two peaks, one higher than the other. The loftier one rises 17,260 feet above the level of the ocean, more than 10,000 feet above the table-land on which it stands, and 3000 above the line of perpetual snow. The ascent is so difficult and laborious that the Turks call Ararat Aghri Dagh, or the Painful Mountain. Its summit was long deemed inaccessible, but it was at length reached by Parrot in 1829, and in 1850 by Col Khoeizko and his party of sixty, while they were engaged on the trigonometrical survey of Trans-Caucasia

A-ra'thes, in A V Ariarathes.

King of Cappadocia from 162 to 131 B. C., surnamed Philopator (1 Mac. xv. 22).

A'ra-rite.

So R. V., following the present Hebrew text, once in 2 Sam. xxiii. 33, where A V. has Hararite as in the corresponding passage, 1 Chron. xi. 35

A-rau'nah.

A Jebusite who possessed a threshing floor on mount Moriah. David purchased the floor in order to erect there an altar to Jehovah that the plague then raging might be stayed (2 Sam. xxiv. 18-25; 1 Chron. xxi. 15-28). The place afterwards became the site of Solomon's temple (2 Chron. in 1). Araunah is called Ornan in Chronicles, Uriah or Ornah in the Hebrew text of 2 Sam. xxiv. 16, and yet differently in ver. 18. It is difficult to determine which was the original form of the name Araunah has the most foreign look those of Minni and Ashkenaz (Jer. li. 27). When the sons of Sennacherib killed their father they escaped into the land of Ararat, which the A. V. happily identifies with Armenia (2 Kin. xix. 37, Is. xxxvii. 38). On one of the mountains of Ararat, it is not stated which, the ark of Noah rested (Gen. viii. 4). The Assyrian cuneiform account of the flood implies a mountain near the country of Urû, northeast of Babylonia. Perhaps the name Ararat (Urartû) and Urû have been confounded. Traditions with respect to the resting place of the ark attach themselves to various mountains in western Asia; but by mount Ararat is now meant a noble mountain almost midway between the Black Sea and the Caspian, and not far from Ar'ba, in A V once Arbah [four, or, perhaps, the croucher (with article, Gen. xxxv. 27)].

The Mountain known as Ararat.

Father or greatest man of Anak (Josh. xiv. 15; xv. 13). He founded, or gave name to, Kirjath-arba, the city later known as Hebron, or else he derived his title from the town (Josh. xiv. 15, Judg. i. 10). See HEBRON.

Ar'bath-ite.

An inhabitant of Beth-arabah (2 Sam. xxiii. 31; 1 Chron. xi. 32).

Ar-bat'ta, in A V Arbattis.

A locality near Galilee (1 Mac. v. 23). The readings of the name vary greatly in the manuscripts, and it is uncertain what place is meant.

Ar-be'la.

A place (1 Mac ix 2); according to Josephus, the well-known town of the name in Galilee (Antiq. xii 11, 1), now Irbid. See BETH-ARBEL.

Ar'bite.

A native of Arab, in the hill country of Judah (2 Sam xxiii 35, possibly a variant reading of 1 Chron. xi 37).

Ar-che-la'us [leading the people, a chief].

The elder one of two sons whom a Samaritan wife bore to Herod the Great, the younger one being Antipas, afterwards Herod the Tetrarch (Antiq. xvii. 1, 3). With his brother Antipas and his half-brothers Herod and Philip, he received his education at Rome. While there Antipater, a half-brother of his, falsely accused him and Philip of plotting to murder their common father, but Archelaus and Philip were acquitted, and the crime which the accuser had alleged against others being brought home to himself, he was put to death (Antiq. xvi 4, 3, xvii 7, 1; War, i. 31, 2 & 32, 7). Herod died immediately afterwards, 4 B C; and when his will, which had been altered a few days previously, was opened, it was found that the greater part of the kingdom was left to Archelaus, though tetrarchies had been cut out of it for Antipas and Philip, and some cities reserved to Herod's sister Salome (Antiq. xvii 8, 1). But at that time the Jewish kingdom stood to imperial Rome in the relation of a protected state. Archelaus therefore prudently abstained from ascending the throne till he had solicited permission from Augustus, the Roman emperor, and he resolved to start at once for the metropolis to urge his suit in person (8, 4). But before he could leave, an unhappy incident occurred. A number of people, who conceived that they had a grievance, wished it redressed by strong measures then and there. Their demand was clearly premature, but they would take no denial; and when they could not have their way, they rioted at the passover, till, sorely against his will, for he wished to gain popularity, Archelaus had to put down the sedition by military force, 3000 people losing their lives. In consequence of this, a deputation of Jews was dispatched to Rome, to urge the emperor not to allow Archelaus to obtain the kingdom. His younger brother, Herod Antipas, also appeared as his rival, petitioning that he, in place of Archelaus, might be made king. The emperor confirmed Herod's will in its essential provisions. Archelaus obtained the larger portion of the kingdom, but only with the title of ethnarch or ruler of a people, which was inferior to that of king (Antiq. xvii 8, 1; 9, 7; 11, 5). His rival Antipas was given only a tetrarchy. Soon after this, Joseph and Mary returned with the infant Jesus from Egypt. They might consider that the queller of the passover riot was not a man over-tender of human life, and that it was only common prudence for them to turn aside to Galilee so as to keep out of his jurisdiction (Mat. ii. 22). A parable of our Lord himself seems to refer to the circumstances attending the accession of Archelaus. "A certain nobleman," we read, "went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return" (Luke xix 12). "But his citizens hated him, and sent a message after him, saying, We will not have this man to reign over us" (14). If the reference is really to Archelaus, then another verse may be history rather than parable. "But those nine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither, and slay them before me" (27). Quite in keeping with this view, Josephus says that Archelaus used not only the Jews but the Samaritans barbarously, out of resentment for their old quarrels with him. Both nationalities, therefore, sent embassies to Rome to complain of his cruelty. They succeeded in their object. In the ninth year of his government about A D 6, he was deposed, and banished to Vienne, in Gaul, while his wealth was put into the emperor's treasury (War ii. 7, 3).

Ar'che-vites.

Babylonians, inhabitants of Erech. A body of them were settled by Asnapper in Samaria after the ten tribes had been carried captive (Ezra iv 9).

Ar'chi. See ARCHITE.

Ar-chip'pus [master of the horse].

A Christian at Colosse who approved himself as a champion of the gospel, was intimate with Philemon, and an office-bearer in the church (Col iv. 17; Philem 2).

Ar'chite, in A V. once Archl, the Hebrew form.

A member of a Canaanite tribe of the same name, or else a native or inhabitant of a village known as Erech. The border of the Archites was on the boundary between Ephraim and Benjamin, west of Bethel, where the fountain 'Arik and the wady 'Arik are found (Josh xvi 2). Hushai, David's faithful counselor, was an Archite (2 Sam xv. 32).

Ar-cu'tus [the Bear-ward].

A large and bright star, which the Greeks and Romans called by this name, meaning the keeper of the Bear, because in its course through the heavens it always kept behind the tail of Ursa Major, or the Great Bear. In the A. V. of Job ix 9 and xxxvii 32 it is the translation of the Hebrew 'Ash or 'Aynsh. But 'Ash is not Arcturus, which looks very solitary in the sky, while the 'Aynsh of Job (xxxviii 32) has sons or bright stars near it in the heavens. It is not the Bear-keeper but probably the Bear itself, and is so rendered in the R. V. The Arabs call it Na'sh, a bier. There are in it seven bright stars. The four constituting the irregular diamond seem to the Arabs to resemble a bier carrying a corpse, while the three stars constituting the Bear's tail appear to them to be the children of the deceased person, walking behind the bier to the place of interment.

Ard.

A son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (Gen. xlvii 21; Num. xxvi. 38 and 41 with 40). He gave name to a family of the tribe of Benjamin (ibid). The person called Addar in 1 Chron. viii. 3 is probably he. The variation in form is probably due to a copyist's transposition of two letters very similar in Hebrew, or to his confusion of Hebrew d and r. The latter error is especially frequent, and is quite intelligible; see under DALETH.

Ar'don.

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb (1 Chron. ii 18).

A-re'll.

A son of Gad, and founder of a family (Gen. xlvii. 16; Num. xxvi 17).

Ar-e-op'a-gite.

A judge of the court of Areopagus (Acts xvii. 34).

Ar-e-op'a-gus [hill of Ares].

1. One of the lower hills on the west of the acropolis of Athens. It was consecrated to Ares, the god of war. It is a narrow, naked ridge of limestone rock, running from northwest to southeast, and terminating abruptly over against the acropolis, or citadel of Athens. This southeastern end was crowned by several altars; and rises 50 or 60 feet above the valley separating it from the acropolis, which is much the higher of the two hills. Ares corresponding to the Roman Mars, Areopagus is the same as Mars' hill.

2. The supreme court of Athens, which met on the hill called Areopagus to pass sentence. It was constituted of venerable and eminent citizens. The seats of the judges and others connected with the court are still seen hewn in the rock; and toward the southwest there is a flight of steps descending to the market place. It was before the Areopagus that Paul pleaded his own cause and that of Christianity, and the philosophic character of his discourse arose from his vivid consciousness that he was addressing some of the most intellectual men in the most intellectual city in the world.

During judicial trial the court sat in its official chamber on the market place, and adjourned to the hill to pass formal sentence. It has been argued that Paul made his defence in the chamber of justice and not on the hill, before the Areopagus and not on the Areopagus (Curtius). Recent studies of Aristotle, however, lead to the conclusion that cases of heresy were not subject to the jurisdiction of this court (Manatt), and the narrative in The Acts militates against the supposition that Paul's discourse was a formal defence in a trial before the court (Conybeare and Howson). It appears, therefore, that Paul addressed an informal gathering of philosophers on the Areopagus (Acts xvii. 16 seq.).

Ar'e-tas [Greek form of Harthath].

More than one king of Arabia Petræa, during the time that it was occupied by the Nabathæan Arabs, bore this name. Among others,

1. A contemporary of the high priest Jason, about 170 B. C. (2 Mac. v. 8).

2. Father-in-law of Herod the Tetrarch. When Herod prepared to divorce his daughter in order to marry Herodias, Aretas declared war against Herod and totally defeated his army in A. D. 36. The Romans took Herod's part, and Vitellius was dispatched to chastise Aretas, but the death of the emperor Tiberius put an end to the expedition (Antiq. xviii 5, 1-3). It was about A. D. 39 or 40, during the reign of Caligula, or perhaps in 36, that Aretas for a brief period held Damascus (2 Cor. xi. 32).

Ar-re'us. See ARI'US.

Ar'gob [a heap of stones or clods]

1. A region of Bashan, included within the dominions of Og, and marching on Geshur and Maacah. It contained sixty fenced cities, besides the nomad encampments taken by Jair (Deut. iii 4, 13, 14; Josh. xiii 30; 1 Kin. iv 13), see HAVVOH-JAIR. The Targum indicates the district of Trachonitis but this region lies too far to the east. Josephus identifies a portion of it with Gaulonitis (Antiq. vin. 2, 3 with 1 Kin. iv 13). It probably corresponded in part to the region between the eastern slope of northern mount Gilead and the Lejjah.

2. A man assassinated along with Pekahiah, king of Israel, by Pekah, who aspired to the throne (2 Kin. xv. 25).

A'ri-a-ra'thes. See ARATHES

A-ri'dai.

A son of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

A-rid'a-tha.

A son of Haman (Esth. ix. 8).

A-ri'eh [lion].

A man assassinated along with king Pekahiah, Argob, and others, by Pekah, the son of Remaliah (2 Kin. xv 25).

A'ri-el [Lion of God]

1. A Moabite (2 Sam. xxiii 20, R. V.).

2. A name of Jerusalem, symbolical of the strength it possesses through God (Is. xxix. 1, 2, 7). A slightly different form would signify the hearth of an altar.

3. A chief of the Jews who were with Ezra at the river Ahava (Ezra viii 16).

Ar-i-ma-thæ'a [Latin and Greek modification of Ramah, height].

The town from which the councilor Joseph came, who obtained permission of Pilate to take away the body of Jesus and give it honorable interment in his own new sepulcher (Mat. xxvii 57-60; Mark xv. 43; Luke xxiii. 51-53; John xix. 38). Arimathea is the Greek form of Ramah, but which town of that name is intended is uncertain. Ramleh near Lydda is out of the question; for it was not built until the beginning of the eighth century A. D. The name occurs in 1 Mac xi 34 (cp. Antiq. xiii 4, 9) as belonging at that period to Samaria.

A'ri-och [servant of the moon-god]

1 King of Ellasar, who was confederate with Chedorlaomer on his invasion of the Jordan valley (Gen. xiv. 1, 9). A king of Larsa called Eriaku, son of Kudurmabug, is mentioned in Babylonian inscriptions. Larsa, probably Ellasar, his capital is now represented by the mounds of Senkerah, a little to the east of Erech.

2 Captain of the king's guard at Babylon under Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. ii 14, 15). It pertained to the office to execute sentences of death (21).

A-ri'sai

A son of Haman (Esth. ix 9).

Ar-is-tar'chus [best ruling]

A Macedonian of Thessalonica who was with Paul at Ephesus, and in the riot was seized by the mob and probably dragged into the theater, but he seems not to have been seriously injured (Acts. xix 29). On the apostle's return from Greece, whither he had gone from Ephesus, Aristarchus accompanied him from Troas to Asia (Acts. xx 4, 6). He was subsequently his fellow-voyager to Rome (xxv. 2, cp. Philem. 24), as also at one time his fellow-prisoner (Col. iv 10).

Ar-is-to-bu'lus [best advising]

1 A celebrated Jewish philosopher at Alexandria (2 Mac. i 10).

2 A Christian, to whose household at Rome Paul sent salutations (Rom. xvi 10).

A-ri'us, in A. V. Aereus.

King of Sparta (1 Mac. xii 20, Antiq. xiii 5, 8), probably the first of the name, who reigned from 309 to 265 B. C.

Ark.

A chest, box, or vessel of similar shape.

1. Noah's ark was the rude vessel which Noah was divinely ordered to construct, and in which he floated about when the deluge was on the earth. If the cubit, in terms of which the dimensions of the ark are stated, was the ordinary cubit of 18 inches, then the length of the ark was 450 feet, the breadth 75 feet, and the height 43 feet. The Great Eastern steamship was 674 feet long, 77 feet broad, 58 feet deep, and had a gross tonnage of 22,500 tons. The ark was made of gopher, probably cypress, wood, and rendered watertight by being daubed inside and outside with bitumen. It had lower, second, and third stories. A door in the side afforded ingress and egress. A window, probably a cubit in height, extended, with slight interruptions, all around the vessel. A rooflike covering protected the inmates from rain and sun (Gen. vi. 14-viii. 19; Mat. xxiv. 38; Luke xvii 27; Heb. xi 7; 1 Pet. ii 20). The ark was designed for the accommodation of Noah, his family, and the animals which were selected to be preserved.

Dr. Howard Osgood, in The Sunday School Times for Feb. 6, 1892, discusses the question whether every species of animals, as they are now classified by naturalists, could have found accommodation in the ark. The highest estimate of the number of species of land mammalia is 290 above the size of the sheep, 757 from the sheep to the rats, and 1359 of the rats, bats, and shrews. The average size is about that of the common cat. Allowing five square feet of deck room as amply sufficient for a cat, two of each species of mammalia could find room on two-thirds of one deck of the ark, with its 33,750 square feet of surface. The representatives of 10,000 species of birds, 979 of reptiles, 1252 of lizards, and 100,000 of insects could easily be placed on the remaining third of the deck, leaving the other two decks for storing food.

2. The infant Moses' ark, made for his reception when he was exposed upon the Nile, was a basket composed of papyrus leaves or stems, or both, plaited together and rendered watertight by a coat of bitumen (Ex. ii 3-6).

3. The Ark of the Covenant or Testimony was the central object of the tabernacle. It was a chest 2½ cubits long, 1½ cubits broad, and the same in depth, made of acacia wood, and overlaid within and without with pure gold. A rim or moulding of gold encircled it at the top. At the bottom were two golden rings on each side, through which poles of acacia wood overlaid with gold were put for the purpose of carrying the ark about. It was covered by a lid of solid gold which was called the mercy seat. Two cherubim of gold stood on this cover, one piece with it, one at each end, spreading their wings on high so as to overshadow it, and facing each other, but looking down toward the mercy seat. They were symbols of the presence and unapproachableness of Jehovah who, as King of Israel in the midst of his people, dwelt between the cherubim, uttered his voice from between them, and met the representative of his people there (Ex. xxv. 10 seq.; xxx. 6; Num. vii 89, 1 Sam. iv 4). It was made specially as a receptacle for the Testimony, on the tables of stone (Ex. xxv. 21, xxxi. 18; Deut. x 3, 5), and it was placed in the holy of holies (Ex. xxvi 34). Afterwards a pot of manna, Aaron's rod that blossomed, and the book of the law were put beside the ark (Ex. xvi 34, Num. xvii. 10; Deut. xxxi. 26, Heb. ix. 4), but were removed during the times of confusion (1 Kin. viii. 9). The ark was placed in charge of the Kohathite Levites (Num. iii 29-31; iv 4-15). The priests, who were Levites and of the family of Kohath, bore it themselves on occasions of special solemnity (Josh. iii 3; vi. 6; vii. 33; 2 Sam. xv. 24, 29; 1 Kin. viii. 3). It went before the Israelites when they left mount Sinai (Num. x. 33); either in the van or, as the expression may denote, like a king in the midst of his troops, leading and directing the march, while the priests who accompanied it signaled the orders of Jehovah (x. 5, 6, 8; and for the phraseology Ex. xxxii. 1; Deut. iii. 28; x. 11; xxxi. 3^b). It went in advance of the people into the Jordan and halted, where the stream ceased to flow, until the tribes had done crossing to the other side (Josh. iv. 9-11). It was carried in the midst of the host for seven days round Jericho before the walls of the city fell down (vi. 1-20). From Gilgal by Jericho it was removed to Shiloh (1 Sam. iii. 3). Having been taken in Eli's time to the field of battle, as a talisman which was expected to work wonders in the contest with the Philistines, it was captured by the enemy (1 Sam. iv. 1-22), but was soon afterwards sent back into the Hebrew territory (v. 1-vi. 11). It was successively at Beth-shemesh, where the inhabitants looked into it and were punished (vi. 12-20; see BETH-SHEMESH); at Kirjath-jearim (vii. 1, 2); and at Perez-uzzah, where Uzzah was struck dead for touching it (2 Sam. vi. 1-11, 1 Chron. xiii. 1-14; cp. Num. iv. 15, 19, 20). Thence it was taken by David to Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi. 12-23), being now borne by men (13) who, if the custom in Israel before and during the reign of David was followed, were priests or priests assisted by other Levites (Josh. iii. 3, 13; iv. 9; vi. 4, 6; 2 Sam. xv. 24, 25, 29), as the Chronicler states (1 Chron. xv. 1-15). At Jerusalem it was put in a temporary tabernacle erected for it by David (2 Sam. vi. 17; vii. 1, 2; 1 Chron. xvi. 1, 4-6, 37-43). Later it was placed in the holy of holies in Solomon's temple (1 Kin. viii. 1-9). Josiah refers to it (2 Chron. xxxv. 3), but the meaning is obscure. It disappeared when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, and has not been reported since.

Sacred chests were in use among other peoples of antiquity. They were employed by the Greeks and Egyptians, and served as receptacles for the idol, or for symbols of the deities, or for other sacred objects.

Ark'te.

A tribe descended from Canaan (Gen. x. 17; 1 Chron. i. 15). According to Josephus they founded the Phœnician city Arke, the modern 'Arka, about twelve miles north of Tripoli, in Syria (Antiq. i. 6, 2). This town is mentioned as Arkatu by Thothmes III. about 1600 years before Christ.

Ar-ma-ged'don, in R V Har-Magedon [mountain of Megiddo]

A prophetic battlefield where the kings of the whole world gather together unto the war of the great day of God (Rev. xvi. 16). The name is framed with evident reference to the sanguinary contests which took place near the town of Megiddo, the first, that in which Sisera and the Canaanites were defeated at the waters of Megiddo (Judg. v. 19), the second, that which resulted in the death of Ahaziah, king of Judah, at Megiddo (2 Kin. ix. 27), and the third, that in which king Josiah was killed when in conflict with the army of Pharaoh-necho (2 Kin. xxiii. 29, Zech. xii. 11). The historical associations with Megiddo in the past were seized upon by the prophet to supply a speaking name appropriate in a description of the future sorrows and triumphs of God's people.

Ar-me'ni-a. See ARARAT

Arm'let.

An ornament like a bracelet, but surrounding the arm higher up than the wrist (Ex. xxxv. 22, R V). There were armlets among the spoil of the Midianites (Num. xxxi. 50, R V). In parts of the East an armlet, generally studded with jewels, is worn by kings as one of the insignia of royal authority (cp. 2 Sam. i. 10).

Ar-mo'ni [pertaining to the palace]

One of Saul's sons by his concubine Rizpah. He was slain by the Gibeonites to satisfy justice (2 Sam. xxi. 8-11).

Ar'mor.

Covering worn to protect the person against offensive weapons (Eph. vi. 11). It consisted of—1 The shield. Shields were used by all nations of antiquity. The Israelites employed a larger and a smaller kind (1 Kin. x. 16, 17). The larger kind, translated shield, buckler, target, belonged to the heavy armed spearmen and lancers (1 Chron. xii. 8, 24, 34; 2 Chron. xiv. 8). The smaller shield, rendered shield or buckler, was carried by archers (1 Chron. v. 18; 2 Chron. xiv. 8). Shields were of various shapes—round, oval, and oblong. They were commonly made of several thicknesses of leather or of wood covered with leather (cp. Ezek. xxxix. 9), which was oiled to keep it glossy and pliable, and to protect it against the wet (Is. xxi. 5). They were sometimes covered with brass (Antiq. xiii.

12, 5), or made entirely of brass (1 Kin xiv. 27, probably), or even of beaten gold (1 Kin x 17; 2 Chron. ix 16; 1 Mac. vi 2, 39). Bronze shields were often two or three feet in diameter. Sometimes a shieldbearer accompanied a warrior into battle (1 Sam xvii 7). 2. Helmets were made of leather and eventually of iron and brass (1 Mac vi 35). They were known to Egyptians, Philistines, Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians (1 Sam xvii 5; Jer. xlv. 4; Ezek xxiii. 23, 24; xxvii 10). Helmets of brass were in occasional use among the Israelites and Philistines as early as the time of Saul (1 Sam xvii. 5, 39). Uzziah armed his troops with helmets and coats of mail (2 Chron xxvi 14). 3. The breastplate or properly coat of mail, as it is sometimes rendered, covered the breast, back, and shoulders. It was made of leather, quilted cloth, linen (Herod iii 47), brass, or iron (1 Sam xvii 5, Rev ix 9), and even gold (1 Mac. vi 2). There were joints in it or between it and the adjacent armor (1 Kin xxi. 34). Scale-armor coats were worn by Goliath, and chain coats by the soldiers of Antiochus Eupator (1 Sam xvii 5, Hebrew, 1 Mac vi 35, Greek). 4. Greaves, consisting of thin plates of metal, were occasionally worn to protect the front of the leg below the knee (1 Sam xvii 6); and sometimes, 5. Laced boots set with nails (Is ix 5, R. V. margin). For offensive weapons, see the several articles.

Ar'my.

The army of Israel consisted originally of infantry only (Num xi 21; 1 Sam iv 10; xv 4), composed of spearmen, slingers, and archers. It included all the able-bodied men of the nation—all the males from 20 years old and upward, able to go forth to war, being enrolled for service (Num 1; 2 Sam xxiv. 9). The Levites were not numbered in the wilderness for military service; but they might bear arms, if the occasion arose (Num i. 48-50; 1 Chron xii 26-28 with 23). The number of men reported as participating in various battles is sufficiently large to include the greater part of the adult male population of the region. For military operations of no great magnitude, each tribe furnished its quota of warriors (Num. xxxi. 4; Josh vii 3, Judg. xx 10); but inroads of the enemy were naturally met by all the manly spirits seizing their weapons to defend their firesides. In time of national peril messengers were sent throughout all the coasts of Israel to summon the men of war by the sound of the trumpet, by proclamation, or by symbolic act, to come to the rescue (Judg. vi. 34, 35, xix. 29; 1 Sam. xi 7).

The militia of Israel was organized on the basis of the political divisions. The military and political units alike were the thousand, a term apparently interchangeable with father's house (Ex. xii. 37; Num. i. 2, 3, 16, 46; Judg vi 15; 1 Sam. x. 19, 21; xvii. 18). A chieftain of Judah was accordingly often an 'alluph or chiliarch (Zech. ix 7; xii 5), as were the chiefs of Edom (Gen xxxvi; Ex xv 15). For both political and military purposes the thousands were divided into hundreds (Ex xviii 25, Num xxxi 14, 48, 2 Sam. xviii 1, 2 Chron xxv 5), and fifties (Ex xviii 25; 1 Sam viii 12; 2 Kin. i 9; cp Num i 25), and tens (Ex xviii 25; cp Num xxvi 7). The actual number composing a father's house or thousand necessarily varied constantly, according to natural law; and it is probable that the "thousand" was usually very much smaller than the technical name indicates (cp the varying numbers in legion and regiment). Each of these divisions was under its own officer (Num xxxi. 14, Judg xx 10, 1 Sam viii. 12; 2 Kin i. 9; xi 4; 2 Chron xxv 5). The commander-in-chief and the officers formed a council of war (1 Chron xii 1, cp 2 Kin. ix 5, 13).

The first traces of a standing army in Israel are found in the reign of Saul. He retained three thousand men of all Israel to hold the Philistines in check (1 Sam xii 2), and impressed any men of marked valor whom he saw (xiv 52). David increased the army, and organized it into twelve divisions of twenty-four thousand footmen each (1 Chron xxxvii), and Solomon added a large force of chariots and horsemen, which he distributed in the cities throughout his kingdom (1 Kin ix 19, x 26; cp iv 26, 2 Chron ix 25). The successors of these three kings of all Israel continued to bestow attention on the organization and equipment of the host, as Jehoshaphat (2 Chron xii 13-19), Amaziah (xxv. 5, 6), Uzziah (xxvi 11-15), Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac iii 55). See WAR.

Ar'nán [agile]

Founder of a family, presumably of the lineage of David (1 Chron. iii 21).

Ar'ni.

Ram, the father of Amminadab (Luke iii 33, R. V., cp Ruth iv 19). The Hebrew name Ram generally appears in the Greek translation of the Old Testament as APAN or APAM; and APNI, which is found in important texts of Luke, may be a mere corruption.

Ar'non [murmuring, noisy, or, perhaps, quickly moving]

A river which anciently formed the boundary between the Amorite country on the north and that of the Moabites on the south (Num. xxi 13, 26), and at a later period between the tribe of Reuben on the north and again Moab on the south (Deut. iii 8, 16; Josh xii 16). It had fords (Is. xvi. 2). Its valley is the deep chasm of the Wady Môjib. The stream is perennial, formed by the junction of three smaller tributaries, and falls into the Dead Sea. It is fringed by oleanders, the vegetation of its banks is exuberant, and its waters are full of fish.

A'rod or Ar'o-di.

A son of Gad, and founder of a family (Gen. xlii. 16; Num. xxvi. 17).

Ar'o-er [naked, nakedness; or juniper thicket].

1. A town on the right or northern bank of the river Arnon. It was the southern point of the Amorite kingdom ruled by Sihon, and afterwards of the tribe of Reuben (Deut. ii. 36; iii. 12; Josh. xii. 2; xiii. 16; Judg. xi. 26, 33). It was taken by Mesha, king of Moab (Moabite Stone, 26). It fell into the hands of Hazael, king of Syria (2 Kin. x. 33; 1 Chron. v. 8). In the time of Jeremiah it belonged to Moab (Jer. xlviii. 19). It is now called 'Ara'ir, and is a desolate heap just south of Dibon, and a little east of the Roman road running north and south through Moab.

2. A city built by the Gadites (Num. xxxii. 34). It was before that is east of, Rabbath Ammon, in the middle of the valley of Gad, on the southern boundary of that tribe (Josh. xiii. 25, 2 Sam. xxiv. 5). Exact site unknown.

3. A village of Judah, to which David sent spoil after his victory over the Amalekites who had pillaged Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 28). Its ruins consist of a few walls, in the wady 'Ar'ara, twelve miles southeast of Beer-sheba.

If Aroer in Is. xvii. 2 is a proper name, and not a common noun meaning nakedness, ruin, the phrase in which it stands may be rendered "the cities of Aroer," and interpreted as the suburbs of the Gadite Aroer, or "the cities Aroer," the two Aroers east of the Jordan being used representatively for all the cities of the region.

Ar'o-er-ite.

A native or inhabitant of Aroer (1 Chron. xi. 44, where the reference is probably to Aroer 3).

Ar-pach'shad, in A. V. Arphaxad [etymology unknown; the latter part of the name, if separable, is contained in Chaldea].

A son of Shem (Gen. x. 22, 24, 1 Chron. i. 17, 18, both R. V.). He was a remote ancestor of Abraham, was born two years after the flood, at the age of 35 begat Shelah, and died 403 years afterwards, at the age of 438 (xi. 10-13, R. V.). Arpachshad is not necessarily a person. The structure of these genealogical registers, apparent at a glance, is such that the name may be that of a tribe or land, of which the people were descended from that son of Shem born two years after the flood. Arpachshad was long identified with the mountainous country on the upper Zab north and northeast of Nineveh, called by the Greek geographers Arrapachitis, and by the Assyrians Arabecha. But this identification fails to account for the final syllable, shad.

Ar'pad, in A. V. twice Arphad.

A city, generally coupled in the O. T. with Hamath, from which, consequently, it was not far distant (2 Kin. xviii. 34; xix. 13; Is.

x. 9; Jer. xlix. 23). It has been placed at Tell Erfad, 13 miles north of Aleppo. It was a place of importance, and was subjected to repeated visitations from the Assyrians. It saw the army of Rammannirari in 806 B. C., and of Ashurnirari in 754, it was besieged and taken by Tiglath-pileser 742-740; and an uprising of cities which included Arpad was suppressed by Sargon in 720.

Ar-phax'ad. See ARPACHSHAD.

Ar'sa-ces.

King of Persia and Media (1 Mac. xiv. 2, 3; xv. 22), from 174 to 136 B. C. He was the sixth of the name, but is better known as Mithridates I of Parthia. His rule extended far beyond the bounds of Media and Persia. He conquered Asia from the Hindu Kush to the Euphrates and raised the Parthian kingdom to an empire.

Ar-tax-erx'es [possessor of an exalted kingdom].

The third son of Xerxes and his successor on the Persian throne, 465 B. C. He is called Longmanus, the Longhanded. This epithet is generally interpreted literally, but Dr. John Wilson considers that it is figurative, and means only that Artaxerxes had a widely-extended dominion. He was led to forbid building at Jerusalem (Ezra iv. 7), but afterwards permitted it (vi. 14). The older interpreters understood the king referred to be the Pseudo-Smerdis, i. e. a Magian impostor called Gomates, who pretended to be Smerdis, brother of the deceased Cambyzes, and reigned as such for seven months in the year 521 B. C., until the fraud was discovered and he was put to death. But see remarks under AHASUERUS. In the seventh year of his reign (458 B. C.) Artaxerxes allowed Ezra to lead a great multitude of exiles back to Jerusalem (Ezra vii. 1, 11, 12, 21. viii. 1). In the twentieth year of his reign (445 B. C.) he permitted Nehemiah to make his first journey to the Jewish capital, and rebuild the walls of the city (Neh. ii. 1, etc.). In the thirty-second year of his reign (433-432 B. C.) he allowed Nehemiah, who had returned for a little to Persia, to revisit Jerusalem, and become governor of the restored city and the adjacent country (xiii. 6). Artaxerxes died in the year 425 B. C.

Ar'te-mas [gift of Artemis].

A companion whom Paul thought of sending on an errand to Titus (Tit. iii. 12).

Ar'te-mis.

The Greek goddess of hunting, corresponding to the Roman Diana (Acts xix. 24, R. V., margin); see DIANA.

A-rub'both, in A. V. Ar'u-both [the latitudes].

A place mentioned in connection with Socoh and Hephher; hence probably in the southwest of Judah (1 Kin. iv. 10).

A-ru'mah [perhaps, a height].

A village near Shechem, once the residence of Abimelech (Judg. ix. 41). It has been supposed to be identical with Ruma (2 Kin xxii 36), and has been placed doubtfully at el-'Orme, 6 miles southeast of Shechem, which, however, is spelled with a different initial letter Ar'vad [wandering].

A place which, in Ezekiel's time, furnished mariners and valiant defenders of the stronghold of Tyre (Ezek xxvii 8, 11). It is the island of Aradus near the coast of Phœnicia, now called er-Ruad (1 Mac xv 23)

Ar'vad-ite.

One of the inhabitants of Arvad. They were reckoned to Canaan (Gen x 18, 1 Chron i 16)

Ar'za [delight]

The steward of king Elah's house in Tirzah (1 Kin xvi 9)

A'sa [physician]

1 A Levite, son of Elkanah who lived in a village of the Netophathites (1 Chron ix 16)

2 A king of Judah who ascended the throne in the twentieth year of Jeroboam, king of Israel. He was son of Abijah and grandson of Rehoboam. His mother (really his grandmother) was Maacah, daughter of Abshalom (1 Kin xv 9-10, cp 2). His reign began with ten years of peace (2 Chron xiv 1). He took away the male prostitutes out of the land, abolished the idols of his predecessors, and removed his grandmother from her position of queen-mother, because she had made an image for an Asherah (1 Kin xv 9-13, cp xiv 22-24, 2 Chron xiv 1-5, xv 16). He also destroyed the strange altars, the high places, and the sun images throughout Judah (2 Chron xiv 3-5) as fully as he was able (cp. 1 Kin xxii 46, 2 Chron xix. 4), but, though his own heart was perfect with the Lord, the people still occasionally sacrificed to Jehovah on high places (1 Kin xv 14, 2 Chron xv 17). His kingdom was invaded by the Ethiopian Zerah, at the head of an enormous host of Africans, but by the help of Jehovah he defeated them, and drove them from the land (2 Chron. xiv 9-15). In the fifteenth year of his reign, encouraged by the prophet Azariah, he completed the religious reformation, restored the altar of burnt offering at the temple, and induced the people to renew the covenant with Jehovah (xv. 1-15). In the thirty-sixth [sixteenth] year of his reign (see CHRONOLOGY), Baasha, king of Israel, invaded Benjamin and fortified Ramah on the main road from Jerusalem to the north. Asa, finding himself too weak to capture Ramah and reopen the road, took the temple treasures, and hired Ben-hadad, king of Damascus, to attack Baasha. Ben-hadad invaded the northern portion of the Israelite kingdom, compelling Baasha to withdraw from Ramah. Asa took the building materials which Baasha had gathered at Ramah and fortified Geba and Mizpah. The prophet Hanani reproved the king for his worldly policy, after his experience of God's help at the time of the Ethiopian invasion. Asa resented the interference of the prophet, putting him in prison (1 Kin. xv 16-22, 2 Chron xvi 1-10). In the thirty-ninth year of his reign he became diseased in his feet. In his distress he sought help from the physicians, but not from the Lord (1 Kin xv 23, 2 Chron. xvi 12). In his latter days he was not so true to Jehovah as in his earlier life. He died in the forty-first year of his reign, and was buried with royal honors in a sepulcher which he had made for himself in the city of David.

As'a-hel [God hath made].

1 Son of David's sister Zeruiah, and brother of Joab and Abishai (1 Chron i 16); noted for valor and fleetness (2 Sam. ii 18; xxiii 24). He was in the army of David; and in the rout of Ishbosheth's troops at Gibeon, he pursued Abner, their commander, in the desire to kill him. Abner, after vainly warning him to desist, in self-defence gave him a mortal thrust (ii 22-23). His death occurred before David became king of all Israel; yet when David organized the army in twelve divisions, the fourth was assigned to Asahel and Zebadiah his son after him (1 Chron xxvii. 7). The form of the statement is peculiar. It may denote that the command of the division for the fourth month was vested in the house of Asahel, being exercised by his son who was now the head of the house. Perhaps the new organization perpetuated an earlier arrangement, only on a larger scale.

2 One of the Levites employed by Jehoshaphat to teach the people the law (2 Chron xxvi. 8)

3 An overseer of the temple in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron xxxi 13).

4. Father of a certain Jonathan (Ezra x. 15).

A-sa'iah, in A V twice As-a-hi'ah (2 Kin. xxii 12, 14) [Jehovah hath made]

1 A Simeonite prince (1 Chron iv 36).

2 A Levite, head of the family of Merari in David's time (1 Chron vi 30; xv. 6, 11)

3 A man of Judah, son of Baruch, and head of the family of Shelah at the time of the return from the captivity (1 Chron ix. 5). He was known also by the synonymous name Maaseiah (Neh xi 5)

4. An officer whom Josiah sent with others to the prophetess Huldah to inquire of the Lord about the things which he had heard from the Law found by Hilkiah (2 Kin. xxii. 12, 14; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20).

A'saph [collector; or He hath gathered or removed reproach].

1. A Levite, the son of Berachiah, of the Gershonite family (1 Chron. vi. 39, 43). With Heman and Ethan, he sounded cymbals before the ark during its removal from the house of Obed-edom to the city of David (xv. 16-19). He was then assigned the permanent office of sounding cymbals at the service (xvi 4, 5, 7); and when the service was finally and fully arranged, of the three families permanently charged with the music and song and instructed in the art, his family, with him at the head, was one (xxv. 1-9). Their position was on the right (vi 39). The family often receives mention (2 Chron xx. 14; xxix. 13). A hundred and twenty-eight, all of them singers, came back from Babylon (Ezra ii. 41; Neh. vii 44), and conducted the psalmody when the foundations of Zerubabel's temple were laid (Ezra iii. 10). Twelve psalms, viz. the 50th and the 73d to the 83d, both inclusive, are attributed in the titles to the family of Asaph (cp 2 Chron xxix 30). The 50th belongs to the second book of psalms; the others constitute the bulk of the third book. In them the usual name of the deity is God, rather than Jehovah Asaph, like the other chief singers, is called a seer (2 Chron xxix 30; cp. xxxv. 15 and 1 Chron. xxv 5).

2 Father of Hezekiah's recorder (2 Kin. xviii 18).

3 Keeper of the king's park in Palestine under Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia (Neh. ii 8).

4. In 1 Chron xxvi 1 read Ebiasaph (cp. ix 19).

A-sar'a-mel, in A V Saramel.

Perhaps a title of Simon Maccabæus, Sar'am'el, prince of the people of God; or more probably, since the word is preceded by a preposition, it stands for h'sar'am'el, the prophet of the people of God, the forecourt of the temple (1 Mac. xiv. 28).

The suggestion has also been made that "in Asaramel" represents the Hebrew sentence: There was no prince of the people of God. The historian states that there was no civil governor at the side of the high priest.

As'a-rel, in A V A-sar'e-el [God hath bound]

A son of Jehaleleel (1 Chron. iv. 16).

As-a-re'lah. See ASHARELAH

As'ca-lon (1 Mac. x. 86). See ASHKELON.

As'e-nath [Egyptian Snat, belonging to the goddess Neith]

Daughter of Poti-phaera, priest of On, wife of Joseph and mother of Manasseh and Ephraim (Gen. xli. 45, 50-52; xlii. 20).

A'ser. See ASHER.

Ash.

The rendering in the A V. of the Hebrew 'Oren in Is. xlv. 14. The wood of the tree was suitable for use in making idols. A tree which the Arabs call 'arân is said by one of their writers to grow in Arabia Petraea, and is described as having thorns and producing bunches of bitter berries. This imperfect description recalls the mountain ash, and the name 'arân may be connected with 'oren. But by 'oren the Seventy understood the fir tree. Jerome renders it pine. R V. accordingly translates the word by fir tree, and places ash on the margin. The Syrian fir (Pinus halepensis) is perhaps intended, which flourishes on the mountains of Palestine, and is occasionally found as far south as Hebron. See FIE.

A'shan [smoke]

A town in the lowland, allotted to Judah, afterwards transferred to Simeon and assigned with its suburbs to the Levites (Josh. xv. 42; xix. 7; 1 Chron. iv. 32; vi 59). In the present text of Josh. xxi. 16 or 1 Chron. vi 59 Ashan and Ain have become confounded through the misreading of one letter. Ashan is apparently identical with Coi-ashan, in A. V. Chor-ashan, smoking furnace (1 Sam xxx 30), where many manuscripts and versions have Bor-ashan, smoking pit.

Ash-a-re'lah, in A V Asarelah [upright toward God].

A son of Asaph (1 Chron. xxv. 2). Called in ver. 14 Jesharelah, a word having the same meaning.

Ash'be-a [let me call as witness]

A descendant of Shelah, of the tribe of Judah. The members of the family wrought fine linen (1 Chron. iv 21).

Ash'bel [perhaps, a secondary form of Eshbaal, man of the Lord]

A son of Benjamin and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii 21, Num. xxvi 38, 1 Chron. viii. 1).

Ash'che-naz. See ASHKENAZ

Ash'dod, in N T Azotus [a fortified place, a castle]

One of the five chief Philistine cities, ruled over by a lord, and seat of the worship of Dagon (Josh. xiii 3, 1 Sam. v 1 seq; vi 17; 1 Mac. x 83, xi 4). Anakim remained in it after the conquest of Canaan by the Hebrews (Josh. xi 22). It was assigned to Judah (xv. 46, 47), but was not possessed by that tribe. The ark of God was carried to Ashdod by the Philistines after they captured it at Ebenezer, and was placed in the temple of Dagon (1 Sam. v 1-8). A judgment falling on the inhabitants, the ark was transferred to Gath (6-8). Uzziah broke down the walls of Ashdod (2 Chron. xxvi 6). The Tartan or Assyrian commander-in-chief under Sargon besieged it with success (Is. xx 1). In the time of the Assyrian kings, from Sargon to Esarhaddon, Ashdod was ruled by an official called king by the Assyrians. Psammetichus, king of Egypt, utterly destroyed it about 630 B. C., after a siege which, according to Herodotus (ii. 157), lasted twenty-nine years. Only a remnant survived (Jer. xxv. 20; cp. Zeph. ii 4; Zech. ix. 6). Its inhabitants were among those who opposed the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, and they spoke a different language from the Israelites of that day; nevertheless some of the returned Jews married women of Ashdod (Neh. iv. 7; xiii. 23, 24). The city was twice besieged and partially destroyed by the Maccabees (1 Mac v 68; x 84), but was rebuilt by the Romans about 55 B C. In N T times it was called Azotus (Acts viii 40).

Philip preached the gospel from this place as far as Caesarea (Acts viii. 40). The city became eventually the seat of a bishop. Its approximate site is the mud village of Eddûd on the eastern slope of a low, round knoll, among sycamore trees and prickly pears, 9 miles northeast from Ascalon, 3 from the Mediterranean, and about midway between Jaffa and Gaza.

The text of 1 Mac ix 15, which mentions mount Azotus, is uncertain.

Ash'dod-ite, in A V once Ashdodthite.

A native or inhabitant of Ashdod (Josh. xiii 3; Neh iv. 7).

Ash'doth-ite. See preceding article.

Ash-doth-pls'gah, in R V slopes of Pisgah, in A V once springs of Pisgah.

The slopes of Pisgah east of the Dead Sea, which face the west (Deut. iii 17, iv. 49; Josh xiii 3; xiii. 20).

Ash'er, in A V of N T Aser, in imitation of the Greek form [happy].

1 The eighth son of Jacob, and the second by Zilpah, Leah's maidservant (Gen xxx 12, 13, xxxv 26). His blessing given by Jacob on his deathbed is thus worded, "Out of Asher his bread shall be fat, and he shall yield royal dainties" (Gen xlix 20). That of Moses, "Let Asher be blessed with children: let him be acceptable to his brethren, and let him dip his foot in oil. Thy shoes shall be iron and brass: and as thy days, so shall thy strength be" (Deut xxxiii 24). He had four sons Jimnah, Ishuah, Isui, and Beriah; and a daughter named Serah (Gen. xli 17; 1 Chron vii 30).

2 The tribe of which Asher, the son of Jacob, was the progenitor. As assigned, its territory extended on the north to the northern boundary of Palestine, and on the south reached to the south of Carmel, a length of about 60 miles. On the east it was bounded by the territories of Zebulun and Naphtali, and on the west by the Mediterranean (Josh. xix. 24-31). But from Tyre, Sidon, Accho, and other strong places the Asherites did not expel the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. i 31, 32). The failure of the Asherites to capture and occupy the Phœnician plain along the sea left them only the inland hill-country, except near Carmel. This was well adapted for the culture of the olive, so that the inhabitants might dip their feet in oil (cp Deut. xxxiii 24).

3 Asher may possibly denote a town also, east of Shechem (Josh. xvii. 7); perhaps Teîâsir, about 11 miles northeast of Shechem on the road to Bethshean.

A-she'rah, plural A-she'rim, masculine, and Asheroth, feminine [upright or uniting, or less probably, bringing fortune].

A word uniformly translated grove in the A. V., but a grove of trees would not be brought out of the temple (2 Kin. xxiii 6). It was something upright made of wood (Ex. xxxiv. 13), originally, perhaps, the trunk of a tree with the branches chopped off, and was regarded as the wooden symbol of a goddess Asherah, who like Ashtoreth, was the type of abounding fertility (Ex. xxxiv. 13, R V margin). It was erected beside the altar of Baal (Judg vi. 25, 28, R V.). The prophets of the Asherah in Ahab's time were, with those of Baal, slain by Elijah at the river Kishon (1 Kin. xv 33; xviii. 19-40, both R. V.). Women wore hangings for an Asherah in the temple (2 Kin. xxiii. 7, R V.), and Josiah, as part of his religious reformation, brought out the idolatrous symbol and burnt it at the brook Kidron (6).

A-she'rim. See preceding article.

Ash'er-ite.

A member of the tribe of Asher (Judg i 32).

A-she'roth. See ASHERAH.

Ash'hur, in A V Ashur [blackness].

Son of Hezron by his wife Abiah. He was enrolled with the house of Caleb, was head or ancestor of the inhabitants of Tekoa, and had two wives and seven children (1 Chron. ii 24, iv 5-7).

Ash'ti-ma.

A divinity worshiped by the people of Hamath (2 Kin. xvii 30).

Ash'ke-lon, in A V sometimes Askelon [starting point, migration].

One of the five leading Philistine cities each ruled by a lord (Josh xiii 3). It was situated in a valley on the Mediterranean seashore (Jer xlvii 5, 7), 12 miles north of Gaza, and was the seat of the worship of Derceto, a goddess with the body of a fish, whose temple and lake lay to the east of the city. It was captured by the tribe of Judah in the time of the judges (Judg i 18), but soon reverted to its old rulers (xiv. 19; 1 Sam vi 17). It was to have its inhabitants, all but a remnant, cut off and made desolate, apparently by a Pharaoh in Jeremiah's time (Jer xlvii. 1, 5, 7; Zeph ii 4, 7; cp also Zech. ix. 5). Ashkelon was twice taken by Jonathan Maccabæus (1 Mac x 86, xi 60). It was the birthplace of Herod the Great, and the residence of his sister Salome. It was several times taken and retaken during the Crusades, till at length, in A. D. 1270, the sultan Bibars destroyed it and filled the harbor with stones. Its site has been found within a natural amphitheater constructed by a ridge of rocks, forming a kind of semicircle with the open side to the sea. The wall, now in ruins, ran along the top of the ridge. The soil is fertile, producing large apples, sycamore figs, etc. The kind of onion called shallot, or eschalot, came at first from Ashkelon, after which it is named. Ashkelon is now called 'Askalan.

Ash'ke-lon-ite; in A. V Eshkelonite, following partly the traditional Hebrew pronunciation and partly the obsolete spelling, Eshkalon.

An inhabitant of Ashkelon (Josh. xiii 3).

Ash'ke-naz, in A V twice Aschenaz.

The eldest son of Gomer (Gen x. 3; 1 Chron. i. 6). The name, whether originally that of a person or country or tribe, denoted a people of the race of Gomer. In the time of Jeremiah they dwelt in the neighborhood of Ararat and Minni, that is, near eastern Armenia (Jer. li. 27).

Ash'nah [strong].

1. A village in the lowland of Judah near Zorah (Josh. xv 33, R V).

2. Another village of Judah, but farther south (Josh. xv. 43). Exact site unknown.

Ash'pe-naz.

The master of the eunuchs at Babylon during Nebuchadnezzar's reign (Dan. i 3).

Ash'ri-el. See ASRIEL

Ash'ta-roth [plural of Ashtoreth (q v.)].

1. In connection with the plural of Baal, a general designation for all the false gods of the neighboring nations and their idols; or better, to judge from Gen. xiv 5 and 1 Sam xxxi 10, the old Canaanitish plural of eminence whereby the goddess Ashtoreth was honorably spoken of in the plural number.

2. A town at Edrei, named after the goddess Astarte, and the capital of Og, king of Bashan (Deut. i 4, where it is spelled Asteroth in A V; Josh ix 10). Some of the ancient inhabitants were giants, Og himself being of the number (Josh xii 4; xiii. 12). The place fell to the lot of Machir, the son of Manasseh (31), but became a Levitical city, inhabited by the children of Gershom (1 Chron vi 71). Uzzia, one of David's mighty men, was connected with the town (xi. 44). Its site is commonly identified with Tell 'Ashterah, which agrees with the statement of Eusebius that the town was distant 6 Roman miles from Edrei. This tell stands on a hill in the midst of a well-watered, grassy plain. See ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.

Ash'te-rath-ite.

A native of Ashtaroth (1 Chron xi 44).

Ash'te-roth-kar-na'im [two-horned Ashtaroth]. In A V written as two words.

A place smitten by Chedorlaomer on his expedition against the cities of the plain (Gen. xiv. 5, R. V.). Its name suggests that the inhabitants specially worshiped the horned moon. Probably Ashteroth-karnaim is the full name of Ashtaroth, and it may be the place known centuries later as Karnaim, which is mentioned in connection with cities of Gilead and in which Atargatis was worshiped (1 Mac. v. 26, 36, 43; 2 Mac. xii. 26). This goddess, whose true name according to Strabo was Athara, was the Syrian nature deity corresponding to Ashtoreth. It is to be remembered that the physical features ascribed to Carnion in 2 Mac xii. 21 do not agree with Tell 'Ashterah, the commonly accepted site of Ashtaroth.

Ash'to-reth [a binding together, union]

Astarte, a Phœnician goddess, partly evolved, perhaps, from admiration for the planet Venus, but symbolizing also the soft radiance of the moon; cp. Ashteroth-karnaim. Her worship was early established at Sidon, hence she is called the goddess or the abomination of the Zidonians (1 Kin xi 5, 33; 2 Kin. xxiii 13). It was in vogue east of the Jordan in the days of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 5). As early as the times of the judges it had spread to the Hebrews (Judg ii 13; x. 6). It was also practiced in Philistia (1 Sam. xxxi 10). Solomon in his old age gave it the support of his great name (1 Kin xi 5; 2 Kin xxiii 13). The pronunciation of the name as Ashtoreth instead of Ashtareth is believed to express the loathing felt for idolatry, by conforming the sound to that of bosheth, shame (cp. ISHOSHETH).

Ash'ur. See ASHHUR

Ash'ur-ite.

A people belonging to the kingdom of Ishbosheth (2 Sam ii. 9). They are enumerated between Gilead and Jezreel. Vulgate and Syriac have Geshurites.

Ash'vath.

An Asherite, family of Heber, house of Japhlet (1 Chron vii 33).

A'si-a.

The continent east of Europe and Africa (Herod iv 36-40). The name was employed in a narrower sense for the kingdom of the Seleucidae (1 Mac vii. 6; xi. 13), which embraced Syria and extensive regions west of the river Halys. When the Romans transferred most of these western districts, Mysia, Lydia, and Phrygia, to Eumenes II, king of Pergamos, the name was used by them for the kingdom of Pergamos, and when this kingdom was appropriated by them in 133 B. c, they added Caria and a strip of coast to it and formed the province of Asia (Acts vi. 9; xxvii 2; 1 Pet i 1, Rev. i 4, 11). Pliny, however, distinguishes between Phrygia and Asia (v. 28). So do Paul and others (Acts ii. 9, 10; xvi. 6). The names of the incorporated districts were not abandoned; and Paul, who was traveling along but outside of the borders of Asia, mentions being at a point over against Mysia (Acts xvi 7, R. V.), in which Pergamos was situated, one of the cities of Asia (Rev. i. 4, 11). The province was at first governed by propretors, but in 27 B. c. it was made senatorial and so continued for 300 years, being governed by proconsuls (cp. Acts xix. 38, R. V.). Its capital was Ephesus. In the N. T. Asia always denotes the Roman province (Acts xix. 10, 22, 26, 27; xx. 4, 16, 18; xxi 27; xxiv. 18; xxvii. 2; 1 Cor. xvi. 19; 2 Cor. i. 8; 2 Tim. i. 15).

A'st-arch [chief of Asia].

Member of a college of deputies who were annually appointed by various towns of the province of Asia to conduct a festival and games in honor of the Roman emperor. The festivities took place yearly at one of the several cities which had the honor in succession. The asarchs were chosen each year, but in time formed an influential body in the towns, and often secured the reelection of their members. The asarchs of Ephesus were friends to Paul (Acts xix. 31, R. V. marg.).

A-si-de'ans. See HASIDEANS.

A'si-el [God hath made].

A Simeonite (1 Chron. iv. 35).

As'ke-lon. See ASHKELON.

As-mo-næ'an [Greek 'Asamōnaios, from Hebrew Hashman, opulent].

A descendant of Hashman, a priest of the family of Joarib and ancestor of the Maccabees (Antiq. xii. 6. 1; cp. 1 Mac. ii. 1. 1 Chron. xxiv. 7). The title Asmonæan is commonly employed in Jewish literature to designate the family from Mattathias to Herod the Great and Aristobulus (Antiq. xiv. 16, 4; xx. 8, 11).

As-mo-næ'ans, Pal'ace of the.

A palace in Jerusalem erected by the Asmonæan princes, opposite the western court of the temple, on an elevation which commanded a view of the city and the sanctuary (Antiq. xx. 8, 11). It stood near the Xystus and overlooked it (ibid. War ii. 16, 3). It is probably the royal palace which was reckoned one of the two fortresses of Jerusalem, the Baris being the other, and in which Herod the Great resided before the erection of his palace in the upper city (Antiq. xiv. 13, 9; xv. 3, 7; 8, 4 and 5). This latter building excelled it in magnificence and as a fortress. So late as A. D. 60 the last prince of the Herodian house used it as a residence, Agrippa II, the king Agrippa of Acts xxv. 13 (Antiq. xx. 8, 11; War ii. 16, 3). It was probably the palace burnt by the seditious Jews at the beginning of the war with the Romans (War ii. 17, 6).

As'nah [a bramble].

One of the Nethinim, some of whose descendants returned from the captivity at Babylon (Ezra ii. 50).

As-nap'per, in R. V. Osnappar.

A high Assyrian dignitary called great and noble who settled various foreign tribes in Samaria (Ezra iv. 10). He seems to have been either Esar-haddon or one of his officials (cp. 2 and 10). The name is supposed by some to be a rude Aramaic form of Ashurbanipal, the son of Esar-haddon, who from about 671 B. C. or later was his associate, and from 668 B. C. his successor on the Assyrian throne, and reigned until about 626 B. C. Ashurbanipal records that he penetrated Elam, took Susa the capital, and carried off many of the inhabitants to Assyria (cp. Ezra iv. 9, 10). His father, Esar-haddon, had conquered Egypt. Rebellion occurred among the petty rulers, and assistance was rendered them by the able Tirhakah. To suppress this revolt, Ashurbanipal conducted two campaigns, in which on the whole he was successful, though Egypt was lost at last. In the later campaign, about 664 B. C., Thebes, then known as No, was captured and plundered (cp. Nah. iii. 8-10). He had relations first friendly, but afterwards the reverse, with Gyges, the usurping king of Lydia; see GOG. He had to crush a rebellion of his own brother, the ruler of Babylon. He had a war with the Minni. By the Greeks, who called him Sardanapalus, he was considered effeminate. Modern scholars regard his memory with gratitude on account of the splendid library which he brought together. He had copyists incessantly at work not merely transcribing Assyrian books, but translating works of value from the so-called Accadian and other tongues. Part of this library has been recovered, and it is from it that we derive most of our acquaintance with the Assyrian empire and its kings.

Asp [a round shield, which the serpent when coiled up resembles].

The rendering of the Hebrew word Pethen in Deut. xxxii. 33; Job xx. 14, 16; and Is. xi. 8, and of the Greek Aspis in Rom. iii. 13. With some inconsistency Pethen is rendered not asp but adder in Ps. lvi. 4 and xci. 13. Pethen is a species of snake (Ps. lvi. 4), venomous (Deut. xxxii. 33), dwelling in holes (Is. xi. 8); probably Naja haje, which is found in Egypt and Palestine is the asp of the Greeks and Romans, is of the same genus as the deadly cobra of India, and is generally used by the snake-charmers in their performances. It has a hood which it dilates when about to strike its prey.

As'pa-tha.

A son of Haman (Esth. ix. 7).

As'phar.

A reservoir in the wilderness of Tekoah (1 Mac. ix. 33).

As'ri-el, in A. V. once Ashriel [probably, vow of God].

A descendant of Manasseh and founder of a family (Num. xxvi. 31; Josh. xvii. 2).

Ass.

The genus called by zoologists Assus, containing the several species and varieties of asses, wild or domesticated. The ass genus belongs to the family Equidæ or Horses. Three asses are mentioned in Scripture.

1. The wild ass, called in Hebrew 'Arod, the fugitive. It is poetically described in Job xxxix. 5-8, where, however, there is mention also of the common wild ass of Syria, and is named also in Dan. v. 21. If distinct in species from the common wild ass, it is probably Assus onager, which is found in the Sahara and in Arabia, where it was once common, but is now more rare. It occasionally visits the Hauran. It is the progenitor of the domestic ass.

2. The wild ass of Syria (Asinus hemippus); Hebrew Pere, the leaper, occurring in Job xxiv. 5; xxxix. 5; Ps civ 11; Is. xxxii 14, and Jer. xiv. 6. It is rather smaller than the onager. Tristram mentions that enormous herds of them often enter the Armenian mountains in summer. They are found at all times in Northern Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Syria, occasionally entering Northern Palestine. They are the species represented on the Ninevite sculptures.

3. The domestic ass (Asinus asinus), the Hebrew H'mor. It is a sub-species descended from the onager. It is obstinate and typical of stupidity. But on the other hand the ass is strong, easily fed, patient, and forgiving. Its faults are mainly produced by the cruel bondage imposed upon it by its human taskmaster. The ass was early domesticated. Abraham had asses (Gen. xii 16) on which he rode (xxii 3), so had Jacob (xxx. 43). They were used also for burden-bearing (xlx. 14; Is xxx 6), for ploughing, etc. (Deut xxii 10). White asses were deemed fit for persons of rank (Judg. v. 10), as they still are in Palestine. Jesus showed his lowliness, and at the same time the spirit of the earlier kings, by rejecting horses and riding on an ass in his triumphal entry into Jerusalem (Zech ix 9, Mat xxi. 5).

As-sas'sins [Greek sikarioi, daggersmen].

Ruffians who terrorized Judea, A. D. 50-70. Their organization was formed in order to assert liberty from the Romans and recognize no master save God. They carried a small sword hidden beneath the cloak; and, mingling with the multitude at the festivals, stabbed those who were marked for destruction. They even formed bands and pillaged villages (Acts xxi 38, R V, Antiq. xx. 8, 10; War vii 10, 1) Cp. ZEALOT.

As'shur, in A. V. twice Assur [probably originally A-ushar, watered plain (Delitzsch), or from the local deity Ashur, the good (Schrader)]. Pronounced Ash'ur.

A people descended from Shem (Gen. x. 22), and the country which they inhabited (Ezra iv 2, A V, Ezek. xxvii. 23). See ASSYRIA.

As-shu'rim.

A people, doubtless of Arabia, descended from Dedan, and more remotely from Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 3). The like name borne by an individual mentioned in the Mosaic inscription throws little or no light on this tribe. The Ashurites, named after Gilead in 2 Sam. ii 9, are almost certainly different, as is also Asshur, that is Assyria, in Ezek. xxvii 23.

As-si-de'ans. See HASIDÆANS.

As'sir [captive].

1. A descendant of Levi through Korah, born in Egypt (Ex. vi. 24; 1 Chron. vi. 22).

2. A descendant of the preceding (1 Chron. vi. 23, 37).

3. A son of king Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii. 17). The name does not appear in R. V. The revisers regard it as an adjective descriptive of Jeconiah, and translate it "the captive;" but there is no definite article in the present Hebrew text, and there was none in the text used by the Seventy. His name suggests that Assir was born in captivity. This accords with other indications. Jeconiah was 18 years old when carried off to Babylon, and in the enumeration of the members of his family deported with him, no children are mentioned (2 Kin. xxiv. 8-15). Assir did not succeed to the royal title; the right to the throne passed to Shealtiel (q. v.).

As'sos.

A seaport town of Mysia, now called Beiram, not far from Troas (Acts xx. 13, 14).

As'sur. See ASSHUR.

As-syr't-a [Greek modification of Asshur (q. v.)].

A country on the river Tigris (Gen. ii. 14, R. V. margin). It was originally the district dominated by the town of Asshur, the ruins of which have been found at Kalah Shergat, on the western bank of the Tigris, about 60 miles below Nineveh. With the growth of the city's power and dominion, the name came to denote the region compassed by the Gordyean mountains of Armenia on the north, the ranges of Media on the east, and the little Zab river on the south. Westward it extended a short distance from the Tigris into Mesopotamia. This district is the Assyria proper of history, but the name was often given to the extensive empire conquered and ruled by the Assyrians. The inhabitants were Semites (Gen. x. 22), who derived their culture from Babylonia, and probably originally emigrated thence. They became powerful enough under king Tukulti-adar, about 1300 B. C. to subjugate Babylonia, and thenceforth during 700 years they were, with brief interruptions, the leading power in the east. Tiglath-pileser I., about 1120 to 1100 B. C., raised the kingdom into the most extensive empire of the age. Under his successors it greatly declined, its decadence leaving a void which permitted the kingdoms of David and Solomon to reach their widest limits. Ashurnasirpal (885 to 860) by his conquests restored the prestige of the empire. He erected a palace in the northwestern part of Calah, and made that ancient town (Gen. x. 11) the capital. He was succeeded by his son Shalmaneser, called II., who reigned from about 860 to 825, the first Assyrian king who came into conflict with the Israelites; see AHAB and JEHU. Among the other kings were Pul, also known as Tiglath-pileser III., 745-727; Shalmaneser IV., 727-722; Sargon, 722-705; Sennacherib, 705-681; Esar-haddon, 680-668; and Ashurbanipal, 668-626. Ashurbanipal is possibly Assnapper. Several minor kings followed. About 607 B. C. the Medes, the Babylonians, and their allies captured Nineveh, and put an end to the Assyrian empire. When at the height of its power in the seventh cenbury B. C. Assyria held sway over Babylonia, parts of Media, Armenia, Syria, Cyprus, Arabia, and Egypt. The kings of Israel mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions are Humri (Omri), Ahabbu (Ahab), Yaua (Jehu), Minihimnu (Menahem), Pakaha (Pekah), and Ausi (Hosea). The kings of Judah so mentioned are Yauhazi (Ahaz), Hazakiyau (Hezekiah), and Minasi (Manasseh). The identification of Azriyau with Azariah, i e, Uzziyah, is no longer generally accepted.

The Assyrian religion was borrowed from that of Babylon, except that Ashur, the presiding god of the city of Asshur, became the chief deity of Assyria. It was animistic nature-worship. Every object and phenomenon in nature was believed to be animated by a spirit. The great gods, after Ashur, were the prominent objects of nature. They were eleven in number, in two triads and a pentad. Chief were Anu, heaven, Bel, the region inhabited by man, beast, and bird, and Ea, terrestrial and subterranean waters. Next in order were Sin, the moon, Shamash, the sun, and Ramman, god of the storm. Then came the five planets. There were innumerable other deities, some of whom were merely different aspects of the foregoing. Subordinate gods often attained eminence as patrons of important towns.

Excavations in the Assyrian palaces, begun by the Frenchman Botta in 1843, followed immediately by the Englishman Layard, and then, after a time, by George Smith of the British Museum, Rassam, and others, have made the Assyrian empire, which was little more than a myth to the classic nations of antiquity, to us a great reality.

The language spoken by the Assyrians and the kindred people in Babylonia was of the Semitic family and closely allied to the Hebrew. An alphabet was not used. The language was written in characters which expressed syllables, not single letters or sounds. These signs were impressed on clay by a stylus, each impression having the shape of a wedge or arrow, whence the writing is called cuneiform. The characters were originally pictures of objects, but in time assumed conventional forms which often bore no resemblance to the original object.

As'ta-roth. See ASHTAROTH 2

As-trol'o-gers.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew words Hob're shamayim, dividers of the heavens. They are mentioned with stargazers (Is. xlvii 13). There is no question that these were astrologers who divided the heavens into certain mansions, with the view of tracing the course of the planets through each of them, in the vain hope of being able to tell fortunes and predict future events. Though their failure was complete, yet the careful study of the heavens which astrologers found needful led to the gradual growth of the sublime science of astronomy.

2 The rendering in A V of the Hebrew and Aramaic words 'Ashshapham (Dan 1 20), 'Ash'phan (11 27), and 'Ash'phayya (iv 7: v. 7), all translated in the R V "enchanters." See ENCHANTMENT and ENCHANTER.

A-sup'plm [collections, stores].

A building for storing temple goods, which stood near the southern gate of the outer court (1 Chron xxvi 15, 17); hence R. V. renders the word by storehouse.

A-syn'cri-tus [incomparable or unlike].

A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom xvi. 14)

A'tad [a plant, Rhamnus paliurus, or Christ's thorn]

The great company, which was bearing the body of Jacob from Egypt to the sepulcher at Hebron, after making a detour, perhaps to avoid the Philistines and Edomites, halted at the threshing-floor of Atad, east of the Jordan, and made a mourning for seven days. The Canaanites saw and called the place Abel-mizraim, Meadow, or with slightly altered pronunciation, Mourning of Egypt. The procession afterwards entered Canaan (Gen. 1 9-13)

At'a-rah [a crown, a diadem]

A wife of Jeahmeel (1 Chron ii 26)

At'a-roth [crowns diadem]

1 A town east of the Jordan, rebuilt by the tribe of Gad (Num xxxii 3, 34). It was taken from the men of Gad by Mesha, king of Moab (Moabite Stone, 10, 11). Its name is generally supposed to be preserved in the ruins 'Attârs, on the western slope of Jebel 'Attârs, three or four miles east of Machærus. The mountain is some miles south of Heshbon, which is in the tribe of Reuben, but the territories of Reuben and Gad, like those of Judah and Simeon, were much commingled. The ruins consist of unwrought stones, lying in heaps; ranges of broken walls, remains of foundations, large caverns, and circular cisterns. The old citadel was an hour's walk from the town, than which it is lower, but more isolated.

2 The same as Ataroth-addar (Josh. xvi 2).

3. A town on the border of Ephraim, not far from Jericho. Apparently different from Ataroth-addar (Josh xvi 7).

4. A village, apparently in Judah (1 Chron. ii. 54). The name should include the four words that follow in A V and be written as in R. V., Atroth-beth-joaab

At'a-roth-ad'dar, in A V. once Ataroth-addar [crowns of Adar]

A village on the southern frontier of Ephraim (Josh xvi. 5), on the boundary line between that tribe and Benjamin, west of Luz and near the hill that heth on the south side of the nether Beth-horon (xviii 13). Not identified 'Atara, 3½ miles south of Bethel, on the road leading to Jerusalem, is much too far east.

A'ter [shut].

1. A man called, by way of distinction, Ater of Hezekiah, ninety-eight of whose descendants returned from Babylon after the captivity (Ezra ii. 16; Neh. vii. 21).

2. A porter (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45).

A'thach [a lodging-place].

A village in the south of Judah, to which David sent some of the spoil of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 30). Perhaps it is Ether (Josh. xv. 42; xix. 7), kaph and resh being confused by a scribe.

A-tha'iah.

A man of Judah, son of Uzziah, of the family of Perez (Neh. xi. 4); scarcely the same as Uthai (1 Chron. ix. 4).

Ath-a-li'ah [Jehovah has afflicted or is exalted].

1. The wife of Jehoram, king of Judah, a daughter of Ahab and granddaughter of Omri (2 Kin. viii. 18, 26; 2 Chron. xxi. 6; xxii. 2). She possessed the masculine courage of her mother Jezebel, and was equally unscrupulous in shedding blood. When her son, king Ahaziah, was slain by Jehu, she killed all the sons of the murdered monarch excepting one infant, Joash, who was stolen away by his aunt, Jehosheba. Then seizing the throne, she reigned six years, at the end of which a priestly insurrection took place in favor of Joash. Attempting to quell it, she was dragged from the temple courts and killed at the carriage entrance of the palace (2 Kin. xi. 1-16; 2 Chron. xxii. 1-xxiii. 21).

2. A Benjamite of the house of Jeroham (1 Chron. viii. 26).

3. A man of the father's house of Elam (Ezra viii. 7).

Ath'a-rim.

The way of the Atharim was not far from the town of Arad, and was the route followed by the Israelites as they journeyed from Kadesh by way of mount Hor in order to enter Canaan (Num. xxi. 1, R. V.). The meaning of the name has not been established.

Ath-e-no'bi-us.

A commissioner sent by Antiochus Sidetes to Simon Maccabæus. He belonged to the privileged class known as friends of the king (1 Mac. xv. 28).

Ath'ens.

The capital of Attica, one of the Greek states. The city became the center of enlightenment in science, literature, and art for the ancient world. It grew up around the rocky hill called Acropolis (top or highest point of the city), and covered the smaller hills and intervening valleys on the north-east side of the Gulf of Ægina, between the small river Ilissus on the east and south, and the Cephissus a little to the west. Athens was about 5 miles from the sea. Its commercial port was Piræus, with which the city when in its glory was connected by long walls. The navy anchored close by at Phaleron.

Tradition says that Athens was founded by Cecrops about 1556 B. C., that it sent fifty ships to the Trojan war, and that it was ruled by kings till about 1068 B. C. The supreme authority was afterwards vested in archons. Two celebrated legislators are spoken of; Draco, about 621 B. C., whose name has become proverbial for pitiless severity, and Solon, about 594 B. C., a wiser man, whose laws were more humane. In 490 B. C. the Athenians, supported by the Plateans, gained the great victory at Marathon against the generals of Darius Hystaspis, king of Persia. In 480 Athens had to be abandoned to his son and successor, Xerxes, but the great naval battle at Salamis gained by the Greeks compelled the invader to withdraw. The city was, however, burnt in 479 B. C. by his general, Mardonius. The glory gained by the Athenians in the Persian war led to the establishment of a small empire, with Athens for its capital and a powerful fleet rather than a large army for its support. About 444 B. C. the power of Pericles, an able democratic leader, became very great. The good feature of his enlightened government was the erection of many beautiful public buildings in Athens. Literature also greatly flourished under his administration. In 431, while he yet lived and ruled, the Peloponnesian war began, which ended by the surrender of Athens to the Spartans in 404. The city afterwards went through various political vicissitudes, though the intellect and knowledge of its inhabitants rendered them influential, whatever changes took place. Four great schools of philosophy—Platonic, Peripatetic, Epicurean, and Stoic—flourished here and attracted numerous students, not only from Greece, but also later from Rome. The city was taken by the Roman general Sulla in 86 B. C., and was still subject to the Romans when Paul was there. Altars "to an unknown god" were found in the city and at the harbor Phaleron (Acts xvii. 23; Pausanias i. 1, 4; Philostratus, vit. Apol. 6, 2). Mars' Hill, on which Paul delivered his celebrated discourse, was a short distance west of the Acropolis (Acts xvii. 15-xviii. 1; cp. also 1 Thes. iii. 1). Athens subsequently came into the hands of the Goths, the Byzantines, and other temporarily dominant races, ending with the Turks. Since the establishment of the modern Greek kingdom, in A. D. 1828, Athens has become the capital not merely of Greece, since A. D. 1835, but of the Hellenic race throughout the world.

Ath'lai [afflicted or exalted].

A man who was induced by Ezra to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra x. 28).

A-tone'ment [at-one-ment, the making of those one in feeling who before were at variance].

1. Reconciliation between persons or beings at variance (Rom. v. 11, A. V.).

2. That which produces this reconciliation, specially an expiatory sacrifice designed to have that effect (Ex. xxx. 16; Lev. iv. 20, 26, 31, 35). This is the sense in which the word atonement is now commonly used.

A-tone'ment, Day of.

The annual day of humiliation and expiation for the sins of the nation, when the high priest offered sacrifices as an atonement for the sanctuary, the priests, and the people (Lev. xvi.; xxiii. 26-32, Num. xxix. 7-11). It was observed on the tenth day of the seventh month by abstinence from daily labor, by a holy convocation, and by fasting. It was the only fast enjoined by the law. It was "the fast" (Acts xxvii. 9; Antiq. xiv. 4, 3). On that day the high priest laid aside his official ornaments, and clad in simple white linen sacrificed a bullock as a sin offering for himself and the priests. Taking a censer of live coals from off the altar, he entered the holy of holies and burned incense that the smoke might cover the mercy seat above the law. He then fetched the blood of the slain bullock and sprinkled it on the mercy seat and on the floor. This completed the atonement for the priesthood. He took the two goats, provided by the nation and cast lots upon them. One he slew as a sin offering for the people, brought its blood within the veil, and sprinkled it as before to make atonement for the holy of holies. By similar rites he made atonement for the holy place and the altar of burnt offering. He now took the remaining goat, placed his hands on its head, and confessed over it the sins of the people. Typically the sins of the people were "laid on its head," it was made the sin bearer of the nation, and laden with guilt not its own was sent away into the wilderness; see AZAZEL. The high priest resumed his official raiment, offered his burnt offering and that of the people, and likewise the fat of the sin offering. The flesh of the bullock and the goat were carried without the camp and burned. The Epistle to the Hebrews points out that this entry of the high priest into the most holy place, once a year, and not without blood, foreshadowed the entrance of Jesus, the great high priest, once for all into heaven, having purchased for us eternal salvation (Heb. ix. 1-12, 24-28).

At'roth. See ATROTH-SHOPHAN.

At'roth-beth-jo'ab [crowns of the house of Joab].

A village, apparently in Judah (1 Chron. ii. 54, R. V.). In A. V. the name is cut asunder.

At'roth-sho'phan [crowns of Shophan].

A town rebuilt by the Gadites (Num. xxxii. 35, R. V.). Site unknown. In A. V. incorrectly represented as two towns.

At'tai [perhaps, opportune].

1. A man of Judah whose descent through his mother was from Jerahmeel and Hezron, but whose father was an Egyptian slave (1 Chron. ii. 34-36).

2. A Gadite who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 11).

3. A son of Rehoboam by his queen Maacah (2 Chron. xi. 20).

At-ta-li'a [pertaining to Attalus].

A city on the seacoast of Pamphylia, built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamos, 159-138 B. C., and now called Antali or Adal. Paul sailed thence to Antioch on his first missionary journey (Acts xiv. 25).

At'ta-lus.

King of Pergamos, either Attalus II, Philadelphus, or his nephew Attalus III, who succeeded his uncle in 138 B. C. (1 Mac. xv. 22).

Au-gus'tan Band, in A. V. Augustus' Band.

A cohort of Roman soldiers, apparently named after the Roman emperor Augustus (Acts xxvii. 1).

Au-gus'tus [venerable, august].

The personal name of the first Roman emperor, called in the N. T. Cæsar Augustus. See CÆSAR.

A'va. See AVVA.

A'ven [emptiness, nothingness, an idol].

1. The Egyptian city On, called by the Greeks Heliopolis (Ezek. xxx. 17). The Hebrew consonants of On and Aven are the same, though the vowels differ. The pronunciation has been intentionally modified by the prophet to express his contempt for the idolatries of the city.

2. A name applied by Hosea to Bethel as no longer the house of God, but now a house of idolatry (Hos. x. 8), see BETH-AVEN.

3. A town, apparently, which served to designate a valley in the kingdom of Damascus (Amos. i. 5); probably Heliopolis, now Baalbec, which like the Egyptian On was a seat of the sun-worship (cp. 1 above).

A-ven'ger of Blood.

One who inflicts punishment on a murderer, thus vindicating the majesty of the law, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen. ix. 5, 6; Num. xxxv. 31). When civil life is regulated, this duty is undertaken by courts of justice. Of old, however, the Semitic nations, like the ancient Greeks, Germans, and Slavs, acted to a large extent on the system of each injured man being his own avenger. When murder or accidental homicide took place, the nearest relative of the victim was expected to avenge his death, and was called the avenger of blood. He slew the murderer or the unintentional homicide, without any preliminary trial to settle the actual facts of the case. Then, very probably, the nearest relative of the second man slain murdered the avenger of blood, and a blood feud was established. The Mosaic legislation introduced modifications into the system which destroyed its worst features. Cities of refuge were established, and any one killing a man and fleeing to one of those cities was granted a fair trial, and was not put to death unless he had committed actual murder (Num xxxv. 19, 21, 24, 27; 2 Sam. xiv. 11). The A V. reads, Revenger of blood. See CITIES OF REFUGE.

A'vim and Avims. See AVVIM.

A'vites. See AVVITES.

A'vith [ruins].

An Edomite city, the native place of king Hadad (Gen. xxxvi 35. 1 Chron 1 46). Exact site unknown.

Av'va, in A V. A'va.

A city of the Assyrian empire, in or north-west of Babylonia, from which people were brought to help to colonize Samaria. Their gods were Nibhaz and Tartak (2 Kin xvii 24, 31). It is doubtless the place called Ivvah in 2 Kin xviii. 34, xix 13, R. V.

Av'vim, in A. V. A'vims and A'vites and, as name of the town, A'vim.

1 The aborigines of the Philistine country about Gaza. All save a small remnant were destroyed by the Captorim, afterwards called Philistines (Deut. ii 23; Josh. xiii. 3).

2 A town of Benjamin, perhaps the same as Ai (Josh. xviii. 23).

Av'vites, in A. V. A'vites.

1. The same as Avvim (Josh. xiii 3).

2. People of Avva (2 Kin xvii. 31).

A'zal. See AZEL.

Az-a-li'ah [Jehovah hath spared].

Son of Meshullam and father of Shaphan the scribe (2 Kin. xxii 3).

Az-a-ni'ah [Jehovah hath given ear]

A Levite, father of Jeshua (Neh. x. 9).

Az-a-rel, in A. V. A-zar'e-el, once A-zar'-a-el (Neh. xii. 36) [God has helped]

1 A Levite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 6).

2. A singer in David's time (1 Chron. xxv. 18). In ver. 4 he is called Uzziel (as king Azariah was also known as Uzziel), and is recorded as of the lineage of Heman.

3 A son of Jeroham, the chief of the tribe of Dan (1 Chron. xxvii. 22).

4. A man whom Ezra persuaded to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra x. 41).

5 A priest of the father's house of Immer (Neh. xi 13).

6. A musician of priestly descent (Neh. xii. 36).

Az-a-ri'ah [Jehovah hath helped].

1 A man of Judah, family of Zerah, house of Ethan (1 Chron. ii. 8).

2. A Levite, family of Kohath, line of Izhar, and an ancestor of Samuel the prophet and Heman the singer (1 Chron. vi. 36; perhaps, 2 Chron. xxix. 12).

3. One of Solomon's officials, son of the high priest Zadok (1 Kin. iv. 2) and brother of Ahimaaz.

4 Grandson of Zadok and son of Ahimaaz. He was in the line of high-priestly succession (1 Chron. vi. 9).

5. Son of Nathan, and hence probably Solomon's nephew (2 Sam. v. 14), who was over Solomon's twelve tax-collectors (1 Kin. iv. 5).

6. A prophet, son of Oded, who encouraged king Asa to persevere in national religious reformation (2 Chron. xv. 1-8).

7. Two sons of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxi. 2). The recurrence of the same name in the family is surprising. It may be due to an early corruption of the text; or, if the text is correct, to a difference of mother, the two boys being half-brothers (cp. the Herods). It cannot be explained by the theory that the younger was named after a deceased elder brother, for the two seem to have been alive together and to have been put to death at the same time.

8 A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii 38, 39). His grandfather was Obed (38), hence he was perhaps the captain Azariah, son of Obed, who assisted in overthrowing Athaliah and placing Joash on the throne (2 Chron. xxiii 1).

9 Another captain, son of Jeroham, who aided in overthrowing Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

10 A prince of Ephraim, son of Johanan, who aided in persuading the soldiers of Pekah's army to release the captives of Judah (2 Chron. xxviii 12).

11. A king of Judah, known also as Uzziiah (cp. 2 Kin. xv 1 with 2 Chron. xxvi 1), see UZZIAH. The belief is no longer generally held that he is the Azriyau mentioned in the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser.

12 A high priest (1 Chron. vi 10), probably he who rebuked Uzziiah for encroaching on the priest's office (2 Chron. xxvi 17-20). Perhaps he was still officiating in Hezekiah's reign (xxxii 10, 13), but probably the pontiff of the latter reign was another priest of the name Azariah, see HIGH PRIEST.

13 A Levite, family of Merari, who assisted in purifying the temple in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxix 12).

14. A high priest, son of Hilkiah and father of Seraiah, not long before the exile (1 Chron. vi 13, 14, perhaps ix 11). See SERAIAH 12.

15 A son of Hoshaiah and an opponent of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xlii. 2).

16 The Hebrew and original name of Abednego (Dan. i 7; 1 Mac. ii 59).

17. A prominent person, probably prince of Judah, who marched in the procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 32, 33).

18 A son of Maaseiah, who had a house at Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time, and repaired the wall in its immediate vicinity (Neh. iii 23, 24).

19 One of those, apparently Levites, who explained to the people the law which Ezra read (Neh. viii. 7).

20. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house, who in the days of Nehemiah sealed the covenant to keep separate from foreigners and observe the law of God (Neh. x 2).

21. A descendant of Hilkiah who was ruler of the house of God after the exile (1 Chron. ix 11); see, however, SERAIAH 12.

Besides these, a king of Israel (not Uzziah) is called Azariah in 2 Chron. xxii 6, but this seems a copyist's error for Ahaziah, which is given in the next verse (2 Chron. xxii. 6, 7; cp 2 Km. viii. 29).

Az-a-ri'as [Greek form of Azariah].

One of two men appointed by Judas Macabæus to chief authority in Judæa during his absence (1 Mac v. 18), but who were defeated by Gorgias (56-60).

A'zaz [strong]

A Reubenite, line of Joel (1 Chron. v. 8).

A-za'zel [probably for 'azazel, in the sense of dismissal or dismissed, separated one]

The word occurs originally in one passage only (Lev xvi. 8, 10, 26, R. V.); see ATONEMENT, DAY OF. The data for determining its meaning are meager and insufficient, being confined as yet to etymology, exegesis of the passage, and general biblical teaching. Numerous interpretations have been proposed, but they are conjectures more or less satisfactory. The word has been interpreted both impersonally and personally, as meaning—1. A place, a solitary desert (Jonathan, Jerome), 2. A goat: the departing goat (Jewish revisers of the Septuagint, Vulgate); scape-goat, the goat that is allowed to escape (A. V.), 3. An abstract noun: utter removal or dismissal (Bahr, Winer, R. V.), 4. A personal being. (a) some demon of the wilderness (Stade); (b) a fallen angel who seduces men to evil (Book of Enoch vi 7; viii 1 et passim), later identified with Sammael, (c) an epithet applied to the devil (Origen, Hengstenberg, Oehler, Kurtz, Keil; see Milton, Paradise Lost i.).

Either of two interpretations is satisfactory: 1. To regard the word as an abstraction: Aaron shall cast lots upon the goats, "one lot for the Lord and the other lot for dismissal," and shall send the goat, upon which the latter lot falls, away "as a dismissal to the wilderness." The idea of the escaped goat is virtually preserved by this interpretation. 2. To regard the word as an epithet of the devil, the apostate one. Those who are laden with sin belong to the devil. The objection to this interpretation is that Satan is nowhere mentioned in any part of the Pentateuch. The serpent indeed is, but it is not certain that the devil was as yet recognized as the possessor and actuator of the serpent of the temptation.

Az-a-zi'ah [Jehovah is strong].

1. A harper for religious service during the reign of David (1 Chron. xv. 21).

2. Father of a prince of Ephraim in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 20).

3. An overseer of the temple in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

Az'buk.

Father of a certain Nehemiah, contemporary, but not identical with the celebrated governor of that name (Neh. iii. 16).

A-ze'kah [a field dug by a hoe and set out with new vines].

A town in the lowland, near Socoh, to which the kings besieging Gibeon were driven by Joshua (Josh x. 10, 11). It was assigned to Judah (xv. 35). The Philistines pitched their camp near it when they brought with them Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 1). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 9). Nebuchadnezzar fought against it (Jer. xxxiv. 7), and probably took it, but it continued to exist after the captivity (Neh. xi. 30). Its site has not been identified.

A'zel; in A. V. once A'zal (Zech. xiv. 5), a Hebrew pronunciation sometimes employed when the word stands at a pause in the sentence (as in text of 1 Chron. viii. 38, but not of ix. 44, R. V.) [perhaps, noble].

1. A descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (1 Chron. viii. 37, 38; ix. 43, 44).

2. Probably a hamlet; and if so, it lay to the east of Jerusalem (Zech. xiv. 5). Perhaps identical with Beth-ezel.

A'zem. See EZEM.

Az'gad [strong of fortune, or the god Gad is strong].

Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylonia with both Zerubbabel and Ezra (Ezra ii. 12, viii. 12). Its representative sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 15).

A'zi-el. See JAAZIEL.

A-zi'za [robust].

A man whom Ezra induced to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra x. 27).

Az'ma-veth [death is strong].

1. A Bahumite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 31).

2. A Benjaminite, whose sons came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 3).

3. The son of Adiel. He was over David's treasures (1 Chron. xxvii. 25).

4. A son of Jehoadah and descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (1 Chron. viii. 36).

5. A village in the vicinity of Jerusalem, near Geba. Forty-two of its inhabitants returned from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra ii. 24). Some singers resided on its fields (Neh. xii. 29). Called also Beth-azmaveth (Neh. vii. 28). Its site is perhaps Hizmieh, midway between Geba and Anathoth.

Az'mon [robust].

A place on the southern boundary of Canaan, to the west of Kadesh-barnea and near the brook of Egypt (Num. xxxiv. 4, 5; Josh. xv. 4, R. V.). Exact site unknown.

Az'noth-ta'bor [the ears, i. e. slopes or tops, of Tabor].

A place on the boundary of Naphtali, evidently near mount Tabor (Josh. xix. 34).

A'zor.

An ancestor of Christ who lived after the exile (Mat. i. 13, 14).

A-zo'tus. See ASHDOD.

Az'ri-el [help of God].

1. A chief man of the half tribe of Manasseh, east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24).
2. A Naphtalite of David's time, father of Jerimoth (1 Chron. xxvii. 19).
3. Father of Seraiah of Jeremiah's time (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

Az'ri-kam [help against an enemy, or help hath arisen]

1. A son of Neariah (1 Chron. iii. 23).
2. A son of Azel, and descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (1 Chron. viii 38; ix 44).
3. A Levite, descended from Merari (1 Chron. ix. 14).
4. The governor of the palace under king Ahaz. He was killed by an Ephraimite, Zichri (2 Chron. xxviii. 7).

A-zu'bah [forsaken or desolation].

1. A wife of Caleb (1 Chron. ii 18, 19).
2. A daughter of Shihl and mother of Jehoshaphat (1 Kin. xxii. 42).

A'zur. See AZZUR.

Az'zah. See GAZA.

Az'zan [strong].

Father of Paltiel, prince of Issachar in the days of Moses (Num xxxiv. 26).

Az'zur, in A. V. twice A'zur [helpful].

1. Father of Hananiah the false prophet (Jer. xxviii. 1).
2. Father of Jaazaniah (Ezek. xi. 1)
3. One of those who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 17).

B.

Ba'al [master, lord, possessor].

1. A sun-god, exhibiting different aspects of the solar energy, the center of whose worship was Phœnicia, whence it spread to the neighboring countries. Baal was adored on high places in Moab as early as the days of Balaam and Balak (Num xxii. 41). In the time of the judges he had altars within the country of the Israelites (Judg. ii. 13; vi. 28-32), and when king Ahab married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Sidomians, the worship of Baal almost supplanted that of Jehovah. The life and death struggle between the two religions culminated on mount Carmel when the prophet Elijah met the priests of Baal (1 Kin xvi 31, 32; xviii. 17-40). Though it ended in the slaughter of the priests of Baal, yet they soon swarmed anew until crushed by Jehu (2 Kin x 18-28). About this time, the worship of Baal received new impulse in Judah through the influence of Jezebel's daughter, Athaliah, wife of Jehoram (2 Chron. xvii. 3; xxi. 6; xxii. 2). On her overthrow, the temple of Baal at Jerusalem was pulled down, the altars and images were destroyed, and Mattan, the chief priest, slain before the altar (2 Kin.

xi. 18). After a time the worship of Baal was revived in both Israel (Hos. ii. 8; iv. 13) and Judah. Ahaz made molten images for the Baalim (2 Chron. xxviii. 2). Hezekiah, indeed, wrought a reformation, but Manasseh erected altars to Baal (2 Kin. xxi 3). Josiah destroyed the vessels of Baal at Jerusalem, and made the public worship of Baal for the time to cease (xxiii 4, 5). Jeremiah frequently denounced it, as did other prophets (Jer xix. 4, 5). The worship of Baal was accompanied with lascivious rites (cp. 1 Kin xiv. 24), the sacrifice of children in the fire by parents (Jer. xix. 5), and kissing the image (1 Kin. xix. 18; Hos. xiii 2). Baal was often associated with the goddess Ashtoreth (Judg. ii 13), and in the vicinity of his altar there was often an Asheiah (Judg vi. 30; 1 Kin. xvi. 32, 33, both R V). Baal must not be confounded with the Babylonian Bel, though both were sun-gods.

2. A Reubenite, house of Joel, who lived before the captivity of the ten tribes (1 Chron. v. 5, 6).

3. A Benjamite, son of king Saul's ancestor Jeiel (1 Chron viii 30, ix 35, 36, 39, R V).

4. A village of Simeon (1 Chron. iv 33); the same as Baalath-beer (q v).

Ba'al-ah [mistress]

1. A town better known as Kirjath-jearim (Josh xv 9).

2. A hill in Judah, between Ekron and Jabneel (Josh xv. 11)

3. A town in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 29), apparently the same as the Simeonite town Balah (Josh xix. 3) or Bilhah (1 Chron. iv. 29). Site unknown.

Ba'al-ath [mistress].

A village of the original territory of Dan (Josh. xix. 44), near Gezer (Antiq. viii 6, 1) Solomon fortified it (1 Kin ix. 18; 2 Chron viii. 6)

Ba'al-ath-be'er [possessor of a well]

A town on the boundary line of the tribe of Simeon. Called simply Baal (1 Chron iv. 33), and apparently known also as Ramah and Ramoth of the South (Josh xix. 8. 1 Sam. xxx. 27, R. V.). Site unknown

Ba'al-be'rith [lord of a covenant; i. e. the god who enters into a covenant with his worshippers].

A designation under which in the time of the judges Baal was worshiped at Shechem, where he had a temple (Judg. viii 33; ix. 4). Sometimes he was spoken of as El-berith, the covenant-keeping god (Judg. ix. 46, R V; where A. V. partly translates the name).

Ba'al-e, or rather, as in R. V., Baale Judah [a construct form, probably singular, Baal of Judah]

A town of Judah, the same as Baalah and Kirjath-baal and Kirjath-jearim (2 Sam. vi. 2; cp. 1 Chron. xiii. 6; Josh. xviii. 14). See KIRJATH-JEARIM.

Ba'al-gad [lord of fortune]

A place at the foot of mount Hermon, in the valley of Lebanon, where apparently Gad, the god of fortune, was worshiped. It constituted the extreme northern limit of Joshua's conquests (Josh. xi 17; xii 7; xiii. 5). It can scarcely be identified with either Banias or Baalbek.

Ba'al-ha'mon [place of a multitude].

A place where Solomon had a vineyard (Song viii. 11). Its identity with Balamon, a town near Dothan (Judith viii 3), which Gesenius suggested, is extremely doubtful in view of the variant spelling Belbaim, Belmaim, Abelmaim (iv. 4; vii. 3).

Ba'al-ha'nán [the Lord is gracious].

1 Son of Achibor and king of Edom (Gen. xxxix. 38; 1 Chron. i 49).

2. Custodian of the olive and sycamore trees under king David (1 Chron. xxvii. 28).

Ba'al-ha'zor [lord of a village].

A place beside Ephraim (2 Sam xiii. 23). Gesenius suggested Hazor in Benjamin (Neh xi. 33). Another view is that it was at Tell 'Asūr, 4½ miles north-northeast of Bethel; but the two names are quite different etymologically.

Ba'al-her'mon [Baal or lord of Hermon]

A mountain marking the northwestern limit of the half tribe of Manasseh east of Jordan, and situated south or southwest of mount Hermon proper (Judg iii 3; 1 Chron v. 23). The comparison of Josh. xiii. 5 with Judg iii 3 is not sufficient to establish its identity with Baal-gad.

Ba'al-i [my master] (Hos. ii. 16).Ba'al-im [Hebrew plural of Baal].

The sun-god Baal as worshiped under different aspects by the nations neighbor to Israel, or the old Canaanite plural of eminence instead of the singular number (Judg. ii. 11; iii 7; viii 33; x 10, 1 Sam vii 4; xii. 10). Often coupled with Ashtaroth (q. v.).

Ba'a-lis.

A king of the Ammonites who reigned shortly after Nebuchadnezzar's capture of Jerusalem (Jer xl. 14).

Ba'al-me'on [lord of Meon or habitation].

An old Amorite city on the frontiers of Moab, known fully as Beth-baal-meon (Num. xxxiii 38; Ezek. xxv. 9; both forms on Moabite Stone 9, 30). It was assigned to the Reubenites and rebuilt by them (Num. xxxii. 38; in ver 3 called Beon; Josh xiii. 17; 1 Chron. v. 8). It was held by Mesha, king of Moab (Stone 9, 30), and was in possession of the same people in the sixth century B. C. (Ezek xxv 9; and Jer xlviii. 23, where it is abbreviated to Beth-meon). It was still a considerable town in the time of Jerome, who gives its distance from Heshbon as 9 Roman miles. The ruins, now called Ma'in, lie in the northern Moabite territory, 4 miles southwest of Medeba. Tristram describes them as occupying the crests and sides of four adjacent hills, one being evidently the site of the central city, connected with the rest by a causeway. There are remains of foundations, walls, streets, arches, carved stones, caverns and cavernous dwellings, wells, and cisterns.

Ba'al-pe'or [lord of Peor].

A Moabite deity worshiped with impure rites on the top of mount Peor. The Israelites, when encamped at Shittim, felt attracted by it, and so sinned that a plague broke out among them, and was not stayed till a slaughter had been ordered of the chief transgressors (Num. xxv. 1-9; Ps cvi. 28; Hos. ix. 10).

Ba'al-per'a-zim [place of breaking forth]

A place near the valley of Rephaim where David gained a victory over the Philistines (2 Sam v 18-20, 1 Chron xiv 9-11, cp Is xxxviii 21).

Ba'al-shal'i-shah, in A. V. Baal-shalisha [lord of Shahshah, a third part].

A village from which bread and corn of the firstfruits were brought to Elisha when he was at Gilgal, on the mountains, seven and a half miles north of Bethel (2 Kin iv 42-44). The gift was brought to Gilgal because a school of the prophets was there. Jerome and Eusebius call Baal-shalishah Beth-shalishah, and describe it as situated 15 Roman miles to the north of Lydda. Conder locates it at the present village of Kefr Thulth on the lower hills of Ephraim, 16 English miles northeast of Lydda and 13½ miles northwest of Gilgal. The distance and etymology favor the identification Cp 1 Sam ix. 4.

Ba'al-ta'mar [lord or possessor of a palm]

A place in Benjamin where the Israelite army took their stand when about to assail Gibeah (Judg xx 33). Exact site unknown.

Ba'al-ze'bub [lord of the fly]

The name under which the sun-god Baal was worshiped at Ekron as the producer of flies, and consequently able to defend against this pest. Ahaziah, king of Judah, applied to him for a revelation (2 Kin i. 6, 16). See BEELZEBUB.

Ba'al-ze'phon [lord of watchfulness, scarcely Baal of the north or place of Typhon].

A place which was over against the Israelites while they were encamped beside Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, just before they crossed through the sea (Ex. xiv. 2, 9). So also in Num xxxiii 7. Pihahiroth is said to be before Baal-zephon. Site disputed.

Ba'a-na, in A. V. once Baanah (1 Kin. iv. 16) [Aramaic form of Baanah].

1. Solomon's purveyor for the southern district of the plain of Jezreel from Megiddo to the Jordan. He was a son of Ahilud and probably brother of Jehoshaphat the recorder (1 Kin iv. 12; cp ver. 3).

2. Solomon's purveyor for Asher and vicinity. He was a son of Hushai, not unlikely of that Hushai who was the friend and adviser of David (1 Kin. iv. 16)

3. A certain Zadok's father (Neh. iii. 4).

Ba'a-nah.

1. A Benjamite, brother of Rechab, and leader of a predatory band. Although the brothers belonged to the tribe of Saul, they nevertheless murdered his son Ish-bosheth, and thus were partly instrumental in turning the kingdom to David. They carried the head of the murdered man to David at Hebron in expectation of a reward; but David had them put to death as criminals (2 Sam. iv. 1-12).

2. A Netophathite, father of Heled, one of David's worthies (1 Chron. xi. 30).

3. One of Solomon's purveyors. See BAANA.

4. A Jew who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7). It was probably the representative of his family who sealed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (x. 27).

Ba'a-ra [perhaps stupidity].

A wife of Shaharaim (1 Chron. vii. 8).

Ba-a-se'iah.

A Levite, descendant of Gershom and ancestor of Asaph the singer (1 Chron. vi. 40).

Ba'a-sha.

Son of Ahijah, of the tribe of Issachar, who conspired against Nadab, the son and successor of Jeroboam I, king of Israel. When Nadab was directing the siege of Gibbethon, then in the hands of the Philistines, Baasha murdered him and all Jeroboam's descendants, thus fulfilling the judgment denounced against his house (1 Kin. xvi. 7; cp. Acts ii. 23). Then the assassin ascended the throne of Israel in the third year of Asa, king of Judah, and fixed his capital at Tirzah (1 Kin. xv. 25-xvi. 4). He carried on a long war with Asa. He began to fortify Ramah to blockade the northern frontier of Judah, but was diverted from his purpose by the invasion of his kingdom by Benhadad, king of Damascus, whom Asa hired (1 Kin. xv. 16-21; 2 Chron. xvi. 1-6). Baasha continued the calf-worship begun by Jeroboam, and the prophet Jehu threatened him and his house with Jeroboam's fate. He died after a reign of 24 years, and was buried in Tirzah. His son Elah succeeded him (1 Kin. xv. 34-xvi. 6).

Ba'bel [gate of God].

A city in the plain of Shinar. It is first mentioned after the flood. It was the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom, i. e. probably the earliest and chief seat of his power (Gen. x. 10). In the English versions the word Babel occurs in this passage and xi. 9 only, being rendered Babylon in all later notices.

The tower of Babel was begun shortly after the flood. Those who planned its erection hoped to establish a renowned center and prevent the danger of their being scattered over the earth. There is neither building-stone nor lime on the alluvial plain of Shinar, so bricks were used in place of stone in building this tower, and for mortar bitumen was employed, abundant supplies of which were found at Hit, about 140 miles higher up the river. The plan of the builders, however, was not carried out, for those erecting the tower were visited with a punishment which instantly or soon produced difference of dialect and the withdrawal of men to new regions. Hence the city was called Babel, place of God's judgment (see GATE). To describe the event the Hebrew writer selected the word balal, which bears some resemblance in sound to Babel (Gen. xi. 1-9). This confusion of tongues is recorded in the midst of a section of the book of Genesis devoted to the Semites (x. 21-xi. 26), and may, therefore, have been an incident of Semitic, and not of universal, history. It may have originated dialects among the Semites only (xi. 1 is equally true on this interpretation); have occurred after the rise of the family of Eber, and be echoed in the name Peleg (x. 25); see PELEG. A groundless tradition identifies the tower of Babel with the Birs Nimrûd, at Borsippa, about 7 miles from the center of Babylon. But if the unfinished tower was ever put to use afterwards, it was more likely perpetuated by the temple-tower Etemenanki, north of the great temple of Marduk, in the city of Babylon itself.

Although work on the tower ceased, yet the place was not wholly deserted. In after years it was the home of a great community. See next article.

Bab'y-lon [Babel, Assyrian Bab-ilu, with the Greek ending on].

1. The capital of the Babylonian empire. Its first mention in the Hebrew Scriptures is in Gen. x. 10, with three other places, as the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom (cp. Is. xxiii. 13). There the tower of Babel (q. v.) was undertaken and the consequent confusion of tongues took place (Gen. xi. 1-9). The city became the mistress of Babylonia under king Hammurabi, about the middle of the twentieth century B. C. (see AMRAPHEL), and henceforth was the political and religious center of the country. It reached the height of its glory in the sixth century B. C., under Nebuchadnezzar, who did much for it, rendering it the largest and most splendid capital of his time. The old palace stood on the eastern bank of the Euphrates. This royal residence was enlarged by Nebuchadnezzar to twice its original size, by an addition on the north, and then had the river on the west and a canal on the north and the south, while the eastern side and a magnificent gateway stood upon the great Procession Street, which came from the temple of Marduk, about half a mile to the south. Nebuchadnezzar built another palace a mile and a half to the north of the older one, on an artificial hill whose terraced sides were probably covered by the famous hanging gardens. Herodotus, who flourished about 443 B. C., states that Babylon, which he presumably visited, was a square, each side being 120 stades, or about fourteen miles, in length. This measurement yields an area of nearly 200 square miles, and includes Borsippa in the city limits. Ctesias, also an eyewitness, who flourished about the year 400 B. C., makes each side of the square about 90 stades, or the length of the four sides together 360 stades or 42 miles, in which case the area would slightly exceed 100 square miles. The city was surrounded by a wall (Jer. li 58), or rather double walls (Herod i 181). Without was a deep and broad moat. Between the two walls, all around the square, was a space in which no houses were allowed to be built. Within the circuit of the inner wall were many gardens, orchards, and fields. These counted much for area, but added little to the population of the city. Herodotus says that the walls were 50 royal cubits broad, or about 85 English feet, and the height 200 royal cubits, about 335 English feet. Quintus Curtius, about A. D. 40, gives the breadth at about 32 English feet; and Clitarchus (as reported by Diodorus Siculus) and Strabo make the height 75 feet. These writers state the circuits variously, from 365 to 385 stades. The city had a hundred gates of bronze, twenty-five on each side. From these there ran broad streets at right angles to the walls, thus dividing the whole area into squares. The Euphrates flowed through the midst of the city, dividing it into two portions. Along each bank of the river there was a continuous quay. A wall separated the quay from the city; but it was pierced by twenty-five gateways, from each of which a sloping descent led to the water's edge. There were ferryboats, a bridge, and even a tunnel. The walls, quays, palaces, temples, and private edifices were built of brick, the cement or mortar was bitumen (cp Gen. xi 3). The timber of the houses, which were two, three, and four stories high, was of palm wood (Herod. i. 178-186).

In 520-19 B. C., and again in 514, Babylon revolted against Darius Hystaspis, but on both occasions it was subdued, and the last time was dismantled. Its decay was hastened by Seleucus Nicator, who conquered the city in 312 B. C., and made large use of its materials in building the new capital, Seleucia, on the banks of the Tigris.

The Scripture prophecies regarding Babylon have been fulfilled (Is xlii; xiv 1-23; xxi. 1-10; xlv. 1, 2; xlvii 1-3; Jer. l. and li.). Jeremiah (li. 37, cp. l. 26) said that it should become heaps, and mounds are all that remain of it now. They commence about 3½ miles above the village of Hillah, and extend northward slightly above 3 miles, by 2 from east to west, lying chiefly on the eastern side of the river. The three most notable mounds are now called by the Arabs the Babil, the Kasr, and the Amran mounds. They lie east of the river, and in a section of the old city which, at some period of history, was a triangular area bounded by the river and two walls. These walls were practically straight, met in almost a right angle toward the east, and measured two and three miles in length. The southern mound, Amran, marks the site of Marduk's temple. The central one, Kasr, covers the remains of the old palace and a temple of the goddess Belit, which stood farther to the east and was separated from the palace by the Procession Street. The mound Babil, in the north, is the site of Nebuchadnezzar's northern palace.

2 The mystic Babylon of Revelation xiv. 8; xvi 19; xvii, xviii, is the city of Rome, which stood on seven hills (cp xvii. 3, 5, 6, 9, 18).

Bab-y-lo'ni-a.

A region of western Asia which had Babylon for its capital. It is sometimes called, in whole or in part, Shinar (Gen x 10, xi 2; Is xi 11), and sometimes land of the Chaldeans (Jer. xxiv 5, xxv 12; Ezek xii. 13). It was bounded on the north by Mesopotamia, the dividing line between the two running from near Hit on the Euphrates to a little below Samarah on the Tigris. The boundary is a natural one, separating the slightly elevated plain of secondary formation on the north from the low-lying alluvium brought down by the Euphrates and the Tigris on the south. Babylonia is bounded on the east by the mountains of Elam, east of the river Tigris, on the south by the Persian Gulf, and on the west by the Arabian desert. In ancient historic times the area was about 25,000 square miles, but the northern part of the Persian Gulf is being gradually filled with alluvium, so that now the district is 430 miles long by 185 broad at the widest part, and contains 30,000 square miles. The deep, rich, alluvial soil, artificially irrigated, was of almost matchless fertility. Cushites were early in the country (Gen x. 8-10), and likewise the Semites. Cities were built, notably Ur (xi 28), Laisa (cp xiv 1), Erech, Babel, Acad (x 10), Cutbah (2 Kin xvii. 24), and Nippur. These towns were sometimes independent kingdoms, at other times under one monarch. The Cushite Nimrod early united four under his sway. Sargon of Agade, who was a Semite by race or had adopted the Semitic language, held the entire region under his rule about 3750 B. C. But his dominion and that of his son Naram-sin extended far beyond Babylonia, and reached to the Mediterranean Sea. Two millennia before Christ Kudurnanhund descended from Elam and conquered Babylonia. To this Elamite dynasty Chedorlaomer probably belonged (Gen. xiv. 1). But the Elamites were at length defeated, and an end was put to their rule in Babylonia by Hammurabi. Several generations later the Cosseans established themselves in the country. About the sixteenth century B. C., the officials of Palestine used the Babylonian script and language in their correspondence with the Egyptian court. About 1270 B. C. the Assyrians under Tukulti-adar subjugated Babylonia, which for the next 700 years remained a second-rate power, though occasionally casting off the Assyrian yoke. Nabonassar achieved independence in 747 B. C. The country was reconquered by Tiglath-pileser about 731 B. C.; then, after successive revolts, by Sargon in 709 B. C., by Sennacherib in 703 B. C., by Esarhaddon in 680 B. C., and by Ashurbanipal in 648 B. C. During this period Merodach-baladan twice occupied the throne, once from 721 to 709, and again in 704 or 703. In 625 B. C., Babylonian independence was finally secured by Nabopolassar, known to the Greeks as Nabopolassar, who was probably an official under the Assyrians. The Assyrian empire was threatened by Medes and restless Babylonians. Aided by the Chaldeans, Nabopolassar took possession of Babylon, proclaimed independence from Assyria, and allied himself with the Medes, and laid the foundations of what soon developed into the great Babylonian empire. He reigned from the year 625 to 605 B. C. Nineveh had been taken and destroyed about 606 B. C., and in the partition of its empire the share of Nabopolassar was Susiana, the valley of the Euphrates, Syria, and Palestine, which were annexed to the Babylonian empire. But the claim of Babylonia to the country west of the Euphrates was disputed by Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, and Nabopolassar sent his son Nebuchadnezzar to protect the Babylonian interests. Nebuchadnezzar totally defeated Necho at the battle of Carchemish, fought 605 B. C., and pushed westward in order to follow up his victory, but he was recalled to Babylon by the news of his father's death. He ascended the throne in 605 B. C., and reigned nearly forty-four years. Under him the Babylonian empire reached the farthest limits to which it ever attained; and almost all its engineering and architectural achievements were carried out under his direction. Jerusalem was captured and destroyed by him, and the people of Judah carried into captivity; see NEBUCHADNEZZAR. On his death in 562 B. C., he was succeeded by his son Evil-merodach, who befriended the captive Jehoiachin (2 Kin xxv. 27; Jer. li. 31). After a reign of two years (562-560 B. C.) Evil-merodach was put to death by conspirators, headed by Neriglissar, husband of a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar. Neriglissar, who was probably the military officer Nergal-sharezer who took part in the siege against Jerusalem (Jer. xxxix. 3, 13), then ascended the throne and reigned four years and a half, dying early in 556 B. C. His son and successor, Labashi-marduk, a mere boy, was clubbed to death a few months later. The conspirators against the boy-king then invested one of their number, Nabona'id, with the sovereignty. In the seventeenth year of his reign, 539 B. C., Cyrus the Persian entered Babylon, terminating the Babylonian empire; see CYRUS. From the Persians the domination of the country was wrested by Alexander the Great, by his victories in 333 and 331 B. C. Since then the territory on the Lower Euphrates has passed from the Greeks successively to the Romans, the Parthians, the Persians again, and finally to the Mohammedans. After the fall of Jerusalem in A. D. 70 Babylonia became, and for centuries remained, a seat of Jewish schools devoted to the study and interpretation of the law. The country at present is comparatively unproductive, but under firm and enlightened rule would be one of the most fertile regions in the world.

Ba'ca [a balsam tree, so named from its shedding, as it were, tears of gum; possibly also a noun meaning weeping].

A valley in Palestine (Ps lxxxiv. 6), so called from the balsam trees which grew in it; possibly the valley of Rephaim, where such trees were found (2 Sam v. 22, 23, R V margin). Perhaps, however, the expression is figurative, as the Greek and Syrian translators believed, like "valley of the shadow of death," and denotes any vale of tears.

Bac'chi-des.

A Syrian general sent by Demetrius I at the close of 162 B. C. to place Alcimus in the high priesthood, and to subjugate rebellious Judah (1 Mac vii 8-20). The next year he defeated Judas and Jonathan Maccabæus, but his third campaign, which he undertook in 157 B. C., was not successful, and he returned discouraged (ix. 1-57, 59-72).

Bad'ger.

The rendering of the Hebrew word Tahash in the A. V. (Ex. xxvi. 14; xxxv. 7; Num. iv. 25; Ezek. xvi. 10). It was an animal. Its skin was used for the outer covering of the tabernacle, and for sandals. Tristram says that the common badger, Meles vulgaris, is not rare in the hilly and wooded parts of Palestine, but it does not seem to be alluded to in the Bible. See SEAL, I.

Bæ'an.

Probably a Bedouin tribe which made predatory incursions (1 Mac. v. 4). Blau has, however, suggested that it may be the name of the place which is called Bajaa in the inscription at Kar'yak, and which was situated in the region indicated by the narrative.

Bag'pipe.

The rendering on the margin of the R. V of the Aramaic Sumphoneya in Dan. iii. 5, 7, 10, 15. The texts of the A. V. and R. V. translate it dulcimer. Sumphoneya is apparently from the Greek sumphonia, symphony, unison of sounds. The bagpipe is known in Italy by the name sambogna, and in Asia Minor as sambonya, names which recall sumphoneya. The instrument is used also in Egypt and Arabia, where it consists of a leathern bag in which two pipes are inserted, one for inflating the bag, the other for playing upon with the fingers.

Ba-ha'rum-ite.

An inhabitant of Bahurim (1 Chron. xi. 33).

Ba-hu'rim [young men].

A village near the mount of Olives, on the road from Jerusalem to the Jordan (2 Sam. xvi. 5). It is mentioned repeatedly in the history of David. Thence came Shimei, who cursed him, and in a well there Jonathan and Ahinai hid when pursued by the partisans of Absalom (2 Sam. iii. 16; xvi. 5; xvii. 18; xix. 16; 1 Kin. ii. 8). There is reason to believe that it was on or near the old road that ran from Jerusalem to the Jordan through the wady Rûâbeh, and stood either at the ruins a mile and a half northeast of Jerusalem and the same distance south of Anathoth or else half a mile to the southeast on the ridge.

Ba'jith. See BAYITH

Bak-bak'kar.

A Levite (1 Chron. ix. 15).

Bak'buk [a flagon].

One of the Nechunim, and founder of a family, members of which returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

Bak-bu-ki'ah [effusion of Jehovah]

1. A Levite resident of Jerusalem, and in high office immediately after the exile (Neh. xi. 17).

2. A Levite, perhaps representative of the family of the earlier Levite of this name, who served as gatekeeper of the temple in Nehemiah's time (Neh. xii. 25).

Ba'laam [perhaps, devouring]

A diviner (Josh. xiii. 22; cp Num. xxiv. 1), son of Beor, and resident at the town of Pethor, on the Euphrates (Num. xxii. 5), in Aram, in the hill country of the east (xxiii. 7; cp Deut. xxiii. 4). The Hebrew text of Num. xxii. 5 describes Balak as sending to Balaam "to the land of the children of his people," meaning Balak's native land or, better, Balaam's. The Samaritan and Syriac, reading 'ammon for 'amno, have "land of the children of Ammon"; but Balaam is nowhere else connected with the Ammonites, not even in Num. xxxi. 8. This diviner recognized Jehovah as the god of Israel (xxiii. 21), and as one at least of his own gods (xxii. 18; but the Greek version reads merely "Jehovah God"). Balak, king of Moab, sent an embassy to him, consisting of elders of Moab and Midian, offering him reward to place the Israelites under a ban (Num. xxii. 5-7). He answered that he could not do so without the consent of Jehovah, the God of Israel. Consent was, of course, refused. Balak dispatched more honorable negotiators, not elders, but princes. Balaam replied that not for a house full of gold and silver would he go beyond the word of Jehovah. Importuning God for permission, he was allowed to go with the men, on condition of uttering only the words that God put into his mouth. On the way an angel of the Lord with drawn sword, visible to the ass on which Balaam rode, but not to its rider, thrice disputed his progress. The ass refused to go forward. When beaten, voice was given to it, and it spoke out. Finally, Balaam himself was permitted to see the angel, and learn the peril he was in. He offered to turn back, but was allowed to go forward, on the same stringent condition as before. Balak met him on the banks of the Arnon, and conducted him to Kiriath-huzoth, probably the same as Kiriath-arim, on the first conspicuous eminence north of the Arnon. The next morning the two, accompanied by the princes of Moab, went northward to the high places of Baal, from which lofty spot part of the camp of Israel at Shittim was visible (Num. xxii. 8-41, R. V.). After sacrifices on seven altars, Balaam went alone to a bare height. There the word of the Lord came to him. He returned to Balak, and under the irresistible power of God blessed the people he had been invited to curse (xxiii. 1-12). Balak was disappointed, but held to the idea that, as long as Balaam saw but a part of the camp, perhaps he might be able to curse the Israelites. He took Balaam to the top of Pisgah and sacrificed as before; but the only result was fresh blessing instead of cursing (13-26). A third attempt was made from the top of Peor, on the ridge north of Nebo. Not merely was there blessing, but the utterance ended with the prophecy of a star out of Jacob, and a scepter out of Israel that should sway over Moab and Edom. Balak in anger dismissed Balaam without conferring on him the intended honor (xxiii. 27-xxiv. 25). Balaam, however, before quitting the country, suggested that if the Israelites could be seduced into the idolatry and the impurity of the worship practiced in Baal-peor, they would come under Jehovah's curse. The evil counsel was followed. In the war waged by the Israelites to execute vengeance on the Midianites for this deed, Balaam was slain (xxxi. 8, 16). Various other O. T. books and some of the N. T. writers refer to Balaam's character and fate (Deut. xxiii. 4, 5; Josh. xxiv. 9, 10; Neh. xiii. 2; Mic. vi. 5; 2 Pet. ii. 15; Jude 11; Rev. ii. 14).

Ba'lac. See BALAK.

Bal'a-dan [a son he hath given] The name is abbreviated by omission of the name of some god who bestowed the son.

Father of Merodach-baladan (Is. xxxix. 1).

Ba'lah. See BAALAH 3.

Ba'lak, in A. V. of N. T. Balac [emptying].

A Moabite king, son of Zippor, who lured Balaam from Pethor to curse Israel (Num. xxii.-xxiv.; Josh. xxiv. 9; Judg. xi. 25; Mic. vi. 4, 5; Rev. ii. 14).

Bald Locust.

The rendering of the Hebrew Sal'am, consumer. An unknown species of locust or grasshopper (Lev. xi. 22). There is nothing in the Hebrew etymology to suggest that the animal had a bald appearance.

Balm, Balm of Gilead.

The rendering of the Hebrew word Seri, ooze, a vegetable product obtained especially in Gilead (Gen. xxxvii. 25; Jer. viii. 22; xlv. 11), and exported from Palestine (Gen. xxxvii. 25; Ezek. xxvii. 17). It was used as an ointment for the healing of wounds (Jer. l. 8). It was once strongly believed, and still is by many, that the balm of Gilead was opobalsamum, a greenish-yellow oily resin of the consistency of honey, to which wonderful healing virtues were attributed. It came; from a tree, Balsamodendron opobalsamum or gileadense, belonging to the order Amyridaceæ (Amyride). It is from six to eight feet high. But the identification of the opobalsamum with the balm of Gilead is rendered doubtful by the fact that the tree producing it is not now found in Gilead, even in gardens, and there is no proof that it ever existed in that locality. It is a native of Arabia and Nubia, and hence is often called the balm of Mecca. On the margin of R. V (Gen. xxxvii. 25) the word is rendered by mastic. Pistacia lentiscus, a bushy evergreen tree, about twelve feet high. It grew in Palestine (Pliny 14, 25). The transparent, pale yellow, fragrant gum was used for incense and, when dissolved in water, as an ointment; while oil obtained from the bark, leaves, and berries was used as a medicine. Josephus mentions a plant bearing very precious balsam as cultivated at Jericho, but he does not give details sufficient for its identification (Antiq. xiv. 4, 1; xv. 4, 2; War i. 6, G). Nor can it be examined now, for it has been extinct, it is believed, since the time of the crusades.

Bal'sam Tree.

The rendering of Hebrew Baku' on the margin of Ps. lxxxiv. 6; 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chron. xiv. 14, 15 in R. V. The plant grew near Jerusalem. The Arabs apply the name to a bush which grows near Mecca, resembles the balsam (see BALM), and has a white, acrid sap.

Ba'mah [high place] (Ezek. xx. 29). See HIGH PLACES.

Ba'moth [high places].

An encampment of the Israelites north of the Arnon, probably an abbreviation of Bamoth-baal (Num. xxi. 19).

Ba'moth-ba'al [high places of Baal].

A place north of the Arnon, probably that at which the Israelites temporarily encamped, to which Balak took Balaam, and whence the plains of Moab were visible (Num. xxi. 19; xxii. 41 R. V. margin). It was within the limits of the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 17; where it is named between Dibon and Beth-baal-meon). It is believed to be one of the peaks of the long ridge of 'Attarus on the south bank of the Zerka Ma'in.

Ba'ni [built].

1. A Gadite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 36). Textual criticism is still unable to determine the text of this verse and of 1 Chron. xi. 38. One or both may need revision.

2. A descendant of Judah through Perez (1 Chron. ix. 4, R. V.).

3. Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 10). Some of them took foreign wives (x. 29). The family's representative sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 14). Called also Binnui (Neh. vii. 15).

4. A Levite of the family of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 46).

5. A Levite who lived before the return from exile, of the sons of Asaph and hence of the family of Gershom (Neh. xi. 22).

6. A Levite, father of Rehun (Neh. iii. 17); perhaps he who took a prominent part at the feast of tabernacles in Ezra's time (Neh. viii. 7; ix. 4, 5), and in behalf of his house sealed the covenant (x. 13).

7. A Levite (Neh. ix. 4). As the name is mentioned twice in ver. 4 and only once in ver. 5, it is perhaps once corrupt in ver. 4.

8. Founder of house or family (Ezra x. 34), among whose descendants was a person also named Bani (38).

Bank and Bank'er.

Not only was money loaned by a man to his neighbor as a private transaction, but money-lending was a regular business. The banker sat at his table (Luke xix. 23), received money on deposit, allowed interest on it (ibid., Mat. xxv. 27), and loaned it to others on pledge or mortgage (cp. Neh. v. 3, 4). A branch of the banking business was money-changing. For a small commission the broker exchanged money of one denomination for that of another, as shekels for the half-shekels needed to pay the temple tax; or gave coins current in the country for foreign money, as a Hebrew shekel for Roman denarii and Greek drachmas (Mark xi. 15; John ii. 15). See LOAN.

Bap'tism.

The rite of washing with water as a sign of religious purification and consecration. Among the Jews, as elsewhere, such washings were frequent; some prescribed in the O. T. (e. g. Ex. xxix. 4; xxx. 20; xl. 12; Lev. xv. 7; xvi. 26, 28; xvii. 15. xxii. 4, 6; Num. xix. 8) and others the product of later custom (see Mark vii. 3, 4; Heb. vi. 2). Many believe also that in Christ's time, as certainly was the case later, proselytes to Judaism were baptized. Hence John, the Forerunner, when sent to call Israel to repentance, was directed by God (John i. 33) to administer baptism to those who accepted his message. His rite is called "the baptism of repentance unto remission of sins" (Mark i 4, R. V.). Recipients of it thereby acknowledged their sins and professed their faith that through the coming Messiah they would be forgiven. Jesus sought baptism partly to express his sympathy with John's work, partly to dedicate himself to his own work, and partly to express his assumption of the sins of men. The mode of John's baptism is not described, but, as Jesus entered into the Jordan (Mark i 9, 10), it was probably by affusion or by immersion. At first Christ's disciples continued to baptize the people as John had done (John iv 1, 2), thus carrying on John's work, but after Christ's Galilean ministry began, we read of this no more. But in his parting instructions (Mat xxviii 19), Christ made baptism the initiatory rite of his Church, one of the two sacraments to be observed by his followers. Hence we find it from the first required and administered by the apostles and their co-laborers (Acts ii 38, 41, viii 12, 38; ix 18; x 48, 1 Cor i 14, 16, etc.). It signifies and seals a believer's union with Christ through repentance and faith; the removal of his sins by Christ's death and the Spirit's operation in him, and his engagement to be the Lord's (Rom vi. 4, Gal. iii. 27; Col ii. 11, 12; 1 Pet in 21). Christians have differed, even from early times, as to the mode of baptism. While the word is derived from a verb, baptizō, which means etymologically to immerse, this does not prove that immersion was the mode always practiced nor that it is necessary. In fact, instances occur where the word plainly does not mean immerse (e. g. Luke xi. 38, in English version "wash," and probably Mark vii. 4). The Scriptures nowhere describe, much less prescribe, the mode. In the post-apostolic times both immersion and affusion were used. The Eastern churches and the Protestant Baptists still practice immersion, the Latin Church generally uses affusion, while most Protestants use affusion or aspersion (sprinkling). Probably the mode varied even in apostolic times. According to Christ's command, it is to be administered in the name of the Trinity. Modern Baptists contend that baptism should only be administered to adult believers. The Church, however, from the earliest time has administered it also to children who have sponsors to care for their Christian nurture. It is certainly scriptural to do this to children of believers, since St. Paul expressly teaches (Gal iii 15-29) that believers in Christ are under the gracious provisions of the covenant which God made with Abraham. Under that covenant circumcision was administered to children as a sign of their participation in the relation in which their parents stood to God. The children of Christian believers have therefore a similar right to the ordinance which has replaced circumcision.

The phrase "baptized for the dead" (1 Cor xv 29) is difficult to explain. It probably either means "baptized with a view to the world of the dead into which we are going," or refers to a custom of baptizing one person in place of another who has died, a custom which Paul might cite for his argument without approving. G. T. P.

Bar-ab'bas [son of a father].

A robber who had made an insurrection in which he had committed murder. He was a notable prisoner when Jesus was arrested. Pilate, anxious that Jesus should be released, offered the Jews the option of releasing Jesus or Barabbas, and they chose Barabbas (Mat. xxvii 16, 17, 20, 21, 26).

Bar'a-chel [God has blessed].

A Buzite, father of Elihu, Job's friend (Job xxxii 2, 6).

Bar-a-chi'ah, in A. V. Barachias, the Greek modification of the Hebrew name [Jehovah hath blessed].

Father of that prophet, Zachariah, who was slain between the temple and the altar (Mat. xxiii 35). See ZACHARIAH.

Bar'ak [lightning].

An Israelite, belonging to the city of Kedesh-naphtali, who at the command of Deborah the prophetess called together 10,000 men of Naphtali and Zebulun, with whom he routed Sisera, Jabin's commander-in-chief, and destroyed his army (Judg. iv. 1-24: v. 1, 12; Heb xi. 32).

Bar-ba'ri-an.

1. Originally one who did not speak the Greek language. The phrase Hellenes and barbarians embraced all nations (cp. Rom. i. 14). There being nothing offensive in the word, the Romans and the Jews were content to be called barbarians.

2. Later, one who did not belong to the cultivated Hellenic race (cp. Col. iii. 11).

3 One who spoke an unintelligible foreign tongue (1 Cor. xiv. 11).

Bar-hu'mite.

Probably a misreading of Baharumite (2 Sam. xxiii 31 with 1 Chron. xi. 33).

Bar-ri'ah [fugitive].

A descendant of Shecaniah (1 Chron. iii. 22).

Bar-je'sus. See ELYMAS.

Bar-Jo'nah, in A. V. Bar-jona.

A surname of the apostle Peter (Mat. xvi. 17), probably meaning "son of John" (John i 42; xxi. 15-17, R V), for the Hebrew word from which John is derived is occasionally written in Greek in a form not distinguished from the Greek of Jonah (cp. various Greek texts of 2 Kin xxv. 23; 1 Chron. vi. 9, 10; xii. 12; xxvi 3; Ezra viii. 12; 1 Esdras ix. 1, 23).

Bar'kos [painter].

One of the Nethumim, who founded a family, members of which returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 53; Neh. vii 55).

Bar'ley.

A cereal grain, called by the Hebrews S'orah, the hairy, bristling thing, and by the Greeks Kuthai, and largely cultivated in Palestine (Ruth i. 22), Egypt (Ex. ix. 31), and the adjacent regions, and made into cakes or loaves (Judg. vii. 13; John vi. 9). The several barleys belong to the genus Hordeum. They are cereal grasses, with the spikelets, which are in threes, on opposite sides of the rachis or flower axis, so as to form a two-sided spike. Ten species are known, of which Tristram found six in Palestine, one of them, Hordeum athaburense, from mount Tabor, being peculiar to the Holy Land. That now cultivated in Palestine is chiefly Hordeum distichum, which has only the central floret fertile, the two side ones being abortive.

Bar'na-bas [son of prophecy, especially of prophesying which takes the form of exhortation or consolation].

The surname of Joses, a Levite of Cyprus, who, early converted to Christianity, sold his land and laid the price at the feet of the apostles in Jerusalem (Acts iv. 36, 37). When the Christians of Jerusalem were afraid to receive the new convert Paul, Barnabas spoke in his behalf, and removed their apprehensions (ix. 27). On the report reaching Jerusalem that Christians of Cyprus and Cyrene had been proclaiming the gospel with great success to Greeks as well as to Jews at Antioch of Syria, the Church sent Barnabas thither, and he aided in the work (xi. 19-24). From Antioch he went to Tarsus and brought back Saul (xi 22-26). Later the two were dispatched to carry alms to their brethren at Jerusalem, then suffering from famine (27-30). Returning with John Mark to Antioch (xii. 25), they were sent forth by the church on a mission to the gentiles (xiii 2). They visited Cyprus, and went thence to Perga, Antioch in Pisidia, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. At Lystra at Paul's command a cripple walked; and the inhabitants concluded that Barnabas was then supreme god Jupiter, and that Paul, since he was the chief speaker, was Mercury, the messenger of the gods (xiii. 3-xiv. 28). Having returned to Syria, they were sent by the church of Antioch to the council of Jerusalem. Barnabas spoke, as did Paul (xv 1, 2, 12). At the close the two were commissioned to carry the decrees of the council to the churches in Syria and Asia Minor (22-31). After further labors at Antioch (35), Paul proposed a second missionary journey. Barnabas desired to have with him his relative, John Mark (Col iv 10). Paul objected, as John Mark had withdrawn from the work on the former tour. After sharp contention, the two evangelists separated and went different ways. Barnabas with Mark sailed again to Cyprus, while Paul went on to Asia Minor (36-41). But their mutual affection did not cease. Paul, in his epistles, speaks in a friendly way of Barnabas (1 Cor ix 6. Gal ii. 1, 9, 13, Col iv 10), and yet more so of John Mark, about whom the quarrel arose (2 Tim iv 11).

Bar-sab'bas, in A. V. Bar'sa-bas [son of Sabba (?)]

1 The surname of the Joseph who stood candidate for the apostleship against Matthias (Acts i 23).

2 The surname of the Judas who was sent to Antioch as a delegate of the metropolitan church with Paul, Barnabas, and Silas (Acts xv. 22).

Bar-thol'o-mew [son of Tolmai].

One of the twelve apostles (Mat x. 3; Mark iii. 18, Luke vi 14; Acts i. 13). As in the first three of these passages the name of Bartholomew immediately follows that of Philip, and nearly does so in the fourth, Bartholomew was probably the surname of Nathanael, who was led to Christ by Philip (John i 45. 46).

Bar-ti-mæ'us [son of Timæus]

A blind man healed by Jesus at Jericho (Mark x 46).

Ba'ruch [blessed].

1. A scribe, member of the family of Neriah, and a friend of Jeremiah (Jer xxxvi. 26, 32; cp. Antiq. x. 9, 1). In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, he wrote the prophecies of Jeremiah at the prophet's dictation (xxxvi. 1-8). In the following year he publicly read them on the fast day (10), and afterwards before the princes, who took possession of the roll (14-20). The king, on hearing the opening sentences, burnt the roll and ordered the seizure of the prophet and the scribe, but they escaped (21-26). Baruch made a new copy with additions (xxxvi. 27-32). In the tenth year of Zedekiah, during the siege of Jerusalem, Jeremiah bought a field at Anathoth from his uncle and, being at the time a prisoner, placed the deed in the charge of Baruch and testified that the land should again be possessed by Israel (xxxiii. 6-16, 43, 44). Baruch was taken with Jeremiah to Egypt (Jer xliii. 1-7). For the book bearing the name of Baruch, see APOCRYPHA.

2. Son of Zabhai. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh iii 20). He is perhaps the person of that name who sealed the covenant (x. 6).

3. A man of Judah, of the Shilonite family (Neh xi. 5).

Bar-zil'la-i [made of iron].

1. A wealthy Gileadite of Rogelim, east of the Jordan. He showed David princely hospitality, sending him and his army food and other necessities while the fugitive king was at Mahanaim during Absalom's rebellion (2 Sam xvii 27-29). After the victory, Barzillai escorted David over the Jordan, and was invited to become a member of the king's household and court at Jerusalem, but he excused himself on account of his great age—eighty years. It was therefore arranged that his son Chimham should go in his stead (xix. 31-40).

2. A Meholahite, whose son Adriel married Saul's daughter Michal (2 Sam xxi 8).

3. A priest who married a daughter of Barzillai the Gileadite, and assumed his father-in-law's name (Ezra ii 61, Neh vii 63).

Bas'ca-ma.

A town east of the Jordan near which Jonathan Maccabæus was put to death, and where for a time he was buried (1 Mac xiii. 23; and Antiq. xiii. 6, 6, where it is called Basca).

Bas'e-math, in A. V. Bashemath, once Basmath (1 Kin iv 15) [fragrance].

1. One of Esau's wives, daughter of Elon the Hittite (Gen xxvi. 34); in xxxvi. 2 called Adah. See ADAB.

2. One of Esau's wives, a daughter of Ishmael and sister of Nebaioth (Gen xxxvi. 3, 4, 13, 17); in xxviii 9 called Mahalath.

3. A daughter of Solomon and wife of his tax collector for Naphtali (1 Kin. iv. 15).

Ba'shan [broad, open land].

A region east of the Jordan. Its location and extent in O. T. times is best learned from its cities. Within its bounds were Golan, north of the Yarmuk (Deut iv. 43), Edrei and Ashtaroth (Deut. i. 4), Salecah on the southern slope of the Jebel Hauran (Deut. iii. 10; Josh. xiii. 11, both R. V.). That is to say, it extended southeastwardly from the neighborhood of the upper Jordan to the border of the Arabian desert south of the Hauran mountain. It marched on the north with Geshur and Maacah (Josh. xii. 5; see ARAM), and contained "the region of the Argob," famous for sixty cities high-walled (Deut. iii. 4, 5; 1 Kin. iv. 13). So large a number is not incredible. In the mountainous parts of the country there are still at least one hundred deserted cities and villages, many of them built of basalt and with basaltic doors (Porter, Cities of Bashan). Josephus identifies Bashan with Gaulonitis and Batanea (Antiq. iv. 5, 3 with 1 Kin. iv. 13; and ix. 8, 1 with 2 Kin. x. 33). In the days of Abraham it was occupied by a people of especially large and powerful build, known as Rephaim (Gen. xiv. 5). The last king of this race was Og, who was defeated and slain at Edrei by the Israelites in the time of Moses (Num. xxi. 33-35, Deut. iii. 1-7). Bashan was assigned to the half tribe of Manasseh (Deut iii 13). It is a broad, fertile plateau, of volcanic formation, and well adapted for pasture. It was celebrated for its cattle (Ps xxii 12, Ezek xxxix 18; Amos iv 1), and for its breed of sheep (Deut xxxii. 14). It was celebrated also for its oak trees (Is ii 13; Ezek. xxvii 6, Zech xi 2). Forests of evergreen oak still survive.

Ba'shan-ha'voth-jai'r; rightly separated by R. V., which renders "he called them, even Bashan, after his own name, Havvoth-jair" (Deut. iii. 14). See HAVVOTH-JAIR.

Bash'e-math. See BASEMATH.

Bas'li-lisk.

The rendering of the R. V. of the Hebrew Sepha and Siph'oni, a venomous serpent living in a hole (Is xi 8). It deposits eggs, from which its young are hatched (lix. 5). It is insensible to the charmer's arts (Jer. viii 17). The marginal rendering is adder, except in Prov. xxiii 32, where adder is used in the text. Except in the last case, the A. V. translates the word by cockatrice.

Ba'sin, formerly spelled Bason.

A portable vessel for holding water for washing and other purposes (John xiii 5).

In the English version the word is used for bowls and dishes of various kinds, especially for—

1. A small vessel, in Hebrew 'Aqan (Is xxii. 24, rendered cup), used for wine (Song vii 2, rendered goblet) and other liquids (Ex xxiv. 6).

2. A shallow vessel, in Hebrew Saph, used for domestic purposes (2 Sam xvii 28) and to receive the blood of sacrifices (Ex xii 22). They were employed in the temple (Jer. lii. 19. R. V. cups; 2 Kin. xii. 13, A. V. bowl, R. V. cup).

3. A large bowl, in Hebrew Mizrak, used in the tabernacle and temple, especially in ministrations at the great altar (Num. iv. 14), to hold the meal offering (Num. vii. 13, rendered bowl), and to receive the blood of sacrifices (Zech. ix. 15 with xiv. 20, rendered bowl). It was made of gold, silver, or brass, and burnished (Ex. xxvii. 3; Num. vii. 84, rendered bowl; 1 Kin. vii. 45, 50). Revelers sometimes drank wine from such vessels (Amos vi. 6, rendered bowl).

Bas'ket.

Baskets of different sizes, shapes, and construction were in use, and various names were employed for them. As ancient sculptures and relics show, and as the etymology denotes, they were woven open or close, were made of the fiber or leaves of the palm tree or of rushes, reeds, twigs, or ropes, tapered at the top or at the bottom, were shallow or deep, ornamented with colors or plain, small enough to be carried in the hand, or so large that they were carried on the shoulder or head or borne on a pole between two men. They were employed for carrying fruit (Deut. xxvi. 2; Jer. vi. 9; xxiv. 2; Amos viii. 2, where in each passage a different Hebrew word is used); for carrying bread, cakes, and flesh (Gen. xl. 17; Ex. xxix. 2, 3; Lev. viii. 2; Judg. vi. 19; Mark viii. 19, 20, where still another Hebrew and two Greek names occur); for carrying clay to the brickyard and earth for the building of embankments (Ps. lxxxi. 6, R. V.; see illustration under EGYPT).

Bas'math. See BASEMATH.

Bat.

The rendering of the Hebrew word "tal-leph." It was classed with fowls, and was ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi. 13, 19; Deut. xiv. 11, 12, 18). It hides itself from observation in dark places (Is. ii. 20). The reference is pretty clearly to the bat order, of which Tristram enumerates seventeen species as occurring in Palestine. The bat is not a bird, but is a quadruped, covered with hair instead of feathers, having teeth instead of a bill, and sucking its young instead of laying eggs. Nor is its "wing" a flying apparatus of the bird type; it is an unfeathered membrane connecting the fore and hind legs.

Bath.

A Hebrew measure of capacity used for measuring liquids (1 Kin. vii. 26, 38; 2 Chron. ii. 10; iv. 5; Ezra vii. 22). It was the tenth part of an homer, and corresponds to the dry measure ephah in capacity (Ezek. xlv. 10, 11, 14).

Bath'ing.

In the warm climate of the East frequent bathing is a necessity. The daughter of Pharaoh bathed in the Nile (Ex. ii. 5). The Egyptians wore linen garments, constantly fresh-washed, and their priests washed themselves in cold water twice every day and twice every night (Herod. ii. 37). Egyptians, Hebrews, and Syrians washed the dust of the road from their feet when they tarried at a house (Gen. xviii. 4; xix. 2; xxiv. 32; xln. 24; John xiii. 10). If the Israelites contracted ceremonial defilement, they bathed the body and washed the raiment (Lev. xiv. 8; xv. 5; xvii. 15; Num. xix. 7, 8), either in running water (Lev. xiv. 13), at a fountain (Judith xii. 7, 9; cp. John ix. 7), in a river (2 Kin. v. 10), or at home in court or garden (2 Sam. xi. 2, 4; cp. Susanna 15). They washed and anointed themselves and put on their best garments for gala and court attire and on putting away mourning (Ex. xl. 12, 13; Ruth iii. 3; 2 Sam. xii. 20; Judith x. 3; Mat. vi. 17). The priests washed their hands and feet before entering the sanctuary or burning an offering on the altar (Ex. xxx. 19-21). The high priest bathed at his inauguration and on the day of atonement before each act of propitiation (Lev. viii. 6; xvi. 4, 24). In the time of Christ, the Jews washed their hands before eating, and washed or sprinkled themselves on coming from the market (Mark vii. 3, 4). At this time also, when Greek and Roman customs had gained entrance among the Jews, there were public baths. The warm springs at Tiberias, Gadara, and Callirrhoe, near the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, were resorted to for health (Antiq. xvii. 6, 5; xviii. 2, 3). The fish ponds connected with the palace at Jericho were used for bathing and swimming (Antiq. xv. 3, 3).

Bath-rab'bim [daughter of many people].

One of the gates of Heshbon (Song vii. 4).

Bath-she'ba [daughter of an oath]

Daughter of Elham, and wife of Uriah the Hittite, thus perhaps the daughter of one, as she was the wife of another, of David's mighty men. She is the woman with whom David so shamefully sinned, and who, after the removal of her husband, became the wife of David and mother of Solomon (2 Sam. xi. 3, 4; xii. 24, 1 Kin. i. 11). When Adonijah was preparing to usurp the kingdom, Bath-sheba, supported by the prophet Nathan, appealed to David in favor of her own son Solomon, the result being that Adonijah's enterprise was thwarted (1 Kin. i. 11-53), and himself ultimately put to death (i. 13-25).

Bath'-shu-a [daughter of riches or salvation]

1. The daughter of Shua (as the name is rendered in A. V.) and wife of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 3; see Gen. xxxviii. 2, 12, both R. V.).

2. The text of 1 Chron. ii. 5 refers to the mother of Solomon as Bath-shua, the daughter of Ammel. Bath-shua is probably merely a misreading of Bath-sheba, due to a partial effacement of the Hebrew letter beth. The Septuagint has here the usual form for Bath-sheba.

Bav'vai, in A. V. Ba'vai.

A son of Henadad, who superintended the repair of part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 18).

Ba'yith, in A. V. Bajith [the house]. The Hebrew text has the definite article.

A Moabite town or temple (Is. xv. 2).

Bay Tree.

The rendering in the A. V. of the Hebrew 'Ezrah' in Ps. xxxvii. 35. The plant referred to by the translators is Laurus nobilis, a tree thirty, forty, or more feet high, with lance-shaped evergreen aromatic leaves, inconspicuous flowers, and cherry-like fruits. Tristram met with it on Carmel, Tabor, and in Gilead. The R. V. renders 'Ezrah' "a green tree in its native soil," which, of course, tends to flourish better than a transplanted and, perhaps, a sickly exotic. The same Hebrew word used in Lev. xvi. 29; xviii. 26, for a native

as distinguished from a man from another country

Baz'lith or Baz'luth [nakedness]. Either form is in itself legitimate.

One of the Nethinim and founder of a family, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 52; Neh. vii. 54)

Bdell'ium.

The rendering of the Hebrew B'dolah, a substance of the same color as manna (Num. xi. 7), and found like gold and the onyx stone or the beryl in the land of Havilah (Gen. ii. 12). The Greeks gave the name bdellion to a transparent, waxy, fragrant gum obtained from a tree in Arabia, Babylonia, India, and Media. The best came from Bactria. As gold, the onyx, and the beryl, belong to the mineral kingdom, bdolah may perhaps also. The Septuagint translates it in Gen. ii. 12 anthrax, the carbuncle, ruby, and garnet, and in Num. xi. 7, kristallos, rock crystal.

Be-a-li'ah [Jehovah is Lord]

A Benjamite warrior who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5)

Be'a-loth [literally mistresses, possessors]

1 A village in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 24). Site unknown.

2 A locality in the vicinity of the tribe of Asher, perhaps known by this name (1 Kin. iv. 16, R. V.). See ALOTH.

Bean.

Beans were used for food (2 Sam. xvii. 28), and occasionally, especially during famine, were mixed with grain and made into a coarse bread (Ezek. iv. 9). The common bean, Vicia faba, is still known in Palestine by the O. T. name for bean.

Bear.

The Syrian bear (Ursus syriacus) is of a yellowish-brown color, and, unless pressed by necessity, lives chiefly on vegetable food. But all bears are dangerous when meddled with (Is. xi. 7; Amos v. 19), especially when robbed of their whelps (2 Sam. xvii. 8; Prov. xvii. 12; Hosea xiii. 8). Though now almost confined to Lebanon, on the west of the Jordan, and Hermon, Gilend, and Bashan, on the east of the river, it anciently roamed over the land (cp. Prov. xxviii. 15). David killed one in the vicinity of Bethlehem (1 Sam. xvii. 34), and near Bethel two she bears, which came out of the woods, tore in pieces forty-two young persons who mocked Elisha (2 Kin. ii. 24).

The bear of Dan. vii. 5, commissioned to devour much flesh, was the Medo-Persian empire, one of four successive empires of the world. The four beasts of Daniel are combined in one beast in Rev. xiii. 2, to symbolize all the power of the world. The feet are bear's feet.

For the constellation Bear, see under ARCTURUS.

Beard.

The beard was cherished as the badge of manly dignity. Its neglect was an outward sign of mental aberration (1 Sam. xxi. 13) or of affliction (2 Sam. xix. 24). As a mark of mourning it was customary to pluck it out or cut it off (Ezra ix. 3; Is. xv. 2; Jer. xli. 5; Herod. ii. 36). The king of the Ammonites grievously insulted David's ambassadors when, among other acts, he shaved off one half of their beards (2 Sam. x. 4, 5; cp. Herod. ii. 121, 4). The ancient Egyptians shaved the head and the face, but often wore a false beard. They let the hair and beard grow as a sign of mourning (Herod. ii. 36). Hence Joseph, when released from prison, shaved the beard in order to appear before Pharaoh (Gen. xli. 14). The practice of shaving off the corners of the beard (Lev. xix. 27; Jer. ix. 26; xxv. 23, both R. V.) was probably a heathenish sign, as the Arabs shaved the side of the face between the ear and the eye in honor of their god Orotal (Herod. in. 8).

Beast.

1. A mammal, not man, as distinguished from a fowl of the air and a creeping thing (Gen. i. 29, 30). The wild beasts are distinguished from domesticated animals (Lev. xxvi. 22; Is. xiii. 21, 22; xxxiv. 14; Jer. l. 39, Mark i. 13).

2. Any of the inferior animals, including reptiles and birds, as distinguished from man (Ps. cxlviii. 9; Eccl. iii. 19, Acts xxviii. 5). In this sense there was a distinction drawn under the Mosaic law between ceremonially clean and unclean beasts.

3. Figuratively, a fierce destructive power. Four successive empires, beginning with the Babylonian, are thus symbolized in Dan. vii. The four beasts, combined into a composite monster, represent the power of the world in Rev. xiii. 1-10, with its seat transferred from Babylon to Rome, xvi. 3-18. A beast with lamb's horns represents false prophecy (xiii. 11-18), which is a ravaging wolf in sheep's clothing. The beasts of Rev. iv. 6-9 of the A. V. are very properly altered to "living creatures" in the R. V.

Be'bai.

The founder of a family, some of whose members returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 11; vii. 11, Neh. vii. 16).

Be'cher [young camel].

1. A son of Benjamin (Gen. xli. 21; 1 Chron. vii. 6). His descendants were apparently too few at the beginning to form a tribal family, at least they found no place in the registry of families (Num. xxvi. 38; 1 Chron. viii. 1-6), but they ultimately increased to nine fathers' houses, inhabiting Anathoth and other towns in the territory of Benjamin and mustering 20,200 men (1 Chron. vii. 8, 9).

2. A son of Ephraim, and founder of a family (Num. xxvi. 35; reference to Becher lacking in the Septuagint). He is not mentioned among the sons of Ephraim in 1 Chron. vii. 20-27. Perhaps the children of Becher the Benjamite were not so few in numbers during the sojourn in Egypt as has been supposed, but were principally identified with Ephraim, perchance through a marriage of Becher with Sheerah, and hence their family as a whole, but not all the fathers' houses, were enrolled with Ephraim.

Be-co'rath, in A. V Be-cho'rath [primo-geniture]

A Benjamite, an ancestor of king Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1).

The identification of Becorath with Becher (1 Chron. vii. 6) is groundless. Becorath was son of Aphiah, the son of a Benjamite, whereas Becher was the son of Benjamin himself.

Bed.

An article of domestic furniture to sleep upon. The poor and travelers often slept on the ground, using their upper garment as a covering (Gen. xxviii. 11; Ex. xxii. 26). A bed might be no more than a rug or mat, easily bundled up and carried away (Mat. ix. 6). But beds raised from the ground were early in existence (2 Kin. i. 4, 6, iv. 10), with bedsteads of wood, or of iron (Deut. iii. 11), or among the wealthy of ivory (Amos vi. 4), with silken cushions (Amos iii. 12, R. V) and rich coverings (Prov. vii. 16; Judith x. 21).

Be'dad [separation]

The father of Hadad, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 35; 1 Chron. i. 46).

Be'dan.

Apparently a Hebrew judge, ruling between Gideon and Jephthah, and distinguished enough to rank with them and with Samuel (1 Sam. xii. 11). No such personage is mentioned in the Book of Judges. Four theories have been proposed in explanation. 1. Bedan ruled Israel, though no record of his administration is found in the Book of Judges. 2. Bedan means in Dan, or is a contraction of Ben-Dan, son of Dan, and is equivalent to Samson. Better is 3. Bedan is the judge Jair; for a person called Bedan is registered in 1 Chron. vii. 14-17 as a descendant of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh; and Jair the judge was a Gileadite, and belonged to the villages named from Jair, a descendant of Machir (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22). Bedan's descent from Manasseh differed from that of Jair who captured and named the villages; but this fact does not prevent Bedan from representing the descendants and the district of Jair the conqueror, and being officially called Jair. Best is 4. Bedan is an early misreading for either Abdon (Judg. xii. 13) or for Barak, which is found in the Septuagint, Syriac and Arabic versions (cp. Heb. xi. 32).

Be-de'lah.

A son of Bani, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 35).

Bee.

An insect which makes honey (Judg. xiv.

8, 18). It is compared to an army (Is. vii. 18) chasing man (Deut. i. 44), or surrounding him (Ps cxviii. 12). As Canaan was a land flowing with milk and honey (Ex. iii. 8; cp. Gen. xlii. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17), bees must have been there in large numbers. Their nests were in rocks (Ps lxxxi. 16) and in woods (1 Sam. xiv. 25), especially in Judah (Ezek. xxvii. 17; cp. Mat. iii. 4).

Be-e-li'a-da [the Lord hath known, i. e. kindly regarded]

A son of king David, born at Jerusalem (1 Chron. xiv. 7). During his lifetime he may have been called by the alternate name Elhada. God hath known; at any rate, when the word Baal became distasteful on account of idolatrous associations, the Hebrew historians were apt to write Elhada instead of Beelhada (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. iii. 8).

Be-el'ze-bub.

The prince of the demons (Mat. x. 25. xii. 24; Mark iii. 22; Luke xi. 15, 18, 19), whom Jesus identifies with Satan (Mat. xii. 26. Mark iii. 23, Luke xi. 18). The spelling Beelzebub differs but slightly from Baalzebub, god of Ekron. The Greek text however, has Beelzebub. The common explanation is that, with the view of insulting the Ekronite god and his worshippers, the Jews wished to make z'bul, fly, into zibbul or zebel, dung. But as in Hebrew z'bul means habitation, Baalzebub may signify lord of the habitation, and the notion of insult falls to the ground. Jesus played upon this meaning of the name in Mat. x. 25. The notion of insult also falls on the plausible supposition that Beelzebub was merely a Greek modification of Beelzebub, adopted because the pronunciation was for the Greeks easier to the tongue and more pleasant to the ear.

Be'er [a well].

1. A station of the Israelites on the confines of Moab, at which a well was dug by the leaders of Israel with their staves or under their official supervision (Num. xxi. 16-18); possibly the same as Beer-elim.

2. A place to which Jotham fled from his brother Abimelech (Judg. ix. 21). Situation unknown. Eusebius discriminates it from Beeroth in Benjamin, and locates it eight Roman miles to the north of Eleutheropolis, i. e. Beit Jibrin, in the maritime plain. But Josephus says that Jotham fled to the mountains (Antiq. v. 7, 2).

Be-e'ra [a well].

An Asherite, family of Heber (1 Chron. vii. 37).

Be-e'rah [a well].

A prince of the Reubenites, who was carried captive by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria (1 Chron. v. 6).

Be'er-e'lim [well of heroes or of trees].

A village of Moab (Is. xv. 8); possibly the same as BEER I.

Be-e'ri [man of a well].

1 A Hittite, father of Judith, one of Esau's wives (Gen. xxvi 34). See ANAH

2 Father of the prophet Hosea (Hos i 1)

Be'er-la-hai'-roi [the well of the Living One who seeth me].

The name given by Hagar to a well in the desert between Kadesh and Bered, pointed ence of the word seven in the name was a constant reminder that a covenant had been sworn to.

A well dug by Abraham in the wilderness adjacent to the Philistine country and where he and the king of Gerar made a covenant not to molest each other. This well had already been an object of strife between their

'Ain Muweileh, the traditional Beer-lahai-roi out to her by an angel when she and her son Ishmael were in danger of perishing from thirst (Gen xvi 10-15, xxiv 62; xxv 11). The Bedouin connect 'Ain Muweileh, at the eastern foot of Jebel Muweileh, a few miles west of Kadesh, on the caravan route to Egypt, with Hagar. (See illustration, p 75.)

Be-e'roth [wells].

1 A Gibeonite town (Josh ix 17), afterwards assigned to the Benjamites (xviii 25, 2 Sam iv 2). It continued to be inhabited after the captivity (Ezra ii. 25, Neh. vii 29). It still exists in the village el-Birch, a little more than 8 miles north of Jerusalem on the way to Bethel. It is built on a ridge running west to east, and is seen from a distance toward both the north and south. Many large stones and various substructions testify to the antiquity of the site.

2 Beeroth of the children of Jaakan, wells on the borders of Edom, belonging to the tribe of Jaakan, by which the Israelites encamped on their way to Canaan (Deut. x. 6). See JAAKAN.

Be-e'roth-ite, once Berothite.

A native or inhabitant of Beeroth (2 Sam iv. 2; xxiii. 37; 1 Chron xi 39)

Be'er-she'ba [well of seven]. The prespective herdsmen. Accordingly Abraham gave Abimelech seven ewe lambs as a witness of the Hebrew title, and to further preserve the memory of the transaction, called the well Beer-sheba (Gen xxi. 22-32). He also planted there a tamarisk tree, and called on the name of Jehovah, the everlasting God (33, R. V.). Abraham resided for many years at this place. Then he went to Hebron, and afterwards sojourned at Beer-lahai-roi. During the absence of the Hebrews from this part of the wilderness, the Philistines filled up the wells, but when Isaac came into authority he returned to this district and began to reopen them. While at Beer-sheba, engaged in clearing out that well also, the king of Gerar came and made a covenant with him, as he or his predecessor had done with Abraham. The Philistine and his companions had scarcely departed, when Isaac's servants announced that they had reached water. As in former like cases, Isaac piously revived the old name, calling the well Shibah, the feminine form of the numeral sheba, thus confirming and preserving the name Beer-sheba (xxvi 32, 33, R. V.). It was from this well that Jacob started on his journey to Haran (xxviii. 10), and there he sacrificed on his way to Egypt (xlii 1-5). A town ultimately rose in the vicinity of the well (Josh. xv. 28). It was situated in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 28; 2 Sam. xxiv. 7; 2 Kin. xxiii. 8), though allotted to the Simeonites (Josh. xix. 1, 2; 1 Chron. iv. 28), and was also the southern limit of Palestine, so that the expression became proverbial, "from Dan to Beer-sheba," i. e. from the extreme north to the extreme south of the Holy Land (Judg. xx. 1 et pas.). Samuel's sons were judges in Beer-sheba (1 Sam. viii. 2). Elijah passed through it on his way to Horeb (1 Kin. xix. 3). It was inhabited after the captivity which it moves like a cedar. It is amphibious, sometimes feeding with other quadrupeds upon the mountains, and sometimes lying in fens, among reeds, or under willows or apparently in flooded rivers (Job xl. 15-24; R. V. margin "hippopotamus"). It is probably the hippopotamus of the Nile (Hippopotamus amphibius). This has an unwieldy body eleven or twelve feet long, a large clumsy head, short stout legs, with four feet bearing toes. The gape of its mouth is enormous and the tusks of formidable size. It feeds on green corn, grass, and young shrubs.

Beer-sheba

(Neh. xi. 27, 30). Edward Robinson found two deep wells, still called Bir es-Seba', on the northern side of a wide watercourse or bed of a torrent, wady es-Seba'. And several others have since been discovered. The larger of the wells described by Robinson was found to be 12½ feet in diameter and 44½ deep, to the surface of the water, 16 feet at the lower part being cut through solid rock.

Be-esh'te-rah [house or temple of Astarte].

The same place as Ashtarothe (cp Josh. xxi. 27 with 1 Chron. vi. 71). This contraction of Beth-ashterah is like that of Beth-shan to Beisan.

Bee'tle. See CRICKET

Be'he-moth [probably derived from Egyptian p-he-mau, water ox, and modified by the Hebrews into b'hemoth, a plural of excellence denoting an animal which possesses in a high degree the attributes of b'hemah, a beast].

A large animal described by Job. It eats grass like an ox. Its body is thick and massive, with bones like bars of iron, and a tail

In ancient times it descended the Nile; but it was hunted for its valuable skin, teeth, and flesh, and it was also taken in considerable numbers to Rome for exhibition in the circus. Now, therefore, these animals are extinct in Egypt, though found on the Upper Nile.

Be'ka, in A. V. Be'kah [division, half].

Half a shekel (Ex. xxxviii. 26). The value was about 16.8 pence or 33 cents. It was used for weighing the precious metals (Gen. xxiv. 22). See WEIGHTS.

Bel [lord]

Title of the patron god of Babylon (Is. xlv. 1; Jer. 1. 2; Is. 44; Bel and Dragon 3-22; Herod. i. 181), whose proper name was Marduk or, as pronounced by the Hebrews, Merodach. He was a sun-god, the sun of early day and of spring, and he was regarded as the son of Ea, god of the ocean and other terrestrial waters. His festival was celebrated in the spring, at the beginning of the year. Because the sun in this aspect exerts such potent influence in nature, and because he was their tutelary divinity, the men of Babylon paid him supreme worship and ascribed to him the loftiest attributes. He was not originally numbered among the chief gods by the people on the lower Tigris and Euphrates, but grew in importance with the increasing power and renown of the city of Babylon.

Another Bel, god of the region between earth and sky, and grouped in a triad with Anu, heaven, and Ea, was one of the eleven great gods.

Be'la, in A. V. once Be'lah (Gen. xli. 21) [devouring, destruction].

1 A king of Edom, whose father's name was Beor (Gen. xxxvi. 32).

2 A Reubenite chief (1 Chron. v. 8).

3 A son of Benjamin, and founder of a family (Gen. xli. 21; Num. xxvi. 38).

4 One of the cities of the plain, the same as Zoar (Gen. xiv. 2, 8).

Be'li-al [worthlessness, wickedness].

Ungodliness (Ps. xxviii. 4, R. V.). The phrase "men of belial" is a Semitic circumlocution, in default of the appropriate adjective, for ungodly men (Deut. xiii. 13). Belial is personified in 2 Cor. vi. 15.

Bell.

Small golden bells, alternating with ornaments in the form of pomegranates, were attached to the lower part of the official blue robe of the high priest in order to send forth a sound that might be heard in the temple for a memorial of the children of Israel, that he die not (Ex. xxviii. 33, 34; Eccles. xiv. 9). A string of flat pieces of brass was hung around the neck of horses, or a single bell was suspended from their throat (Zech. xiv. 20, cp. Judg. viii. 21). In either case the tinkling kept the horses together at night, and made it easy to find a strayed beast.

Bel'lovs.

An instrument for blowing the fire of a smelting furnace (Jer. vi. 29; Isai. xlviii. 470). As used by the ancient Egyptians the bellows consisted of a pair of leather bags, fitted into a frame, from each of which a pipe extended to the fire. They were worked by the feet, the operator standing upon them with one under each foot, and pressing them alternately while he pulled up the exhausted skin with a string which he held in his hand. A double pair was used for each furnace.

Bel-shaz'zar [Babylonian Bel-shar-usur, Bel protect the king].

A king of the Chaldeans, who reigned a part at least of three years (Dan. vii. 1), apparently as co-regent of his father (v. 16, 29, by implication), and was slain on a memorable night (30). According to contemporary Babylonian records, he was the eldest son of Nabuna'id and grandson of Nabubelatsukbi, the wise prince and mighty potentate (1 R. 68 No. 4; 69, ii. 26; V R. 63, i. 16; 65, i. 9). The Babylonian queen, probably Nabuna'id's wife, and Belshazzar himself, and Daniel his contemporary speak of Nebuchadnezzar as Belshazzar's father (v. 11, 13), and his father Nabuna'id, speaking of himself, mentions "the king, his fathers." It is quite possible that Belshazzar was descended, through his mother at least, from Nebuchadnezzar, but the words spoken of Belshazzar that might at court may also be explained by the broad usage of the word father for a predecessor in the same office. Nebuchadnezzar speaks of Naramsin, who reigned three thousand years before him, as "the king, the ancient father," although doubtless no blood relationship existed between them. Sargon, king of Assyria, like Nabuna'id a usurper, speaks of being endowed with understanding beyond "the kings, my fathers" (Cylinder 48). Delegates from the Ionian cities urged Seleucus Nicator to adhere to the policy of his "ancestors," progonoi, although but one ancestor of his sat upon the throne (Bevan, House of Seleucus, I. 161). In the court parlance of the day Belshazzar was Nebuchadnezzar's son, politically his descendant, his successor on the throne.

In 555 B. C., the first year of his father's reign, he was occupying a house in Babylon; and had taken into his own establishment, it would seem, two at least of the servants who had belonged to the household of the late king Nergal-sharusur. During the years that his father remained in Tema, Belshazzar was with the army which was quartered in the district of Accad, to the north of Babylon and on the southern frontier of Assyria (Annals ii. 5-23). The king's son, as his title uniformly is, not only had nominal or actual command of the troops, but also represented his father in certain religious, administrative, and domestic duties. Not far from the military camp in Accad was the city of Sippar; and again and again the documents certify to his gift of sheep and oxen to the temples at Sippar as an offering of the king, and even of a tongue of gold as a present to the sun-god.

The inscriptions which were written at Ur by order of Nabuna'id to commemorate his restoration of the temple of the moon-god are peculiar and significant because the king, after praying for himself, invariably adds a petition for Belshazzar. "As for me, Nabuna'id king of Babylon, deliver me from sin against thy great divine nature and grant unto me length of days. And concerning Belsharusur my firstborn, the offspring of my body, his heart also fill thou with awe of thy great divinity, that he may never indulge in sins. With abundance of days let him be satisfied."

The Persians under Cyrus' general Ugbaru, written Gubaru also, entered Babylon on the 16th day of Tammuz, the fourth month, 539 B. C. They boasted that they had taken the city without a battle. Nabuna'id was seized, and a guard of shield-bearers was stationed at the gates of the great sanctuary Esaggila for two weeks (Annals iii. 16, 17). The city was held by a foreign army, but the commercial documents of the time indicate no interruption of business and no feeling of financial insecurity. Property was bought and sold at Babylon and the transactions were duly recorded; money was loaned, bills payable were given, and houses were taken as security. Documents continued even to be dated by the regnal year of Nabuna'id, notwithstanding his arrest. Indeed, it would seem that beyond the restriction of Nabuna'id's liberty, the royal family was not molested nor its goods seized. Belshazzar even made a gift of money out of the king's substance to the sun-god at Sippar. It was not until the third day of the eighth month that Cyrus made his triumphal entry into Babylon (Annals iii 18), and in the princely palace placed the seat of sovereignty (Cylinder 23). About a week later, on the night of the eleventh, an important event took place. The inscription is slightly defaced, and several of the written characters are rendered doubtful; but recent expert opinion declares that the word son is clear and certain (Pinches, Delitzsch, Hagen). On this reading the record states that "on the eleventh of Machesvan, in the night, Gubaru upon . . . killed the son of the king." On that night, then, Belshazzar was slain. No bodily injury was done to his father Nabuna'id. On the contrary, according to Berossus, although Nabuna'id was deprived of the crown and deported from Babylonia, he was kindly treated by Cyrus, who granted him estates in Carmania, in southern Persia (contra Apion 1 20), and endowed him with the government of the province (Eusebius, Chron. i. 10, 3). The feast which Belshazzar gave to a thousand men of rank (Dan v. 1) took place, on this reading of the text, earlier in the evening of the eleventh of Machesvan. To judge from the contemporary records, it was quite possible for Belshazzar, after the city was occupied by the Persian troops, to give a great banquet, and to obtain cups of gold and silver for the purpose out of the storehouse in the temple of Marduk (v. 2: Ezra i. 7). Perhaps conspiracy was the motive of the feast. See CYRUS and DANIEL.

Bel-te-shaz'zar [Babylonian, Balatsu-usur, protect his life]. The name is abbreviated by omitting the name of the deity invoked.

The name given by the prince of the Babylonian eunuchs to the prophet Daniel (Dan i. 7). Bel, the god of Nebuchadnezzar, was the deity invoked in the name (iv. 8).

Ben [son].

A Levite (1 Chron. xv. 18), but probably the name has erroneously crept into the text, cp. 20, 21.

Ben-a-bin'a-dab [son of Abinadab]

Son-in-law of Solomon and his purveyor in the region of Dor (1 Kin. iv. 11, R. V.).

Be-na'iah [Jehovah hath built].

1. A Levite, the son of Jehoiada of Kabzeel in Judah (2 Sam. xxiii. 20). His father was a priest (1 Chron. xxvii. 5). If the title here denotes a minister at the altar, Benaiah's father was probably the leader of the priests who joined the army which placed David on the throne (xii 27). Benaiah was a valiant man, celebrated for having descended into a pit and killed a lion, for having slain two lion-like men of Moab, and, when armed only with a staff, for having met an Egyptian giant, wrested away his spear, and killed him with his own weapon (2 Sam. xxiii 20, 21; 1 Chron. xi. 22, 23). He was over the Cherethites and Pelethites, David's bodyguard (2 Sam. viii. 18), and also commanded the military division for the third month (1 Chron. xxvii 5, 6). He with the bodyguard remained faithful to David during Absalom's rebellion (cp. 2 Sam. xv 18; xx 23) and that of Adonijah (1 Kin. i 10). By David's order he, at the head of the guard, escorted Solomon to Gihon, to be anointed king (3s), and as chief of the guard he executed Adonijah (ii 25), Joab (29-31), and Shimei (46). The death of Joab having left the office of commander-in-chief vacant, Benaiah was promoted to the same (35).

2. A Pirathonite, one of David's thirty mighty men of the second rank (2 Sam. xxiii 30, 1 Chron. xi 31). He commanded the military division for the eleventh month (xxvii 14).

3. A Levite of the second degree who played the psaltery before the ark when it was escorted to Jerusalem, and afterwards in the tabernacle erected by David (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20; xvi 5).

4. A priest who blew a trumpet in the company which escorted the ark to Jerusalem and afterwards in David's tabernacle (1 Chron. xv. 24, xvi 6).

5. A Levite, descended from Asaph, and living before the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx 14).

6. A Simeonite possibly a contemporary of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv 36, cp. 41).

7. A Levite, an overseer of dedicated offerings in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi 13).

8. Father of Ezekiel's contemporary, prince Pelatiah (Ezek. xi 1, 13).

9-12. Four men, sons of Parosh, Pahath-moab, Bani, and Nebo, respectively, who were induced by Ezra to put away their strange wives (Ezra x 25, 30, 35, 45).

Ben-am'mi [son of my people; a circumlocution for my kinsman, and equivalent to Ammon, kin].

Son of Lot's younger daughter, from whom sprang the Ammonite tribe (Gen. xix. 38).

Ben-de'ker [son of Deker]

Solomon's purveyor in Bethshemesh and some other towns (1 Kin. iv. 9, R. V.).

Ben'e-be'rak [sons of Berak]

A town of Dan (Josh. xix. 45), now Ibn Ibrak, 4 miles east of Jaffa.

Ben'e-ja-a-kan. See JAAKAN.

Ben-ge'ber [son of Geber]

Solomon's purveyor in Ramoth-gilead (1 Kin iv. 13, R. V.).

Ben-ha'dad [son of Hadad, the supreme god of Syria] See HADAD

The name of three kings ruling at Damascus

1 Benhadad, son of Tabrimmon and grandson of Hezion. When Baasha, king of Israel, built Ramah to blockade the entrance into Judah from the north, Asa, king of Judah, hired Benhadad to break his treaty with Baasha and invade the kingdom of Israel. The army of Benhadad entered the territory of the ten tribes, captured the cities of Ijon, Dan, and Abel-maacah, and ravaged the land west of the lake of Genesaret. The diversion caused Baasha to withdraw from Ramah and terminate the blockade of the kingdom of Judah (1 Kin. xv 18-21; 2 Chron. xvi 1-6).

2 Benhadad, contemporary of Ahab. His full name appears to have been Benhadadidri, the son of Hadad is my help. He besieged Samaria, but drove Ahab to desperation and forced him to battle by insulting demands, and was defeated. The next year Benhadad renewed the war but sustained a still heavier defeat than on the previous occasion. Ahab granted him conditions of peace, making a covenant with him and letting him go (1 Kin. xx 1-34). The arrival of a common enemy, Shalmaneser king of Assyria, in the west in 856 B. C. necessitated the preservation of the peace, and it continued three years (1 Kin. xxii 1). In 854 Benhadad, assisted by Ahab and other royal allies, offered resistance to the Assyrians at Karkar near Hamath, but was defeated. In the following year, as is probable, in early spring Ahab unsuccessfully attempted to wrest Ramoth-gilead out of the hands of Benhadad (xxii 1-36). For some time Benhadad waged predatory warfare with the Israelites, and later he invaded Israel with his army and laid siege to Samaria (2 Kin. v 2, vi 8-vii 20), but these varied hostilities were repeatedly interrupted by Shalmaneser's operations against Benhadad in the years 850, 849, and 846. Between 845 and the close of 843, Benhadad was murdered and succeeded by Hazael (2 Kin. viii. 15).

3 Benhadad, son of Hazael, and called by the murdered king's name. In the reign of Jehoahaz, king of Israel, Hazael and then Benhadad oppressed the ten tribes (2 Kin. xii. 3-13). But Joash, son of Jehoahaz, inflicted three defeats on Benhadad, and recovered the cities of Israel which had been under Syrian rule (22-25). His son, Jeroboam II., followed up these victories by retaking Hamath, and even temporarily occupying Damascus (xiv. 28).

The palaces of Benhadad are the palaces of Damascus (Jer. xlix. 27; Amos i. 4).

Ben-ha'il [son of strength, virtuous]

One of the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 7).

Ben-ha'nán [son of the kind one]

A son of Shimon, registered with the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

Ben-he'sed [son of benevolence or of Hese]]

Solomon's purveyor in Aruboth (1 Kin. iv. 10, R. V.)

Ben'hur [son of Hur]

Solomon's purveyor in mount Ephraim (1 Kin. iv. 8, R. V.)

Be-ni'nu [our son]

A Levite who with Nehemiah and others sealed a covenant with Jehovah (Neh. x. 13)

Ben'ja-min [son of the right hand, i. e. of happiness]

1. The youngest of Jacob's twelve sons. He was the full brother of Joseph both being children of Rachel. As Jacob was approaching Bethlehem, Rachel gave birth to Benjamin, and, feeling that his advent into the world was about to cost her her life, named him Benoni son of my sorrow, but Jacob called him Benjamin (Gen. xxxv. 16-20). Being the youngest, and associated with such memories, he was peculiarly dear to his father, especially after the supposed death of Joseph. With excessive reluctance his parent allowed him to go to Egypt with his other brothers (Gen. xlii. 1-17) and Judah was probably right in supposing that the father would die of grief if any untoward occurrence happened to the son of his old age. Joseph also felt much affection for Benjamin (xliii. 29-34, xlv. 1-4). Ultimately Benjamin had, besides other descendants, five sons and two grandsons, through whom he became the founder of families and a tribe in Israel (Gen. xlii. 21, Num. xxvi. 38-41, 1 Chron. vii. 6-12, viii).

2. The tribe to which Benjamin gave origin and the territory that it obtained. Jacob prophesied: "Benjamin is a wolf that raveth. In the morning he shall devour the prey, and at even he shall divide the spoil" (Gen. xlix. 27, R. V.), and Moses: "The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him. He covereth him all the day long and he dwelleth between his shoulders" (Deut. xxxiii. 12, R. V.). In the distribution of the land by lot under Joshua at Shiloh, after Judah and Ephraim had received territory, the first lot came to Benjamin, who was assigned the district lying between those of Judah and Ephraim. Its northern boundary ran from Jordan through Bethel to Ataroth-addar, south of nether Bethhoron. Its western border ran from this point to Kirjath-jearim. Its southern boundary went thence through the valley of the son of Hinnom, immediately south of Jerusalem, to the northern point of the Dead Sea. Its eastern limit was the Jordan (Josh. xviii. 11-20). The territory thus marked out extended from west to east about 28 miles, and from north to south about 12 miles. It was a hilly country, but extremely fertile (Antiq. v. 1, 22) and it was studded with towns, the chief of which were Jerusalem, Jericho, Bethel, Gibeon, Gibeath, and Mizpeh (Josh. xviii. 21-28). The tribe early furnished Israel with a deliverer from foreign oppression (Judg. iii. 15). The tribe was nearly exterminated for protecting the guilty inhabitants of Gibeah (xix.-xxi.). Later it gave the first king to Israel, and long clung to the house of Saul (2 Sam. ii. 9, 15; 1 Chron. xii. 29). Even after David had become king of all Israel, Benjamites occasionally showed dissatisfaction (2 Sam. xvi. 5, xx. 1-22; Ps. vii. title); but a large part of the tribe remained true to the house of David when the ten tribes separated under Jeroboam (1 Kin. xii. 21), and shared the fortunes of Judah to the end (Ezra iv. 1). From this tribe sprang the apostle of the gentiles (Phil. iii. 5).

Two gates at Jerusalem bore the name of Benjamin. The upper or high gate of Benjamin was in the temple (Jer. xx. 2). For the other gate of Benjamin, see JERUSALEM II. 3.

3. A Benjamite, a son of Bilhan, family of Jediahel (1 Chron. vii. 10).

4. A son of Harim, who had taken a foreign wife (Ezra x. 32).

Be'no [his son]

A descendant of Merari through Jaaziah (1 Chron. xxiv. 26, 27), if Beno is a proper name, as it seems to be in ver. 27.

Ben-o'ni [son of my sorrow].

The name designed by Rachel for the child whose birth was causing her death. But Jacob changed it to Benjamin (Gen. xxxv. 18).

Ben-zo'heth [son of Zoheth].

A descendant of Ishi, registered with the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20). Perhaps, however, a name has dropped out of the text before this name. If so, the passage should be translated: "And the sons of Ishi, Zoheth and . . . the son of Zoheth."

Be'on. See BAAL-MEON.

Be'or [a torch].

1. Father of Bela, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 32; 1 Chron. i. 43).

2. Father of Balaam (Num. xxii. 5). Called in A. V. of 2 Pet. ii. 15 Bosor.

Be'ra [excellence].

A king of Sodom, defeated by Chedorlaomer and his confederates (Gen. xiv. 2).

Be'r'a-cah, in A. V. Berachah [blessing]

1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 3).

2. A valley in Judah near Tekoa. Jehoshaphat gave it its name because he and his army there returned thanks to God for a great victory over the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites (2 Chron. xx. 26). The name still lingers as Bereikût, a ruin about 4 miles northwest of Tekoa, 6 miles southwest of Bethlehem, and a little east of the road from the latter village to Hebron.

Be-r-a-chi'ah. See BERECHIAH

Be-ra'iah [Jehovah hath created]

A son of Shimei (1 Chron. viii. 21, R. V.), descendant of Shiharam who had his registry with Benjamin (8, 11-13).

Be-re-a.

A town in Judæa near which Judas Macabæus was slain (1 Mac. ix. 4). Not identified.

For Be-re'a, a city of Macedonia (Acts xviii. 10, A. V.), see BEREA.

Be-r-e-chi'ah, in A. V. once Berachiah (1 Chron. vi. 39) [Jehovah hath blessed]

1. A Levite, the father of Asaph, descended from Gershon (1 Chron. vi. 39, xv. 17).

2. A Levite, one of the four doorkeepers for the ark in David's reign (1 Chron. xv. 23, 24).

3. One of the chief men of Ephraim in the reign of Pekah. He took the part of the captives from Judah. He was a son of Meshillemoth (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

4. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 20).

5. A Levite, descended from Elkaphah of Netophah (1 Chron. ix. 16).

6. A son of Meshezabel. His son repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 4, 30).

7. Father of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i. 1, 7).

Be'red [hail].

1. A place in the wilderness of Shur, to the west of Kadesh, and not far from Beer-lahai-roi (Gen. xvi. 7, 14). Its exact locality has not been determined.

2. An Ephramite, of the family of Shuthelah (1 Chron. vii. 20).

Be'ri [man of a well]

An Asherite, son of Zophah, family of Heber (1 Chron. vii. 36).

Be-ri'ah [perhaps, with an outcry, or in evil]

1. A son of Asher, and founder of a family (Gen. xlvii. 17; Num. xxvi. 44).

2. A son of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 23).

3. A Benjamite, head of a father's house among the inhabitants of Aijalon (1 Chron. viii. 13).

4. A Levite, a son of Shimei, the Gershonite (1 Chron. xxiii. 10). His sons were united with the children of his brother Jeush into one father's house (11).

Be'rite.

Apparently a people living near Abel-beth-maacah (2 Sam. xx. 14), but it is questionable if the present text is correct.

Be'ri'ith. See BAAL-BERITH.

Be-rn'i'ce [for Pherenkê, carrying off victory, victorious].

The eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I. She was married to her uncle, Herod, ruler of Chalcis, who soon afterwards died. She was so much with her brother Agrippa that scandal arose in consequence. She tried to allay it by a marriage with Polemo, king of Cilicia. She soon became tired of him, and, deserting him, returned to her brother Agrippa (Antiq. xx. 7, 3; War ii. 11, 5). She was with him when Paul made his defense before him (Acts xxv. 23; xxvi. 30). She afterwards became the mistress, first of Vespasian and then of Titus.

Ber'o-dach-bal'a-dan. See MERODACH-BALADAN.

Be-rø'a, in A. V. Be-re'a.

1 A city of Macedonia, about 50 miles west of Thessalonica and 23 or 24 miles from the sea, where Paul preached on his first journey to Europe (Acts xvii. 10-14, xx. 4). It is now called Verria or Boor.

2 A Syrian city between Antioch and Hierapolis, where Menelaus was smothered in a tower of ashes (2 Mac. xiii. 4). An earlier name of the town survives in Aleppo, the designation Bere'a, which was given by Seleucus Nicator, having had a transient existence.

3 See BERE'A.

Be-ro'thah or Ber'o-thai [wells].

Berothah was a town situated between Hamath and Damascus (Ezek. xlvii. 16). It is probably identical with Berothai, a city which was once subject to Hadadezer, king of Zobah, but was captured by David and yielded him large booty in brass (2 Sam. viii. 8; in 1 Chron. xviii. 8 called Cun, in A. V. Chun; probably a corruption, for the Seventy read the noun Mibhar, of which the letters are much like those of Berothai). Site unknown.

Ber'yl.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew Tarshush, a precious stone brought doubtless from the place bearing the same name. It was the first stone of the fourth row on the Jewish high priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 20; xxxix. 13; Song v. 14; Ezek. i. 16; x. 9, xxviii. 13; Dan. x. 6). None of these passages tells the color of the stone. On the margin of the R. V. of Song v. 14 tarshush is rendered topaz, and on that of Ex. xxviii. 20 chalcedony. The Septuagint renders the word by chrysolite in Ex. xxviii. 20, xxxix. 13; Ezek. xxviii. 13, and by anthrax, carbuncle, in Ezek. x. 9.

2. The Greek Berullos (Rev. xxi. 20), the eighth foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem. The beryl is an earthy mineral, having as its chief constituents silica, alumina, and beryllium (glucinum). It may be colorless or aquamarine, bluish green, or various blues and violet, or yellow and brown. It is closely allied to the emerald. It is found in Siberia, India, Brazil, and in some parts of Great Britain.

Be'sai.

One of the Nethinim and founder of a family (Ezra ii. 49, Neh. vii. 52).

Bes-o-de'tah [in familiarity with Jehovah].

Father of Meshullam, who helped to repair a gate of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6).

Be'sor [perhaps coldness, or, possibly, haste]. A brook south of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 9, 10, 21), perhaps the Nahr Ghazze, which rises near Beir-sheba and empties into the Mediterranean south of Gaza.

Be'tah [trust, confidence].

A city of Aram-zobah (2 Sam. viii. 8), probably to be read Tebah. Called Tibbath in 1 Chron. xviii. 8. Site unknown.

Be'ten [body, belly, or valley].

A village of Asher (Josh. xix. 25). Eusebius identified it with a village Beth-beten, 8 Roman miles east of Acce.

Beth.

The second letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Originally it was a rude representation of a dwelling, and from this circumstance it derives its name, which means a house. The English letter B has the same origin. Beth stands at the head of the second section of P's cxix in many versions, in which section each verse begins with this letter.

The Hebrew letters, beth, caph, mem, and pe, or b, k, m, and p, have at different stages of their development been so similar as to cause readers some difficulty in distinguishing them, and open the way to misreadings; for example, they are written, in the order just named, on Beth-ab'a-ra [house of the ford].

A place beyond Jordan at which John baptized (John i. 28, A. V.). The oldest manuscripts have Bethany, as now the R. V., but Origen, not being able to find a place of this name, decided in favor of the reading Beth-abara. If the correct reading be Bethabara, then the site is evidently at one of the numerous fords of the Jordan, and of these only one is now called Makhadet 'Abarah. It is a main ford of the river just above the place where the Jalud stream, flowing down the valley of Jezreel by Beisân, enters the Jordan. The traditional site, however, is east of Jericho.

Beth-a'nath [house of the goddess Anath].

A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38), from which, however, that tribe failed to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. i. 33). Suitably located at the village of 'Anâta, 'Ainâta, or 'Anitha, 6 miles west of Kedesh.

Beth-a'noth [house of the goddess Anath].

A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 59), commonly sought at Beit 'Ainûn, 13 miles southeast of Halhul.

Beth'a-ny [house of the afflicted one; in Talmud, house of non-maturing dates].

1. A small town on the mount of Olives (Mark xi. 1; Luke xix. 29), about 15 furlongs from Jerusalem (John xi. 18) on the road to Jericho. Our Lord often lodged there (Mat. xxi. 17; xxvi. 6; Mark xi. 1, 11, 12; xiv. 3). It was the town of Lazarus, of Martha, and of Mary (John xi. 1; xii. 1), as well as of Simon the leper, in whose house one of the anointings of Jesus took place (Mat. xxvi. 6-13; Mark xiv. 3). From near the town Jesus ascended to heaven (Luke xxiv. 50, 51). It has been generally identified as the village of el-'Aziriyeh (Lazarus' village), on the farther side of a shallow valley on the eastern slope of the mount of Olives, southeast from Jerusalem. It is now a miserable village with a few ancient stones built into modern habitations. The houses of Simon and of Martha Beth-ar'bel [house of God's ambush].

A town destroyed by Shalman with horrible cruelty (Hos. x. 14). The best identification that has been proposed is with Arbela of Galilee (Antiq. xii. 11, 1; xiv. 15, 4; cp. 1 Mac. ix. 2), now Irbid, 4 miles west-northwest of Tiberias. There are many natural caverns in a limestone precipice, which have been connected by artificial passages cut through the rock, with defenses wherever access was possible. Herod the Great found these caverns the abode of robbers, whom he rooted out.

Beth-a'ven [house of nothingness or idolatry].

1. A town in the territory of Benjamin, near Ai, east of Bethel (Josh. vii. 2), west of Michmash (1 Sam. xiii. 5; cp. xiv. 23), and and Mary and the tomb of Lazarus are all shown, but there is no reason to believe that they are genuine. Presumably when the village was first named date palms grew in the vicinity. They do not do so now, but in their place are olives, figs, and pomegranates.

2. A place east of the Jordan, probably a village, where John was baptizing when Jesus returned from the temptation (John i. 28, R. V.; cp. x. 40). See BETHABARA.

Beth-ar'a-bah [house of the wilderness].

A village in the wilderness of Judah, on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 6, 61; xviii. 22). Called simply Arabah in xviii. 18; unless the reading of the Septuagint be correct, Beth-arabah instead of "the side over against the Arabah." Site not yet identified.

Beth-a'ram. See BETH-HARAM.

on the border of a wilderness (Josh. xviii. 12). Not yet identified.

2. A name applied by Hosea contemptuously to Bethel after it had become a seat of idolatry (Hos. iv. 15; v. 8; x. 5).

Beth-az'ma-veth. See AZMAVETH.

Beth-ba'al-me'on. See BAAL-MEON.

Beth-ba'rah [perhaps for Beth-abarah, house of the ford].

A place on the Jordan, probably on the right bank (Judg. vii. 24).

Beth-ba'si.

A place in the wilderness (1 Mac. ix. 62), probably the wilderness of Tekoa (33). Josephus calls it Bethalaga (Antiq. xiii. 1, 5).

Beth-bi'ri, in A. V. Beth-bir'e-i [house of my creation].

A Simeonite town (1 Chron. iv. 31). The name is probably a corruption of Beth-lebaoth (cp Josh. xix 6)

Beth'-car [house of pasture, a place fit for grazing]

A place which is named to indicate the point to which the Philistines were pursued by the Israelites after the second and decisive battle of Ebenezer (1 Sam vii 11). The use of the word "under" seems to imply that it overlooked a plain

Beth-da'gon [house of Dagon]

1 A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh xv 33, 41), apparently in the vicinity of Eleutheropolis. Not identified

2 A town of Asher, on the frontier toward Zebulun (Josh xix 27). Not identified

Beth-dib-la-tha'im [house of fig cakes]

A town on the tableland of Moab, territory once in possession of Israel (Jer xlviii 21, 22; Moabite Stone 30). Probably the same as Ahmon-diblathaim.

Beth-e'den. See EDEN 2

Beth'el [house of God]

1 A town of Palestine, west of Ai, south of Shiloh (Gen xii 8, Judg xxi 19), and near Michmash (1 Sam xiii 2). Abraham on his first journey into Palestine, and subsequently, pitched his tent near it (Gen xiii 3). The town was called Luz by the Canaanites, but Jacob called the name of the place close by, where he passed the night sleeping on the ground, Bethel on account of the vision which he saw there, and he erected a pillar to mark the spot (Gen xxxviii 19 seq., xxxi 13). The two are distinguished (Josh xvi 2), but the name Bethel soon supplanted Luz as designation of the town. On the return of Jacob from Paddan-aram he went to Bethel, built an altar, and reaffirmed the name (Gen xxxv 1-15; Hos xii 4). The people of the town helped those of Ai in the second battle with Joshua (Josh viii 9, 12, 17). Later it was taken and its king slain (xii 9, 16). It was assigned to Benjamin, and stood on the boundary line between that tribe and Ephraim (Josh xvi 2, xviii 13, 22). It was entered and its Canaanite inhabitants were slain by the men of Ephraim when they were engaged in securing their recently acquired territory (Judg. i. 22 seq.). Its villages on the north of the boundary line belonged to Ephraim, and so perhaps did the town, as a result of this extermination of the Canaanites within its walls (1 Chron. vii. 28). When the Israelites were gathered at Mizpah near Gibeah to war against Benjamin, the ark was brought from Shiloh, 18 miles distant, to Bethel, 8 miles off (Judg. xx. 1, 27). Thither the men of Israel repaired to ask counsel of God, and there they built a temporary altar and offered sacrifices (18, 26, R. V.). At the end of the war they came again to Bethel, sat there before the Lord, built a new altar or repaired the old one, and offered sacrifices (xxi. 2-4, R. V.). When the regular services of the sanctuary at Shiloh were suspended during the loss and seclusion of the ark, Bethel was one of the places where Samuel judged Israel, and whither men went with their offerings to God (1 Sam vii 16, x 3). Jeroboam fixed one of his calves there (1 Kin xii 29-33), and Bethel became a great center of idolatry (1 Kin xiii 1-32, 2 Kin x 29). It was taken and temporarily held by Abijah (2 Chron xiii 19). Elijah passed through it (2 Kin i 1-3), and it was from Bethel that the youths came who mocked Elisha (23, 24). The prophets denounced it for its idolatries (Jer xliiii 13 Hos x 15; Amos iii. 14, iv 4, v 5, 6), and called it Beth-aven, house of naught (Hos iv 15; v 8, x 5). Amos was in danger in Bethel for his bold preaching (Amos vii 10-13). Josiah broke down its altars and its high places, and, as foretold, burned the bones of the priests taken from its sepulchers (2 Kin xxiii 4, 15-20). Some of its inhabitants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 28, Neh vii 32), the place again reverting to the Benjamites (xi 31). In Maccabean times it was fortified by the Syrian Bacchides (1 Mac ix 50). In the Jewish war it was captured by Vespasian, later Roman emperor (War iv 9, 9). The ruins, called Beitin, lie on the watershed of Palestine, about 11 miles north from Jerusalem. They are on the summit of a hill sloping to the southeast, and cover three or four acres. A range of hills trends to the southeast (cp 1 Sam xiii 2). In the valley to the west is a broken reservoir, 314 feet long by 217 broad, with two brooks of living water. Two other brooks are in the vicinity. There are sepulchers cut in a low cliff. The country round is of gray stone or white chalk, with scant vegetable mould. As in Abraham's time, it is a pastoral region.

2 A town in the territory of Simeon (1 Sam xxx 27). See BETHUEL

Beth-e'mek [house of the valley].

A town within the territory of Asher (Josh. xix 27). Not identified Be'ther [separation, division].

Probably a common noun, describing certain mountains as cleft and rugged (Song ii. 17, cp iv 6; vii 14), and not the town in Judah called Baithar or Bethther (Josh. xv 59, Greek), now Bittir, six miles southwest of Jerusalem, where on the height above the village the Jews under Bar-cocheba made their last stand against the Romans, B. C. 135.

Be-thes'da [house of mercy].

Earlier manuscripts of the N. T. have other spellings, as Bethsada, house of fishing, and Bethzatha, house of the olive.

A pool at Jerusalem, which was near the sheep gate and had five porches, that were sufficiently ample to accommodate a great multitude (John v. 2 seq.). Its waters were supposed to possess healing virtue. The fourth verse of the A. V., which mentions a periodic troubling of the waters, and ascribes

It to an angel, is omitted in R V as being insufficiently supported by early texts. Tradition located Bethesda at the Birket Israel, north of the temple, or at an adjacent pool. The tradition was well founded, even if it ultimately went astray. 1 In A. D 333 the Bordeaux pilgrim stated that there were two pools and five porches. 2 Early manuscripts, e. g. the Sinaitic, have Bethzatha, abbreviated Bezatha, instead of Bethesda. These words are apparently variations of Bezetha, the name of the quarter of the city north of the temple hill, and imply that the pool was in the Bezethan section of the city. 3 The pool was near the sheep gate, and the natural explanation of Neh i determines the location of this gate to have been north of the temple area. 4 In the autumn of 1888 excavation in the northeast part of Jerusalem, in connection with the repair of the church of St Anne, laid bare 100 feet northwest of that building a pool with five porches. A faded fresco on the wall depicts an angel and water, and shows that in the early Christian ages this pool was regarded as Bethesda.

Beth-e'zel [perhaps, house at the side].

A town of Judah or Samaria—it is uncertain which (Mic. i 11). Perhaps identical with Azal, i. e. Azel (Zech xiv 5).

Beth-ga'dor [house of a wall]

A town of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 51). See GEDER.

Beth-ga'mul [house of perfection].

A Moabite town (Jer. xlviii. 23), possibly Jemal, east of Dibon.

Beth-gil'gal. See GILGAL 1

Beth-hac'che-rem, in A V Beth-hac'ce-rem [house of the vineyard]

A town of Judah (Neh iii 14, Jer. vi 1). Jerome knew a village Beta-charma. It was visible from Bethlehem where he resided, and was situated on a hill between Tekoa and Jerusalem. Accordingly its site has been sought at the Frank mountain, 3½ miles southeast of Bethlehem.

Beth-ha'ran, Beth-a'ram, Beth-ha'ram [last two forms may signify place of the height].

A town in the Jordan valley, rebuilt by the children of Gad (Num xxxii 36; Josh. xii 27). Tristram well identified it with the mound called Beth-haran, in the plain east of the Jordan, opposite Jericho on the southeast. This mound must be distinguished from Tell er-Rameh. 3 miles farther up the wady to the east, the site of Betharamphtha, where Herod had a palace (Antiq. xviii. 2. 1; War ii. 4. 2; 9, 1).

Beth-hog'lai, in A. V. once Beth-hogla [house of the partridge].

A village of Benjamin on the boundary line between that tribe and Judah, and near the river Jordan (Josh xv 6; xviii 19, 21). The name and site are found at 'Ain Hajlah, 4 miles southeast of Jericho.

Beth-ho'ron [house of hollowness]

Twin towns of Ephraim, 1½ miles apart, but with a difference of 600 feet in altitude, on the boundary between Ephraim and Benjamin, built by a woman of Ephraim called Sherah (Josh xvi 3, 5, xvii 13; 1 Chron vii 24). One of them was assigned as residence to the Levites of the family of Kohath (Josh xxi 22, 1 Chron vi 68). The towns lay in a mountain pass, on the ancient highway between Jerusalem and the plain, 12 Roman miles northwest of the capital. They controlled the pass, and were fortified by Solomon (2 Chron viii. 5); but especially did the walls of the upper town engage military attention, for it occupied the more strategic position (1 Km ix 17, 1 Mac ix 50, cp Judith iv. 4). Up and down, past these towns, repeatedly surged the tide of war. The Ammonites fled down this pass before Joshua (Josh x 10 seq.). The Philistines ascended it to make war with Saul (1 Sam xiii 18). Judas Maccabæus fought two battles here (1 Mac iii 15 seq., vii 39 seq.), and the army of Cestius Gallus, governor of Syria, was almost annihilated here by the Jews (War ii 19, 8). The towns still exist under the names Beit 'Ur et-Tahta and el-Fôka.

Beth-jesh'i-moth, in A V once Beth-jes'i-moth [house of the wastes]

A town east of the Jordan, near Pithgah and the Dead Sea (Josh xiii 3, xiii 20, War iv 7, 6). When the Israelites encamped at Shittim, it formed the southern limit of the camp (Num xxxiii 49). It was 10 Roman miles southeast of Jericho. Direction and distance indicate 'Am es-Suw'êmeih, and this name seems an echo of Jeshimoth. It was assigned to the Reubenites, but in the time of Ezekiel was in the hands of the Moabites (Josh xiii 20, Ezek. xxv. 9).

Beth-le-aph'rah. See APHRAH

Beth-leb'a-oth [house of houses].

A town in the south of Judah, assigned to the Simeonites (Josh xv 32; xix 6), see BETH-BIRI. Not identified.

Beth'le-hem [house of bread].

1 A town in the hill country of Judah, originally called Ephrath, hence, to distinguish it from a place of the same name in Zebulun, called also Bethlehem-judah and Bethlehem-ephrathah (Gen xxxv 19, Judg xvii 7; Mic v. 2). Bethlehem is not mentioned among the cities assigned to Judah (Josh. xv; see, however, ver 59, Septuagint). But as a village it existed as early as the time of Jacob. Rachel died and was buried in its vicinity (Gen. xxxv 16, 19; xlviii 7). Its citizens were hospitable to the Levites (Judg xvii. 7; xix 1). A branch of Caleb's family settled in the town and attained to great influence (1 Chron. ii. 51, 54; cp. Ruth. iv. 20). It was the residence of Boaz, of Ruth (i. 19; iv 9-11), doubtless of Obed (iv. 21, 22), and of Jesse, the father of David (Ruth iv. 11, 17; 1 Sam. xvi. 1, 4). As the birthplace and ancestral home of David, it was the city of David (Luke ii. 11). It was a walled town as early as the time of David. It fell temporarily into the hands of the Philistines (2 Sam. xxiii. 14, 15). Rehoboam strengthened its fortifications (2 Chron xi 6). Bethlehemites returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 21, Neh vii 26). It was looked to as the place where the Messiah should be born (Mic v 2; Mat ii 5), and accordingly when the fullness of time had come Jesus became incarnate at Bethlehem. In its vicinity the annunciation to the shepherds took place (Luke i 1-20). Thither the Magi went to salute the newborn babe, and it was the infants of Bethlehem who were murdered by Herod to make sure that among them he had cut off the future king (Mat ii 1-18). There has never been any doubt as to its site. It is 5 miles south of Jerusalem, at the modern village of Beit Lahm, on the east and north-east slope of a long ridge, which to the west is higher than the village. The town has several gates. The houses are mostly small, but well built. The inhabitants, who may be 4000 or more, are mostly Christians belonging to the Greek Church. There are in the vicinity vineyards, orchards of fig trees, and olive trees. The fields, though stony, produce grain abundantly, and at harvest gleaming may be seen as it was in the days of Ruth. A little east of the town is the church built by Helena, the mother of Constantine, over the cave said to be the stable in which the nativity took place. Half a mile to the north of the town is the traditional tomb of Rachel. On the southern side of the town is a valley running to the Dead Sea, while almost at the walls on the east a valley begins which joins the wady es-Surar or vale of Sorek, and near by is also an upper branch of the wady es-Sunt or vale of Elah (cp. 1 Sam. xvii 2).

2. A town with dependent villages within the territory of Zebulun (Josh xix. 15). It seems to have been this Bethlehem which gave birth to the judge Ibzan (Judg xii. 8-10; cp. 11). It is believed to have been on the site of the modern Beit Lahm, a small and wretched village 7 miles northwest of Nazareth.

Beth-ma'a-cah, in A. V. Beth-maacah [house of Maacah].

A town near the foot of mount Hermon (2 Sam. xx 14, 15). See ABEL-BETH-MAACAH.

Beth-mar'ca-both [house of the chariots].

A town of the Simeonites (Josh. xix. 5; 1 Chron iv. 31). Exact site unknown. Perhaps Madmannah was a chariot station, and was spoken of by this name (Josh. xv. 31).

Beth-me'on. See BAAL-MEON.

Beth-mer'hak [house of removal].

Probably only a house beside the brook Kidron, between Jerusalem and the mount of Olives (2 Sam. xv. 17, R. V.). The margin renders it the Far House; the A. V., a place that was far off.

Beth-nim'rah [house of limpid fresh water].

A town in the Jordan valley east of the river, assigned to Gad and rebuilt by that tribe (Num xxxii 36; Josh. xiii. 27). Eusebius and Jerome locate it 5 Roman miles to the north of Luvias, now Tell er-Rameh. At the place thus indicated ruins bear the name Nimrin. They lie amidst rich, well-watered pasture land.

Beth-pa'let. See BETH-PELET.

Beth-paz'zez [house of dispersion].

A town within the territory of Issachar (Josh. xix. 21). Exact site unknown.

Beth-pe'let; in A. V. Beth-phelet and Beth-palet [house of escape].

A town in the most southerly part of Judah (Josh. xv. 27; Neh. xi. 26). Exact site unknown.

Beth-pe'or [house of Peor].

A town near Pisgah. In the valley opposite to it the Israelites had their main encampment, elsewhere referred to as in the mountains of Abarim, when their army was waiting with Sihon and Og (cp. Deut iii 29, iv 46, with Num. xxi 20, xxiii 28, xxxiii. 47-49). In this valley Moses was afterwards buried (Deut xxxiv 6). The town was assigned to the Reubenites (Josh xiii 20). According to Eusebius, it lay 6 Roman miles above, that is in the mountains east of, Luvias, now Tell er-Rameh.

Beth-pha-ga [house of figs].

A village near Bethany, on or near the road from Jericho to Jerusalem (Mark xi 1; Luke xix. 29). It probably stood between Bethany and Jerusalem, not far from the descent of the mount of Olives (Mat xxi 1, John xii 1, 12, 14), and near the old road that crosses the mountain at the summit.

Beth-phe'let. See BETH-PELET.

Beth-ra'pha [house of Rapha, house of a giant].

A family of Judah, or a town whose inhabitants belonged to that tribe (1 Chron iv. 12).

Beth-re'hob [house of a street].

A town in the north of Palestine, by the valley of the upper Jordan (Num. xiii 21, where it is called simply Rehob; Judg xviii. 28). It was inhabited by Syrians, who joined the Ammonites in a great war with David (2 Sam. x. 6). Robinson doubtfully located it at the modern fortress of Hânin commanding the plain of Huleh, in which Dan was situated; but the location is improbable.

Beth-sa'l-da [house of hunting or fishing].

A town on the lake of Gennesaret, near the Jordan, rebuilt by Philip the tetrarch, and named by him Julius in honor of the daughter of the emperor Augustus (Antiq. xviii. 2, 1; Life 72). To this town, which was on the other side of the sea (actually at the northern end), Jesus withdrew on receiving news of the murder of John the Baptist (Luke ix. 10; cp. Mat. xiv. 13; John vi. 1). Going forth to a desert grassy place, apparently about 2 miles down the eastern side of the lake, he was followed by the multitude. In the evening he miraculously fed them. The disciples then entered into a boat to precede him "unto the other side to [or toward] Bethsaida" (Mark vi 45, R. V.). During the evening and night, the disciples were in the midst of the sea distressed in rowing, for the wind was contrary unto them. Jesus came walking on the sea, and was taken into the boat. And when they had crossed over they came to the land unto Gennesaret (ver 53). Do these statements, taken in connection with John's mention of "Bethsaida of Galilee" (xii. 21), imply another Bethsaida? Notable scholars, like Robinson, think so, and locate it, among other places, at 'Am et-Tabighah, about 3 miles southwest of the mouth of the Jordan. But the existence of two towns of the same name on the same lake, and at most only a few miles apart, is so improbable that the words of the evangelists must be subjected to careful scrutiny to learn whether they require this assumption; and 1 The ultimate destination of the disciples was Capernaum (John vi 17); but it was determined that they should sail "toward Bethsaida," keeping nearer the shore than the direct course to Capernaum would require (Thomson). 2 Even if their purpose was to make a stop at Bethsaida, it was proper to speak of going "to the other side to Bethsaida," for Josephus uses a similar expression for proceeding by boat from Tiberias 34 miles to Taricheæ. He "sailed over to Taricheæ" (Life 59, quoted by G. A. Smith). 3 Philip was of Bethsaida of Galilee (John xii 21). Thomson suggests that any city built at the mouth of the narrow Jordan, as Bethsaida-Julias admittedly was, would almost necessarily have part of its houses or a suburb on the west bank of the river, which would be in Galilee. Peter, Andrew, and Philip were Galileans and of Bethsaida. Thomson further suggests that probably the whole city on both banks of the river was ordinarily attached to Galilee. Geo. Adam Smith affirms that "the province of Galilee ran right round the lake." His opinion is based on Josephus' mention of a certain Judas, who belonged to Gamala in Gaulonitis, as a Galilean (War ii. 8, 1 with Antiq. xviii. 1, 1).

Beth-she'an, or, contracted, Beth'-shan [house of quiet or restful security].

A city splendidly situated on the brow of a hill just where the valley of Jezreel drops down 300 feet to the level of the Jordan. In addition to enjoying the security afforded by the natural strength of the city, its inhabitants early rendered themselves formidable by the use of war chariots of iron (Josh. xvii. 16). Beth-shean, with its dependent towns, fell within the area of Issachar, but was given to the Manassites (Josh. xvii. 11; 1 Chron. vii. 29). They failed, however, to drive out the Canaanites, but were strong enough to make them pay tribute (Josh. xvii. 12-16; Judg. i. 27, 28). After the battle of Gilboa, the Philistines fastened the bodies of Saul and his sons to the wall of Beth-shean (1 Sam. xxxi. 10-13; 2 Sam. xxi. 12-14). In the Greek period it was sometimes called Nyssa, but its common name in Greek and Latin literature is Scythopolis. It bore this name as early as the time of Judas Maccabæus. In several instances Scythopolis is written Σκυθων πόλις, city of the Scythians (Judg. i. 27, Septuagint; Judith iii. 10, 2 Mac. xii. 29); and it has been supposed that a remnant of the Scythian hordes settled here, who are said to have advanced through Palestine against Egypt in the latter half of the seventh century before Christ (Herod. i. 103, 105; Pliny, Hist. nat. v. 16). The name Scythopolis may, however, be the echo of some Semitic word. In the first century A. D. the population of the city was predominantly gentile (2 Mac. xii. 30. War ii. 18, 1, 3, 4, Life 6), and the Jews consequently sacked it during the war with the Romans. The citizens retaliated by massacring the Jewish residents. Josephus says that it was the largest of the ten cities called Decapolis, apparently disregarding Damascus, possibly because the city on the Abanah was not at this moment a member of the league (War ii. 9, 7). It was the only one of the ten cities that lay west of the Jordan. It continued to figure in history as late as the crusades. Though the name Scythopolis lasted for centuries, it did not ultimately take root, and the Arab village which now marks its site is called Baysân. Extensive ruins of the city still remain, which date largely from the Greco-Roman period. Its walls must have been between 2 and 3 miles round. The city was divided into three parts by two streams flowing through deep ravines. The southern section contains the modern village and hippodrome (race course), a theater, with a ruined mosque, and part of the ancient city walls. The central section is almost surrounded by the two streams, and includes the present mound or tell, which rises about 200 feet high with sides nearly perpendicular, and at its top traces of the thick wall which once enclosed the summit. The northerly one has a church, tombs, and fort. The principal edifices were built of black basalt, the region around being volcanic.

Beth-she'mesh [house of the sun].

1 A town of the lowland, in the vale of Sorck, now called Am Shems. The name suggests that it was once a seat of the Canaanite worship of the sun. It was allotted to Judah, and lay on the assigned boundary line (Josh. xv. 10); but as this tribe found itself possessed of more territory than necessary (xix. 9), it was transferred with several other towns to Dan (41, where the synonymous name Ir-shemesh is used). The Danites did not occupy it; and when provision was made for the tribe of Levi, it was given to the priests the sons of Aaron, and reckoned as set apart from the tribe of Judah (xxi. 16, cp. 9; 1 Chron. vi. 59). Of course, after the formation of the kingdom it was within Judah (2 Kin. xiv. 11). When the ark was sent back from the Philistine country on a new cart drawn by two milch kine without human guidance, the animals took the way to Beth-shemesh. The townspeople, profanely looking into the ark, were struck by a plague which was fatal to seventy of their number (Antiq. vi. 1, 4). After the words seventy men there is the strange insertion in the Hebrew text, rendered suspicious by the absence of the conjunction, of the further words fifty thousand men (1 Sam. vi. 1-21, R. V.). One of Solomon's twelve purveyors drew supplies of food from the town and district (1 Kin. iv. 7, 9). It was the scene of a battle between Amaziah, king of Judah, and Joash, king of Israel, in which the former was defeated (2 Kin. xiv. 11; 2 Chron. xxv. 21), and it was taken by the Philistines during the reign of Ahaz (xxviii. 18).

2. A town on the boundary of Issachar, between Tabor and the Jordan (Josh. xix. 22) Not identified.

3. A fenced city of the tribe of Naphtali, from which, however, the Canaanites were not driven (Josh. xix. 38; Judg. i. 33). Not identified. Possibly the town of this name, already mentioned as on the boundary of Issachar, is intended.

4. An Egyptian city where the sun was worshiped (Jer. xliii. 13); doubtless On.

Beth-she'mite.

A native of Beth-shemesh (1 Sam. vi. 14, 18).

Beth-shit'tah [house of the acacia].

A town between the valley of Jezreel and Zererah in the Jordan valley (Judg. vii. 22, R. V.). The fact that it is coupled with Zererah, and not with Beth-shean, excludes its identification with Shutta.

Beth-su'ra. See BETH-ZUR

Beth-tap'pu-ah [house of apples or similar fruit].

A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 53), the modern village of Tuffüh, about 4 miles west of Hebron (cp. 1 Chron. ii. 43).

Be-thu'el [perhaps abode of God].

1. Son of Nahor by his wife Milcah. He was the father of Laban and Rebekah, and nephew of Abraham (Gen. xxii. 20, 22, 23, xxiv. 15, 29; xxv. 20; xxviii. 2, 5).

2. A town of the Simeonites (1 Chron. iv. 30; in Josh. xix. 4 Bethul). David sent thither part of the recaptured spoil of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 27). In this latter passage it is called Bethel, a modified form of the name, more suggestive to the Hebrew ear. It seems to be the Chesil of Josh. xv. 30. Not identified. Possibly the small village of Beit A'ila, 6½ miles northwest of Hebron.

Be'thul. See BETHUEL 2.

Beth-zach-a-ri'as.

A town (1 Mac. vi. 32, 33), 70 stades or 8 miles from Bethsura (Antiq. xii. 9, 4). It is identified with the modern Beit Zakariya, 9 Roman miles by road north of Bethsura.

Beth'-zur, in Maccabees Bethsura [house of a rock].

A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 58). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 7). In Nehemiah's time half of its district was subject to Azbuk (Neh. iii. 16). In the Greek period the name was written Bethsura, and it was important as a frontier town toward Idumaea. Here Judas Maccabæus gained a great victory over the Syrian general Lysias (1 Mac. iv. 29, 2 Mac. xi. 5. xiii. 19, 22). The patriot leader afterwards fortified it (1 Mac. iv. 61; vi. 7, 26, 31). Want of food compelled the garrison to surrender it to the Syrians (49, 50). Its defenses were strengthened by Bacchides (ix. 52) but it was recaptured by Simon (xi. 65, 66; xiv. 7) and refortified (33). The name lingers in the ruins Beit Sür, 4 miles to the north of Hebron.

Be't'o-nim [pistachio-nuts].

A town of Gad (Josh. xiii. 26). Not properly identified.

Beu'lah [married].

A name prophetically applied to the once forsaken land of Palestine when it was restored to God's favor and re-peopled after the captivity (Is. lxii. 4).

Be'zal.

Founder of a family, some of whom returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 17; Neh. vii. 23). A representative of the family signed the covenant of fidelity to Jehovah (Neh. x. 18).

Be'zal-el, in A. V. Be-zal'e-el [in the shadow (i. e. under the protection) of God].

1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb, and a grandson of Hur (1 Chron. ii. 20); a skillful artificer raised up of God and appointed to work in gold, silver, copper, in the setting of precious stones, and the carving of wood for the furnishing of the tabernacle (Ex. xxxi. 1-11; xxxv. 30-35).

2. A son of Pahath-moab, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 30).

Be'zek [dissemination, sowing, plantation].

A town evidently in central Palestine, not a great distance from Jabesh-gilead (1 Sam. xi. 8, 11). Twin villages of this name existed in Eusebius' time 17 Roman miles from Shechem toward Beth-shean. Conder identifies the site with the ruin Ibzik, 13 miles northeast of Shechem. With this town may be identified Bezek mentioned in Judg. i. 4 seq., on the assumption that Adoni-bezek advanced southward with his forces to unite with the southern Canaanites, was met and repulsed by Judah and Simeon, and pursued to his capital.

Be'zer [gold or silver ore].

1. An Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Chron. vii. 37).

2. A city in the wilderness, on the plateau within the territory of Reuben. It was given to the Levites, and was one of the cities of refuge (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8; xxi. 36, 1 Mac. v. 26). It afterwards came into the possession of Moab, and Mesha, king of Moab, fortified it (Moabite Stone 27). Not identified.

Be'zeth.

A place not far from Jerusalem, where Bacchides pitched his camp (1 Mac. vii. 19), the village of Beth-zetho or Berzetho (Antiq. xii. 10, 2), doubtless Bezetha, the northern suburb of Jerusalem. See JERUSALEM II. 3.

Bible [Greek Biblia, books, ecclesiastical Latin Biblia]. It is believed that the Greek word Biblia was first applied to the sacred books by John Chrysostom, patriarch of Constantinople from A. D. 398 to 404.

Etymologically viewed, the Bible means "the Books," and that no qualifying adjective stands before the noun implies that these writings were regarded by those who used the term as forming a class by themselves and as superior to all other literary productions. They are uniquely and preeminently the books. The same view is suggested by the etymology of the word Scripture and Scriptures, and the fact is rendered all the more significant that both terms occur frequently with this implied meaning in the N. T. (Mat. xxi. 42, Acts viii. 32). [The term Bible is absent from the sacred page: it is of ecclesiastical origin.] The plural term Biblia marks the important fact that the Bible is not a single book, but a great many. The words Bible and Scripture, on the other hand, being both in the singular number, emphasize the fact that, under the diversity of human authorship, there lies a wonderful unity, pointing to the operation of one directing Mind, which acted during more than a thousand consecutive years when these writings were being produced. The claims to divine authority made by Scripture are investigated by the science of Apologetics. The word is used in a Greek rather than in an English sense, and is, therefore, liable to be misunderstood. It is related that when George III. was told that Bishop Watson had published an Apology for the Bible, he dryly remarked that he did not know before that the Bible required an apology. The bishop used the word "Apology" like the Greek apologia, to mean defense; and the science of Apologetics defends the Bible. [A second science is that of Biblical Criticism.] This is divided into Higher Criticism, which inquires into the origin and character of the several books, and seeks to determine by whom, under what circumstances, and with what design they were written; and Lower or Textual Criticism, which seeks, by the aid of the ancient manuscripts and versions, to bring the text of these books to the highest practicable level of accuracy. Cp. APOCRYPHA, CANON. The science of Hermeneutics investigates the principles of interpretation, while Exegesis applies them. The contents of the Bible are then methodically arranged. It will be found when this is done that they touch geography, history, science, philosophy, ethics—in fact, nearly every department of human thought. Further, Biblical Theology investigates the doctrines of the Bible in their historical development, and Dogmatic or Systematic Theology seeks to arrange the doctrines into the system which is contained in Scripture, show their relation to each other and to other truths, and to state them with precision.

The Bible embraces the Old and the New Testaments or covenants. The O. T. was written in Hebrew, except a few passages in Aramaic, and the N. T. in Greek. For the several books of the O. T. and N. T., see the articles which bear their names; and for the versions of the Scripture into other tongues, see SAMARITAN, SEPTAGINT, VERSIONS, and VULGATE.

Each of the sacred books on its original publication came forth without division into chapters or verses. The author of the present division into chapters is believed to have been either the Spanish cardinal Hugo or the British archbishop Langton, both of whom lived in the thirteenth century. The Jewish Masorites of the ninth century divided the O. T. into verses. The division of the N. T. into its present verses is due to Robert Stephens, who introduced them into the Greek and Latin N. T. which he published at Geneva in 1551; and they were adopted in the English version of the N. T. printed at Geneva in 1557. The whole Bible first appeared with its present chapters and verses in Stephen's edition of the Vulgate in 1555. The first English Bible to be thus divided was the Genevan edition of 1560 (see NEW TESTAMENT). They are not perfect. Regarding chapters, there is an imperfection in drawing the line between the i. and ii. of Genesis at the place where the separation is now made. Gen. i. should also include Gen. ii. 1-3, and chapter ii. begin at ii. 4, where "God" is succeeded by "the Lord God." Is. lvi. should begin with Is. 13, and John vii. should take in also viii. 1. Regarding the verses, they are absolutely indispensable for the purpose of reference, but they should be ignored when one is following the thread of an argument or of a narrative. The R. V. enables one to do this easily, for it does not make the division into verses prominent; but greater accuracy of reference is secured by citing the number of the verse from the A. V.

The Bible has already been translated, in its entirety or in part, into more than three hundred languages or dialects. It is not an exaggeration, when referring to the writers of the Bible, to adopt the language of the psalmist, meant originally for the silent theological teaching of the starry sky: "Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world (Ps. xix 4).

Bich'ri [youthful]

Father of the rebel Sheba (2 Sam. xx. 1).

Bid'kar.

A captain under Jehu (2 Kin. ix. 25).

Big'tha.

A chamberlain who ministered in the presence of Xerxes (Esth. i 10).

Big'than or Big'tha-na [Persian and Sanscrit Bagadāna, gift of fortune].

A chamberlain, keeper of the palace door, who conspired against king Xerxes (Esth. ii. 21; vi 2)

Big'val.

1. One of the leaders of the exiles who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 2)

2. Founder of a family, of which some 2000 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 14; Neh. vii. 19), and several score afterwards with Ezra (Ezra viii. 14).

Bil'dad.

A Shuhite, one of Job's friends (Job ii. 11), who made three speeches to the patriarch (viii., xviii., xxv.).

Bil'e-am [perhaps greed, consumption, destruction].

A town of Manasseh, west of the Jordan, which was assigned to the Levites of the family of Kohath (1 Chron. vi. 70); see IBLEAM. In its stead Gath-rimmon appears in the present Hebrew text of Josh. xxi 25. This latter name has probably been erroneously copied from the preceding verse. The Septuagint (Vat. and Alex.) lends confirmation to this view.

Bil'gah [cheerful]

1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and was made the fifteenth course of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 6, 14).

2. A chief of the priests, perhaps representing the priestly course of this name, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 5, 7). In the next generation a father's house among the priests bore this name (ver 18); cp. BILGAI.

Bil'gai [cheerful]

One of the priests who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. x 8); cp. under the similar name BILGAH.

Bil'hah [perhaps bashful].

1. Rachel's maidservant, who, at her mistress's desire, became one of Jacob's secondary wives. She was the mother of Dan and Naphtali (Gen. xxx. 1-8; 1 Chron. vii. 13). Ultimately she committed sin with Reuben (Gen. xxxv. 22).

2. A Simeonite town (1 Chron. iv. 29). See BAALAH.

Bil'han [perhaps bashful].

1. A Horite, son of Ezer (Gen. xxxvi. 27).

2. A Benjamite, family of Jedaiel, and himself the ancestor of several fathers' houses (1 Chron. vii. 10).

Bil'shan.

One of the twelve chief men who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).

Bim'hal.

An Asherite, family of Beriah, house of Japhlet (1 Chron. vii. 33).

Bin'e-a.

A son of Moza, a descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (1 Chron. viii. 37; ix. 43).

Bin'nu-1 [built].

1. The head of a family, of which several hundred returned from the captivity. His name is also pronounced Bani (Ezra ii. 10; Neh. vii. 15).

2 and 3. Two men, a son of Pahath-moab and a son of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x 30, 38).

4. A Levite who went from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 8). He was a son of Henadad (x. 9). His son was one who received the silver and gold brought from Babylon to the temple by Ezra (Ezra viii. 33), and his family was represented at the building of the wall (Neh. iii. 24), and its representative sealed the covenant (x. 9).

Birds.

The Hebrews classed as birds all animals which fly, including the bat and winged insects. Tristram enumerates 348 species of birds as either indigenous or visitants to Palestine. Of these 271 belong to the Palaearctic zone of Selater—that to which most of the European birds belong; 40 to the Ethiopian, and 7 to the Indian zone; while 30, as far as is known, are peculiar to Palestine itself. The Ethiopian and Indian types are almost exclusively confined to the Dead Sea basin, but it is so depressed beneath the level of the ocean that it is really a small tropical region located in the midst of the temperate zone. In the Mosaic law twenty or twenty-one birds and, in the case of four of them, their kind are expressly named as unclean (Lev. xi 13-19; Deut. xiv 11-20). The flesh and the eggs of all clean birds were eaten (cp. Is. x 14. Luke xi 12), but the only birds used for sacrifice were turtle doves and young pigeons (Lev. i. 14). Doves were domesticated (Is. lx. 8), and later, chickens. The cock is mentioned (Mat. xxvi. 34), and the hen (xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 34). Wild fowl were hunted, among other ways, by decoy birds (Ecclus. xi. 30), with snares (Amos iii. 5), and with nets (Prov. i. 17). The migration of birds is referred to (Jer. viii. 7).

Bir'sha.

A king of Gomorrah who was defeated by Chedorlaomer and his confederates (Gen. xiv. 2, 8, 10).

Birth'day.

The birth of a child, especially of a son, was a glad occasion, and was often celebrated by a feast (Jer. xx 15; Antiq. xii. 4, 7) The anniversary of one's birth was celebrated by the Egyptians and Persians (Gen. xl. 20; Herod 1 133). Herod the tetrarch kept the anniversary of either his birth or his accession, it is debated which (Mat xiv 6).

Birth'right.

A certain right or privilege considered to belong to the firstborn son in a family, and which is not shared by his younger brothers. The eldest son ordinarily succeeded to his father's rank and position, as head of the family or tribe, and as representative of its prerogatives. He also inherited a double portion of his father's property, a right guaranteed to the firstborn even when his mother was the less loved of two wives (Deut xxi 17, cp 2 Kin ii. 9) A birthright might be sold to a younger brother, as Esau sold his birthright to Jacob (Gen xxv 29, 31, Heb xii. 16). It might also be forfeited on account of misconduct (1 Chron v 1)

Bir'za-ith, in A V. Bir'za-vith [openings, wounds] The form in R V is the traditional reading, that in A V represents the consonants of the present text

An Asherite, family of Malchiel; or possibly a town, meaning olive well (1 Chron vii. 31).

Bish'lam.

A Persian official who joined in the complaint to Artaxerxes that the Jews were rebuilding Jerusalem (Ezra iv 7)

Bish'op [a corruption of Latin episcopus, Greek episkopos an overseer]

The Greek word is used in the Septuagint for an official overseer, whether civil or religious, as Eleazar the priest (Num iv. 16), and officers of the army (xxxii. 14) In the N T the word occurs first in the exhortation of Paul to the elders or, as in the margin, presbyters of the church at Ephesus, when he said, "Take heed unto yourselves, and to all the flock, in the which the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops," or, as in the margin, "overseers" (Acts xx. 17, 28, R V). Here and elsewhere Paul identifies elders, presbyters, and bishops (Tit 1. 5-7). The terms are different designations for the incumbent of the same office. Elsewhere he distinguishes simply between bishop and deacon (Phil i 1: 1 Tim. iii. 1-8). Peter, using the verb episkopeō, exhorts the elders to tend the flock of God, "exercising the oversight, not of constraint, but willingly" (1 Pet. v. 2, R V). In the church of the N T the duties of the bishop were to care for the flock of God (Acts xx 28; 1 Pet v. 2) He was the shepherd, bearing rule and watching in behalf of souls, admonishing, encouraging, and supporting (1 Thes v 14; Heb. xiii. 17), and some among them labored in the word and in teaching (1 Tim v. 17). His qualifications are enumerated in 1

Tim. iii. 1-7 and Tit. i 7-9. A plurality of them existed in the church at Philippi, as in that of Ephesus (Phil 1 1), and the college of presbyter-bishops ordained by the laying on of hands (1 Tim iv 14) In the church at Jerusalem the elders and apostles consulted together, and the decision of the council was given in the name of the apostles and elders (Acts xv 6, 22, xvi. 4, xxi 18), see ELDER The name is applied figuratively to Jesus (1 Pet ii 25) A distinction, however, grew up very early in the Church between elder or presbyter and bishop It appears in the second century, being mentioned in the epistles of Ignatius, who died in 107 or 116 According to the Roman Catholic Council of Trent in the sixteenth century, "Bishops, being the successors of the apostles are placed by the Holy Ghost to govern the Church of God, and to be superior to their presbyters or priests." Roman Catholic opinion assumes that the apostles had a general supervision of the congregation, while the elders whom they had ordained had the local oversight, but as the congregations increased in number, the apostles ordained assistants whom they appointed their successors, to be overseers of the congregation in a district. Such were the angels of the seven churches (Rev 1 20), see ANGEL High Anglicans find the institution implied in the position of Jesus' brother James in the church at Jerusalem, in the angels of the seven churches, and in the work of Timothy and Titus Paul did indeed exhort Timothy to tarry at Ephesus, order public worship, exhort and teach (1 Tim i 3 ff), and Titus, whom Paul had before employed as a messenger to the Corinthians (2 Cor xii 18), he left in Crete to set in order things that were wanting, and to appoint elders, called also bishops, in every city (Tit. i 5-7) But it is to be noted that Timothy was in the first instance ordained by presbytery (1 Tim iv. 14), and there is not a trace in the N. T. of the apostles appointing any man to succeed them.

Bi-thi'ah [a daughter, in the sense of a worshiper, of Jehovah].

A daughter of Pharaoh and wife of Mered, a man of Judah (1 Chron iv. 18). Her name indicates that she was a convert to the worship of Jehovah.

Bith'ron [cut, division, gorge].

A region, doubtless a valley, north of the Jabbok near Mahanaim (2 Sam. ii. 29).

Bi-thyn'i-a.

A country in the northwestern part of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by the Black Sea, on the south by Phrygia and Galatia, on the east by Paphlagonia and part of Phrygia, and on the west by Mysia. But its boundaries varied at different times. It was colonized by the Thyni or Bithyni from Thrace, in Europe, who conquered or drove out the Bebryces, its original inhabitants, and imparted to it their own name (Herod. vii. 75). Under the Persian empire it constituted a satrapy.

Nicomedes III. bequeathed it to the Romans in 74 B. C. Paul and Silas attempted to enter Bithynia, but the Spirit suffered them not (Acts xvi. 7). The gospel was carried thither by other means. Peter was able to address Christians of Bithynia in his first letter (1 Pet. i. 1), and at the beginning of the second century Pliny the younger reported numerous Christians there. Later still, in two of its towns, Nicæa and Chalcedon, great councils of the Church were held. It is a fertile country, in which the vine is largely cultivated. In various parts, especially in the chain of mount Olympus, which runs along its southern boundary, there are forests of oak, interspersed with beech trees, chestnuts, and walnuts.

Bit'tern.

The rendering in A. V. of the Hebrew word Kippod, the one contracting or rolling itself together; an animal frequenting ruins (Is. xiv. 23, xxxiv. 11), which ascended to the top of ruined doors or to window sills, and thence made its voice heard (Zeph. ii. 14). The bittern (Botaurus stellaris) is a long-necked and long-legged wading bird, habitually frequenting pools of water, but not likely to be heard giving voice from a ruined window. The R. V. considers the animal to be the porcupine, while Tristram identifies it as probably the Scops Owl (Scops qua), a migrant in Palestine for the summer months, breeding in the walls of old ruins and in hollow trees.

Bi-tu-men.

Mineral pitch. There are three varieties of it: (1) Earthy bitumen; (2) elastic bitumen, elaterite or mineral caoutchouc; (3) compact bitumen or asphalt, asphaltum, or Jew's pitch. In its appearance it resembles common pitch. It sinks in water, is easily melted, is very inflammable, and when set on fire burns with a red smoky flame. It is produced in the chemistry of nature by the enclosure of vegetable matter in the crust of the earth, so that it is in immediate contact with water, while atmospheric air is quite shut out. There is a pitch lake in Trinidad. Bitumen or asphalt exists at or near the Dead Sea, called, in consequence, by the Greeks and Romans, Lake Asphaltites. It is found also at Hit, on the Euphrates, above Babylon, and in other places. Bitumen was the slime with which the bricks used for the erection of the tower of Babel were cemented (Gen. xi. 3). The slime pits in which the defeated kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fell were bitumen pits (xiv. 10).

Biz'lo-thi'ah, in A. V. Biz-joth'jah [tempt of Jehovah].

A town in the most southerly portion of Judah (Josh. xv. 28). The text is suspicious. Almost the same consonants would mean "its daughters or suburbs" (Septuagint, cp. Neh. xi. 27).

Biz'tha.

A chamberlain at the court of Xerxes (Esth. i. 10).

Blain.

The rendering of the Hebrew 'aba'bu'oth, pustules. It signifies a bleb, a bubble of matter, a blister full of serum arising upon the skin. It would now probably be ranked under the skin disease called pemphigus. Blains accompanied by boils is the disease which constituted the sixth of the ten plagues of Egypt (Ex. ix. 8-11).

Blas'phe-my.

Defamatory or other wicked language directed against God (Ps. lxxiv. 10-18; Is. liii. 5; Rev. xvi. 9, 11, 21). Under the Mosaic law it was punished by stoning (Lev. xxiv. 16). The charge of blasphemy was falsely brought against Naboth (1 Kin. xxi. 10-13), Stephen (Acts vi. 11), and our Lord (Mat. ix. 3, xxvi. 65, 66; John x. 36).

Blasphemy against the Holy Ghost consisted in attributing the miracles of Christ, which were wrought by the Spirit of God, to Satanic power (Mat. xii. 22-32; Mark iii. 22-30).

Blas'tus

 [a sprout or shoot, a sucker].

A palace functionary who had charge of Herod Agrippa's bedchamber (Acts xii. 20).

Bless.

The three leading meanings which the verb bless has in Scripture are

- 1 To bestow divine favor and confer divine benefits (Gen. i. 22; ii. 3; ix. 1-7)
- 2 To adore God for his goodness and return thanks (Ps. ciii. 1; and Mat. xxvi. 26; Mark xiv. 22 with Luke xxii. 19 and 1 Cor. xi. 24).
- 3 To invoke God's favor on a person (Gen. xxvii. 4, 27-29; 1 Chron. xvi. 2, Ps. cxxix. 8), including salutation and even the ordinary greeting, "Peace be to you" (1 Sam. xxv. 6, 14, 2 Kin. iv. 29).

Bless'ing.

Any advantage conferred or wished for. Specially—

- 1 Favors, advantages, conferred by God, and bringing pleasure or happiness in their train (Gen. xxxix. 5. Deut. xxviii. 8, Prov. x. 22, etc.)
- 2 The invocation of God's favor upon a person (Gen. xxvii. 12)
- 3 A present, a token of good will (Gen. xxxix. 11; Josh. xv. 19; 2 Kin. v. 15)

Blind'ness.

Blindness is extremely prevalent in the east. Its main causes are smallpox, and especially ophthalmia, aggravated by peculiar conditions, such as the perpetual glare of the sun, the quantity of fine dust in the air, and flies. Children are also sometimes born blind (John ix. 1). Consequently blind beggars are frequent (Mat. ix. 27; xii. 22; xx. 30; xxi. 14). Total or partial blindness may result from old age (Gen. xxvii. 1; 1 Sam. iv. 15; 1 Kin. xiv. 4). The eyes of captives taken in war were frequently put out by barbarous victors, as by the Ammonites, Philistines, Assyrians, and Babylonians (Judg. xvi. 21: 1 Sam. xi. 2; 2 Kin. xxv. 7). In a few instances men were miraculously smitten with temporary blindness (Gen. xix. 11; 2 Kin. vi. 18-22; Acts ix. 9; xiii. 11). The Mosaic law inculcated the exercise of humanity toward the blind (Lev. xix. 14; Deut. xxvii. 18).

Assyrian King piercing the Eyes of Captives

Blood.

The vital fluid circulating through the body, and conveyed by a system of deep-seated arteries from the heart to the extremities, and by a system of superficial veins back again to the heart. Arterial blood is florid red, while venous blood is of a dark purple or modena hue. The life is in the blood (Lev. xvii. 11, 14); or the blood is the life (Deut. xii. 23), though not exclusively (Ps. civ. 30). The blood represented the life, and so sacred is life before God that the blood of murdered Abel could be described as crying to God from the ground for vengeance (Gen. iv. 10); and immediately after the flood the eating of the blood of the lower animals was forbidden, although their slaughter for food was authorized (ix. 3, 4; Acts xv. 20, 29), and the law was laid down, "Who so sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed" (Gen. ix. 6). The loss of life is the penalty for sin, and its typical vicarious surrender was necessary to remission (Heb. ix. 22), and so, under the Mosaic law, the blood of animals was used in all offerings for sin, and the blood of beasts killed on the hunt or slaughtered for food was poured out and covered with earth, because withheld by God from man's consumption and reserved for purposes of atonement (Lev. xvii. 10-14; Deut. xii. 15, 16). The "blood of Jesus," the "blood of Christ," the "blood of Jesus Christ," or "the blood of the Lamb," are figurative expressions for his atoning death (1 Cor. x. 16; Eph. ii. 13; Heb. ix. 14; x. 19; 1 Pet. i. 2, 19; 1 John i. 7; Rev. vii. 14; xii. 11).

For revenger, or rather avenger, of blood, see AVENGER.

Blood'y Flux. See DYSENTERY.

Blood'y Sweat. See SWEAT.

Bo-a-ner'ges [sons of tumult or thunder].

A name given by Jesus to James and John on account of their impetuosity (Mark iii. 17; cp. Luke ix. 54, 55).

Boar.

The rendering of the Hebrew H'zir, when it refers to wild swine, and especially to the male of wild swine (Ps. lxxx. 13). When the reference is to the domesticated animal, it is rendered swine. The wild boar is three or more feet long, not counting the tail. The canine teeth project beyond the upper lip, constituting formidable tusks with which it seeks to rip up its assailants. The female is smaller than the male, and has smaller tusks. The animal is still found in Palestine, especially in the ravines east of the Jordan, in the valley near Jericho, in the swamps of the waters of Merom, on Tabor, Lebanon, and Carmel, and in the plain of Sharon.

Bo'az, in A V of N T Bo'oz [commonly interpreted as meaning "In him is strength," but both spelling and accentuation are against this explanation]

1 A wealthy and honorable Bethlehemite, kinsman to the husband of Ruth the Moabitess. He respected the memory of the dead by marrying Ruth after the decease of her husband, and became ancestor of David and of Christ (Ruth ii-iv. Mat. i. 5). Late Jewish tradition, destitute of all probability, identifies him with the judge Iban.

2 One of two pillars, that on the left, set up in the porch of Solomon's temple (1 Kin. vii. 15-22).

Boch'e-ru [firstborn]

A son of Azel and a descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (1 Chron. viii. 38).

Bo'chim [weepers]

A place near Gilgal, where the Israelites repented and wept under the rebuke of the angel of the Lord for their disobedience of God's commands (Judg. ii. 1-5). Its exact site is unknown.

Bo'han [thumb].

1 A son of Reuben (Josh. xv. 6; xviii. 17), unless Bohan is a common noun in these passages.

2 The stone of Bohan, son of Reuben, or the stone known as the Reubenite's thumb, was a landmark on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin, not a great distance from the Jordan (Josh. xv. 6; xviii. 17). Exact site unknown.

Boil.

An inflamed ulcer. It was inflicted along with blains as the sixth plague of Egypt (Ex. ix. 8-11; cp. Deut. xxviii. 27, 35). It was a prominent symptom in leprosy (Lev. xiii. 18-20). It constituted the main feature of Hezekiah's disease, which brought his life into imminent danger (2 Kin. xx. 7; Is. xxxviii. 21). Job was smitten by Satan with boils from head to foot (Job ii. 7). Ordinary boils are common, in the warmer parts of the East, during the rainy season. They are unsightly.

but are not dangerous. One type of boil, however, the carbuncle, arising from poisoned blood and eating away the flesh like an ulcer, may terminate the life. This was probably Hezekiah's disease. The application of a poultice of figs would do it good, but the rapid cure was due to God.

Bol'ster.

The usual Hebrew word which is rendered bolster or pillow means simply at the head, and the Greek word rendered pillow in A. V. does not necessarily mean a cushion for the head. Jacob, sleeping in the open field, took a stone to support his head (Gen xxviii. 11, 18). Jesus probably placed the leather cushion of the steersman's seat under his head when he lay down to sleep in the stern of the boat (Mark iv. 38). Michal put some article of goats' hair at the head of the teraphim which she laid in the bed to deceive the messengers who were sent to take David. She did this perhaps to give the appearance of human hair or of a covering laid over the sleeper (1 Sam. xix. 13).

Bon'net.

Originally a head dress for men (Ezek. xlv. 18), a sense which the word still retains in Scotland. Then it was applied to a head dress for women (Is iii. 20). The R. V. renders it head tires and tires (q v).

Book.

Documents were early inscribed on clay or graven on stone. Skin or parchment and papyrus came into use at an early period also. When written on skin, a long document took the form of a roll with writing on one or both of its sides. Of this type of book there is a memorial in the word volume, Latin volumen, properly, something rolled up (Ps xl. 7; Jer. xxxvi. 2; Ezek. ii. 9). Books are first mentioned as written by the Hebrews after the sojourn in Egypt, where written literature had existed for centuries (Ex. xvii. 14). The 39 books of the O. T. and the 27 of the N. T., which constitute the canon of Scripture, do not represent the entire literary activity of the Hebrews during the time embraced by the canon. There were, for example, the books of the Apocrypha. Later there were memoirs of Jesus (Luke i. 1). In the O. T. period there were two poetical books at least, the Book of the Wars of Jehovah and the Book of Jashar (Num. xxi. 14; Josh. x. 13). The events of the reigns of David and Solomon were recorded in the History of Samuel the Seer, the History of Nathan the Prophet, the History of Gad the Seer (1 Chron. xxix. 29; 2 Chron. ix. 29), and also in the Chronicles of King David, which apparently mark the beginning of the custom of keeping royal annals (1 Chron. xxvii. 24). The reigns of Solomon and Jeroboam found record in the Visions of Iddo the Seer (2 Chron. ix. 29), and Rehoboam's reign in the History of Shemaiah the Prophet and in the History of Iddo the Seer (xii. 15). The Chronicles of the Kings of Israel and the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah recorded the history of the two kingdoms from the time of Rehoboam and Jeroboam, until as late as the reign of Jehoiakim (1 Kin. xiv. 19, 29; 2 Kin. xxiv. 5; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 8); see KINGS. In addition to these works, there was quite a library in existence at the time when the books of Chronicles were written, consisting largely of monographs, of which not a few titles are cited (2 Chron. ix. 29, xiii. 22; xx. 34; xxiv. 27; xxvi. 22, xxxii. 32; xxxiii. 18, 19; xxxv. 25; see also Prov. xxv. 1; 1 Kin. iv. 32, 33).

Booth.

A rude habitation designed in most cases for a longer occupation than a tent, but not for permanence like a house. It was often formed with branches of trees. Jacob made booths at Shechem for his cattle, the place in consequence being afterwards called Succoth (Gen. xxxii. 17). The keeper of a vineyard occupied a booth (Job xxvii. 18; Is i. 8, R. V.), which during the vintage sheltered the owner and his friends. The Israelites were required to form booths of branches of trees, palm leaves, etc., and dwell in them for seven days at the feast of tabernacles. The booths at this harvest festival were a reminder of the vintage life, but with this recollection there was also to be associated the memory of their deliverance from Egypt, when they sojourned in the wilderness without permanent habitation (Lev. xxiii. 39-43, Neh. viii. 14).

Boo'ty.

The plunder of a conquered district or town. It consisted of everything of value—household goods, gold, silver, cattle, and captives to be used as slaves (Gen. xiv. 11, 12, 16; Num. xxxi. 9, 26-52; Josh. vii. 21). At the conquest of Canaan the Israelites were required to slay everything that breathed and to destroy all idols and places of idolatrous worship, but in foreign conquests they were bidden to slay the men only, and were authorized to take the remaining spoil (Num. xxxiii. 52; Deut. xx. 14-16). Exceptions were occasionally made when everything was devoted, the living to destruction, the goods to the treasury of the sanctuary, or when a certain portion of the spoil was dedicated to the Lord (Num. xxxi. 26-47; Josh. vi. 19; 1 Sam. xv. 2, 3). David made a law that the troops detailed to guard the baggage should share equally with those who engaged in the battle (1 Sam. xxx. 23-25).

Bo'oz. See BOAZ.

Bor'row.

To ask in loan. Did the Israelites, when the Egyptians urged them to leave the country, borrow goods from the Egyptians or obtain them as gifts? The word rendered borrow in A. V. of Ex. iii. 22; xi. 2; xii. 35, means simply ask (R. V.) or request, whether the object desired was to be returned (2 Kin. vi. 5) or not (Judg. v. 25; viii. 24); and the word translated lend (Ex. xii. 36, A. V.) is a form of the same verb, and means to grant a request or let one have what one asks (R. V; cp. 1 Sam. i. 28)

Bos'cath. See BOZKATH

Bo'sor.

1 A town of Gilead, Gilead being doubtless used in a broad sense (1 Mac. v. 26, 36); perhaps Bezer in the former territory of Reuben (Josh. xx. 8).

2 See BEOR.

Bos'o-ra.

A town of Gilead (1 Mac. v. 26, 28), either Bozrah in Edom or Bostra in Hauran.

Botch.

The rendering in A. V. of Deut. xxviii. 27, 35 of the Hebrew word elsewhere translated boil.

Bot'tle.

1 A hollow vessel of leather, or the hollow hide of an animal, used for holding liquids (Job xxxii. 19; Mat. ix. 17). See under BUTLER.

Skin Bottles.

2. A small vessel of earthenware formed by potters, and which was capable of being broken (Jer. xix. 1, 10, 11). If any glass bottle is referred to in Scripture it was probably a small lachrymatory for holding tears (Ps. lvi. 8).

Bow.

A weapon used for shooting arrows (2 Kin.

35; Job. xx. 24), with a cord stretched between its two ends (Ps. xi. 2), and was held in the left hand (Ezek. xxxix. 3). It was used both in hunting and war (Gen. xxvii. 3; xlviii. 22). Its use was general among the nations of antiquity (1 Sam. xxxi. 3; 1 Kin. xxii. 34; Jer. xli. 9, xlix. 35). There were archers among the soldiers of Reuben, Gad, the half tribe of Manasseh, Ephraim, and especially Benjamin (1 Chron. v. 18, 2 Chron. xiv. 8; Ps. lxxviii. 9). The bow was carried by officers and soldiers on foot, in chariots, or on horseback (2 Kin. ix. 24). The archers carried the little shield and a sword (1 Sam. xviii. 4; 1 Chron. v. 18; 2 Chron. xiv. 8), and with the slingers constituted the light-armed troops.

The arrows were of cane or polished wood, and were carried in a quiver (Lam. iii. 13, Is. xlix. 2; Ezek. xxxix. 9). Their heads were made of iron, copper, or stone, and were sometimes poisoned (Job vi. 4).

Bowl. See BASIN.

Box.

1. A small case or vessel with a cover. In Scripture times they were used to hold oil, ointment, etc. (2 Kin. ix. 1; Mat. xxvi. 7).

2. The rendering of the Hebrew T'ash-shûr, meaning a straight tree. Boat seats were made of it (Ezek. xxvii. 6, R. V.), and writing tablets (2 Esdr. xiv. 24). The box, fir, and pine were the glory of Lebanon (Is. lx. 13; on R. V. margin of Is. xli. 19 cypress). The box tree of Lebanon is Burnus longifolia, a small evergreen tree about 20 feet high.

Bo'zez [shining].

Of two crags near Gibeah, the northernmost, in front of Michmash (1 Sam. xiv. 4, 5). It overlooked the Wady Suweinit.

Boz'kath, in A. V. once Bos'cath [elevated, stony ground].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 39). Josiah's maternal grandfather, Adaiah, was of the place (2 Kin. xxii. 1). Exact site unknown.

Boz'rah [an enclosure, a sheepfold].

Bow used in Battle between Assyrians and their Foes.

vi. 22; 1 Chron. xii. 2). It was made of a strip of elastic wood or metal (2 Sam. xxii.

1. An important city of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 33; 1 Chron. i. 44; Is. xxxiv. 6; lxiii. 1).

Amos predicted that its palaces should be destroyed (Amos 1. 12); and Jeremiah foretold its utter destruction (Jer. xlix 13, 22). It was noted for its sheep (Mic 1. 12). Burckhardt and Robinson located it at el-Buseira, a village of some fifty houses, about 18 miles southeast of the Dead Sea. This identification is generally accepted.

2 A city of Moab mentioned with Kerioth, Beth-meon, Dibon, and other towns of the plateau (Jer. xlviii. 24); probably the same as Bezer (in Septuagint, Bosor).

Brace'let.

An ornament for the wrist or for the arm, worn by both sexes (Ezek xvi 11). One was put on Rebekah's wrist by Abraham's servant (Gen. xxiv 22). Bracelets were given by the Israelites in the wilderness to furnish gold or silver for the construction of the vessels of the tabernacle (Num xxxi. 50). Saul wore one, unless what he had on was rather an armlet (2 Sam i 10). For bracelet in A V in Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25, R V substitutes cord; in Ex xxxv. 22, brooches; and in Is. iii 19, on the margin, chains.

Egyptian Bracelets.

Bram'ble.

The rendering of the Hebrew word 'Atad' in Judg. ix. 14, 15. The plant is named from its firmness. The R V renders it on the margin by thorn, and both versions so translate the word in Ps. lvm 9. It is doubtless a variety of Rhamnus. The Septuagint and Vulgate render it by Rhamnus. This thorn is quite common in the warmer parts of Palestine, especially in the vicinity of the Dead Sea (cp. Gen. i 10), in the Jordan valley, and about the Sea of Galilee. It is also found at Jerusalem. The Rhamnus is still called by the Arabs 'atad' or nabk, applying the name not only to Christ's Thorn (Zizyphus spina Christi), which takes its name from the tradition that the crown placed on Christ's head was made from its twigs, but apparently also to Rhamnus palustris.

Branch.

A title applied to the Messiah as the offspring of David (Jer xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15; Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12).

Brass.

The rendering of the Hebrew word N'hosheth and the Greek Chalkos. The margin of the R. V., however, at Gen. iv. 22 gives copper as a constant alternative. Copper was smelted from the ore dug from the ground (Deut. viii. 9; Job xxviii. 2). Traces of ancient copper works exist in Lebanon and in Edom. It was obtained notably in the peninsula of Sinai, in Cyprus, and in Meshech and Tubal (Ezek. xxvii 13). Brass is an alloy of copper with from 28 to 34 per cent. of zinc. Unless accidentally associated with calamine, it does not occur in nature, but is an artificial product. The assertion used to be made that it was not known till it was accidentally formed by the running together of different melted metals when Corinth was burned, 146 B C., by the consul Mummius. But vessels of brass have been found of much higher antiquity in Egyptian tombs. Bronze is another artificial product from copper, being an alloy of copper and tin. From copper and its alloys utensils were made: pots, shovels, basins, pans, spoons, snuffers (Ex xxxviii. 3, Lev. vi 28; Num xvi 39; Jer li 18); armor, also, such as helmets, coats of mail, greaves, shields, spear points, and even bows (2 Sam xxi 16, xxii 35, R.V.; 2 Chron xii 10), fetters also, mirrors, city gates, musical instruments, idols, and in later times coins (Ex xxxviii 8, 2 Kin xxv 7, 13, Is xlv 2, Mat x 9, 1 Cor. xiii 1; Rev ix 20). Where casting is spoken of, the metal was bronze. Thus were made the plating and railing for the altar, the lavers and the sea with its pedestal of oxen, and two magnificent pillars for the temple (1 Kin. vii 41-46; 2 Chron iv 1-17).

Bra'zen Ser'pent.

The figure of a serpent, made of metal, and erected by Moses on a pole in the wilderness, that the Israelites who were bitten by fiery serpents might look at it with faith in God's promise to heal those who looked (Num. xxi. 8, 9). In after years the Israelites began to use it as an idol, and Hezekiah had it broken in pieces, contemptuously calling it N'hush-tan, that is to say, only a piece of brass (2 Kin xviii. 4). Jesus in foretelling his crucifixion explained its spiritual significance by comparing it with the rearing of the brazen serpent (John iii 14, 15).

Bread.

The bread in use among the Israelites consisted generally of small flatcakes of wheat flour or, among the poor, of barley flour. The grain was ground daily in a hand mill, and fresh bread baked every day. When this bread was to be eaten at once, it was often unleavened (Gen. xix 3; 1 Sam xxviii. 24), but the art of making leavened bread was also understood (Mat xiii 33). The showbread which was edible after eight days was evidently leavened. The flour was made into a paste or dough by mixing with water, and might be leavened some time after mixing; for example, at the first passover the dough was already mixed in the troughs, but not yet leavened when the order came to march (Ex xii 34).

The oven used by private families was a portable jar in which, after it had been heated, the loaves were laid or were stuck against the sides, the cakes baked in this later fashion being very thin.

Besides the bread baked in the oven (Lev. ii. 4), cakes also were baked on a slightly concave pan put over a fire, these being something like pancakes (Lev. ii. 5). Bread was also baked on the heated hearth or on any hot stones after the ashes were swept aside (1 Kin. xix. 6). This kind was made especially when food was wanted in a hurry (Gen. xviii. 6). The Bedouin at present commonly bake by placing their loaves in a hole in the ground distinguished leader of the Jerusalem church (Acts xii. 17; xv. 13; Gal. ii. 9), and was the author of the epistle which goes by his name. In what sense they were Christ's "brethren" has been much disputed. In very early times they were regarded as the children of Joseph by a former marriage. The disappearance of Joseph from the gospels suggests that he had died, and may have been much older than Mary, and may have been previously married. This view is a possible one, but, in view of Mat. i. 25 and Luke. ii. 7, not which has previously held a fire and then been cleared out. The hole is carefully covered and the bread allowed to bake all night. This method was probably well known to the Israelites. Baking was ordinarily done by the women (Gen. xviii. 6; 1 Sam. viii. 13; Lev. xxvi. 26; but Judg. vi. 19), and in large households by the slaves, but in the cities there were also bakers who sold bread (Jer. xxxvii. 21, cp. Hos. vii. 4, 6). In the second chapter of Leviticus is given a list of the different kinds of bread which were acceptable as offerings. In some places the word is applied to all kinds of food (Luke xi. 3).

Breast'plate.

1 A sacred article of dress worn by the Jewish high priest (Ex. xxviii. 15-30). See HIGH PRIEST.

2 Armor designed to protect the body in battle (Rev. ix. 9). See ARMOR. Figuratively, righteousness (Is. lix. 17; Eph. vi. 14; Wisd. v. 19), or faith and love, constitute a spiritual breastplate (1 Thes. v. 8).

Breth'ren of the Lord.

Their names are given in the gospels as James, Joseph or Joses, Simon, and Judas (Mat. xii. 55; R. V.; Mark vi. 3). They appear in company with Mary (Mat. xii. 47-50; Mark iii. 31-35; Luke viii. 19-21), moved to Capernaum with her and Jesus and the latter's disciples at the beginning of Christ's ministry (John ii. 12), but are said not to have believed in Jesus even toward the close of his life (John vii. 4, 5). After the resurrection, however, they are found united with the disciples (Acts i. 14), and are afterwards mentioned as Christian workers (1 Cor. ix. 5). One of them, James (Gal. i. 19), became a probable. In the fourth century Jerome proposed another view; viz., that they were Christ's cousins on his mother's side, the children of Alphæus (or Clopas) and Mary's sister of the same name. This is inferred mainly from a combination of Mark xv. 40 and John xix. 25 (the latter being thought to mention but three women), and from the identity of the names Alphæus and Clopas. On this view one (James the son of Alphæus) and perhaps more (Simon and Judas) of the apostles were Christ's brethren. But the apostles are distinguished from his brethren; the latter did not believe in him, and it is unlikely that two sisters had the same name. Another very old view was that they were cousins on Joseph's side, and some have even supposed they were the children of the widow of Joseph's brother (Deut. xxv. 5-10). But all these theories appear to have originated from a wish to maintain the perpetual virginity of Mary. That they were the children of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus, is the natural view, and that Mary had other children is implied in Mat. i. 25; Luke ii. 7. This view explains also the constant association of "the brethren" with Mary.

G. T. P.

Brick.

A mass of clay tempered, made rectangular in shape, and hardened either by burning in a kiln (Gen. xi. 3) or by drying in the sun (Herod. ii. 136). They were of course sun-dried when the clay was mixed with straw (Ex. v. 7). Both bricks and tiles are often found stamped with names and inscriptions, from which we have derived much of our knowledge of those ancient times, as well as from the tablets of burnt clay specially prepared as documents in a similar way (cp. Ezek. iv. 1). For illustration of brickmaking, see EGYPT.

Brick bearing Name and Inscription of Nebuchadnezzar

Brick'kiln.

A kiln for enclosing bricks while they are being burned (2 Sam. xii. 31 and Nah. iii. 14, where R. V. margin translates brickmould; Jer. xlii. 9, in R. V. brickwork).

Bri'er.

The rendering of six distinct Hebrew words and of one Greek word.

1. Barkan (Judg. viii. 7, 16); perhaps, as etymology suggests, so named because it grows in stony ground.

2. Shamir, bristling, prickly (Is. ix. 18; x. 17; xxvii. 4; xxxii. 13), such as springs up in abandoned vineyards (v. 6; vii. 23).

3. Sirpad (Is. lv. 13). Septuagint and Vulgate render it nettle.

4. Sarab, refractory (Ezek. ii. 6).

5. Sillon (Ezek. xxviii. 24, in ii. 6 rendered thorn).

6. Hedek (Mic. vii. 4), used in hedges (Prov. xv. 19, where it is rendered thorn). The corresponding word in Arabic means the Egg-plant, Mad-apple, Jew's-apple or Brinjal (Solanum melongena), one variety of which is thorny. It is a native of India and, it is believed, of Arabia. It is of the same genus as the potato, but the edible part is the fruit, which is much used in curries in the East.

7. Greek Akantha, a thorn or a prickly plant or thorny tree (Heb. vi. 8, A. V.).

Brig'an-dine.

A name for a coat of mail, composed of light thin-jointed scales, or of thin pliant plate armor (Jer. xli. 4, li. 3). The R. V. substitutes coat of mail.

Brim'stone.

Sulphur (Gen. xix. 24, Deut. xxix. 23).

Brook.

A small perennial stream, as the Kishon (1 Kin. xviii. 40) and the Jabbok (Gen. xxxii. 23, A. V.). Generally, however, in Scripture the word is used for a stream which flows in the rainy, winter season, but is dry in summer, as the brook of Egypt (Num. xxxiv. 5, R. V.; see RIVER), the Zered (Deut. ii. 13), and the Kidron (2 Sam. xv. 23, John xviii. 1, R. V.).

Broom.

A much-branched bush, with twiggy, nearly leafless, branches, and clusters of pinkish-white flowers, which grows in the Jordan valley and Arabia, and is common in the peninsula of Sinai (Job xxx. 4; 1 Kin. xix. 4). Its large root stalk is made into charcoal (Ps. cxx. 4). In the text of the last two passages in the R. V., and in all the three in the A. V., it is rendered juniper, but the Hebrew word corresponds to the still existing Arabic name for Retama, broom.

Broth'er.

1. A kinsman born of the same parents as the person to whom he is brother (Gen. xxvii. 6), or at least of the same father (xxviii. 2) or the same mother (Judg. viii. 19).

2. A man of the same near ancestry (as a nephew, Gen. xiv. 16), or of the same race or of a kindred nation (Deut. xxiii. 7; Neh. v. 7; Jer. xxxiv. 9).

3. An ally (Amos i. 9) or co-religionist (Acts ix. 17; 1 Cor. vi. 6; 2 Cor. ii. 13), often in the plural applied to Christian disciples (Mat. xxiii. 8; Rom. i. 13).

4. One of the male sex greatly beloved or politely addressed by the person who calls him brother (2 Sam. i. 26, 1 Kin. xx. 32).

5. Any man whatever, the common brotherhood of the human race being recognized (Gen. ix. 5, Mat. v. 22; xviii. 35).

Buck'ler.

See ARMOR.

Buk'ki [abbreviation of Bukkiah].

1. Prince of the tribe of Dan and member of the commission for allotting the land (Num. xxxiv. 22).

2. A descendant of Aaron, in the high-priestly line of Phinehas (1 Chron. vi. 5, 51; Ezra vii. 4).

Buk-ki'ah [devastation sent by Jehovah].

A Levite, son of Heman, and head of the sixth of the twenty-four companies of twelve musicians each which David appointed for the service of the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 13).

Bul [growth].

The eighth month of the Jewish year (1 Kin. vi. 38). See YEAR.

Bull.

The male of the species called by naturalists Bos taurus (Job xxi. 10; Ps. lxxviii. 30; Is. xxxiv. 7; Jer. lii. 20; see OX). A particularly strong and fierce breed of bulls existed in Bashan (Ps. xxii. 12).

The word To, rendered wild ox and wild bull in A. V. (Deut. xiv. 5; Is. li. 20), is translated in R. V. by antelope (q. v.).

Bull'ock.

A young bull, though the Hebrew word is used once of an animal seven years old (Judg. vi. 25). Bullocks were used as draught animals bearing a yoke (Jer. xxxi. 18, A. V.), and were largely offered in sacrifice (Ex xxix. 1; 1 Chron. xxix. 21).

Bul'rush [bull, i. e. a large, rush].

1. Hebrew Gome' (Ex. ii. 3; Is xviii. 2, A. V.); papyrus (q. v.).

2. Hebrew 'Aqmon. The etymology suggests that it grows in swamps; and it is a low plant (Is ix 14; xix 15), bows the head (lviii 5), and was twisted into ropes (Job xli. 2, R. V. margin).

• Bu'nah [prudence]

A descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 25).

Bun'ni [built, erected].

1. A Levite who lived before the exile (Neh. xi. 15).

2. A Levite, contemporary of Nehemiah (Neh. ix. 4).

3. Representative of a family or father's house who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 15).

Bur'den.

1. A heavy load to be borne; used in a literal or a figurative sense (Ex xxiii. 5; Num. xi. 11, etc.).

2. An utterance or prophecy, in almost every instance denouncing heavy judgment on a place or people (Is. xiv. 28; xv. 1, Ezek. xii. 10, Hos. viii. 10, Nah. i. 1).

Bur'ī-al.

Interment, the committal of a corpse to the ground, or its disposal in another reverential way. When a death occurred friends, especially women, hurried to the house and made loud lamentation (Mark v. 38). Mourners were even hired (Jer. ix. 17). The body was washed (Acts ix. 37), and wrapped in a cloth or closely bound in bands (Mat. xxvii. 59, John xi. 44). The wealthy added spices and perfumes (John xii. 7, xix. 39) or burned fragrant materials (Jer. xxxiv. 5). The body was carried upon a bier to the grave (2 Sam. iii. 31, Luke vii. 14). Burial was generally in a cave or in a sepulcher scooped horizontally in the rock (Gen. xxv. 9, 10; Mat. xxvii. 60). See MOURNING and SEPULCHER.

Burnt Offer-ing. See OFFERINGS.

Burnt Sac'ri-fice, the same as burnt offering. See OFFERINGS.

Bush.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Sueh and Greek Batos, a thorny bush (Luke vi. 44), which Moses saw burning and from which Jehovah spoke (Ex. iii. 2, 3; Deut. xxxiii. 16; Mark xii. 26). Tristram believes it to have been the Acacia vera or nilotica, the Egyptian thorn. It is a withered-looking thorny tree, 12 feet high, with bipinnate leaves and white flowers. It grows throughout a large part of Africa, also in the Sinai Peninsula, and, in Palestine, on the shores of the Dead Sea. It yields the gum arabic of commerce, which naturally exudes in a nearly fluid state from the trunk and branches, hardening on exposure to the air.

2. Hebrew Shah (Job. xxx. 4, 7; and Gen. ii. 5, where it is rendered plant); a shrub large enough to afford some shade (Gen. xxi. 15, where it is rendered shrub).

3. Hebrew Nah'lol (Is. vii. 19), rendered in the text of R. V. by pasture, and on the margin of the A. V. by commendable trees.

Bush'el.

The rendering of the Greek Modios, a dry measure containing more than two gallons (Mat. v. 15; Mark iv. 21). See MEASURE.

But'ler. See CUPBEARER.

But'ter.

In Scripture, curdled milk or curds (Gen. xviii. 8; Deut. xxxii. 14; Prov. xxx. 33; Is. vii. 15, 22). On margin of R. V. of Is. vii. 15 the translation is curds. Thomson says that neither the ancient nor the modern Orientals have made butter in our sense of the word. The butter given to Sisera by Jael was sour milk, called in Arabic leben. The butter, so called, of Prov. xxx. 33 is a production made in this way. A bottle formed by stripping off the entire skin of a young buffalo is filled with milk and then perseveringly kneaded or shaken by women. Then the contents are taken out, boiled or melted, and put into bottles of goats' skins. In winter it resembles candied honey, and in summer is mere oil.

Buz [contempt]

1. An Aramæan tribe, descended from a son of Nahor (Gen. xxii. 20, 21), and probably dwelling in Jeremiah's time near Dedan and Tema in Arabia (Jer. xxv. 23).

2. A Gadite, founder of a tribal family or house (1 Chron. v. 14).

Bu'zi [descendant of Buz]

Father of the priest and prophet Ezekiel (Ezek. i. 3).

Buz'ite.

One belonging to the Arabian tribe of Buz (Job. xxxii. 2).

C.

Cab, in R. V. Kab [a hollow vessel].

A Hebrew measure of capacity for dry articles (2 Kin. vi. 25). It held, according to Rabbinical tradition, the sixth part of a seah or one hundred and eightieth part of a homer.

Cab'bon [a cake, or perhaps a binding].

A village of Judah in the lowland (Josh. xv. 46). Perhaps identical with Machbenah (1 Chron. ii. 49). The radical letters are the same and the location is suitable.

Ca'bul [perhaps, fettered land; proverbial for hard, dry land which produces no fruit].

1. A town of Asher (Josh. xix. 27; Life 43, 45). It is still known as Kabûl, a village 9 miles east-southeast of Acre.

2. A district of Gahlee, that is, of the northern part of the territory of Naphtali, for the most part inhabited by people other than Israelites (Is. ix. 1). It contained twenty towns, which Solomon presented to Hiram, king of Tyre, in return for services rendered in connection with the building of the temple. Hiram was displeased with the gift, and therefore called the region Cabul (1 Kin. ix. 13). Hiram thus apparently rejected the proffered compensation as inadequate, and returned the district to Solomon, who thereupon fortified the cities thus put back on his hands, and caused Israelites to dwell in them (2 Chron. viii 2; Antiq viii 5, 3).

Cæ'sar.

The family name of a branch of the Julian house or clan in Rome. According to Pliny (7, 9), the first who bore the name was so called quod cæso mortuæ matris utero natus fuerit. Though it is traceable from 501 B. C., it did not gain extensive celebrity till it was borne by Caius Julius Cæsar, who ranks with Alexander the Great and Napoleon as one of the three most remarkable conquerors the civilized world has produced. On the assassination of Julius Cæsar, 44 B. C., his will requested his grandnephew Octavius, afterwards the emperor Augustus, to assume the name of Cæsar. Tiberius, who succeeded Augustus, and Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, who followed in succession, were all entitled by relationship to the great dictator to bear the family name; the seven succeeding emperors—Galba, Otho, Vitellius, Vespasian, Titus, Domitian, and Nerva—assumed it, so that it is customary to speak of the twelve Cæsars. From having been the name of one mighty conqueror, and then of a series of emperors, the name Cæsar became the type or symbol of the civil power in general, and it is continually used in this sense in discussions as to the relative domains of civil and ecclesiastical rulers (cp. Mat. xxii 17, 21; Mark xii 14, 16, 17; Luke xx 22, 24, 25).

The name Cæsar is applied in the N. T. to:

1. AUGUSTUS CÆSAR, the first Roman emperor (Luke ii. 1). In 43 B. C. he was named one of the second triumvirate, Marc Antony and Lepidus being the other two. Lepidus was found incompetent and forced to retire; and after the defeat of Antony at Actium in 31 B. C. Augustus was sole ruler of the Roman world, and was given the title of emperor. It was in consequence of a decree of Augustus that Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem to be taxed, at the time of Christ's birth. Although Augustus was not fond of the Jews, he favored them from policy, and caused sacrifices to be made daily in the temple at Jerusalem at his expense. He was friendly to Herod, recognizing that in him he had a valuable ally. Cæsarea Philippi and Cæsarea by the Sea were built in his honor by Herod. Augustus died A. D. 14, in the sixty-seventh year of his age.

2. TIBERIUS CÆSAR, the second Roman emperor (Mat. xxii 17, Mark xii 14; Luke iii. 1; xx. 21, 22, John xix. 12), born 42 B. C., was the adopted son, also stepson and son-in-law, of Augustus. He was of a morose and gloomy temper, and spent a large part of his reign in voluntary exile on the island of Capri. During his reign Judæa was governed by Valerius Gratus and Pontius Pilatus. At one time he banished the Jews from Rome, but later recalled the edict, and gave them redress for the seventy of the provincial governors. Tiberias, on the sea of Galilee, was built in his honor by Herod Antipas. His death was hastened by the hand of Caligula, A. D. 37. See p. 134, years 12-37.

Bust of Tiberius

Coin with Head of Claudius

3. CLAUDIUS, the fourth Roman emperor. He was a weak, vacillating man, a nephew of Tiberius. He was made emperor almost against his will, and left the real power in the hands of unprincipled favorites. Herod Agrippa I. had been in Rome, and had assisted in his coronation, and in consequence was given the whole of Palestine as a mark of favor. In the beginning of his reign Claudius favored the Jews, and reinstated the Alexandrian Jews in their former privileges, but later he banished all Jews from Rome (Acts xviii 2). He died A. D. 54, in the fourteenth year of his reign.

4. NERO, the fifth Roman emperor (Acts xxv. 12, 21; xxvi 32; Phil iv 22). He was the adopted son of his predecessor Claudius, and secured his own position by poisoning his stepbrother Britannicus. Nero was a monster of lust and cruelty, though, perhaps, his crimes have been exaggerated. In the tenth year of his reign, A. D. 64, a great fire broke out at Rome, in large measure destroying three of the fourteen districts into which the city was divided. The emperor was believed, apparently on insufficient evidence, to have been himself the incendiary, and was in consequence in danger of his life. To screen himself, he falsely accused the Christians of having caused the fire, and put many of them to cruel deaths, tradition adding that both Paul and Peter were among the sufferers. Nero is the "lion" of 2 Tim. iv 17. Finding that he was deserted by his troops, and that he would soon be put to death, he anticipated his fate. Like Saul, he attempted suicide, and, failing, induced one of his supporters to complete the act of slaughter. He died A. D. 68, in the thirty-second year of his age and the fourteenth of his reign.

TITUS, son of Vespasian, and tenth Roman emperor. In A. D. 66 Vespasian was sent to Palestine to quell a revolt of the Jews, and Titus accompanied him. In 69, when Vespasian hurried from Judea to Rome to secure the imperial office for himself, he left Titus in command of the army, and Titus conducted the siege of Jerusalem in A. D. 70 (War iii. 1, 3-vii. 3, 1); see JERUSALEM II. 3

Coin with Head of Titus

Titus became emperor in 79, and died in 81, in the fortieth year of his age.

Cæs-a-re'a [pertaining to Cæsar]

A city on the coast of Palestine, about 23 miles south of mount Carmel. It was built by Herod the Great, on the site of a town called Strato's Tower. Twelve years, from 25 to 13 B. C., were spent in its erection. A sea mole was built of stones 50 feet long, 18 broad, and 9 deep. It was 200 feet wide, stood in 20 fathoms of water, and enclosed a harbor as large as that at Athens. The entrance to the artificial port was on the north, where there was a tower. The city was provided with a temple, a theater, and an amphitheater, and had a complete system of drainage. Herod named the place Cæsarea, after his patron Augustus Cæsar (Antiq. xv. 9, 6; War i 21, 5, seq.). It was sometimes called Cæsarea of Palestine, or Cæsarea by the Sea, to distinguish it from Cæsarea Philippi. It became the Roman capital of Palestine. The gospel was carried thither by Philip the evangelist, who made it his residence (Acts viii 40; xxi. 8). When Paul soon after his conversion, was in danger of being murdered by the Jews of Jerusalem, his Christian brethren brought him down to Cæsarea, whence he sailed to his birthplace, Tarsus, in Asia Minor (ix. 30). It was at Cæsarea that the Roman centurion Cornelius lived, to whom Peter preached Christ, and that the calling of the gentiles took place (x 1, 24; xi 11). Herod Agrippa died at Cæsarea in A. D. 44 (Acts xii. 19, 23; Antiq. xix 8, 2). Paul twice revisited the city, and found a church existing (Acts xviii 22, xxi 8, 16). He was afterwards taken thither as a prisoner (xxiii. 23, 33), and it was there that his trial before Festus and Agrippa took place (xxv. 1-4, 6-13). The population of the city was mixed, and race jealousies existed to such an extent that in the reign of Nero the Syrians made a wholesale massacre of the Jews, commencing the troubles which culminated in A. D. 70 in the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (War ii. 18, 1). In the second century A. D. Cæsarea became the residence of a bishop, who down to 451 was metropolitan of Palestine Prima. In 195 a council was held there. A Christian school was established in the city, in which Origen taught and where Eusebius, afterwards bishop of Cæsarea, was educated. In 548 the Jews and Samaritans joined in assaulting the Christians. In 638 the city was captured by the Mohammedans. In 1102 it was taken by the crusaders, led by Baldwin I. Saladin retook it from them in 1189; the crusaders recovered it in 1191, but lost it to the sultan Bibars in 1265.

The ruins are of two periods. There is, first, the Roman town with mole and walls, a theater, hippodrome, temple, and aqueducts; and, secondly, the Crusading town with walls, a castle, a cathedral, a smaller church, and a harbor. The Roman wall extends 4800 feet from north to south, and 2700 from east to west. The harbor measures 540 feet across. A reef running into the sea is probably the old mole. Cæsarea is still called Kaisárieħ able conversation took place between him and Peter arising out of the question "Who do men say that I am?" (Mat. xvi. 13; Mark viii. 27). Agrippa II. still further embellished it, and changed the name to Neronias, to compliment the emperor Nero; but on the emperor's death the name speedily lapsed (Antiq. xx. 9, 4). After the destruction of Jerusalem Titus exhibited gladiatorial shows in this town also, one part of the spectacle being Jewish captives thrown to the wild beasts, or compelled to encounter each other in deadly warfare (War vii. 2, 1; 3, 1). Part of its fortifications still remain, and there are Greek inscriptions on the adjacent rocks. The town has dwindled to a small village called Banias, an alteration of its early name Paneas.

Cage.

A box or basket, Hebrew K'hub, in which birds were kept, especially for purposes of decoy (Jer. v. 27; Eccles. xi. 30). Semacharib boasts of having shut up Hezekiah in Jerusalem like a bird in a cage.

Ca'ia-phas [depression]

Joseph Caiaphas, who was appointed to the Ruins of Cæsarea Philippi.

Cæs-a-re'a Phi-lip'pi [Cæsarea of Philip, in distinction from Cæsarea of Palestine].

A city at the foot of mount Hermon, at the main source of the Jordan, and in the angle of a small plain, with hills on all sides except on the west. It has sometimes been identified with Baal-gad. The worship of the Roman god Pan long prevailed in the locality; and Herod the Great having built a temple of fine marble near the sacred spot, the place was called Paneas (Antiq. xv. 10, 3). The town was afterwards enlarged and adorned by Philip the tetrarch, and its name altered to Cæsarea in honor of the Roman emperor Tiberius Cæsar (Antiq. xviii. 2, 1; War ii. 9, 1). Jesus and his disciples visited it at least once, and it was there that the remark-high priesthood not earlier than A. D. 18 by Valerius Gratus, the Roman procurator and immediate predecessor of Pontius Pilate (Antiq. xviii. 2, 2). Caiaphas and his father-in-law Annas (John xviii. 13) were high priests when John the Baptist commenced his ministry (Luke iii. 2). Caiaphas proposed the death of Jesus, and, speaking of its import more significantly than he was aware, said, "It is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not" (John xi. 49-53, xviii. 14). At his palace the council of chief priests, scribes, and elders was held to devise measures for the arrest of our Lord (Mat. xxvi. 3-5). When Jesus was apprehended, he was taken first to the palace of Annas, who sent him bound to Caiaphas (John xviii. 24), whence he was led next to the prætorium of Pilate (28). Deeply responsible for the judicial murder of the innocent prisoner, Caiaphas afterwards took part in the trial of Peter and John (Acts iv. 6). In A D 36 he was deposed by Vitellus, the Roman president of Syria (Antiq. xviii 4, 2).

Cain [fabrication, forged instrument, smith].

1. The elder brother of Abel, by calling an agriculturist. He brought of the fruits of the ground an offering to God, an implied acknowledgment of gratitude to God for the produce of the earth. But the heart of Cain was not right, and his offering was rejected. Then his character was revealed. He showed envy and anger, refused the exhortation to strive against sin, committed murder, denied his guilt; and when judgment was pronounced, gave no evidence of repentance for his sin, but only of fear of the punishment. Sent into exile, he lived in the land of Nod, eastward of Eden. He had a wife, one of the unnamed daughters or granddaughters of Adam. In early ages no impropriety existed or was felt in such a marriage (cp Gen. xi. 27, 29; xx. 12). In his exile Cain built a fortified hamlet, and became the progenitor of a race which made considerable progress in the mechanical arts (Gen. iv. 1-25; 1 John iii. 12, Jude 11).

2. The progenitor of the Kenites. See KAIN.

3. A village in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 57). Doubtfully located at the ruin Yukin, 3 miles southeast of Hebron.

Cal'nán, in A. V. once Kenan (1 Chron. i. 2), as always in R. V. of O. T.

1. Son of Enos (Gen. v. 9-14; 1 Chron. i. 2; Luke iii. 37, 38).

2. Son of Arphaxad, and father of Shelah (Luke iii. 36, R. V.). The corresponding genealogy of Gen. xi. 12 has no Cainan; the Septuagint, however, has, and it was from the Septuagint that Luke quotes.

Ca'lah.

A city of Assyria, built by Nimrod or by people from his country, and forming part of that complex of cities which collectively were called by the Hebrews that great city (Gen. x. 11, 12; cp. Jon. i. 2). According to Ashurnasirpal (about 885-860 B. C.) it was built or rebuilt, embellished, and fortified by Shalmaneser, who reigned about 1300 B. C. Early in the ninth century B. C. it had fallen into decay, but was restored by Ashurnasirpal, who erected a palace and made the city the place of royal residence. Calah remained the favorite dwelling place of the Assyrian kings for more than one hundred and fifty years. Its ruins, now called Nimrud, lie about 20 miles south of Nineveh.

Cal'a-mus [Greek kalamos, a reed, a cane].

The rendering of the Hebrew k'neh bōsem, reed of fragrance, and Kaneh, cane, reed, when an odorous variety is intended. The plant was sweet smelling (Song. iv. 14), a constituent of the anointing oil (Ex. xxv. 23), and used in connection with sacrifice (Is. xliii. 24 and Jer. vi. 20, margin of R. V.). It was brought from a far country (Jer. vi. 20). The Tyrians obtained it apparently from Javan, the regions of western Asia Minor and Greece (Ezek. xxvii. 19). What came from Europe was probably the Acorus calamus, or common Sweet Sedge of England, an endogenous plant, with a spadix and spathe, akin to the Aroids, but belonging to the allied order of the Ononitaceæ or Ononitids. The rhizome or underground stem is aromatic. If an Indian plant is permissible, then the calamus was probably the Andropogon calamus aromaticus, a genuine grass, which, like its near ally, the Lemon Grass, A. schænanthus, is highly scented.

Cal'col, in A. V. once Chalcol [sustenance, maintenance].

One of three sons of Mahol, each of whom was celebrated for wisdom (1 Kin. iv. 31; 1 Chron. ii. 6).

Cal'dron. See POT.

Ca'leb.

1. Son of Hezron, and brother of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 18, 42). A variant form of the name is Chelubai (ver. 9). In tribal registration, his posterity constituted a subdivision of the house of Hezron, family of Perez, tribe of Judah (1 Sam. xxv. 3, 1 Chron. ii. 3, R. V., seq.). Among his more immediate descendants were Hur, Aaron's associate, and Hur's grandson, the skilled artificer Bezalel (1 Chron. ii. 19, R. V., seq.).

2. Son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite and an elder brother of Othniel (Num. xxxiii. 12, R. V.; Josh. xv. 17; 1 Chron. iv. 15, cp. 13). He was the head of a father's house of the tribe of Judah; was one of the twelve men sent to spy out the land of Canaan; was one of the two members of this commission who kept their faith in Jehovah, and forty years later took part in the conquest of Canaan; was, in fact, the first to speak for this minority of two (Num. xiii. 2, 6, 30; xiv. 6, 24, 38; Josh. xiv. 6, 14; 1 Mac. ii. 56). He was on the commission appointed by Moses before the conquest to distribute the land, and he represented, as before, the tribe of Judah (Num. xxxiv. 19). He was 85 years old when the conquest was completed (Josh. xiv. 7, 10). He received as his portion the town of Hebron (14), from which he expelled the Anakim by whom it had been previously occupied (xv. 13, 14); see HEBRON. He had also to do with the taking of the adjacent town of Kirjath-sepher, or Debir (15-19). The south of Caleb mentioned in 1 Sam. xxx. 14 was probably the south of the Hebron district or the vicinity of Debir.

In 1 Chron. ii. 49 (cp. 19, 42, 46) Achsah, the well-known daughter of Caleb the spy, is registered as daughter or descendant of Caleb the brother of Jerahmeel. To judge from this register, Caleb the son of Jephunneh and father of Achsah was descended from the elder Caleb, and perhaps his concubine Maacah, and hence through Hezron and Perez from Judah. There are many details to be accounted for, and the ordinary difficulty of interpreting an ancient Hebrew genealogy is in this case greatly increased by the imperfect state of the text in 1 Chron. ii and iv. The general explanation probably is that a member of the tribe of Kenizzites became identified with the Israelites by taking service with Judah before the Israelites went into Egypt, and he or his descendant married a woman descended from Judah through Perez. Various modifications of this general theory are possible. All genealogical and historical references, and the peculiarities of the register are satisfied by the assumption that shortly before the exodus Jephunneh the Kenizite married a woman of the household of Caleb the brother of Jerahmeel, and by her had a firstborn son to whom was given the family name Caleb. This youth inherited the prerogatives of the family, and in time became head of the house and a chief of Judah. Jephunneh the Kenizite took a second wife, by whom he had Othniel and Seraiah. Hence they are called sons of Kenez or Kenizzites, and are enrolled loosely with the tribe of Judah, and reckoned like Jephunneh as Kenizzites.

Ca'leb-eph'ra-thah, in A. V. Caleb-eph'ra-tah.

The community formed by the descendants of Caleb and his wife Ephrath (1 Chron i 19, 24). The Septuagint had a slightly different text. If the present Hebrew text is correct, and the genealogy is here dealing strictly with persons, then Hezron, the father of Caleb, late in life married a grand-daughter of Manasseh. Their descendants were afterwards reckoned through the ancestress with the tribe of Manasseh, but in this register they are included with Hezron's descendants through Caleb and Ephrath. In this connection it is recorded that Hezron died in Caleb-ephrath; that is, either in that part of Goshen where the branch of his family known as Caleb-ephrath resided, or in Palestine, whither Caleb had gone back from Egypt.

Calf.

A young bull or cow, Bos taurus. Calves were killed for food (Gen xviii 7) and for sacrifice (Heb. ix. 12, 19). Aaron made a golden image of a male calf that the people might worship Jehovah under this form (Ex. xxxii. 4; Ps. cvi. 19, 20; see also Neh. ix. 18). The young bull symbolized vigor, strength, and endurance (cp Num. xxiii. 22); and the choice of this animal rather than another to represent God was favored also by the pomp of the bull worship in Egypt, where the Israelites had often seen the inhabitants adore the living bull Apis. On the division of the kingdom Jeroboam instituted the calf worship anew, setting up two calves, one at Bethel and one at

Dan (1 Kin. xii. 29). He, too, had seen the Apis worshiped in Egypt while he was a refugee at the court of Shishak (1 Kin. xi. 40), but he was influenced more by the desire to adhere to ancient traditions, for in recommending the calves he quoted the words of Ex xxxii 4.

Image of Apis, the Sacred Bull of Egypt

Cal'neh.

A city of Babylonia, belonging to the kingdom of Nimrod (Gen x 10). A town of this name is also mentioned by Amos (Amos vi. 2) Not identified. Jerusalem Talmud, Eusebius, Jerome, indicate Ctesiphon east of the Tigris. Friedrich Delitzsch has suggested Kulunu Cal'no.

A city, probably in northern Syria, which the Assyrians cited as an example of the futility of offering resistance to Assyria (Is x 9)

Cal'va-ry [skull]

A place close to Jerusalem, but outside the city walls where Christ was crucified, and in the vicinity of which he was buried (Mat. xxviii 11; John xix. 17, 20, 41; Heb. xiii. 11-13). It appears to have been a conspicuous spot (Mark xv. 40, Luke xxiii. 49), and was perhaps near a highway (Mat. xxvii 39). The name is derived from the Latin calvaria, more rarely calvarium, a skull (Luke xxiii. 33), corresponding to the Aramaic Golgotha (Mat. xxvii 33, Mark xv. 22; John xix. 17, 41). Jerome supposed that the name arose from uncovered or unburied skulls; others have thought rather of a place of execution. The common explanation is that the name was due to the cranial shape of the rock or hillock, although the expression mount Calvary is modern.

The question of the site of the crucifixion is involved with that of the location of the sepulcher. The theory advanced by Ferguson, that the tomb was in the rock under the dome of the Mosque of Omar, has not obtained favor. Two sites contend for acceptance: 1. The church of the Holy Sepulcher, within the walls of the modern city. 2. The hill in which is Jeremiah's grotto, about 250 yards northeast of the Damascus gate. The church of the Holy Sepulcher has ancient tradition in its favor. Eusebius, born in Caesarea about A. D. 264, is the earliest historian who gives any information on the subject. He states that impious men had covered the sepulcher with earth and built a temple to the goddess Venus over it, and that the place had long been given over to forgetfulness and oblivion. Constantine erected a church where the temple of Venus stood, and the site of Constantine's building is occupied by the present church of the Holy Sepulcher. Is this church on ground that was outside the second wall? This question can be decided only by costly excavation to determine the course of the second wall.

The theory that the hill above Jeremiah's grotto marks the site of Calvary is at present in the ascendant. It was suggested by Otto Thenius some thirty or forty years ago, and has been adopted or independently reached by other scholars, and greatly elaborated. This location unquestionably satisfies all the conditions of the problem. The hill in which is Jeremiah's grotto admittedly rises beyond the course of the second wall. The rounded summit of the hill, and the two hollow cave entrances beneath, present a striking resemblance to a skull. Its commanding position renders it visible from a distance. Near it was the great highway to the north. In the neighborhood are gardens and rock-hewn tombs. But no ancient tradition connects the crucifixion with this place.

The one-humped camel, which runs into two well marked varieties, the camel properly so called, which is a slow-going draught animal (2 Km viii 9), and the dromedary, which is swift of foot (cp Is. lxxvi. 20, margin of R. V.). The two-humped Bactrian camel may be referred to in Tobit ix. 2. The camel has been called the ship of the desert, and its whole organization fits it to cross sandy cloven hoof, the foot is enveloped in a hardened skin, enclosing the cushion-like soles, which can be spread out sidewise so as to adapt it to walk, without sinking deeply, over soft and yielding sand. Another adaptation is that in the walls of the paunch or first stomach there are two collections of water cells, on which the animal can draw when no other water is procurable. Yet another adaptation is its ability to subsist on the poorest food. Even the hump is another adaptation. It is a storehouse of food, and becomes larger or smaller according as the animal is in good or in bad condition. The camel is stupid, ill-tempered, and sometimes vindictive; but its passive obedience and power of endurance render it very valuable. It is not now anywhere found wild, nor has it been known wild in historical times. Abraham and Jacob had camels (Gen. xii. 16; xxx. 43), and so had later nomads in the south of Palestine (1 Sam. xxvii 9, 2 Chron. xv 15). The Ishmaelites who bought Joseph also had camels (Gen. xxxvii. 25). The camel was not, however, so much at home in Palestine, which is a hilly country, as in the Arabian and the African deserts (Ex. ix 3, Judg. vi 5, 1 Km. x 2, 1 Chron. v 18-21). But it is still bred abundantly on the plains of Moab and in the south of Judæa. The milk was used (cp. Gen. xxxii 15), but the animal was ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi. 4). From its hair a coarse cloth was woven, which was sometimes made into clothing (Mat. iii 4) and used for tents. The burden was borne on the hump (Is. xxx. 6). When the camel is ridden, a saddle is commonly used, and sometimes a palanquin (cp. Gen. xxxi 34). The Arabs commonly deck their camels' necks with ornaments (cp. Judg. vii. 21, 26).

Cam' mon. See KAMON.

Camp.

The station of an army or other body of people, where temporary structures are erected for their accommodation (Ex. xiv. 19; 1 Sam. iv. 5; xvii 4; 2 Km. vii 7). Strict regulations were prescribed for the army of Israel in order to secure cleanliness in their camp wastes. It is a ruminating animal, but belongs to that aberrant portion of the Ruminantia in which, in place of the ordinary (Deut. xxiii. 9-14). The arrangement of the camp of the migrating Hebrew nation, which was adopted for the journey through the wilderness, is described in Num. i. 47-ii. 34; iii. 14-39; cp. x. 11-28, and see SHITTIM.

It was, of course, absolutely regular only when the people were encamped on a broad, level plain. For the encampments of Israel during the journey through the wilderness, see WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING.

Camphire [old form of English camphor; Greek kaphoura, Arabic kafur; all from Malay kapur, chalk]

The rendering of the Hebrew word Kopher in Song i. 14; iv. 13, A V. See HENNA.

Ca'na [place of reeds].

A village, more fully named Cana of Galilee, where Jesus wrought his first miracle, making water wine (John ii. 1-11), and healed the nobleman's son at Capernaum (iv. 46). Nathanael was of Cana (xxi. 2). Possibly the words "of Galilee" are added to this Cana to distinguish it from another in Coele-syria (Antiq. xv. 5, 1). Josephus also mentions Cana of Galilee (Life 16, 71). The traditional site is Kefr Kenna, a village about 3½ miles northeast of Nazareth, on the road to Tiberias. Robinson advocated the view, held by some inquirers in the Crusading period, that Cana of Galilee was at Kána-el-Jellî, which is the old name scarcely changed, about 8 miles north by east of Nazareth.

Ca'naan, in A. V. of N T. twice Cha'naan [low, lowland].

1. Son of Ham and grandson of Noah; or better, the descendants of Ham who occupied Canaan and took their name from that country, and in whom the low traits manifested by their progenitor were strongly marked (Gen. x. 6, 15; Hos. xii. 7, margin). The continuance of Ham's character in a branch of his descendants had been prophesied by Noah, and the consequence of yielding to the bestial impulses had been foretold (Gen. ix. 18-27). In this passage the progenitor of the Canaanites is called Canaan proleptically by a late transmitter of the venerable prophecy. Wishing to indicate the forefather of the Canaanites among the sons of Ham, the narrator gives to their ancestor the name borne by his descendants, and by which he had come to be familiarly known, irrespective of the question whether it was his personal name or not.

2. A name probably given at first only to the low-lying coast line of Palestine to distinguish it from the neighboring hill country (Num. xiii. 29; Josh. xi. 3). Afterwards the name Canaan was extended first to the Jordan valley, and then to the whole of Palestine west of the river, and became one of the most common designations of the country inhabited by the Hebrews, though what they occupied was really the highland portion of Palestine and the Jordan valley, with little of the coast line (Gen. xi. 31; Num. xiii. 2).

The language of Canaan after the conquest of the country by the Israelites was Hebrew, the speech of the people of God (Is. xix. 18).

The Hebrews conquered Canaan under the leadership of Joshua after the death of Moses. The plan of the campaign included the establishment of a fixed camp at Gilgal. The site was on the east of Jericho, in the plain (Josh. iv. 19; v. 10). From it the Israelites went up to Ai and Gibeon (vii. 3; viii. 1, 3; x. 9). The advantages of this location for the camp of Israel were great. At Gilgal Joshua had no enemies in his rear, had water in abundance for the people, could draw supplies from the two tribes and a half which had settled in the country east of the Jordan, and had a safe place for hoarding spoil. The characteristic objects in this camp were the tabernacle (Josh. vi. 24; cp. ix. 23; xviii. 1, xxii. 19); the ark (ii. 17; vi. 11, etc.; vii. 6); the altar (ix. 27; cp. xxii. 19, 28, 29); Eleazar the priest (xiv. 1; cp. 6), besides other priests (vi. 6, 12, etc.; viii. 33), twelve stones which had been taken out of the bed of the Jordan and set up as a memorial of the passage of the river (iv. 20). Joshua's plan further included a preliminary campaign for the overthrow of the enemies which threatened the camp. He took Jericho, the outpost of Canaan, the mistress of the valley. Then he marched into the mountain, directly to the west, and overthrew Ai. This town lay at the head of the valley which emerged opposite Gilgal, and from it troops might be poured down against the camp. After this preliminary campaign he fulfilled the injunction of Moses to erect an altar on Ebal (Josh. vii. 30-35; Deut. xxvii.). According to Josephus, this solemnity was performed after the conquest of the entire country (Antiq. v. 1, 19). At this juncture ambassadors from the town of Gibeon appeared, with whom Joshua made a treaty without asking counsel of the Lord. It was an unfortunate step, as will be shown presently. Having obtained secure foothold in the country, Joshua proceeded to conquer Canaan in two campaigns. The alliance of the five kings determined the southern expedition (Josh. x). The king of Jerusalem summoned the kings of Hebron, Lachish, Egion, and Jarmuth to war against Gibeon; and Joshua was obliged to help those with whom he was in treaty. The five kings were routed, and fled down the pass of Beth-horon. Following up the victory, Joshua captured Makkedah, in or hard by the maritime plain and pitched a temporary camp there; took Libnah, which was likewise in the plain. Lachish, where the king of Gezer also was defeated; Egion, where another temporary camp was fixed; and Hebron. From Hebron he turned and smote Debir, in the hill country. Thus the entire region included between Gibeon, Gaza, and Kadesh-barnea was smitten, and Joshua returned to Gilgal.

It was during this campaign that Joshua bade the sun to stand still (x. 12-15). This event occurred during a miracle period; see MIRACLE. But it is cited from the book of Jasher, which contained poems accompanying by remarks in prose. See SUN.

Having conquered the central region and the south, Joshua determined as a matter of expediency, or under compulsion of the northern confederacy, to neglect the inconsiderable towns on the coast north of the Philistine country, and to strike at the populous and powerful north (Josh. xi.). With this end in view, he undertook a northern campaign. The king of Hazor was head of a confederacy of petty monarchs, and on hearing of the Israelitish victories in the south he summoned the remaining kings of the country to a united attempt to crush Joshua. The allied armies met at the waters of Merom. Joshua had reached the same neighborhood, and he attacked them. He routed them, pursued the fugitives as far as Sidon toward the northwest and eastward to Mizpeh. He then returned, captured and burnt the town of Hazor, and took the capitals of the other petty kingdoms which had been in alliance. In xi. 16 xii. 24 a summary of the conquest is given.

The power of the Canaanites was broken by these campaigns, but the inhabitants were not wholly exterminated. Many of the natives remained. Important towns were left in the possession of the Canaanitish population (xi. 13; xv. 63; xvi. 10, etc.); and even where the destruction was most complete, not a few of the people had escaped by flight or hiding and, when the army of Israel withdrew (x. 43), they returned, rebuilt ruined towns, and placed the wasted fields once more under cultivation. Years afterwards, when the tribes of Israel scattered over the country in order to settle, they met with sporadic resistance (Judg. i.; see HEBRON, JOSHUA).

The time occupied in the conquest of Canaan was long, because not a city made peace with Israel save the five cities of the Gibeonites (xi. 18, 19). It may be calculated with a considerable degree of accuracy. From the sending forth of the spies in the second year (cp. Num. x. 11; xii. 20; Deut. i. 2) to the time of assigning the reconquest of Hebron to Caleb when the land was about to be distributed was (Josh. xiv. 7, 10) 45 years; from the sending forth of the spies to the crossing of the Zered was (Deut. ii. 14) 38 years; leaving for the conquest of the country, both east and west of the Jordan, about 6 or 7 years. From this is to be deducted the time consumed in the conquest of the eastern country and by the events at Shittim. The death of Aaron (Num. xxxiii. 38) occurred in the 40th year, 5th month, 1st day, and the crossing of Jordan (Josh. iv. 19) in 1st month, 10th day; leaving for the conquest of the country of Sihon and Og, and for the events at Shittim, nearly 8 months, 9 days, of which period the events at Shittim occupied about two months (cp. Deut. i. 3, 4, with Josh. iv. 19; Deut. xxxiv. 8; Josh. ii. 22, etc.; Ant. iv. 8, 49 and iv. 8, 1), leaving for the conquest of western Palestine 5 or 6 years. Josephus assigns 5 years to this conquest (Antiq. v. 1, 19).

Three political blunders were committed by Joshua: his making a treaty with the Gibeonites; allowing the Jebusites to hold Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 63); and failure to dispossess the Philistines and control the country to the sea. A study of the map shows that, as a result of these mistakes, Judah and Simeon were isolated from the rest of the nation. The main road from Judah to the north was commanded by the Jebusite stronghold at Jerusalem, and was skirted for 10 miles on the west by the settlements of the Gibeonites. Between Jerusalem and Jericho on the east was a tract of wild, rocky, uninhabited mountain land crossed east and west by impassable gorges. From Jerusalem to the Mediterranean Sea a strip of country stretched, which was occupied by foreigners—first Gibeonites, next Canaanites in Dan, then Philistines as far as the sea. The consequences of this isolation of Judah and Simeon were serious, distinctly affecting the course of history in the years that followed.

Was the extermination of the Canaanites by the Israelites a justifiable act? The mere matter of their dispossessing the Canaanites presents no moral difficulties. This procedure accorded with the spirit of the age. The Israelites doubtless had as much right to Canaan as had the inhabitants whom they drove out. They despoiled despoilers. Nor does the manner of warfare present moral difficulties, for the conduct of the Hebrews in war compares favorably with the practices of the time. Judged by the standards of their own age, they were not bloodthirsty or cruel. The Assyrians have pictured their own wars. It was not infrequent for them to decapitate the inhabitants of captured cities, and pile the heads in heaps; to crucify or impale prisoners, pierce their eyeballs with a spear, or flay them alive. In the battles of Israel with the Canaanites there is record of death, but not of torture. The moral difficulty connected with the extermination of the Canaanites is that God commanded it. God's character is involved. But it is to be remembered that God had a twofold end in view in the utter extermination by death and expulsion which he commanded. It was punitive (Gen. xv. 16; Lev. xviii. 25; Deut. ix. 3, 4, xviii. 12) and preventive (Ex. xxiii. 31-33; xxxiv. 12-16, Deut. vii. 2-4). It was to punish the Canaanites for their outrageous wickedness, and to prevent them from contaminating the people of God. It is not asserted that the Canaanites were sinners above all men that ever lived. Their personal morals were perhaps not worse than those of other heathen as described in Rom. i. The Canaanites were idolaters, they indulged in shameful and abominable vice, they went beyond other nations in practicing human sacrifice. It is appointed unto all men to die. God holds nations as well as individuals responsible, and deals with them accordingly. He doomed the nations of Canaan to extermination as a punishment for their wickedness, and to prevent them from seducing the people of God. He had exterminated the wicked race of men in the days of Noah by the flood; he had swept away the iniquitous cities of the plain by an eruption, it would seem, of burning naphtha; he had overthrown Pharaoh and his host in the Red Sea; he had destroyed Korah and his rebellious crew by an earthquake and by fire. Now, instead of using the forces of nature to effect his punitive ends, he employed the Israelites as the ministers of his justice; as the public executioner, employed by the civil tribunal, is the minister of human justice. This truth was taught to the Israelites. They were informed that they were the instruments of divine justice. For these reasons the extermination of the Canaanites by the Israelites was just; the employment of the Israelites for the purpose was right; and in connection with the righteous judgment was an intention to benefit the world. The failure of the Israelites to carry out God's command fully was one of the great blunders which they committed, as well as a sin, and it resulted in lasting injury to the nation.

The distribution of the conquered territory on the west of the Jordan was made partly at Gilgal and partly at Shiloh, whither the tabernacle was removed (Josh. xiv. 1, 2, 6-xviii 1, 2). It was conducted by Eleazar the priest, Joshua, and ten heads of fathers' houses (xvii. 4; cp. Num. xxxiv 17, 18), and was made by lot (Josh xviii. 6) The law to govern the distribution had already been enacted; namely, to the more numerous a larger inheritance, and whosoever the lot falleth to any man (Num xxvi.52-56; xxxiii. 54). The rabbis state that two urns were used; in one were placed tickets with the names of the tribes, and in the other were tickets with the names of the districts. A tribe was drawn and the district which it should possess. The size of the territory was then determined by the populousness of the tribe. Probably, however, the commission selected a district without narrowly defining its boundaries, and merely determined by lot what tribe should possess it; for—1. Compare the form of the question in Judg. i 1. 2. This theory satisfies Num. xxxiii 54. 3. Compare Josh. xviii 1-10, where the land is first described in seven portions, and Joshua then cast lots for the tribes. 4. This theory also satisfies Josh. xix 1, etc., where it is stated that at the final allotment the second lot came out for Simeon, the third for Zebulun, etc. 5. The districts were assigned for occupation, not as though determined by lot, but in regular order, building up the nation compactly as the allotment proceeded, and not leaping hither and thither. 6. Much was evidently left to the discretion of the supervisors. Caleb must have Hebron whether the lot of the main body of the tribe of Judah allowed them to settle in that neighborhood or not. Jacob's last wishes would be observed so far as the lot permitted (Gen.

xlix.), though the lot did not permit Zebulun to possess the seacoast, but his possession was doubtless adjusted as nearly as possible to the patriarch's desire. Mistakes were made and rectified. Before the allotment was completed—and it was not carried out in a day or a week—Judah reported that it had been granted too much territory. The surplus was accordingly added to the undistributed domain. The children of Joseph, on the other hand, informed Joshua that they had received too little land, and they asked and received more. It was intended, in accordance with Jacob's wish, that Ephraim and Manasseh should dwell side by side; hence the lot was not cast for them separately, but for them unitedly as the children of Joseph (Josh. xvi. 1, 4). In this manner the nation was compactly built up, the territory which lay nearest the camp being distributed first.

Ca'naan-ite.

1. An inhabitant of Canaan, especially one of Hamitic blood, although persons and tribes incorporated with the descendants of Ham in this region acquired the name. According as the geographical designation Canaan is used in its broader or its narrower sense, the word Canaanite has a broader or narrower signification. In the narrow sense, the Canaanites were the people of the coast and valleys (Gen. xv. 21; Josh. ix. 1). In the broad sense, they were the tribes enumerated in Gen. x. 15-19. The Canaanites were doomed to destruction on account of their sins (Deut. xx. 17). But the Israelites to a certain extent failed to carry out the injunction. They in many cases contented themselves with putting the Canaanite inhabitants to tribute (Judg. i 27-36). Solomon levied on them a tribute of bondservice; in other words, made them perform forced labor (1 Kin. ix. 20, 21). The Canaanites eventually devoted themselves extensively to trade, and their name became synonymous with trader (Is xxiii 8).

2. A member of a Jewish patriotic party. See CANANÆAN.

Ca'naan-1'tess.

A queen of Ethiopia, i. e., probably of Meroë, in southern Nubia. A eunuch of great authority at her court, when returning home from a visit to Jerusalem, where he had gone to worship, was converted to Christianity through the instrumentality of Philip the evangelist (Acts viii 26-39). Strabo, Dion Cassius, and Pliny, all concur in stating that Meroë in the first century of the Christian era was governed by a succession of queens, each called Candace.

solid gold, and it supported seven lamps. It stood on the south side of the sanctuary (Ex. xxv. 31-40; xl. 24; Lev. xxiv. 2-4). Pure olive oil was used in the lamps, and the light burned from evening to morning (Ex. xxvii. 20, 21, xxx 7, 8; 1 Sam iii 3). According to Josephus, three of the lamps were allowed to burn by day (Antiq. iii 8, 3). This continuous burning apparently symbolized the uninterrupted worship, even by night, and the unceasing emission of light by the people of God (cp. Zech. iv). For the temple Solomon made ten candlesticks, five for the right and five for the left of the oracle (1 Kin vii 49; 2 Chron. iv 7). They were carried away to Babylon (Jer. lii 19). Zerubbabel returned to the earlier arrangement, and had but a single candlestick; this was carried off by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac. i 21). Being replaced (iv 49), it continued till the capture of Jerusalem by Titus, when it was carried off to Rome, figured in Titus' triumph, and was sculptured on his arch (War vii 5, 5).

As it is mentioned with the typical locust (Joel i. 4; Nah. iii. 15), which it resembles also in the numbers in which it appears (Joel ii. 25), it is probably a locust of some species or in some stage of development.

Can'neh.

A place, evidently in Mesopotamia, perhaps the same as Calneh (Ezek. xxvii. 23).

Can'on [reed, cane].

The meaning of the word was extended to denote (1) any straight rod or bar, such as a rod or level used by masons in building; (2) figuratively, anything which serves to regulate or determine other things, especially classical books, a guide or model (Gal vi. 16; Phil. iii. 16); (3) a type of Christian doctrine, the orthodox as opposed to the heterodox; (4) the Scriptures viewed as a rule of faith and conduct. The word is Greek. It was first used in this fourth sense by the early fathers, but the idea denoted was ancient. A book entitled to a place in the Bible is called canonical; one not so entitled, uncanonical, and title to a place, canonicity.

THE OLD TESTAMENT CANON. Authoritative literature grew up by degrees and was carefully preserved. The ten commandments, written on tables of stone, Israel's constitution, were deposited in the ark (Ex. xl. 20). The statutes were recorded in the book of the covenant (xx. 23-xxiii. 33, xxiv. 7). The book of the law, written by Moses, was put by the side of the ark (Deut. xxxi. 24-26). Joshua added to the collection what he wrote (Josh. xxiv. 26). Samuel wrote the manner of the kingdom in a book, and laid it up before the Lord (1 Sam. x. 25). In the days of Josiah the book of the law of the Lord, the well-known book, was found in the temple and recognized by king, priests, prophets, and people, as authoritative and ancient (2 Kin. xxii. 8-20). Copies of the law were made (Deut. xvi. 18-20). Prophets committed their words to writing (e. g. Jer. xxxvi. 32), and they were acquainted with each other's writings and quoted them as authority (Is. li. 2-4 with Mic. iv. 1-3). The law and the words of the prophets were recognized as authoritative, inspired by the Spirit of God, and jealously guarded by Jehovah (Zech. i. 4; vii. 7, 12).

The law of Moses, comprising the five books of Moses, circulated as a distinct portion of the sacred literature in the time of Ezra. It was in Ezra's hand (Ezra vii. 14), and he was a ready scribe in it (6, 11). At the request of the people, he read the book publicly to them (Neh. viii. 1, 5, 8). About this time also, before the schism between the Jews and Samaritans had become final, the Pentateuch was taken to Samaria. The arrangement of the minor prophets into a group of twelve is attested by Jesus, son of Sirach, as in vogue by the year 200 B. C. (Ecclus. xlix. 10). His language further suggests the great group of books—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve (xlv. xlix.)—which constitute the second division of the Hebrew canon. The existence of the threefold division of all the Scriptures into "the law, the prophets, and the others that have followed in their steps," or "the law, the prophets, and the other books," or, "the law, the prophecies, and the rest of the books," is attested as early as the year 132 B. C., and the existence of a Greek version of them at the same time; for the grandson of Jesus, son of Sirach, states these things (Ecclus. prologue). Reference is made in a passage which dates from about 100 B. C. to "the sacred books which are now in our hands" (1 Mac. xii. 9). Philo Judæus, who was born at Alexandria in 20 B. C., and died there in the reign of Claudius, had the present canon, and quotes from nearly all the books while he cites nothing from the Apocrypha.

The N. T. refers to "the Scriptures" as a body of authoritative writings (Mat. xxiii. 42; xxvi. 56; Mark. xiv. 49; John. x. 35, 2 Tim. iii. 16), as holy (Rom. i. 2, 2 Tim. iii. 15), and as the oracles of God (Rom. i. 2, Heb. v. 12; 1 Pet. iv. 11); mentions a threefold division into "the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms" (Luke. xxiv. 44); and quotes from or refers to all the books except Obadiah and Nahum, Ezra and Nehemiah, Esther, Song of Songs, and Ecclesiastes. Josephus, a contemporary of the apostle Paul, writing about A. D. 100, and speaking for his nation, says: "We have but twenty-two [books], containing the history of all time, books that are justly believed in," or, according to the usual reading, "believed to be divine," and he speaks in the strongest terms of the exclusive authority of these writings, continuing: "From the days of Artaxerxes to our own times every event has indeed been recorded; but these recent records have not been deemed worthy of equal credit with those which preceded them, on account of the failure of the exact succession of the prophets. There is practical proof of the spirit in which we treat our Scriptures; for although so great an interval of time has now passed, not a soul has ventured either to add or to remove or to alter a syllable, and it is the instinct of every Jew, from the day of his birth, to consider these Scriptures as the teaching of God, and to abide by them and, if need be, cheerfully to lay down his life in their behalf" (against Apion, i. 8). Josephus states the contents of Scripture under three heads (1) "Five belong to Moses, which contain his laws and the traditions of the origin of mankind till his death." (2) "From the death of Moses to Artaxerxes the prophets who were after Moses wrote down what was done in their time in thirteen books." Josephus followed the arrangement of the Septuagint probably, and the enumeration of the Alexandrians. The thirteen books are probably Joshua, Judges with Ruth, Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, Ezra with Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Daniel, Isaiah, Jeremiah with Lamentations, Ezekiel, the Twelve Minor Prophets. (3) "The remaining four books contain hymns to God and precepts for the conduct of human life." These were doubtless Psalms, Song of Songs, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes.

So far facts. There was also a tradition current that the canon was arranged in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. Josephus, as already cited, expresses the universal belief of his countrymen that no books had been added since the time of Artaxerxes—that is, since the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. An extravagant legend of the latter part of the first century of the Christian era (2 Esd xiv) grew out of the current tradition that Ezra restored the law and even the entire O. T. (21, 22, 40), of which the temple copies had been lost. It attests that the Jews of Palestine in that age reckoned the canonical books at twenty-four ($24 + 70 = 94$; vers. 44–46, R. V.). A passage of doubtful date and authenticity, perhaps penned about 100 B. C. (2 Mac ii. 13), alludes to Nehemiah's activity in connection with the second and third divisions of the canon. Irenæus transmits the tradition thus: "After the sacred writings had been destroyed in the exile under Nebuchadnezzar, when the Jews after seventy years had returned to their own country, He in the days of Artaxerxes inspired Ezra the priest, of the tribe of Levi, to rearrange all the words of the prophets who had gone before, and to restore to the people the legislation of Moses." Elias Levita, writing in 1538, states the belief of his people in this wise: "In Ezra's time the twenty-four books were not yet united in a single volume. Ezra and his associates united them together and divided them into three parts, the law, the prophets, and the hagiographa." This tradition contains truth. Whether it can be accepted in every particular depends on the settlement of the date when certain books were written, such as Nehemiah and Chronicles.

The Pentateuch as the work of Moses, and as embodying the fundamental law of the nation, formed one division of the canon, and with chronological fitness occupied the first place in the collection. To the second division books written by the prophets were assigned, as the name and largely the contents indicate. The books were eight in number—Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, which came to be known as the former prophets, and Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve, which were called the latter prophets. For Joshua, regarded as a prophet, see Ecclus. xlv. 1. The nucleus of the third division consisted of sections of the books of Psalms and Proverbs. They had two characteristics—they were poetry, and their authors were not official prophets. They attracted to themselves all other similar authoritative literature. The prayer of Moses (Ps xc.), though written by a prophet, was placed in this division of Scripture because it is poetry. So, too, Lamentations, though written by a prophet, yet being poetry, likewise found place in the third division of the Hebrew canon. An additional reason existed for separating it from Jeremiah. It was read on the anniversary of the destruction of both temples, and hence was put with four other short books which were read on four other anniversaries, Song, Ruth, Ecclesiastes, and Esther. They constitute the five rolls or Megilloth. The book of Daniel was placed here because written by a man who, although gifted with prophecy, was not by office a prophet. In all probability Chronicles was written, not by a prophet, but by a priest; hence it belonged in the third division of the canon. The mere fact of its late authorship does not account for its place in this division, for books and sections of books in this division were in existence before Zechariah and Malachi, which were put in the second division. It is proper to add that while the contents of the several divisions of the canon were fixed, the order of the books in the third division varied from time to time, and even in the second division the Talmud knew Isaiah as standing between Ezekiel and the Minor Prophets. This order of the four prophetic books (Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, and Minor Prophets), was evidently determined by size, the largest being placed first. As late as the close of the first century A. D., the right of several books of the third division to remain in the canon was discussed. The books were in the canon, none questioned that. The discussions concerned the contents of the books and difficulties in reconciling them with other books; but the debates were probably mere intellectual displays. There was no intention of removing any book from the canon, but rather the purpose to establish its right to the place it already occupied. J. D. D.

CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. The apostolic church received from the Jewish the belief in a written rule of faith. Christ himself confirmed this belief by appealing to the O. T. as the written word of God (e. g. John v. 37–47; Mat. v. 17, 18; Mark xii. 36, 37; Luke xvi. 31), and by instructing his disciples out of it (Luke xxiv. 45); and the apostles habitually refer to the O. T. as authoritative (e. g. Rom. iii. 2, 21; 1 Cor. i. 6; Rom. xv. 4; 2 Tim. iii. 15–17; 2 Pet. i. 21). In the next place, the apostles claimed for their own teaching, oral and written, like authority with the O. T. (1 Cor. ii. 7–13; xiv. 37; 1 Thess. ii. 13; Rev. i. 3), and directed the public reading of their epistles (1 Thess. v. 27; Col. iv. 16, 17; 2 Thess. ii. 15; 2 Pet. i. 15;

iii. 1, 2), while revelations, given to the church through inspired prophets, were considered to form, with apostolic instruction, the foundation of the church (Eph. ii 20). It was therefore both natural and right that the N. T. literature should be added to the Old, and thus the written canon of faith be enlarged. In the N. T. itself we may see this beginning to be done (1 Tim. v. 18; 2 Pet. iii. 1, 2, 16), and in the generations which followed the apostles, the writings which were known to have apostolic authority were gradually collected into the second half of the church's canon, and finally called the New Testament. For, from the beginning, the proof that a book had a right to a place in the canon was its apostolicity, by which was meant that it was bequeathed to the church with apostolic sanction, having either been written by an apostle or else guaranteed by one as authoritative. This, as we have said, was the apostolic doctrine; and evidence is abundant that, in the second and third centuries, this was the principle on which the N. T. collection was made. The complete collection, however, was formed slowly for various reasons. At first certain books were known only in some churches to be apostolic, and it was not until the whole body of believers throughout the Roman empire was united in one ecclesiastical consciousness that all the books, which in the several parts of the church were known to be apostolic, were universally accepted. The process of collection also did not at first have the incentive which it afterwards received through the rise of heresy and of spurious writings claiming apostolic authority. But, while the process of collection was slow, the books which in any church were accepted were regarded as canonical because apostolic. The teaching of the apostles was the rule of faith. Their works were read in public worship. Early in the second century we find them directly called Scripture (Ep. of Polycarp 12; Ep. of Barnabas 4). The books by Mark and Luke were received because stamped with the authority of Peter and Paul. Even commentaries began to be made upon them, and their statements and phraseology saturate the literature of the post-apostolic age. Then, as to the extent and rapidity with which the collection itself was made, the following facts are the most noteworthy. The four gospels were everywhere received from the beginning of the second century, while 2 Pet. iii. 16 shows that its readers were already familiar with a collection of Paul's epistles. Very early we find the phrases "gospel" and "apostles" used to describe the two parts of the new collection. The evidence of the canonicity of The Acts likewise carries us back to the first half of the second century. Some books indeed were disputed in some sections of the church, but this only shows that their final acceptance was based on sufficient evidence. Finally it appears that the Syrian church in the second century received all our N. T. except Rev., Jude, 2 Pet., 2 and 3 John; the Roman church, all except Heb., Epp. of Pet., Jas., 3 John; the North African, all except Heb., 2 Pet., and perhaps James. These collections, however, only contained the books formally received in the respective churches, and do not prove that no other apostolic books were known. The remainder were in fact universally accepted in the course of the third century, though difference of opinion existed about some; and, when the age of councils came, our present N. T. canon appears in the lists as the accepted one. In the fourth century ten fathers and two councils have left lists of canonical books. Of these three omit Revelation, against which prejudice existed in some quarters, though earlier testimony to it is abundant. The rest give the N. T. as we have it.

In view of these facts it should be noted: (1) That while the collection of the N. T. into one volume was slow, the belief in a written rule of faith was primitive and apostolic. The history of the formation of the collection should not be thought to give the rise into authority of a written rule of faith. It only shows the stages by which the books rightly belonging to the canon were recognized and brought together. (2) Differences of opinion and usage, as to what books were canonical, and as to the degree of certainty with which a book could be received, appear in the writers and churches even of the second century. This fact, however, again only marks the stages by which the evidence for the books was gradually accepted by the church as a whole, and the carefulness of the primitive Christians in receiving books as apostolic. In like manner the occasional acceptance of spurious writings was corrected in due time. (3) The proof on which we should accept the several N. T. books as canonical is historical evidence. As to this, the judgment of the early church that our twenty-seven books are apostolic is entitled to acceptance unless it can be proved false. We should not, however, receive them merely because ecclesiastical councils decreed them canonical; nor, on the other hand, because of their contents. The question is one of historical evidence alone. (4) Finally, we note that the name canon is not known to have been applied to the collection of sacred books until the fourth century. But while this term, now universal, was not at first used, the thing denoted by it—viz that the sacred books were the rule of faith—was, as we have seen, an apostolic doctrine.

Naphtali (Mat. iv. 13-16; cp. Luke iv. 31; John vi. 17-24). It was the seat of a tax-collector (Mark ii. 1, 14), and was apparently a Roman military post (Mat. viii. 5-13, Luke vii. 1-10). Our Lord at an early period of his ministry removed thither from Nazareth and made it so continually his headquarters that it came to be called his own city (Mat. ix. 1; cp. Mark ii. 1). It was there that he healed the centurion's palsied servant (Mat. viii. 5-13; Luke vii. 1-10), Peter's wife's mother when she was prostrate with fever (Mat. viii. 14-17; Mark i. 29-31), a demoniac (Mark i. 21-28; Luke iv. 31-37), a man sick of the palsy borne of four (Mark ii. 1-13; cp. Mat. ix. 1-8), a nobleman's son (John. iv. 46-54), and a number of other diseased people (Mat. viii. 16, 17; Mark i. 32-34; Luke iv. 23, 40, 41). The discourse recorded in John being the site of Capernaum. They are about 2½ miles apart. The more northerly is called Tell Hum, and the more southerly Khan Minyeh or Minna. Each of them marks the site of a former town. At Capernaum, or near it, was a receipt of custom (Mark ii. 13, 14). If the object was the collection of toll from passing caravans, the tollhouse naturally stood close to the great trade route from Damascus to the Mediterranean seacoast and Egypt; and that location belongs preeminently to Khan Minyeh. But if the taxes were levied on the products of mills and the produce of the fields (cp. Luke xix. 2), the town was probably situated near the extensive water-power and celebrated wheat fields in the neighborhood of Tell Hum (Talmud). The fountain of Capernaum, from which the plain of Gennesaret was in part irrigated, vi. 24-71, which followed on the feeding of the 5000, with many other addresses, was delivered in the synagogue at Capernaum or elsewhere in the town (Mark ix. 33-50). It was at Capernaum also that Jesus called to the apostleship Matthew or Levi, as he was sitting at the receipt of custom (Mat. ix. 9-13; Mark ii. 14-17, Luke v. 27-32; cp. Mat. xvi. 24). Notwithstanding the teaching and works of Jesus its people did not repent, and Jesus predicted the utter ruin of the place (Mat. xi. 23, 24; Luke x. 15).

Tell Hum from the Northeast.

Capernaum is not mentioned in the O. T., and perhaps did not arise till after the captivity. Josephus was carried with bruised wrist from near Julias (not far from the spot where the Jordan enters the sea of Galilee) into a village named Cepharnome or Capernaum (Life 72).

Two spots contend for the distinction of and where coracin fish were and are found (War iii. 10, 8), was doubtless the abundant source at Tâbighah, midway between Khan Minyeh and Tell Hum. The locality is connected topographically with Tell Hum, not with Khan Minyeh. Mills doubtless stood there then as now; water was conducted thence to the plain by a canal, portions of which still remain; and a considerable town lay immediately to the north, the ruins of which include the site of Tell Hum and extend westward from the shore for at least 800 feet. The houses were largely of black basalt, while the ruins of a synagogue are of marble or fine limestone quarried in the mountains northwest of the place.

In the word Capernaum the first two syllables, Caper, represent the Hebrew word for village, and might well be supplanted by the Arabic Tell, mound, when the place became a ruin. Hum in Arabic means "a herd of camels"; if Hebrew, it is probably part of the word Nahum. But Tell Hum is perhaps not an echo of Capernaum, but a corruption of Tanhum, the name of a Jewish rabbi who was buried there.

English K comes from the same source; but C and, especially before e and i, or when final, Ch are employed as its representative in anglicized Hebrew names. Caph stands at the head of the eleventh section of Ps cxix, in which section each verse begins with this letter in the original. See BETH.

Caph-ar-sal'a-ma [village of Salem].

A town (1 Mac. vii. 31; Antiq xii. 10, 4), perhaps the later Carvasalim, near Ramleh.

Ca-phen'a-tha. See CHAPHENATHA.

Caphtor.

An isle or seacoast, from which the Philistines originally came (Jer xlvii 4; Amos ix 7). The Philistines as a whole were Cherethites, that is, probably Cretans (1 Sam xxx. 14; Ezek xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5), and Caphtor was perhaps the island Crete. However, an Egyptian nome in the delta bore the name Kapet-hor. This word may be the original of Caphtor. If so, the ancestors of the Philistines went thence to Crete and later to Philistia, or they went thither from Crete and ultimately to Philistia.

Capht'o-rim; in A. V. once Caphtorimis and once Caphthorim.

A tribe descended from the Egyptians (Gen. x. 14. 1 Chron. i. 12), and inhabiting Caphtor (Deut. ii. 23).

Cap-pa-do'ci-a.

A highland province of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Pontus, on the south by Cilicia, on the east by Syria and Lesser Armenia, and on the west by Lycania. It produced excellent wheat and horses, but was regarded as a region of uncultivated minds and immoral practices. Worshipers from Cappadocia were present at the feast of Pentecost, rendered memorable by the descent of the Holy Spirit (Acts ii. 9). Some of the Dispersion to whom Peter addressed his first epistle sojourned in Cappadocia (1 Pet. i. 1).

Cap'tain.

As a military title, captain is generally in O. T. the rendering of the Hebrew word Sar. It is a broad designation for an official, whether he be the commander-in-chief of the army (Gen. xxi. 22; Judg. iv. 2: 1 Sam. xiv. 50; 2 Sam. x. 16), or the commander of a division of the army (2 Sam. xviii. 2 with 5), or part of a division (1 Kin. xvi. 9); an officer over 1000 men or 100 men or 50 men (Num. xxxi. 14, 48; 1 Sam. viii. 12; xvii. 18; xviii. 13; xxii. 7; 2 Sam. xviii. 1; 2 Kin. i. 9; Is. iii. 3); the commander of the king's body guard (Gen. xxxvii. 36; and 2 Kin. xxv. 8; Dan. ii. 14, where the word is Rab), or of a post of sentries (Jer. xxxvii. 13, in Hebrew Ba'al). The word rendered captain in A. V. of Num. ii. is Nasi', and denotes a tribal prince. Kagan is thrice rendered captain in A. V. (Josh. x. 24; Judg. xi. 6, 11), where it refers to leaders of the host; but the word is a general term for one with whom decision rests, and it is applied to civil rulers (Is. i. 10; iii. 6, 7; Mic. iii. 1, 9), whose duties included that of judging (Prov. vi. 7; xxv. 15, R. V. margin).

In N. T. the chief captain was a chlarchos, a term which originally denoted the commander of 1000 men, but was used broadly for the commandant of a garrison, and as the equivalent of the Roman military tribune (John xviii. 12, R. V. margin). He was one of the general officers of a legion, and higher in rank than a centurion (Acts xxi. 31, 32, R. V. margin; xxii. 25). The captain of the guard at Rome (Acts xxviii. 16, A. V.) was a stratopedarchos, or commander of a legion, in this particular instance the chief officer of the legion known as the praetorian guard (R. V. margin). The captain of the temple was not a military officer, but the priest in command of the guard of Levites who kept watch at the temple (Acts iv. 1; v. 24, 26; Antiq. xx. 6, 2 with War ii. 12, 6; vi. 5, 3). Under him were subordinate officers of the several divisions of the guard (Luke xxii. 4, 52).

Cap-tiv'i-ty.

The state of being in bondage to enemies, especially in a foreign land. In O. T. times the Assyrians introduced, and the Babylonians adopted, the practice of making a wholesale deportation of at least the leading men belonging to each country which they conquered, and locating them in districts where they would be removed from familiar associations and patriotic memories, and would be under the eye of the central government. Deportation was generally resorted to as an extreme measure when other means failed. The stronger state was usually content with imposing tribute. The withholding of the customary tribute was treated as rebellion, and was punished by a military invasion and pillage of the country. If these harsh measures proved ineffective, resort was had to deportation.

Two principal captivities are mentioned in the Bible:

I THE CAPTIVITY OF THE TEN TRIBES.

As early as 842 B. C. Jehu paid tribute to Shalmaneser, king of Assyria. About 803 Rammannirari reports receiving tribute from the Israelites. But it was not until the reign of Tiglath-pileser, 745-727, that the Assyrians began emptying the land of the ten tribes of its inhabitants. That king received tribute from Menahem. In the reign of Pekah he captured cities of Naphtali and carried off the inhabitants to Assyria (2 Kin. xv. 29). He overran the country east of the Jordan and deported the Reubenites, Gadites, and half tribe of Manasseh to Mesopotamia (1 Chron. v 26). By his connivance also Pekah was eventually slain and Hoshea placed on the throne. His successor Shalmaneser besieged Samaria, the city was taken in the accession year of Sargon, 722 B C., and a large number of the inhabitants were transported to Mesopotamia and Media (2 Kin. xvii 5, 6), and the rest were placed under tribute. This remnant, in alliance with Hamath and Damascus, presently attempted to throw off the Assyrian yoke; but Sargon crushed the rebellion and began introducing foreigners into Samaria, a process which his successors continued until a new and heterogeneous people occupied the former territory of the ten tribes. Some of the Israelites eventually returned to Jerusalem (Luke ii. 36), but most of them remained in the countries whither they had been carried, preserving their racial distinctions, continuing their religious observances, and visiting Jerusalem from time to time (Acts ii 9; xxvi 7).

II THE CAPTIVITY OF JUDAH. Sennacherib has recorded that he removed 200,000 captives from Judah (cp. 2 Kin xviii 13). But by the captivity of Judah is meant the deportation of the people to Babylonia. Judah's captivity was predicted a century and a half before its occurrence (Is vi 11, 12; xi. 12), and Babylonia as the place was foretold by Micah (iv 10) and Isaiah (xi 11, xxxix. 6). The prophet Jeremiah announced that it should continue seventy years (Jer xxv. 1, 11, 12). It was effected by Nebuchadnezzar. In 605 B C., in the third or fourth year of Jehoiakim, according to the method of reckoning which one adopts, he came unto Jerusalem, took the vessels of the temple to Babylon, and carried off certain of the seed royal as captives (2 Chron. xxxvi. 2-7; Dan. i. 1-3). Seven years later he carried off Jehoiachin, the king's mother, wives, and 3000 princes, 7000 men of might and 1000 artisans (2 Kin. xxiv 14-16). Eleven years later his army burned the temple, destroyed Jerusalem, and carried off the residue of the people, leaving only the poorest of the land to be vinedressers and husbandmen (2 Kin. xxv. 2-21). Five years after the destruction of the city, another batch was deported to Babylonia (Jer. lii. 30). In their exile the Jews enjoyed many privileges. They were permitted to build and occupy houses, keep servants, and engage in business (Jer xxix. 5-7; Ezra ii. 65), and there was nothing to hinder them from rising to the highest positions in the state (Dan ii. 48; Neh. i. 11). Their priests and teachers were with them (Jer. xxix. 1; Ezra i. 5), and they had the instructions and encouragement of Ezekiel (Ezek. i 1). In 539 B C. Daniel understood by the books that the captivity was to last for seventy years, and, as the time was drawing to a close, began to supplicate God for the restoration of divine favor to his people (Dan. ix. 2). In 538 Cyrus issued a decree authorizing the Jews to return to the land of their fathers and rebuild the temple (Ezra i. 1-4), when about 43,000 of them embraced the opportunity (ii. 64). Many, however, preferred to remain in Babylonia and the east, and with the Israelites in Mesopotamia and Media formed part of what became known as the Diaspora (Zech. vi. 10; Acts ii 9). See DISPERSION.

Carbuncle.

1 The rendering of Hebrew Bareketh and Bar'kath, shining like lightning. It denotes a gem (Ezek xxviii 13), and was the third stone in the first row of the high priest's breastplate (Ex xxviii 17). In both cases the margin of the R V., following the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Josephus, makes it an emerald.

2 The rendering of the Hebrew 'Ekdah, blaze, sparkle. It denotes a precious stone (Is liv 12).

According to Dana three distinct minerals are called by Pliny carbuncles. They are the garnet, the ruby spinel, and the sapphire. The garnet specially included under Pliny's carbuncles is the precious or Oriental garnet or almandine. It is of a fine deep transparent color, the best are from Pegu. The ruby spinel is a spinel of a clear red or reddish color, transparent or translucent. For the sapphire, see the article Car'cas.

One of seven chamberlains who served in the presence of king Ahasuerus (Esth 1 10).

Car'che-mish, in A V once Charchemish (2 Chron xxxv 20).

The eastern capital of the Hittites, west of the Euphrates, at a ford of the river, and north of the confluence with the Sajur. Admirably situated for commercial purposes, it became very wealthy. The Assyrian king, Ashurnasirpal (885 to 860 B C.) was about to assault it, but was bought off by the promise of rich tribute. In 717 B C it was captured by Sargon, and with it fell the Hittite empire (Is. x. 9). Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, was heavily defeated at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar in 605 B C (2 Chron. xxxv 20, Jer xlvii 2). Its site is called Jerabis. It is on the western bank of the Euphrates, midway between Birejik and the mouth of the Sajur, about 200 miles northwest of Circesium. An artificial mound covers ruins. The human figures on the sculptured blocks have boots with upturned tips, which is believed to settle conclusively that they are of Hittite origin.

Ca-re'ah. See KAREAH.

Ca'ri-a.

A country at the southwestern point of Asia Minor. It was part of the territory conquered by the Romans from Antiochus the Great. The Roman senate bestowed it on the Rhodians, but released it again in 168 B. C. It was still a separate district in 139 B. C. (1 Mac. xv. 23), but it was finally incorporated in the province of Asia.

Car'ites. See CHERETHITES.

Car'mel [fruitful field, garden park].

1. A range of hills, about 15 miles long, connected by a chain of lower hills with the mountainous region of central Palestine and terminating in a promontory which juts into the Mediterranean (Jer xlvi. 18), and constitutes the southern boundary of the bay of Acre. Near its southeastern end it is 1742 feet high, a little further onward it is 1715, and it gradually falls more and more, till at the northwestern top, which constitutes the promontory, it is only 556 feet high. The range constitutes the southwestern boundary of the valley of Esdraelon, through which the Kishon runs, and at one place that brook washes the northern slope of Carmel (1 Kin. xviii. 40). The summit of the range consists of a series of eminences with table-lands on their tops, sometimes bare and rocky, and sometimes covered with shrubs, especially the prickly oak and the juniper. The strata are of limestone, and there are caves on the sides of the mountain chain, though not on its summit. The view from its higher parts is fine. It is now called Jebel Kurmul. Carmel was on the southern boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 26), within the limits of that tribe (cp. xvii. 11). On the top of Carmel Elijah brought to a decisive issue the question between Jehovah and the worship of Baal (1 Kin. xviii. 17-40), and from the top of the same range his servant saw the ascent from the Mediterranean of the little cloud like a man's hand which heralded the rain storm and the termination of the drought (41-46). Carmel was visited by Elisha (2 Kin. ii. 25; iv. 25). It is believed to have been anciently cultivated to the summit, with fruit trees in orchards or gardens, as its name imports, and as the fruitfulness ascribed to it indicates (Is xxxiii. 9; xxxiv. 2; Jer l. 19). A forest, probably consisting chiefly of fruit trees, was in its midst (Mic vii. 14). When in Song vii. 5 the lover says to the object of his affection, "Thine head upon thee is like Carmel," he probably means covered with luxuriant hair, as Carmel is with fruit trees. Amos prophesied: "The top of Carmel shall wither" (i. 2). There has long been a convent on mount Carmel, after which the Carmelite monks are named.

2. A town in the mountainous part of Judah (Josh. xv. 55; cp. 1 Sam. xv. 12; xxv. 2). The churlish Nabal's possessions lay in the vicinity (1 Sam. xxv. 2-40). The name is still retained in the modern Kurmul, a ruin about 7 miles south-southeast of Hebron. From this town one of David's wives hailed (1 Sam. xxx. 5), and also one of his mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 35).

Car'mi [vinedresser].

1. A son of Reuben, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xli. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 6).

2. A descendant of Judah and father of Achan (Josh. vii. 1; 1 Chron. ii. 6, 7).

Car'na-im. See ASHTEROTH-KARNAIM.

Car'pen-ter.

The first mention of carpentry in the Bible as a distinct occupation is on occasion of carpenters being brought from Tyre to build David a palace (2 Sam. v. 11). Among carpenter's tools were the axe, saw (Is. x. 15), measuring line, plane, compass (xlv. 13), iron nails, hammers (Jer. x. 4; 1 Chron. xxii. 3). Joseph, husband of Mary, was a carpenter (Mat. xiii. 55), and Jesus in his youth worked at the same calling (Mark vi. 3).

Car'pus [the wrist].

A resident at Troas, with whom Paul left his cloak, for which he afterwards sent (2 Tim. iv. 13).

Car'riage.

That which is carried; baggage (1 Sam. xvii. 22, Is. x. 28, 1 Mac. ix. 35, 39; Acts xxi. 15), heavy matters or goods (Judg. xviii. 21), a burden (Is. xlv. 1). The place of the carriage (1 Sam. xvii. 20, xxvi. 5, 7, A. V. margin) was the enclosure formed by the carts which were used to transport goods for the army, and which were drawn up in a circle around the camp. In all passages R. V. has abandoned this obsolete sense of carriage and substituted the appropriate modern word.

Car'she-na [perhaps pillage of war, spoiler].

One of the seven leading princes of Peisia at the court of king Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 14).

Cart.

A wheeled vehicle employed in peaceful occupations, and distinguished from the chanot, which was used for state and war. It was made of wood (1 Sam. vi. 14), was either covered or uncovered (Num. vii. 3, where the Hebrew word is rendered wagon), was drawn by cattle (vii. 7, 1 Sam. vi. 7, 2 Sam. vi. 6), though horses occasionally dragged the threshing cart, it would seem (Is. xxviii. 28), and was used in threshing in lieu of a sledge (Is. xxviii. 27), for transporting goods (2 Sam. vi. 3), hauling grain (Amos ii. 13), and conveying persons (Gen. xlv. 19, rendered wagon). In Egypt a cart was used like that which is now employed universally in western Asia, with two wheels of solid wood. Asiatic carts, including the one in which Jewish captive women of Lachish are riding on sacks of grain, are represented in Assyrian bas-reliefs as having two wheels with eight, six, or four spokes each and drawn by oxen. They are also depicted as drawn by mules, or by two men.

Ancient Egyptian Cart.

Carv'ing.

The art of cutting letters, images, or ornamental designs in wood, stone, ivory, or other material. Bezaleel, a man of Judah, and Aholab, a Danite, were gifted for this work, and wrought the carving for the tabernacle (Ex. xxxi 1-7; xxxv 30-35). There was carved work in Solomon's temple—flowers, palm trees, and cherubim (1 Kin vi 18, 29); in that of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. lxxiv 6), and in the superior kind of domestic architecture (Prov vii 16).

Case'ment.

A sash which moves on a hinge; or part of a window, made movable by a hinge, so that it may be opened while the rest of the window remains shut (Prov vii 6, A V). But in Judg v 28 and in R V of both passages the Hebrew word is rendered lattice.

Cas'siph'i-a.

A place not far from the route between Babylon and Jerusalem, and in or near Babylon (Ezra viii. 17).

Cas'lu-him.

A people descended from the Egyptians (or possibly only conquered and incorporated with them), and standing somewhere in the ancestral line of the Philistines (Gen x 14; 1 Chron. i 12). Apparently they were the immediate ancestors of the Philistines. Perhaps they were the inhabitants of Casiotis, a district on the Mediterranean Sea extending from the eastern mouth of the Nile to Philistia.

Cas'phor.

A fortified town east of the Jordan, captured by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mac v. 26, 36). In the latter verse A. V. gives the name as Casphon. Josephus calls it Casphoma (Antiq. xii. 8, 3).

Cas'sia.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew word Ki'dah (Ezek. xxvii. 19). It denotes an aromatic wood, and was an ingredient of the anointing oil (Ex. xxx. 24). The translation cassia is supported by the Syriac version, the Targum, and the Vulgate. If correct, the word probably denotes a species of the wood. On the margin R. V. has costus. The Costus of the ancients was discovered by Falconer to be a composite plant with purple flowers now called Apollaris lappa, growing in Cashmere from 8000 to 9000 feet above the sea level. It is exported to various countries, the valuable part being the root. The Chinese burn it in their temples for incense.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew word Ki's'ah. It is fragrant (Ps. xlv 8). Cassia bark is derived from various species of Cinnamomum. See CINNAMON.

Cas'ta-net.

In the plural the rendering of the Hebrew Mu'dan'im, moving to and fro (2 Sam. vi. 5, R. V.), a musical instrument which David and his subjects played. The margin, following the Vulgate, has sistra, and the A. V. cornets. Castanets are a pair of small spoon-shaped cymbals fastened to the thumb and beaten together by the middle finger. The word castanets is derived from castanea, a chestnut, two of these fruits being anciently attached to the fingers and beaten together. Castanets were employed in Greece and Rome as an accompaniment to hymns in honor of the goddess Artemis or Diana.

Cas'tle.

A fortified building or stronghold (Prov. xviii. 19). David took the Jebusite castle and converted it into his residence, and it was afterwards called the city of David (1 Chron. xi 5, 7). Jehoshaphat built castles in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvi 12; margin of A. V. palaces), and Jotham in its forests (xxvii 4). The habitations of the descendants of Aaron (1 Chron. vi 54), and probably those of the Ishmaelite chieftains and of the Midianites (Gen. xxi 16; Num. xxxi 10), were encampments (R. V.) and not castles (A. V.).

The castle which Schemiah erected was presumably succeeded by the stronghold eventually known as Antonia, and in which Paul was confined at Jerusalem. See ANTONIA, TOWER OF.

Cas'tor and Pol'lux.

Two Greek and Roman divinities, born of the same mother, Leda, but by different fathers. Castor's father was Tyndareus, a Spartan king, while that of Pollux was Zeus, the Greek supreme god. By another account, however, Castor was also the son of Zeus. Castor was a great charioteer and horse-master, who was eventually killed in a fight. Pollux was a highly distinguished pugilist. His father Zeus offered him immortality, but he begged to be allowed to share it day and day about with the deceased Castor. The request was granted, and both brothers were worshiped, especially at Sparta, under the name of the Dioscuri, or sons of Zeus. They were regarded as the special protectors of distressed mariners. The Alexandrian vessel in which Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli had for its sign or figurehead Dioskouroi. This the R. V. renders The Twin Brothers and the A. V., with more latitude, Castor and Pollux.

(Acts xxviii 11). The constellation Gemini (the Twins) is called after the affectionate brother, and its two leading stars are named Castor and Pollux.

Cat'er-pil-lar.

The rendering of the Hebrew word Hasil, devourer. It is associated with the locust, and is a destroyer of vegetation (1 Kin. viii. 37; 2 Chron. vi 28; Ps lxxviii 46, Is xxxiii. 4; Joel i. 4; ii 25). Probably a species of locust, or the common migratory locust in one stage of development (cp Joel i. 4; ii 25, margin of R. V.). For Ps. cv 34 and Jer li. 27 of A. V., see CANKERWORM.

Cat'tle.

A comprehensive term used in the O. T. for domestic animals, large and small, for camels, horses, sheep, goats, oxen, and asses (Gen xiii. 2; xxvi 13, 14, xxx 32, A. V; xxxi 8, 9, 38, 41; xlvii 16-18)

Cau'da. See CLAUDA.

Caul.

1. A network over the hair by Hebrew women (Is. iii. 18); rendered networks on the margin of both the R. V. and the A. V.

2 The lesser omentum, a layer of the inner lining of the cavity of the belly, partly enveloping the liver, as the greater omentum does the stomach (Ex. xxix. 13, 22; Lev iii. 4, 10, 15)

Cave.

A hollow place or cavern in the side of a hill or in any similar situation. Caves tend to occur in all cliffs which are now or have at any former time been washed by sea waves; they are, however, most numerous and largest in limestone countries, of which Palestine is one. Caves served as dwellings for the aborigines of mount Seir, as the name Horite indicates (Gen. xxxvi. 20). Even in later times they were used as temporary abodes, as by Lot and his daughters after the destruction of Sodom (xix. 30), and by Elijah (1 Kin. xix. 9) They often served as stables for cattle. They were natural tombs, and were constantly employed for burial purposes; for example, the cave of Machpelah (Gen. xxiii. 1-20; xlix. 29) and the tomb of Lazarus (John xi. 38). In times of war and oppression they afforded a place of refuge (Judg. vi 2; 1 Sam. xiii. 6; xxiv. 3-10; 1 Mac i. 53; 2 Mac. vi. 11), the most noted being the caves at Makkedah (Josh. x 16-27) and Adullam (1 Sam. xxxi. 1; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13).

Ce'dar.

A famous tree of Lebanon (1 Kin. v. 6), tall and stately (Is ii. 13; Ezek. xvii 22; xxxi. 3). It furnished a timber much prized in the construction of palaces and temples (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Kin v. 5, 6; vii. 1-12; Ezra iii. 7). From its pillars, beams, and planks were cut (1 Kin. vi 9, 10, 18; vii. 2, 7); idols were hewn (Is. xliv. 14); masts were made for ships (Ezek. xxvii. 5). It is fragrant (Song iv 11; Hos. xiv. 7), and it was used in ceremonial purifications (Lev. xiv. 4; Num.

xix. 6). The tree is evidently the Cedar of Lebanon (Abies cedrus or Cedrus libani), is called 'erez in Hebrew, and bears the same name in Arabic, namely 'arz. It is a large tree of dome-shaped form, with long, spreading, contorted branches, evergreen leaves, and cones 3 to 5 inches long. It is wild on mount Taurus as well as in Lebanon. The little grove of trees on the latter range generally visited by travelers was long believed to be the only one, but others have now been discovered on the back of the mountain. It is doubtful whether the Deodar of the Himalaya mountains is really a distinct species.

Ce'dron. See KIDRON.

Cel-o-syr'i-a. See COELESYRIA.

Cen'chre-æ, in A. V. Cenchrea [millet].

The eastern of the two ports of Corinth, that which gave access to the Archipelago. It was about 9 miles from the city. It was visited by Paul (Acts xviii. 18); and it possessed a Christian church, of which Phebe was a servant or deaconess (Rom xvi. 1). The village of Kikres marks the site and preserves the old name a little changed.

Cen-de-bæ'us, in A. V. Cendebeus.

A general placed in command of the sea-coast of Judæa by Antiochus VII. (1 Mac. xv. 38). He was routed by Judas and John, sons of Simon Maccabæus (xvi. 1-10).

Cen'ser.

A vessel for holding incense whilst it is being burned (Num xvi 6, 7, 39). The censers of the tabernacle were of brass (Lev. xvi. 12; cp. Ex. xxvii. 3, firepans); those of the temple were of gold (1 Kin vii 50; 2 Chron. iv. 22; Heb. ix. 4). The censers of the book of Revelation (viii. 3, 5) were also of gold.

Cen'sus.

An enumeration and registration of a people, conveniently made among the Hebrews according to tribe, family, and house (Num. i. 18), and in the wilderness probably based on the reports of the officers over thousands, hundreds, fifties, and tens (Ex. xviii. 25; cp. round numbers, Num. i. 21, 23, etc.). Besides enumerations of classes of the people, like that of the firstborn (Num. iii. 43), a formal census of all the Israelites of military age is recorded in the O. T. as having been taken on three different occasions. The first was taken at mount Sinai in the second month of the second year after they had left Egypt (Num. i). Omitting the Levites (47-54), there were of males above 20 years of age, and capable of bearing arms, 603,550 (45-47; xi. 21). The records of those who had recently paid tribute were probably used in making up the lists (Ex. xxxviii. 26). The Levites from one month old and upward were counted separately, and numbered 22,000 (Num. iii. 39). The second census was taken 38 years later at the camp at Shittim in the Moabite country at the close of the forty years' wandering. The number of men had altered but slightly, and now was 601,730 (Num. xxvi. 1-51), Levites 23,000 (xxvi. 62). The third census was made by order of David, who found that there were of fighting men in Israel 800,000, in Judah 500,000 (2 Sam. xxiv. 1-9; cp. 1 Chron. xxi. 1-6). About the same time the Levites, from 30 years old and upward, numbered 38,000 (1 Chron. xxiii. 3). An enumeration was made of the exiles who returned to Jerusalem from Babylonia with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii.), and an enrollment was ordered by the emperor Augustus for the Roman empire shortly before the birth of Christ (Luke ii. 1; see QUIRINIUS).

Cen-tu'ri-on [from Latin centum, one hundred]

An officer in the Roman army (Acts xxi. 32; xxii. 26), who at first commanded 100 soldiers and afterwards about that number (cp. xxii. 23). Two are mentioned by name in the N. T., Cornelius, stationed at Caesarea, through whom it was made evident that the conducted Paul and other prisoners to Rome and treated Paul kindly (Acts xxvii. 1, 3, 43). Two centurions, besides Cornelius, believed—one at Capernaum (Mat. viii. 5-13), the other at the cross (xxvii. 54).

Ce'phas [Aramaic, rock or stone].

An appellation given by Jesus to the apostle Simon (John i. 42; 1 Cor. i. 12; iii. 22; ix. 5; xv. 5; Gal. i. 9); from it his best-known name Peter, which is the Greek equivalent of Cephas, arose.

Chal-ced'o-ny [from Chalkēdōn, Kalkēdōn, a town in Asia Minor where the mineral was found].

A precious stone, the third foundation of the wall of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19). Chalcedony used to be regarded as a distinct species of siliceous (flinty) mineral, but is now reduced to a variety of the species quartz. It is hard, its largest ingredient being silica. It is of a waxy luster, and therefore much duller than typical quartz. It is white-gray, brown, blue, etc. It is not perfectly crystallized, but often coats crystals of quartz. It occurs massive, in veins, in nodules of botryoidal form (i. e. resembling a cluster of grapes), or in stalactites. This stone, however, did not receive the name chalcedony, it is believed, until the Middle Ages, so that John, it would seem, had a different stone of Chalcedon in mind, perhaps the Chalcedonian emerald or the Chalcedonian jasper which are mentioned by Pliny (37, 18 and 37).

Chal'col. See CALCOL.

Chal-de'a [akin to Hebrew Kasdim, and perhaps meaning land of the conquerors or of the Cushlanders]

Originally the southern portion of Babylonia, at the head of the Persian Gulf, but the designation was ultimately extended to the whole of the alluvial plain stretching from above Hit to the gulf. In the southern portion were situated Ur and Erech; in the northern part Babylon, Cutha, Sippara. There were other cities in the country which are not mentioned in the Scriptures or are not identified.

There is no evidence that the term Chaldea included the plateau to the north, in whole or in part. The theory that it did is ultimately based on the identification of the river Chebar, which was in the land of the Chaldeans (Ezek. i. 3), with the river of Mesopotamia called by the Greeks Chaboras. But this identification cannot be maintained, for the Hebrews distinguished the two rivers by names radically different, Kēbar and Habor. Again, the presence of people called Chaldeans in the mountains of Kurdistan during the retreat of the ten thousand under Roman Centurion.

Holy Spirit is given to gentile believers not less than to Jewish (Acts x.), and Julius, who Xenophon (Anabasis iv 3, 4, etc.), and of others in Pontus mentioned by Strabo (549) has been urged as proof that the primitive home of the Chaldeans was in Armenia. That theory seems now to be abandoned; partly doubtless because, although the Kurdish mountains and adjacent country were repeatedly traversed by the armies of Assyria during a period of seven hundred years, beginning in the fourteenth century B. C. and the geographical notices in the records of these military expeditions are full and minute, yet there is no report of the Assyrians having found a people or country called Kaldû in all that region. If the people called Chaldeans by the classical writers referred to are properly named, and have any connection with the Chaldeans of the south, they are late immigrants, relics perhaps of the imperial army of Babylonia, rather than the original stock.

Chal-de'an, in N. T. Chaldean.

A native or inhabitant of Chaldea. Chaldeans early entered Babylonia. By the 9th century B. C. they were firmly established on the shores of the Persian gulf, with Bit-yakin for their capital. Under Merodach-baladan they conquered Babylonia, but he was finally crushed by Sennacherib, king of Assyria. In 625 B. C. a Chaldean, Nabopolassar, founded the new Babylonian empire. The Chaldeans were now the dominant race, and doubtless possessed themselves of all offices of influence. So exclusively did they fill ecclesiastical positions at the capital that at Babylon their name became synonymous with priests of Bel-marduk (Herod. i 181, 183). These priests were esteemed as possessors of wisdom (Dan. i 4; ii 2, 4).

Chal-dees'.

A variant form of Chaldeans used in the expression Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. xi 31; Neh. ix 7), and also sometimes in A. V. when there is no mention of Ur (2 Kin. xxiv. 2; xxv. 4-26; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 17; Is. xlii. 19).

Chalk's stone.

A stone taken from the limestone rocks which constitute a marked feature of Palestine (Is. xxvii. 9).

Chal'phi, in A. V. Calphi.

Father of Judas, one of the two captains who stood by Jonathan Maccabeus at Hazer (1 Mac. xi. 70).

Cham'ber-lain.

One who looks after the private chambers of a palace or mansion; as Blastus, who was over Herod's bedchamber (Acts xii. 20); or one who has charge of the treasure chamber, as Erastus, the treasurer of the city of Corinth (Rom. xvi. 23, A. V.; in R. V. treasurer). In the O. T. the word rendered chamberlain signifies eunuch, and is often translated so; see EUNUCH.

Cha-me'le-on [the ground lion].

A reptile which belongs to the same order as lizards, but, according to the present classification, not to the same group. The name is found in Lev. xi 30. In R. V. it is the rendering of the Hebrew Tnshemeth, breathing, inflation (in A. V. mole), whereas in A. V. it represents the Hebrew word Koah (in R. V. land crocodile; see LIZARD). The lungs of the lizard are very large and, when expanded, render it semi-transparent. Its eyeballs protrude from the head, and are independent in their action, so that it can turn one eye up and the other down, or look in different directions and at different objects at the same time. It has also the faculty of changing its hue in accordance with the color of the objects about it or with its temper when disturbed. This power is due to the presence of clear or pigment-bearing cells in the skin, their contractions and dilatations being controlled by the nervous system. It lives in trees. Its feet are fitted for use as hands and its tail is prehensile, so that it is able to cling to the branches. It feeds upon insects which it captures by means of its long tongue covered at the end with a viscous substance.

Cham'o'is.

The rendering of the Hebrew Zemer, leaper. The animal is ruminant. (Deut. xiv. 5). It is not the real chamois, which is a native of the European mountains from the Pyrenees to the Caucasus, but does not occur in Palestine.

Cham-paign' [open country] (Deut. xi. 30, A. V.). See ARABAH.

Cha'naan. See CANAAN.

Cha-phen'a'tha, in A. V. Caphenatha.

Apparently a portion of the eastern wall of Jerusalem, perhaps one of the towers or other mural fortifications (1 Mac. xii. 37), and possibly even the tower that stood out from the upper house of the king (Neh. iii. 25).

Chap'i-ter.

The capital, i. e. the head or uppermost part of a column, pillar, or pilaster (1 Kin. vii. 16). It can be varied in form and ornamentation, according to the order of architecture used in the building (Ex. xxxvi. 38; xxxviii. 17, 19; 1 Kin. vii. 19, 20).

Chap'man.

Originally a merchant; then a mere pedlar (2 Chron. ix. 14).

Char'a-shim [craftsmen], in R. V. Ge-harashim [valley of craftsmen].

A valley in Judah (1 Chron. iv. 14), inhabited after the exile by the tribe of Benjamin (Neh. xi. 35). Conder suggests the ruin Hirsha as an echo of the name, on the slope of a wady $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles southeast of Ajlalon and 11 miles west-northwest of Jerusalem.

Char'che-mish. See CARCHEMISH.

Char'ger.

A large dish or platter. The name is appropriately used in the English version for the dish on which the head of John the Baptist was brought to Herodias' daughter (Mat. xiv. 8), and for the silver dishes of 130 shekels' weight presented by the tribal princes at the dedication of the altar (Num. vii. 13). The Hebrew word rendered charger in the last passage denotes the golden dishes which stood on the table of showbread (Ex. xxvi. 29; Num. iv. 7).

Char'1-ot.

A two-wheeled vehicle, of various forms, drawn by horses (2 Sam. viii. 4), and used for military (Ex. xiv. 9; 1 Sam. xiii. 5), state (Gen. xli. 43, 2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 Kin. i. 5), and private purposes (Gen. xli. 29; 2 Kin. v. 9; Acts viii. 28). The bed was open behind, and rested on the axle without springs. The wheels were not clumsy, but consisted of felloes, spokes, and naves, and were often of metal (1 Kin. vii. 33). Chariots were but poorly adapted to the hills of Palestine, and were not much used, but they were common among the Canaanites in the valley (Josh. xvii. 16; Judg. iv. 3), and among the Egyptians (Is. xxxi. 1), Ethiopians (2 Chron. xvi. 8), Syrians (2 Kin. v. 9), Hittites (2 Kin. vii.

Royal Assyrian Chariot

6), and Assyrians (Nah. iii. 4; iii. 2). The war chariots commonly carried a driver (2 Chron. xviii. 33), and occasionally a shield-bearer, besides the warrior himself. Probably among the Hebrews a third person, perhaps shield-bearer, sometimes occupied the chariot (2 Kin. ix. 25). The war chariot was at times constructed of iron or covered with iron plates (Josh. xvii. 16, 18; Judg. i. 19; iv. 3). The Persians armed the axles and sometimes the tongue with scythes. Cruel chariots of this sort were seen in Palestine in the Seleucid period (2 Mac. xiii. 2). A four-wheeled vehicle may be intended in Rev. xvii. 13. See additional illustration under Bow.

Char'1-ty.

Love, often manifested by almsgiving. The charity described in 1 Cor. xiii. is not almsgiving, as is evident from ver. 3; it is love, charity in the broad sense, love toward all. It is so rendered by the R. V.

Char'ran. See HARAN.

Che'bar.

A river in the land of the Chaldeans, on the banks of which some of the Jewish exiles, including the prophet Ezekiel, were settled. It was there that the prophet saw several of his visions (Ezek. i. 1, 3; iii. 15, 23; x. 15, 20). It is not the river called by the Greeks Chaboras, which rises near Nisibis in upper Mesopotamia, and falls into the Euphrates at Ctesium, for the Hebrew name of this river was Habor. The Chebar was a great canal, southeast of Babylon. These streams were known by the name nâr, river.

Ched-or-la'o-mer [Elamite, servant of the god Lagamar].

A king of Elam, who evidently held the sovereignty over Babylonia. In the days of Abraham, in alliance with Amraphel, king of Shinar, Arioch, king of Ellasar, and Tidal, king of Gonn, he made an expedition to the west and subjugated the country about the Dead Sea. The people of the plain served him twelve years and then revolted. The next year Chedorlaomer came with his allies and smote the region east of the Jordan from Bashan southward, the land of Edom to the head of the Red Sea, the country afterwards inhabited by the Amalekites, and the plain about the Dead Sea. This conquest gave him control of the caravan routes from Arabia past the head of the Red Sea to Egypt, Canaan, and the north. But he carried off Lot from Sodom. This induced Abraham to lead his numerous servants and his allied chieftains to the pursuit. They fell upon Chedorlaomer by night at Dan, put him and his followers to flight, and recovered the captives and the spoil (Gen. xiv. 1-16). It was not strange, even in those early days, for a Babylonian monarch to make an expedition to the countries on the Mediterranean sea. Long before the time of Abraham great kings, such as Lugal-zaggisi, Sargon, Gudea, had extended their conquests to the western sea or drawn supplies from that region.

Kudurmabug, the overlord of Babylonia, was an Elamite, and Eriaku, king of Larsa, was his son. Chedorlaomer's name, in its native form Kudurlagamar, proves that he was an Elamite, and his association with Arioch and the extent of his sway, strongly indicate that he was a member of this dynasty and a successor of Kudurmabug.

Cheese.

The curd of milk, coagulated, separated from the whey, and pressed (Job x. 10; cp. 1 Sam. xvii. 18; 2 Sam. xvii. 29). A valley at Jerusalem bore the name Tyropæon (War v. 4, 1), which in Greek means cheesemakers.

Che'lal [consummation, completion].

A son of Pahath-moab, whom Ezra induced to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra x. 30).

Che'lub [wicker basket; bird's cage].

1. A brother of Shuah, whose lineage is not traced, but who was entitled to registry in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 11).

2. The father of David's officer over the cultivators (1 Chron. xxvii. 26).

Che-lu'bai. See CALEB 1.

Chel'u-hi, in A. V. Chel'luh.

A son of Bani, whom Ezra induced to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra x. 35).

Chem'a-rim, in text of A. V. Chemarims.

Priests of the high places (2 Kin xxiii 5, margin), of the calves at Bethel (Hos. x. 5, margin), and of Baal (Zeph. i. 4).

Chem'mosh [probably subduer].

The god of the Moabites (Num. xxi. 29; Jer. xlviii. 46; Moabite Stone 3), worshiped in the same manner as was Molech, by the sacrifice of children as burnt offerings (2 Kin. iii. 27). His identity with Molech appears further from Judg. xi. 24, where the god of the Ammonites, who was Molech (1 Kin. xi. 7), is called Chemosh. Solomon erected a high place for him near Jerusalem (1 Kin. xi. 7), which was afterwards defiled by Josiah (2 Kin. xxiii. 13).

Che-na'a-nah [feminine of Canaan].

1. A Benjamite. family of Jedael (1 Chron. vii. 10).

2. The father of the false prophet Zedekiah who deluded Ahab (1 Kin. xxii. 11; 2 Chron. xviii. 10).

Chen'a-ni [firm].

A Levite who assisted in bringing the returned exiles to such a frame of mind that they agreed to enter into a covenant to worship Jehovah (Neh. ix. 4).

Chen-a-ni'ah [Jehovah is firm].

A chief of the Levites in David's reign, of the house of Izhar, who was appointed superintendent of the outward business, such as judging (1 Chron. xxvi. 29), and the transportation of the ark (xv. 22, 27, margin; in text, song).

Che-phar-am'mo-ni, in A. V. Che-phar-ha-am'mo-nai [village of the Ammonite].

A village of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 24). Site unknown.

Che-phi'rah [village].

A city of the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 17), allotted to the Benjamites (xviii. 26). It continued to exist after the captivity (Ezra ii. 25; Neh. vii. 29). Its site is the ruin Kefireh, 8 miles west-northwest of Jerusalem.

Che'ran [possibly either or lute].

A Horite, a son of Dishon (Gen. xxxvi. 26; 1 Chron. i. 41).

Cher'eth-ites, in A. V. once Cherethims [probably Cretans].

A nation or tribe inhabiting the Philistine country or its southern portion (1 Sam. xxx. 14; Ezek. xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5, 6). They may be identical with the Philistines who came from Caphtor (q. v.), or may represent a direct emigration from Crete. Some of them were members of David's bodyguard (2 Sam. viii. 18 with xxiii. 23; xv. 18). In three places the name Carite appears in their stead (2 Sam. xx. 23; 2 Kin. xi. 4, 19, both R. V.). It has been suggested that this name preserves the memory of Carian inhabitants of Crete, alluded to by classical writers.

Cher'ith [cut, gorge].

A brook before Jordan, by which Elijah sojourned (1 Kin. xvii. 3, 5). Whether east or west of the Jordan is uncertain.

Cher'ub, plural Cher'u-bim; in A. V. Cherubims.

1. Guardians placed east of the garden of Eden to prevent the approach of our first parents to the tree of life after their expulsion from the garden (Gen. iii. 24). When the ark was constructed for the tabernacle, cherubim wrought of gold were placed facing each other, one at each side of the mercy seat, overshadowing it with their wings (Ex. xxv. 18-20; xxxvii. 7-9). They symbolized the presence and unapproachability of Jehovah, whose glory was manifested between them (Lev. xvi. 2), who thus dwelt in the midst of his people, and was present in the tabernacle to receive worship (Ex. xxv. 22; Lev. i. 1). Frequent reference is made to Jehovah dwelling between the cherubim (Num. vii. 89; 1 Sam. iv. 4; 2 Sam. vi. 2; 2 Kin. xix. 15; Ps. lxxx. 1; xcix. 1; Is. xxxvii. 16). Cherubim were also embroidered on the hangings of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 1). For the grander temple Solomon had two gigantic cherubs made. The height was ten cubits, or about fifteen feet, and the expansion of their wings as many more. They were of olive wood, and were overlaid with gold (1 Kin. vi. 23-28; viii. 7; 2 Chron. iii. 10-13; v. 7, 8; Heb. ix. 5). Cherubs, with palm trees and open flowers, were also carved all round the walls of the temple (1 Kin. vi. 29). In a poem David represented Jehovah as riding upon a cherub and flying (2 Sam. xxii. 11; Ps. xviii. 10). Ezekiel had a vision of cherubs by the river Chebar. Each had four faces and four wings (Ezek. x. 1-22; cp. ix. 3), and since they seem to be identical with the four living creatures previously seen by the prophet, these four faces were those of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle (cp. i. 5-12 with x. 20, 21). They carried the throne of Jehovah (i. 26-28; ix. 3). Finally the apostle John in the apocalypse describes four living creatures, who had faces like those of the same four animals (Rev. iv. 6, 9).

It is possible, though not yet proven, that the Assyrians had acquaintance with the same idea. Their winged, man-headed bulls have a certain external physical resemblance to cherubim as sometimes described in the Hebrew Scriptures; and they performed the same function, being placed at the entrance of palaces and temples where majesty dwelt. It is especially premature, however, to assert that the bulls of Assyria bore a name similar to that of the Hebrew cherubim.

The varying forms assumed by the cherubim in art and poetic imagery show that they were symbols. But symbols of what? The flaming sword (Gen. iii. 24), and the darkness under Him who did ride upon a cherub and flew upon the wings of the wind (Ps. xviii. 10), have been cited as the main support of the theory that the cherub is in ultimate analysis the storm cloud. It is true that the cherubim might represent some power of nature, or all the powers of nature, as the servants of Jehovah and guardians of his abode. But the biblical writers represent the cherubim, symbolically at least, as animate beings with the intelligence of man, the strength of the ox, the courage of the lion, and the free motion of the eagle through the air. The facts at present obtainable indicate an order of angels.

2 A place in Babylonia, from which certain persons came who could not prove their Israelite descent (Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61). Situation unknown. Pronounced ke'rub.

Ches'a-lon [trust, hope]

A town on the boundary line of Judah, on mount Jearim (Josh. xv. 10), commonly identified with the village of Kesla, 10 miles west of Jerusalem.

Chesed [perhaps the noun from which Kasdim, Chaldeans, is derived]

A son of Nahor by his wife Milcah (Gen. xxii. 22).

Ches'il [a fool]

A village in the most southerly region of Judah (Josh. xv. 30); apparently called also Bethul and Bethuel.

Chestnut. See PLANE

Chesul'loth [trusts, or perhaps the loins (or slopes)].

A town on the boundary line of Issachar (Josh. xix. 18), probably the same as Chisloth-tabor (q. v.).

Cheth, in R. V. Heth and Hheth.

The eighth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. English H, which developed out of the same original, and Ch, though neither is pronounced with the guttural sound of cheth, represent it in anglicized Hebrew names, as Haran, Chezib. It stands at the beginning of the eighth section of Ps. cxix. in several versions, in which section each verse begins with this letter.

Ches'zib. See ACHZIB.

Chi'don [a javelin].

A name for the threshing floor at which Uzza was struck dead for touching the ark (1 Chron. xiii. 9). In 2 Sam. vi. 6 called Nachon. The difference of name has not been satisfactorily explained. Exact site unknown.

Chil'e-ab.

David's second son (2 Sam. iii. 3; where the Greek gives his name as Daluia[h]), born at Hebron. His mother was Abigail. In 1 Chron. iii. 1 he is called Daniel.

Chil'i-on [a wasting away].

The younger son of Elmelech and Naomi (Ruth i. 2, 5).

Chil'mad.

A place which traded with Tyre, mentioned in connection with Sheba and Asshur (Ezek. xxxvii. 23).

Chim'ham [longing]

The son of Barzillai the Gileadite. When the father was invited by David to Jerusalem, and declined the honor on account of his advanced age, Chimham was sent in his place (2 Sam. xix. 37, 38). He seems to have settled in the vicinity of Bethlehem and erected a caravansary (Jer. xli. 17).

Chin'ne-reth and Chinneroth, in A. V. once Cinneroth (1 Km. xv. 20) [lute, harp].

1 A fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35, cp. also Deut. iii. 17).

2 The region around the city of Chinnereth (1 Km. xv. 20, cp. also Josh. xi. 21), commonly identified with the plain of Gennesaret (Mat. xiv. 34).

3. The sheet of water adjacent to the fortified city and region of Chinnereth (Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 27; 1 Km. xv. 20). In later times known as the lake of Gennesaret (Luke v. 1) and sea of Galilee or Tiberias (John vi. 1).

Chi'os.

An island, now called Scio or Chio, in the Greek Archipelago, at the entrance of the Gulf of Smyrna. It has Lesbos on the north and Samos on the south. It is about 32 miles long from north to south, 18 broad from east to west, and has an area of about 400 square miles. Paul's vessel passed it on his last voyage to Palestine (Acts xx. 15).

Chis'lev, in A. V. Chisleu.

The ninth month of the Hebrew year (Neh. i. 1, Zech. vii. 1, 1 Mac. i. 54). See YEAR.

Chis'lon [trust, hope]

Father of the prince of Benjamin in the time of Moses (Num. xxxiv. 21).

Chis'loth-ta'bor [the flanks of Tabor or the trust of Tabor].

A locality hard by mount Tabor, and a landmark on the boundary of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 12); probably the same as Chesulloth, a town on the border of Issachar (ver. 18). The two names are radically identical; they differ merely in the vocalization, and this difference of pronunciation is not supported by the Septuagint. Eusebius mentions a village Chasalus in the plain near mount Tabor. The place is commonly identified with the modern village of Iksâl or Ksâl, which stands on a low, rocky eminence west of Tabor.

Chith'lish, in A. V. Kithlish.

A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 40).

Chit'tim. See KITTIM.

Chi'un.

A word occurring but once in the Hebrew Bible (Amos v. 26). It may denote the planet Saturn, known to the Syrians as Kewan or Kaivan, and which was looked upon as unpropitious. The A. R. V. translates it shrine.

Chlo'e [the first shoot of green grass]

A Christian woman, apparently of Corinth (1 Cor. i 11).

Chor-a'shan. See ASHAN.Cho-ra'zin.

A town mentioned along with Bethsaida and Capernaum, and probably, like them, near the sea of Galilee. Like the two other places, Chorazin had at times been the scene of the Saviour's preaching and beneficent miracles; but it failed to turn its spiritual privileges to account, and was doomed to suffer the penalty of its neglect (Mat. xi 21, Luke x 13). Eusebius, in the fourth century, said that it was 2 Roman miles from Capernaum. In 1842 the Rev. G. Williams believed that he had found it at Kerázeh, about 2½ miles north of Tell Hum. The the Hebrew name Messiah, which denoted the anointed king of Israel, and, after Saul's reign, the royal son of David. The term was borrowed from the Septuagint, specially from Ps ii. 2; Dan ix. 25. When used in the N T. it generally has the word the prefixed, and means the Messiah of O T. prophecy (Mat. xvi 16, 20; xxvi. 63; Mark viii 29; Luke iii 15; John i. 41). Sometimes the is omitted (Mat. xxvi. 68; John iv. 25).

Christ, though really used in the primary sense, is so constantly appended to Jesus, the distinctive personal name of our Lord, given from his birth, as virtually to constitute part of the proper name (John i 17; Acts xi. 17; Rom i 1, v 1, Philemon 1, etc.).

Chris'tian.

A follower of the Lord Jesus Christ. The name was first given at Antioch, about A. D. 43, and apparently by foes rather than friends (Acts xi. 26). Though destined ultimately to become universal, yet it took root so slowly that it is found only twice again in the N T., once in the mouth of Agrippa II., when Paul preached repentance and remission of sins through Jesus and testified to the resurrecidentification is now generally accepted. It is a little inland, in a side valley branching off from another one which goes down to the lake. The spot is marked by extensive ruins, including a synagogue.

Kerázeh, Site of Chorazin

Cho-ze'ba. See COZEBA.Christ [Greek, anointed].

The Anointed One, a title corresponding to tion of Christ (Acts xxvi 18, 23, 28), and once in a letter from Peter to comfort the faithful whose adherence to Christ brought persecution upon them (1 Pet. iv. 16).

Chronicles, Books of the.

Two historical books of the O T. They are evidently the work of a single author, for they have unity of plan and purpose, and are incomplete if one is sundered from the other. In fact they actually formed one book in the old Hebrew canon. The Septuagint translators divided them into two, and this division was finally admitted into printed editions of the Hebrew canon. The Hebrew name of the books is "Acts of the Days," ἡ εἰς τοῦ Τημερῶν. The Septuagint calls them Paraleipomena, or things left over. The title is unfortunate, since it incorrectly implies that the book was intended as a supplement, whereas it has an independent aim. The name Chronicles is derived from the title (Chronicon) applied to these writings by Jerome, who describes them as "a chronicle of the whole of sacred history."

The work naturally divides itself into two parts. 1 The genealogies, especially of Judah, Benjamin, and Levi, from the creation to the return from the Babylonian exile (1 Chron. i-viii), with a register of those who, probably before the exile, dwelt in Jerusalem (ix 1-34). The transition to part second is afforded by means of the genealogy and death of Saul and Jonathan (ix 35-x 14). 2 History of the Israelites, more especially of Judah, from the accession of David to the return from the Babylonian exile (xi-2 Chron xxxvi).

The abrupt conclusion of the work, and the identity of its closing verses with the opening verses of Ezra, have been thought to indicate that Chronicles and Ezra were originally one continuous history. But these verses are a quotation either in both Chronicles and Ezra from the same state document, or, more probably, in one book from the other. The books themselves never constituted one work. They are entirely different in plan, and ancient tradition never reckoned them as one. They may, however, have had one and the same author.

The first datum which bears on the question as to when the work was composed is found in the genealogies. The line of David is brought down to a date later than any other. The grandchildren of Zerubbabel are mentioned (1 Chron. ix. 19-21), consequently the work cannot have been composed a great while before the time of Ezra. It is, however, frequently affirmed that yet later descendants of Zerubbabel are registered, even the sixth generation after him (21-24). But there is not the shadow of proof that the families enumerated in verse 21, latter part, were descendants of Hananiah, son of Zerubbabel. Their descent and that of Shecaniah, whose posterity is given at considerable length (21-24), are not indicated. The phenomenon of unattached families is of common occurrence in these genealogies, and, when the text is not at fault, indicates that the family thus loosely catalogued belonged to the clan or tribe with which it is registered, though its connection is not traced. The four families enumerated in verse 21 belonged to the lineage of David, and were collateral with the royal line which descended through Hananiah, son of Zerubbabel. The other indications likewise point to the time of Ezra. The amount contributed toward the erection of the temple is stated in Persian coins, not in Greek (1 Chron. xxix 7, R V, daries), which indicates that the Greek empire had not supplanted the Persian when the work was composed. The designation of the temple as "the Birah," the castle or the palace (1 Chron. xxix 1, 19), indicates a time not later than Nehemiah, for after his time "the Birah" denoted not the temple, but a structure erected by him (Neh. ii 8, vii 2, both R V), which came to be distinguished from the temple and all other buildings as the castle, see ANTONIA, TOWER OF.

Ancient opinion was that Chronicles was written by Ezra. This tradition cannot be proved, and it is not vital that it should be. But there is no valid objection to it, and it is strengthened by peculiarities of language common to Chronicles and Ezra. These peculiarities have led most modern critics, even when influenced by the unwarranted interpretation of the genealogy in ix 19-24 to assign a late date to Chronicles, nevertheless to hold that the two books in their present form are from the same hand.

Chronicles stands among the Hagiographa, the last division of the Hebrew canon, and not among "the prophets." This is evidence that the author was not a prophet; see CANON. The Masorites, followed as a rule by Spanish manuscripts, placed Chronicles first in order among the Hagiographa and immediately before the Psalms. In the printed editions of the Hebrew Bible, and in German and French manuscripts, it follows Ezra-Nehemiah, and is the last book in the division. This position it probably occupied at the time of Christ, for Zechariah is cited as the last [named] prophet who suffered a violent death (Mat. xxiii 35; Luke xi 51, cp 2 Chron. xxiv 20-22).

For the book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel, see KINGS, BOOKS OF THE.

Chro-nol'o-gy.

The nations of antiquity did not have a uniform system of chronology; nor did they entertain the same notions and feel the same need of an exact and unvarying chronological method as does the modern world. The Assyrians and Babylonians appear to have been confident of their ability to date events of remote antiquity, but, so far as known, they did not have an era serving as a fixed standard from which to reckon all occurrences, but named each year after a public official, and kept a list of these annual eponyms. An event having been dated by the eponym in which it happened, its remoteness was readily ascertained by counting on the list or canon the number of eponyms that had intervened. In Babylonia, Assyria, Palestine, and Egypt, documents were frequently dated by the regnal year of the reigning monarch. Unfortunately the scribes did not always reckon uniformly; but under the same king some regarded the accession year as the first regnal year, while others considered the civil twelve-month which followed the accession as the first year of the reign. Furthermore, a son was not infrequently associated with his father on the throne, and some scribes treated the first year of association with the father, and others the first year of sole reign, as the first regnal year. The deficient sense of chronology, estimated by modern conceptions, is seen in the fact that Josephus determines the duration of the kingdom of Israel by simply adding together the number of years that each king ruled, regardless of the fact that the reigns regularly overlapped one year, since the death of a king and the accession of his successor fell in the same year, and this year was apt to be reckoned to both reigns. Pursuing this method, he states that the kingdom of Israel lasted 240 years, 7 months, and 7 days (Antiq. ix. 14, 1); yet by other calculations, which he makes on the basis of the reigns of the kings of Judah, he implies that the period was 263 years (e. g. Antiq. x. 8, 5 with viii. 7, 8 and x. 9, 7). The same lack of a nice chronological sense appears in the fact that Josephus estimates the number of years that elapsed from the exodus to the founding of the temple at 592 (Antiq. viii. 3, 1), at other times at 612 (xx. 10; con. Apion. ii. 2), the Hebrew writer at 480 (1 Kin. vi. 1), and Paul apparently at about 574 (Acts xiii. 18-21 and 1 Kin. ii. 11; vi. 1). These diverse statements appear contradictory to the modern reader who lacks the historic sense and cannot divest himself of modern chronological conceptions; but they are accurate in the sense in which they were intended, and in which they were understood.

The era, as it is used in modern chronology, came into use at a comparatively late date. The exodus from Egypt served the Hebrews for a brief time as a point from which to reckon (Ex. xvi. 1; Num. ix. 1; x. 11, xxxiii. 38). The Romans dated all documents by the name of the consul in office, and later they added the regnal year of the emperor. Their historians began to date from the foundation of the city, A. U. C., but the custom did not arise until some centuries after the event. Varro's date for the founding of the city, 753 B. C., is generally accepted as the commencement of this era. The Greeks reckoned by periods of four years called Olympiads. The first began in 776 B. C., the year in which Coræbus was victor in the Olympic games. The Syrians used the Seleucid era, beginning with October 312 B. C. It was used by the Jews in Maccabæan times (1 Mac. i. 10). The Mohammedans date from the Hegira, or flight of Mohammed from Mecca, in A. D. 622. The Jews use a world's era, dating from the creation, which they place in the year 3760-61 B. C. Christian nations have adopted the birth of Christ as an era. At the beginning of the sixth century, the Roman abbot Dionysius in his Easter tables counted from the incarnation of the Lord. The abbot erred in his calculation of the date of Christ's birth, but the year which he fixed upon, A. U. C. 754, has been accepted as the commencement of the Christian era. The Christian era began, not with no year, but with a first year. Events which occurred within the civil year which included Christ's birth are dated in the first year.

Dates were placed in the margin of A. V. in 1701. They represent the chronological scheme of Usher, archbishop of Armagh, which he published in his Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti in 1650-54. His work was careful and scholarly, and served a useful purpose for two centuries and a half. But it is inaccurate and obsolete. It gives only one of several possible arrangements. It is based in crucial points on Usher's private interpretation of disputed passages, in some of which he clearly erred, as has been proved in recent years. His system was worked out from the standpoint of modern chronological conceptions, and fails to do justice to the different notions which prevailed in antiquity. It was constructed without the invaluable aid of data which have been brought to light by modern research. But although Usher's system is obsolete, it cannot as yet be superseded by a complete and final scheme. A few dates are fixed, and the chronology of certain periods is established. Other dates are still under investigation or are awaiting disclosure from undiscovered ancient records. Much is tentative.

I. FROM THE CREATION OF THE WORLD TO THE BIRTH OF ABRAHAM.

The data are furnished by the Hebrew records in Gen. v. 1-32; vii. 11; xi. 10-26. There are several possible methods of interpreting them, among which may be mentioned:

1. The genealogy was constructed by the ancient writers in the same manner that it would be framed by people of the present day.

Adam	having lived	130 years,	begat
Seth,	who "	105 "	" "
Enosh,	" "	90 "	" "

Noah	having lived 500 years, begat
Shem, who	" " 100 " "
Arpachshad	" " " 35 " "
Shelah,	" " " 30 " "
Eber,	" " " 34 " "
Peleg,	" " " 30 " "
Reu,	" " " 32 " "
Serug,	" " " 30 " "
Nahor,	" " " 29 " "
Terah,	" " " 70 " "

Abram, Nahor, and Haran,	890 years after birth of Noah.
	290 " after the flood.
	1946 " after the creation.

The two years of Gen. xi. 10 are added to this result by Usher, according to whom Terah begat his sons 1948 years after the creation. On this interpretation Shem was not the eldest son of Noah, as is generally believed, born when his father was 500 years old (Gen v. 32). But xi 10 has another explanation. Interpreting the data of the genealogy as before, Noah having lived 500 years begat Shem, who having lived 100 years, begat Arpachshad. Arpachshad was thus born in the 601st year of Noah's life. He was born in the second civil year after the flood year, counting it the first. The flood year was the 600th of Noah's life (vii. 6, 11), the flood itself prevailing during five months of that year. Noah lived 350 full years after the flood year, counting it the first (ix. 28). In the flood year he was 599 years and some months old. As he lived 350 years longer, he died when he was 949 years and some months old, in the 950th year of his age (ix. 29). There are discrepancies between the Hebrew, the Septuagint, and the Samaritan Pentateuch. The Hebrew text is evidently the most accurate one with respect to dates. The Septuagint, probably on the ground that the long-lived antediluvians were not likely to beget a son while they were less than 150 years old, took the liberty of adding a century to the Hebrew date, where it was said that they had done so, as in the case of Adam, Seth, Enosh, Kenan, Mahalalel, and Enoch. The minor variations are that to Lamech the Alexandrian text and Lucian assign $188 + 565 = 753$ years; and Lucian divides Methuselah's life into $167 + 802 = 969$ years. The Samaritan Pentateuch, on the contrary, apparently on the ground that an antediluvian was not likely to have lived 150 years without begetting his first son, finding by the Hebrew text that Jared did so at 162, Methuselah at 187 (according to Lucian at 167), and Lamech at 182, cut the figures down to 62, 67, and 53. This reduced the total length of their lives, whereas the Septuagint had carefully balanced its additions to the first part of the lives by corresponding subtractions from the later part, so that the total length of each life was the same in that version as in the Hebrew original, except in the case of Lamech. Similarly, in the case of the postdiluvian patriarchs who preceded Abraham, the Septuagint hesitates to allow them to beget a son till they are 100 years old. It adds 100 years to the ages at which sons were begotten by Arpachshad, Shelah, Eber, Peleg, Reu, and Serug, and 50 (Alexandrian manuscript and Lucian) to the time of life when Nahor begat Terah. After Arpachshad it inserts Kenan, and states that he begat Shelah when 130 years old. The Samaritan Pentateuch allows them to beget a son after 50; and in the case of Arpachshad, Shelah, Eber, Peleg, Reu, and Serug adds 100 years to the age assigned by the Hebrew text, and 50 years in the case of Nahor.

2. Or many links are omitted. As in other Hebrew genealogies, each member is said to have begotten his successor, although the latter may be a grandson or even remoter descendant; as in the royal genealogy given in Matthew, the three kings, Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah are passed over and Joram is said to have begotten Uzziah, his great-great-grandson (i. 8, R. V.; cp the use of the verb "bare" in Gen. xlvii 15, 18). Only prominent members of the line are enumerated, or else, as an aid to memory, a definite number is chosen; in Matthew groups of twice seven, in Genesis groups of ten.

Adam, at the age of 130 begat
Seth, who at the age of 105 begat
Ancestor of Enosh or Enosh himself.
Enosh, at the age of 90 begat
Ancestor of Kenan or Kenan himself.
Kenan, at the age of 70 begat
Ancestor of Mahalalel or Mahalalel himself.

According to this theory, the Hebrew records afford no basis for a chronology from Adam to Abraham. It assumes, further, that the age assigned to the patriarchs is that of their natural life. Adam lived 930 years. This extraordinary longevity is accounted for by the fact that sin, which has a physical effect and works disease and death, had only begun its malign influence on the race, and had not reached its normal hereditary power. The balance between man in a sinless state and man in the condition of sinner had not been attained.

3. Or the names denote an individual and his family spoken of collectively; as Israel denotes a patriarch and his descendants, Kain is used for the Kenites (Num. xxiv. 22, R. V.), David for the royal house (1 Kin. xii. 16). Sometimes the family takes its name from its progenitor or later leading member of the tribe; sometimes the name of the tribe or of the country it inhabits is applied to its chief representative, as to-day men are constantly addressed by their family name, and nobles are called by the name of their duchy or country. In Gen. x. the names in the gen-geology are sometimes individuals, sometimes peoples, sometimes cities, sometimes countries; and in the pedigree of Abraham given in this chapter Arpachshad, whom Shem begat (x. 22), is apparently a country whose inhabitants were descendants of Shem, and this country produced Shelah (cp. bear, beget, firstborn in Gen. xxv 2, 3; 12-16). The longevity is the period during which the family had prominence and leadership.

Family of Enosh,	1842

Hence the years from the creation of Adam to the flood were 8225, and from Adam to the death of Terah may be 11,571. This outline exhibits one application of the theory; but it must be remembered that at different points in the genealogy various interpretations are possible, which must be subject to individual preference until further data come to light.

II. FROM THE BIRTH OF ABRAHAM TO THE EXODUS

How long after the flood Abraham was born cannot be determined from the biblical record, not even by the first method enumerated above and employed by Usher in interpreting the genealogy from Adam to Abraham, for the age of Terah at the birth of Abraham is not so stated in Gen. xi. 26, 32 as to be unquestionable; see ABRAHAM. According to Usher, Abraham's birth occurred in 1996 B. C. The period from the birth of Abraham to the descent into Egypt can be measured.

Birth of Abraham to—“ “ Isaac 100 years (Gen. xxi. 5).

“ “ Jacob 60 years (Gen. xxv. 26).

Jacob's age at descent into Egypt 130 years (Gen. xlvii. 9).
290 years.

The sojourn of the children of Israel in Egypt was 430 years (Ex. xii. 40, 41). But from what initial date is this period reckoned? From the covenant with Abraham (Gen. xv), when he was between 75 and 85 years old (xii. 4; xvi 3), as Usher and many others believe, or from the descent into Egypt? Probably from the latter event; see EGYPT III 3.

It is generally believed that Ramses II was the Pharaoh of the oppression, and one of his successors, probably Mer-n-ptah (a name more familiar in the form Menepthah), was the Pharaoh of the exodus; see EGYPT III 8. The date of Ramses II. may be approximately fixed by the fact that Amen-hetep, or as the Greeks pronounced the name, Amenophis IV. of Egypt was a contemporary of Ashuruballit of Assyria Tukulti-adar, fifth in descent from Ashuruballit, reigned, according to a statement of Sennacherib, about 1300 B. C. The fifth or sixth king on the throne of Egypt after Amenophis IV. was Ramses II., an indication that Ramses II. reigned about 1300 B. C. The date of Menepthah's reign was determined in the following manner Menophres, apparently Menepthah, is the king in whose reign the Sothic period of 1460 years is said to have begun. According to Theon the astronomer, the Sothic period ended in A. D. 139. It began, therefore, in 1321 B. C. Hence Menepthah's reign included the year 1321. On the basis of these calculations for the date of the reigns of Ramses II. and Menepthah, the exodus has been provisionally fixed at about 1320. This date will be lowered about forty years if Dr. Mahler, astronomer at Vienna, proves to be correct in his opinion, founded on astronomical data, that Ramses II. reigned from 1348 to 1281 B. C.

III. FROM THE EXODUS TO THE FOUNDATION OF SOLOMON'S TEMPLE.

This interval was doubtless reckoned as twelve periods of forty years each (1 Kin. vi. 1), of which the first covered the sojourn in the wilderness (Ex. xvi. 35; Num. xiv. 33), six certainly, and probably eight, were allowed for the time of the judges proper, the oppression and rest being frequently included in the statement (Judg. iii. 11, 30—double period: v. 31; viii 28; xiii. 1; and probably x. 1-4 and xii. 7-14), the high priesthood of Eli counted as one (1 Sam iv. 18), Saul's reign probably as another (Acts xiii. 21), while David's reign made the twelfth (1 Kin. ii. 11). But the forty years are a round number, and not always exact. The periods enumerated were sometimes in whole or in part contemporary; see JUDGES. Jephthah speaks of the Israelites having occupied the country about Heshbon for 300 years (Judg. xi. 26), some seven periods of forty years Josephus, reckoning in a different manner, estimates the time from the exodus to the temple at 592 or 612 years (Antiq. viii 3, 1; xx 10), while Paul, according to the received text, refers to the period of the judges as lasting about 450 years (Acts xiii 20). As already pointed out, these diverse results do not contradict each other, although they do not agree. The variations are due to the different methods employed in calculating. The sum was not supposed to represent the exact duration of the period, as would a modern chronological statement. The length of the period cannot be given in modern terms until new data come to light.

IV FROM THE FOUNDATION OF THE TEMPLE TO THE EXILE AND RETURN.

The temple was founded in the fourth year of Solomon (1 Kin vi. 1). Solomon reigned forty years, and was succeeded by Rehoboam, on whose ascension of the throne the ten tribes revolted. The data obtained from both Hebrew and foreign sources may be arranged according to the following scheme. For discussion of the details, see the articles in this Manual which are devoted to the several kings, and a brief monograph on the chronology by Prof. Davis in the Presbyterian and Reformed Review, 1891, pp. 98-114. In general it may be remarked that this scheme recognizes the existence of co-reigns. They were common in the neighboring monarchies, and are proven in individual cases for the Hebrews. David when incapacitated by age for government, and in danger of having his throne usurped, had Solomon made king (1 Kin. i.). When Uzziah was compelled to seclude himself because he had become a leper, Jotham assumed the duties of royalty (2 Kin. xv. 5). The scheme further recognizes that among the Hebrews, as among neighboring nations, no fixed rule existed as to whether the accession year of a king or the civil year which followed should be counted as the first regnal year. Some recorders followed one method, others another. Examples might be multiplied; one will suffice. In Ptolemy's canon 604, the civil year following accession is treated as the first regnal year of Nebuchadnezzar. So it is by Josephus, Daniel, and Babylonian scribes, and in the record whence Jer lii 28-30 is taken. But Jeremiah himself and other Palestinian writers of the day numbered the accession year of Nebuchadnezzar his first year, synchronizing Jehoiachim 4 with Nebuchadnezzar 1, and Zedekiah 11 with Nebuchadnezzar 19. It will be observed, finally, that two events, the slaughter of Ahaziah of Judah and Jehoram of Israel by Jehu and the fall of Samaria, divide the history of the divided monarchy into three periods, each chronologically complete in itself. The dates of these two events are established. The chronology, therefore, of each of these periods must be settled by itself. Difficulties which arise in matters of adjustment affect only their own period, not the others.

This scheme is not offered as final in every particular. Slightly different arrangements of the data are possible at several points; for example, in the matter of Athaliah's usurpation. Such minor modifications, however, do not affect the chronology as a whole.

* The dates 35 and 36 given in these verses in the Hebrew text were explained by the older commentators as reckoned from the commencement of the kingdom of Judah. The numbers are then correct. Modern interpreters generally regard the Hebrew text as corrupt, and read 15 or 25 and 16 or 26 for 35 and 36 respectively. They are doubtless right in doing so, for the text of Chronicles has not been transmitted as carefully as it should have been, and the phrase "year of Asa" or other king always refers to his regnal year, and Baasha was dead before the 35th and 36th years of Asa.

* Usher and the older chronologists assumed that anarchy prevailed for several years between the death of Pekah and the accession of Hoshea. Both the Hebrew and the Assyrian records, however, clearly indicate that no interregnum occurred, but that Hoshea slew Pekah and succeeded him on the throne. Chrys'o-lite, in A. V. Chrysolyte [Greek, gold stone].

A unisilicate mineral consisting mainly of magnesia and silica. There are two varieties of it, one precious, the other common. The former, which is transparent and of a pale yellowish-green, is brought from the Levant. It is disputed whether the chrysolite of Phrygia and of the N. T. was a gold-colored chrysolite or a topaz. It constitutes the seventh foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20).

Chrys'o-prase, in A. V. Chrysoprasus [Greek, golden-green stone].

A variety of chalcidony of an apple-green hue, the color being produced by the presence of oxide of nickel. Its best-known locality is in Silesia. It constitutes the tenth foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20).

Church [probably from Greek, kuriakon, the Lord's house].

The rendering in the N. T. of the Greek ekklesia, which in the states of Greece meant the assembly of citizens summoned for legislative or other purposes (Acts xix. 32, 41, rendered assembly). The sacred writers use the word ekklesia to denote an organized community acknowledging the Lord Jesus Christ as their supreme ruler, and meeting stately or as opportunities offer for religious worship (Mat. xvi. 18; xviii. 17; Acts ii. 47; v. 11; Eph. v. 23, 25). As followers of Jesus arose in many different cities, the plural "churches" began to be employed, the Christian community in each separate locality being considered a church (Acts ix. 31; xv. 41; Rom. xvi. 4; 1 Cor. vii. 17; 1 Thes. ii. 14). Church is nowhere unequivocally used in the N. T. for the building in which any particular Christian community met. The Protestant doctrine of the church is that the church may exist without a visible form, because it is both invisible and visible. The invisible church is composed of all who are really united to Christ (1 Cor. i. 2; xii. 12, 13, 27, 28; Col. i. 24; 1 Pet. ii. 9, 10). It is not an external organization. Its members are known to God, though they cannot always be infallibly detected by the human eye, and many of them are in heaven or are yet to be born. The visible church consists of all who profess to be united to Christ.

The apostles occupied a peculiar position of authority (Acts v. 2; vi. 6; 1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. ii. 20; 2 Pet. iii. 2); but they were not the sole governing body, the elders or bishops also exercised rule (Acts xv. 2, 4, 6, 22, 23; 1 Tim. iv. 14; v. 17; 1 Pet. v. 1). The officers of the local churches were elders or bishops and deacons (Acts vi. 3; xiv. 23; xx. 17; 1 Tim. iii. 1, 8; Titus i. 5-9). The apostles sometimes appointed commissioners for special work (1 Tim. i. 3; Titus i. 5).

The public worship of the church was engrafted upon the synagogue service. It consisted of preaching (Mat. xxvii. 20; Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xiv. 19, 26-36), reading of Scripture (Jas. i. 22; Col. iv. 16; 1 Thes. v. 27; cp. Acts xiii. 15), prayer (1 Cor. xiv. 14, 16), singing (Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16; and cp. the hymns Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16), administration of the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper (Mat. xxviii. 19; Acts ii. 41, 1 Cor. xi. 18-34), and almsgiving (1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2). When the spiritual gift was present, there were also prophesyings and tongues.

Chu'shan-rish-a-tha'im. See CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM

Chu'za, in A. R. V. Chuzas [perhaps Aramaic kuza', modest, or jug].

Herod the tetrarch's steward, whose wife Joanna ministered to the wants of Jesus (Luke viii. 3).

Ci-li'ci-a.

A province of Asia Minor, separated on the north by the Taurus mountains from Cappadocia, Lycaonia, and Isauria, and on the east by mount Amanus from Syria; bounded on the south by the Mediterranean, and on the west by Pamphylia. It was anciently divided into two portions, the western one, which was mountainous, called the Rough, and the eastern one, which was level, the Plain Cilicia. The chief town in the latter was Tarsus, the birthplace of St. Paul (Acts xxi. 39; xxii. 3; xxiii. 34). Cilicia formed part of the kingdom of Syria; and when in 148-7 B. C. Demetrius II. landed on its shores and set himself up for king of Syria, the bulk of its inhabitants supported him (1 Mac. xi. 14; Antiq. xiii. 4, 3). Jews from Cilicia disputed with Stephen (Acts vi. 9). The gospel reached it very early (xv. 23), planted apparently by Paul (ix. 30; Gal. i. 21). Afterwards, passing through it, he confirmed the churches which had been founded (Acts xv. 41). Subsequently on his voyage as a prisoner to Rome he sailed over the sea of Cilicia (xxvii. 5).

Cin'na-mon.

A fragrant wood (Song iv. 14; Rev. xviii. 13). It was an ingredient in the sacred anointing oil used in the consecration of Aaron and his successors (Ex. xxx. 23). It was used in after times to perfume beds (Prov. vii. 17). It is the aromatic bark of a tree, Cinnamomum zeylanicum, belonging to the laurel order, and cultivated in Ceylon, of which it is a native. The bark of the tree yields an essential oil, which is obtained from it by distillation. It is of a golden-yellow color, has an agreeable smell, and is used in perfumery. The tree has been grown in Arabia.

Cin'ne-roth. See CHINNERETH.

Cir-cum-cis'ion [a cutting around].

The initiatory rite into the covenant privileges of the family of God represented by Abraham and his descendants through Isaac, and the token of the covenant (Gen xvii. 1-10, 21). As a rite of the religion of this people, it was instituted by God and enjoined upon Abraham, who was himself to be circumcised, as were all his male children and his male slaves, whether born in his house or bought with money. The act consists in removing the foreskin, and it was performed on the child by the father of the house or some other Israelite, and even by the mother (Ex iv 25, 1 Mac i 60). The proper time to carry out the rite was when the child was eight days old, but those born before the institution of the ordinance were to be circumcised at any time of life. Abraham was circumcised when he was 99, and Ishmael when 13 (Gen xvii 11-27). The rite was observed during the bondage in Egypt, but was neglected in the wilderness. Before the entry into Canaan, however, Joshua made knives of flint and circumcised the people (Josh. v. 2-9). By this time metal was known, but there is a strong conservatism in religion, and antique arrangements tend to remain after the necessity for them has passed away; so flint held its own against metal for centuries after the time that the former might have been superseded (cp Ex. iv 25). Foreigners who wished to become members of the commonwealth of Israel were required to submit to the rite, whatever their age might be (Gen. xxxiv. 14-17, 22; Ex. xii. 48). Shortly before the Christian era, the conquered Edomites and Itureans were by force added thus to the Jewish nation (Antiq. xiii. 9, 1; 11, 3). Though there were other circumcised nations as well as the Hebrews, especially the Egyptians (con. Apion. ii. 14; Herod. ii. 104), and they as early as 3000 B. C., yet the Philistines, the Phœnicians, the Moabites, the Ammonites, the Syrians, the Assyrians, the Babylonians, and various other nationalities with whom the Jews were in contact were uncircumcised; so that the word "uncircumcised," as a term of reproach, meant almost practically (not etymologically) the same as heathen (Gen xxxiv. 14; Judg. xiv. 3; xv. 18; 1 Sam. xvii. 26, 36; xxxi. 4; 2 Sam. i. 20; 1 Chron. x. 4; Ezek. xxviii. 10; xxxi. 18; xxxii. 19-32). "The circumcision," on the contrary, used in the N. T. meant the Jewish church and nation (Gal. ii. 8; Col. iv. 11). Circumcision was an act of religious purification (Herod. ii. 37), and in its full significance betokened the putting away of carnal lust (Col. ii. 11). To circumcise the heart is so to regenerate it that its irreligious obstinacy will disappear (Deut. x. 16), and it will be able and willing to love God with all its powers (xxx. 6). Circumcision is universal among the Mohammedans as well as the Jews.

Cis. See KISH.

Cis'tern.

A small artificial reservoir dug in the earth and enclosed by stone or brick work, or scooped in a rock to collect and retain rain water (Deut vi 11, Jer ii 13). Cisterns were very numerous in Palestine, as the populace was largely dependent upon rain water (cp War iii. 7, 12, and 13, iv 1, 8). In the cities they were constructed on the top of the towers of the city wall (War v. 4, 3). They were also excavated under the houses and in the courtyards (cp. 2 Sam xvii. 18; Jer xxxviii 6), provided with bucket and windlass (Ecc. xii 6), and supplied with water conducted to them from the roof. In the open country the mouth is closed with a large stone and frequently, especially in the wilderness, is covered with earth to conceal it.

Cit'y.

In Hebrew usage, a collection of permanent human habitations, whether few or numerous, especially if surrounded by a wall (Gen. iv. 17; xviii 26; xix 20; Num. xiii. 19; Josh. iii 16; x. 39; xiii 17; Judg. xx. 15; Luke ii 4; xiiii 51). Walled and unwallled cities are distinguished (Deut iii. 5; Esth. ix 19, Hebrew). Cities were built on hills (Josh. xi 3; 1 Kin. xvi 24; Mat. v. 14; War iii 7, 7), where the situation rendered defense easy; and in fertile spots, where water and soil invited man to dwell. They were usually fenced with high walls, gates and bars (Num. xii. 28; Deut. iii 5; Josh. ii 5, 15; vi. 5; Neh. iii. 3; Acts ix. 24, 25), and further defended by towers (Neh. iii. 1, 11, 25; War v. 4, 3). Walls of the thickness of 20 to 30 feet were not unusual. The gate was a massive structure, with a room over the gateway (2 Sam. xviii. 33). In time of need a guard was posted at the gate (2 Kin. vii 10; Neh. xiii 19), and a watchman was stationed on the roof of gatehouse or tower (2 Sam. xviii. 24; 2 Kin. ix. 17; War v. 6, 3). In open places at the gate public business was transacted, cases at law adjudicated, and markets held (Gen. xxiii. 10; Ruth iv. 1-11; 2 Sam. xv 2; 1 Kin. xxii 10; 2 Kin. vii. 1; Neh. viii. 1). The streets were as a rule narrow (Antiq. xx. 5, 3; War ii. 14, 9; 15, 5; v. 8, 1), but not always (2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 Kin. i. 5; Jer. xvii. 25); and some streets were devoted to bazaars

(1 Kin. xx 34; Neh. iii. 31; Jer xxxvii. 21).

Cit'y of Refuge.

Six Levitical cities designed to shelter the person who had accidentally committed manslaughter from the pursuit of the avenger of blood (Num xxxv 9-14, Ex xxi. 13); see AVENGER. Moses appointed the three east of the Jordan - Bezer in the territory of Reuben, Ramoth-gilead in that of Gad, and Golan in Bashan in the tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iv 41-43). After the conquest of Canaan, Joshua and the heads of the tribes designated the three west of the river, setting apart Kedesh in the territory of Naphtali, Shechem in Ephraim, and Kirjath-arba, which is Hebron, in the mountain of Judah (Josh xx. 7). No part of Palestine was far from a city of refuge. To the nearest the manslayer fled. He might be overtaken on the way and slain by the avenger; but if he reached a city of refuge he was received into it and obtained a fair trial. If guilty of willful murder he was delivered to death. If he had slain a fellow creature by accident or in self-defense, actual or constructive, he was granted asylum in the city. If he left the city before the death of the high priest he did so at his own risk. On the death of the high priest he was at liberty to return to his home and enjoy the protection of the authorities (Num. xxxv; Deut xix, Josh xx). The matter was between man and God, and the death of the high priest, who represented the people before God, closed a period of theocratic life (cp. the release at the year of jubilee).

Clau'da.

A small island off the southwest of Candia or Crete. Paul's ship ran under its lee when caught by the tempest off Crete (Acts xxvii. 16). It was also called Cauda (R V text) and Gaudos (Phny, Hist. nat. iv. 42). The Greeks still call it Claudanesa, or Gaudonesi, which the Italians have corrupted into Gozzo.

Clau'di-a.

A Christian woman who joined Paul in sending a salutation to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21).

Clau'di-us. See CÆSAR.

Clau'di-us Ly'ei-as.

A chiliarch or commander of 1000 men, who seems to have been the military tribune in charge of the whole garrison at Jerusalem. Each legion had as its officers six such tribunes. He resided in the castle of Antonia, and sent soldiers to rescue Paul from fanatical Jewish rioters. He gave orders that this unknown Jew be examined by scourging, but had him unbound on being informed of his Roman citizenship. Soon afterwards he frustrated a plot against Paul's life by sending him by night under military escort to Cæsarea to Felix, the Roman procurator (Acts xxii. 24-xxiii. 35).

Clean. See UNCLEAN ANIMALS, UNCLEANNESS.

Clem'ent [kind, merciful].

A Christian who labored along with Paul, apparently at Philippi (Phil. iv. 3). He may have been the same individual as the apostolic father, Clement of Rome.

Cle'o-pas

One of the two disciples who journeyed to and from Emmaus on the evening of the Resurrection day (Luke xxiv 18). Apparently not the same as Clopas or Cleophas, though some Christian fathers, not of early date, assumed the identity of the two.

Cle-o-pa'tra.

A name borne by many Egyptian princesses. One was daughter of Ptolemy VI. and wife of Alexander Balas (1 Mac. x 57, 58). Her father afterwards took her from Balas and married her to Demetrius Nicator when he invaded Syria (vi 12; Antiq. xii 4, 7). During the captivity of Demetrius in Parthia, she married his brother Antiochus VII. (Antiq. xii 7, 1: 9, 3; 10, 1). She had two sons by Demetrius, the elder she murdered, and then raised to the throne the younger. Antiochus VIII., called Grypus. As he was unwilling to gratify her ambitious designs, she attempted to make away with him by offering him a cup of poison, but was compelled to drink it herself. 120 B. C.

Clo'pas, in A V Cle'o-phas. See ALPHÆUS

Cloth'ing

Man at first went naked (Gen ii 25). The first clothing consisted of the skins of beasts (iii 21). Subsequently the materials used for clothing were wool (xxxix 19, Lev. xiii 47; Job xxxi 20), linen (Ex ix 31; Lev xvi 4), byssus, a fabric made of cotton or flax (Gen xli 42; Luke xvi 19), silk (Ezek. xvi 10, 13; Rev. xviii 12), goats' hair (Rev. vi 12), and camels' hair (Mat iii 4). The essential articles of the apparel of men and women were two. 1. An undergarment or tunic, commonly called coat, less frequently garment, in the English versions. It usually had short sleeves and reached nearly to the knees, though a longer form with sleeves of full length was in use (Gen xxxvii. 3; 2 Sam. xiii. 18, R V margin). This tunic was sometimes woven without seam (John xix 23, 24). It was confined at the waist by a girdle. 2. An upper garment or mantle (Ruth iii. 15, R. V.; 1 Kin. xi. 30; Acts ix. 39), a large, square piece of cloth, provided with tassels (Num xv 38; Mat xxiii. 5). It was thrown over the left shoulder and brought over or under the right arm. The pendant ends were called skirts (Hag. ii. 12; Zech. viii. 23). The garment of hair worn by prophets (2 Kin. i. 8; Zech. xiii. 4) may have consisted of a sheepskin or goatskin (cp. Heb. xi. 37), but was more probably made of coarse camel's hair (cp. Mat iii. 4). An occasional garment was worn between the tunic and the mantle by men and women of distinction and officially by the high priest (Lev. viii. 7; 1 Sam. ii. 19; xviii 4; xxiv. 4; 2 Sam. xiii. 18; 1 Chron. xv. 27; Job i. 20, margin). It was a long vestment, with or without sleeves, tied round with a girdle (Antiq. iii. 7, 4). The girdles, which confined the undergarments at the waist to prevent them as far as possible from impeding the action of the limbs, were made of leather, linen, or byssus (2 Kin. i. 8; Jer. xiii. 1; Ezek. xvi. 10); often elaborately wrought and richly decorated (Ex. xxviii. 39; xxxix. 29; Dan. x. 5; Rev. i. 13). The sword was worn in the girdle and money was carried there (Judg. iii. 16; 1 Sam. xxv. 13; Mat. x. 9. R. V. margin). When outside of a room they wore sandals, an imperfect shoe consisting of a sole of wood or leather (Ezek. xvi. 10), fastened to the bare foot by straps passing over the instep and around the ankle (Gen. xiv. 23; Is. v. 27; Acts xii. 8). Probably people commonly went bareheaded, still turbans were on occasion worn by both sexes (Job. xxix. 14, R. V. margin; Is. iii. 20, Ezek. xxxiii. 15). The veil was worn by women in the presence of strangers (Gen. xxiv. 65, Song v. 7); but it was not uncommon for them to go with face unveiled (Gen. xxiv. 16, xxvi. 8; Judith x. 7, 14). By the Mosaic law a man was forbidden to wear a garment that pertains to a woman, and a woman to wear that belonging to a man (Deut. xxii. 5; cp. 1 Cor. xi. 6, 14).

Cloud.

As agents in connection with rain, clouds are the bearers of moisture (2 Sam. xxii. 12, Job xxvi. 8; xxxvii. 11, Ecc. xi. 3), and discharge it upon the earth (Judg. v. 4; Ps. lxxvii. 17). A cloud in the west was a har-binger of rain (1 Kin. xviii. 44; Luke xii. 54).

The Pillar of Cloud was a miraculous cloud taking the form of a pillar, which moved in front of the Israelites in the wilderness to indicate to them the way along which God wished them to advance (Ex. xiii. 21, 22; Neh. ix. 19). When the evening was too far advanced for it to be seen, it shone with light as a pillar of fire. When God designed to show his presence to the Israelites he did it in the pillar of cloud (Num. xii. 5; Deut. xxxi. 15), and when he designed to trouble the Egyptians he looked at them with hostile gaze through the pillar of cloud (Ex. xiv. 24).

Cni'dus.

A city of Caria, on the southwest coast of Asia Minor, over against the isle of Cos, which is about 10 miles away. It was a Dorian colony. Extensive ruins exist at the spot, containing fine remains of Grecian architecture. A small island just off the coast, now joined to the mainland, constitutes a peninsula called Cape Crio. Paul's vessel passed near it during the voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii. 7).

Coal.

In Scripture this is not the mineral substance coal, but charcoal made by burning wood. Hence we read of coals of juniper (Ps. cxx. 4). It was used to furnish warmth in winter (Is. xlvii. 14, John xviii. 18), for culinary purposes (Is. xlv. 19; John xxi. 9), and by the smith (Is. xlv. 12; liv. 16).

Coat. See CLOTHING and HIGH PRIEST.

Coat of Mail. See ARMOR.

Cock.

The male of the well-known domestic fowl Gallus domesticus. It is figured on the ancient Egyptian monuments. The cock is mentioned in the N. T. (Mat. xxvi. 34, 74, 75). Cock-crowing, as a portion of time, is the third watch of the night (Mark xiii. 35). See NIGHT.

Cock'a-trice [Old French cocatrice, a corruption of Latin crocodilus, a crocodile].

A fabulous monster, created by the fancy of Europeans, and reputed to be hatched from a cock's egg brooded by a serpent. The A. V. so renders the Hebrew word Sph'on (Is. xi. 8, lix. 5; Jer. vii. 17), and Sepha' (Is. xiv. 29); but in Prov. xxiii. 32 it translates the word by adder. The R. V. everywhere alters it to basilisk, or in the margin to adder.

Cock'le.

The rendering of the Hebrew Bo'shah, mal-odorous plant (Job xxxi. 40). But the cockle, a plant which is found in grain fields and grows one or two feet high, does not have a bad smell. The margin has noisome weeds, which is a more exact rendering.

Coe'l'e-syr'i-a, in A. V. Celosyria [hollow Syria].

The valley between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon mountains. It is watered by the two streams Orontes and Litany, which rise in the vicinity of Baalbek and flow in opposite directions. The term had, however, a wider application (1 Mac. x. 69). It included the western side of the Jordan valley as far as Bethshean (Antiq. xiii. 13, 2) and the region extending from Damascus southward through Trachonitis, Persea, and Idumaea to the borders of Egypt (cp. Antiq. i. 11, 5). It was distinct from Phoenicia (2 Mac. iii. 5).

Col-ho'zeh [all-seeing one].

Father of Shallun and perhaps one with the father of Baruch (Neh. iii. 15; xi. 5).

Col'lege.

A mistranslation of the Hebrew word Mish-neh in A. V. of 2 Kin. xxii. 14, and 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22. The word is correctly rendered "the second [part]" in Zeph. i. 10. In these passages R. V. has "the second quarter."

Col'o-ny.

A settlement of Roman citizens authorized by the senate, in conquered territory. The decree of the senate fixed the amount of land to be set apart for the colony, the manner in which it was to be distributed, and the burdens to be borne. Philippi was a colony (Acts xvi. 12). See PRÆTOR.

Col'ors.

Colors are presented to the eye by nature (Esth. i. 6) and were early imitated. In Babylonia different clays were employed to produce orange, red, and yellow bricks. Bricks of blue were obtained by vitrification. The ancient Egyptians prepared colors from various metallic and earthy substances. The Hebrews dyed skins in various colors (Ex xxv. 5), and wove and embroidered cloth out of threads of various hues (Ex xxvii. 16; Judith x 21). A reddish purple dye (Ex. xxvii. 16; 1 Mac. iv. 23; Acts xvi 14) was obtained from the secretion of a species of shell fish, Murex trunculus, found in the Mediterranean. Blue (Num. iv. 7; Ezek xxiii 6) was obtained from another shell fish, Helix vanthina. Scarlet or crimson was made from an insect (Ex xxv 4, Is i 18). They used a vermilion pigment for decorating walls, beams, idols, and the like (Jer xxii 14; Ezek xxiii 14, Wisd xii 14). In addition to these artificial coloring matters, allusion is made in the Bible to white (Gen xlix 12, Is i. 18), black, including brown (Gen xxx 32; Song i 6, Mic. iii 6, R V), red (Gen xxv 25, 30; 2 Kin iii 22, Prov xxiii 31), reddish (Lev xiii 19), sorrel (Zech i. 8; in A. V. speckled; margin, bay), greenish (Ps lxxv 13, in Eng. vers yellow, Lev xiii. 49).

Symbolism was connected with colors. The temple of the seven lights at Borsippa, in Babylonia, consisted of seven stages, each colored in a hue appropriate to the planet it represented. Beginning at the lowest stage, the succession of colors was black, orange, blood-red, gold, pale-yellow, blue, and probably silver, according with the planets Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, the sun, Venus, Mercury, and the moon. In the Scripture white is the constant emblem of purity (Mark xvi. 5, Rev iii. 4; xix. 11, 14) and joy (Ecc ix 8). The white horse signifies victory in Rev vi 2. The black horse is typical of famine and death (5, 6). Red commonly typifies blood, in which is life, or war and carnage (4). Blue is the familiar color of the sky, and purple was worn by princes and the rich in their magnificence (Judg viii 26; Esth. viii 15; Luke xvi 19).

Co-los'sæ, in A. V. Colosse.

A city of southwestern Phrygia, in Asia Minor, lying on the river Lycos not far east of its confluence with the Meander. It was originally on the trade route from west to east and was a place of much importance (Herod vii 30; Xen Anabasis I ii 6). But the road system was changed, and the neighboring cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis (Col. ii. 1; iv 13), distant ten and thirteen miles respectively, surpassed it in position and wealth, and the importance of Colosse declined. It was, however, like Laodicea, famous for its fine wool, and it retained municipal independence under the Romans. A Christian community grew up at Colosse under the ministrations of Epaphras and later of Archippus (Col. i 7; iv. 17; Philem. 2). Of this church Philemon was an active member, and also Onesimus (Col. iv. 9; Philem. 2).

Co-los'si-ans, E-pis'tle to the.

An epistle written when the apostle Paul was a prisoner (iv. 3, 10, 18) probably at Rome during the two years of his first imprisonment there (Acts xxviii. 30, 31), though some believe that it was written from Cæsarea (Acts xxiii 35, xxiv. 27). From Col. n. 1 it appears evident that he had never himself preached at Colosse; and i 7 seems to imply that Epaphras had been the founder, or at least had assisted in the establishment of the Colossian church. The church may have been founded while Paul was labouring in Ephesus (Acts xix 10). Epaphras had recently joined the apostle (i 8), and his report of the condition of the church prompted the writing of the letter. It was sent by the hand of a certain Tychicus (iv. 7, 8), who was also intrusted with the letter to the Ephesians (Eph vi 21), written at the same time. With him went Onesimus (Col iv 9), who also bore the letter to Philemon, a resident of Colosse, whose slave Onesimus had formerly been. The Archippus mentioned in Phile 2, probably Philemon's son, is also mentioned in Col iv 17. The salutations which the letter contains (iv 10-17) indicate that while Paul had not labored in Colosse his friends had, and that he himself was well acquainted with some of the Colossians. In fact, Philemon was one of his converts (Phile 19), made, perhaps, in Ephesus. The reports of Epaphras had shown that the Colossian Christians were threatened by false teachers who seemed to have combined ritualistic, ascetic, and speculative tendencies. That they were Jewish appears from ii 11, 16. But they were also ascetic (ii 16, 20-23), a feature which may have come from the Jewish sect of Essenes. With this they united a mystic philosophy (ii. 8) which seems to have claimed superior knowledge of divine things (ii. 18) and to have introduced the worship of angels (ii 18), thus infringing on the all-sufficiency and the supremacy of Christ. These false teachers, therefore, were different from the Judaizers whom Paul opposed in the Epistle to the Galatians. They represent a new form of error, and in certain respects appear as the forerunners of the Gnostics. They united with ritualism that theosophical tendency which was almost characteristic of oriental thought, and therefore demanded an immediate refutation by the apostle. The epistle naturally falls into four parts: (1) the introduction and thanksgiving (i 1-8); (2) the doctrinal section (i 9-iii. 4), (3) practical exhortations (iii. 5-iv 6); (4) concluding salutations (iv. 7-18). The doctrinal section is of great importance. Beginning with a prayer for their growth in knowledge and holiness, he rises to a description of the preeminence of Christ in his relation to God, the universe, and the church. Then in ch. ii. he sets forth Christ's preëminence as against the errorists, assuring believers of their completeness in him, since he has once for all triumphed over their spiritual foes, and nothing but union with him by faith is requisite for the full experience of salvation. As against asceticism he further urges, in his practical exhortations, to a spiritual morality and to social order. The epistle is, therefore, christological in character. It assumes the doctrines of salvation taught in previous epistles, but more explicitly states the preëminence of Christ's person and the sufficiency of his work. This epistle, together with Philemon and Ephesians, was probably written comparatively early in Paul's Roman imprisonment, perhaps in the early spring of A. D. 62. The Epistle to the Ephesians has many remarkable coincidences of language and thought with that to the Colossians, though their differences are equally noteworthy; see EPHESIANS. While evidently written at the same time, Ephesians presents a further unfolding of the truths which the specific needs of his Colossian readers led him to write to them. G T. P.

Com-men-ta'ry.

A Midrash or interpretation of history from the religious standpoint and its didactic exposition; as the prophet Iddo's commentary on the acts, ways, and sayings of king Abijah (2 Chron. xii. 22, R. V.), and the commentary of the book of the kings, in which were set forth the burdens laid upon king Josiah and his rebuilding of the temple (xxiv. 27, R. V.).

Con-a-ni'ah, in A V twice Cononiah [Jehovah hath established]

1 A Levite who had charge of the tithes and offerings in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 12, 13).

2 A Levite of high station in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 9).

Con'cu-bine.

In the Bible a secondary wife under the system of polygamy. Concubines were commonly taken from among the purchased slaves or captives; as Hagar (Gen. xvi. 2, 3; xxi. 10), Bilhah (xxix. 29; xxxv. 22), Gideon's concubine (Judg. vii. 31; ix. 18). They could be more easily put away than a wife (Gen. xxi. 10-14), yet their rights were recognized and guarded by the Mosaic law (Ex. xxi. 7-11; Deut. xxi. 10-14).

Co'ney.

The coney of England is the rabbit; that of Scripture is probably the rock-badger (Lev. xi. 5). See ROCK-BADGER.

Con-gre-ga'tion.

In Scripture the word is used mainly for: 1. The body politic of Israel, including men, women, and children (Ex. xii. 3, 19, 47; xvi. 1, 22; Lev. iv. 13, 15; xxiv. 14; Num. i. 2; xiv. 1; xv. 26; xvi. 9; xx. 11; Judg. xx. 1).

2. An assemblage of the people, especially for religious purposes (1 Kin. viii. 14, 65; 2 Chron. xxx. 2, 4; Ps. xxii. 22, 25), or the community regarded as ever summoned and assembled for worship. In R V the word assembly is often preferred (Num. x. 7, xvi. 3; xix. 20; xx. 4; Josh. vii. 35; and so also sometimes in A. V. Judg. xx. 2), and in Acts xiii. 43 the word synagogue.

3 In A. V. the tabernacle of the congregation designates the tent of meeting (R V), the appointed place where Jehovah and his people met (Ex. xxvii. 21; cp. xxv. 22; xxix. 42; xxx. 36).

Con-o-ni'ah. See CONANIAH.

Con-se-cra'tion.

The act whereby a person or thing is dedicated to the service and worship of God. It includes ordination to a sacred office (Ex. xxix. 9), ordination to sacred service (Lev. viii. 33; 1 Chron. xxix. 5; 2 Chron. xxix. 31), and the setting apart of things from a common to a sacred use (Josh. vi. 19, 2 Chron. xxxi. 6).

Con-ver-sa'tion.

In the English versions the word conversation is used in its obsolescent sense and denotes manner of life.

1. The rendering in the A. V. of the Greek words Poluteuō and Politeuma (Phil. i. 27; iii. 20). The words refer to civil life, as is recognized by R. V. Christians are citizens of the heavenly kingdom and their daily civil conduct should correspond with the teachings of the gospel of the kingdom.

2 The rendering, in many passages of the A. V., and even in R. V. of Ps. l. 23, of various words, especially of the Greek Anastrophē. It means conduct, or mode of life, especially with respect to morals (Ps. xxxvii. 14; Eph. iv. 22; Heb. xiii. 5; 1 Pet. i. 15).

Con-vo-ca'tion.

A festival on which the Israelites were summoned to assemble together and when no servile work was allowed to be done. The holy convocations were every sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 1-3), the first and seventh days of the feast of unleavened bread (Ex. xii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 6, 7; Num. xxviii. 18, 25), Pentecost (Lev. xxiii. 15-21), the first and seventh days of the tenth month, the latter being the great day of atonement (Lev. xxiii. 24-28, 35; Num. xxix. 1), and the first and eighth days of the feast of tabernacles, which began on the 15th of the seventh month (Lev. xxiii. 34-36; Neh. viii. 18).

Co'os. See Cos.

Cop'per. See BRASS.

Cor. See MEASURES.

Cor'al.

A rendering of the Hebrew Ra'moth. It was highly prized (Job xxviii. 18; Prov. xxiv. 7, in E. V. "too high"), and was brought to the markets of Tyre by Aramæan traders (Ezek. xxvii. 16). It was obtained in the Mediterranean and Red seas, and was made into beads and charms. Coral is properly the calcareous skeleton of certain animals of low organization, popularly but erroneously called coral insects. They are radiated animals, with a central mouth surrounded by fleshy limbs; and are either attached singly to a rock, or so bud from parents as to make a compound being of many half-distinct, half-united individuals. The carbonate of lime of which the coral skeleton is made is obtained from the sea water. The coral is often beautifully branched like a tree or shrub, whence these animals are often called Zoophytes (Plant animals). Some species form great reefs.

Coral is also a marginal rendering of the Hebrew Punim, rendered rubies in the text (Lam. iv. 7, Job xxviii. 18, Prov. iii. 15).

Cor-a'shan. See ASHAN.

Cor'ban [Hebrew korban, offering]

An offering or oblation, either of a bloody or an unbloody sacrifice, given to God (Lev. i. 2, 3; ii. 1; iii. 1; Num. vii. 12-17; where the word occurs in the Hebrew text). A word korbanas, from the same root, is rendered in Mat. xxvii. 6 "treasury," and on the margin of the R. V. "sacred treasury." Corban is used for money or service dedicated to God (Mark vii. 11). The reprehensible practice arose of children giving no aid to parents needing their support, on the pretense that the money or service which would otherwise have been available for the parents had been dedicated to God, and that it would be sacrilege to divert it from this sacred purpose. Josephus relates that a clamorous mob beset the tribunal of Pontius Pilate when he took the sacred money called Corban and expended it on aqueducts designed to improve the water supply of Jerusalem. This doubtless was a public benefit, but the Jews evidently thought that money once dedicated to God could never again be lawfully used for a secular purpose, however conducive to the public welfare (War. ii. 9, 4).

Co're. See KORAH.

Co-ri-an'der.

A plant, called in Hebrew Gad, which had white seeds (Ex. xvi. 31; Num. xi. 7). Very probably it was the Coriander (Corandrum sativum), called in Punic Goud; a branched annual, with cut leaves, umbels of pink or white flowers, and a small globular fruit used to season dishes. It is wild in Arabia, northern Africa, and, perhaps, in southern Europe. In Palestine it is found in cultivated grounds and in the Jordan valley.

Cor'inth.

A city of Greece, on the narrow isthmus that connects the Peloponnesus with the mainland. At an early date a town grew up at the southern end of this neck of land, on the plateau at the northern foot of the Acrocorinthus. This mountain is 1750 feet high, and its summit served as a citadel and as the site for a temple. The land traffic between the peninsula and the mainland was obliged to pass the town, and much of the commerce between Asia and the west was brought to its harbors and portage by the convenience of the water route afforded by the Salonic Gulf on the east of the isthmus and the Gulf of Corinth on the west. The town attracted Phœnician settlers, who made a purple dye from fish of the neighboring waters, introduced the manufacture of cloth, pottery, and armor, and established the impure worship of the Phœnician deities. At a later time emigrants from Attica became dominant. About 1074 B. C. the political supremacy passed to the Dorians. But the character of the inhabitants remained unchanged; they were commercial in spirit, unwarlike, luxurious, and licentious. Their immoral life gave rise and meaning to a verb "to corinthianize."

Except during the years 243-222 B. C., the Macedonians held the citadel from 335-197 B. C., when in 196 B. C. Greece was declared independent by the Romans. In 146 B. C., in consequence of rebellion against Rome, the Roman consul Mummius burned the city to ashes. The accidental fusing together of different metals during the conflagration is said to have led to the discovery of Corinthian brass. The city was rebuilt by Julius Cæsar shortly before his death in 44 B. C.; became the capital of the Roman province of Achaia, and was ruled by a proconsul. Paul reached Corinth probably in A. D. 52 and labored there for a year and a half. He lodged with Aquila and Priscilla, supported himself by tent-making, and preached Christ, first in the synagogue and then in the house of Justus. At length he was dragged before the tribunal of the proconsul Gallio, but was dismissed (Acts xviii. 1-18). After Paul's departure, Apollos continued the work (xviii. 24-28). On three several occasions later the apostle sent letters to the Corinthian church (1 Cor. v. 9). The Christian community continued to increase; and by the second century its bishop possessed great influence in the church at large. The capture of Constantinople by the Venetians and the crusaders in 1204 was followed by the surrender of Corinth. In 1446 the Turks took it, and in 1687 the Venetians retook it; the Turks capturing it again in 1715. In 1823 it joined in the successful great rebellion. In February, 1858, it was nearly destroyed by an earthquake, but has since been restored. It is now called Gorthio.

Co-rin'thi-ans, E-pis'tles to the.

The First Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians was written during the apostle's long sojourn in Ephesus (xvi. 8, 9, 19, Acts xix.), probably early in A. D. 57. He had had much anxiety over the state of the Corinthian church, which he had founded a few years before. The Corinthians had written him a letter asking instructions on the subject of marriage and social purity, and he had replied (v. 9). This letter has not been preserved. Apparently also a deputation from Corinth had been sent to him (xvi 17), and from other sources reports of divisions among them had reached him (i 11). He had previously sent Timothy to Corinth by way of Macedonia (iv 17; xvi 10), but the later news moved him immediately to write this epistle. It is even thought by many that Paul himself made a brief unrecorded visit to Corinth from Ephesus for the purpose of exercising discipline in the church. This is inferred from 2 Cor. xii 14, xiii 1, where he speaks of being about to visit them a third time, though The Acts speaks of only one previous visit. Some have located this unrecorded visit before 1 Cor was written; but, since that epistle does not allude to it, it should be placed between 1 and 2 Cor. But in 1 Cor he takes up in order the practical and doctrinal points on which they needed instruction. The epistle is carefully written. It combines cogent doctrinal discussion, and skillful dealing with moral and ecclesiastical problems. It clearly reflects the actual conditions of the churches among the gentiles. Hence its great importance. The subjects discussed are, after the introductory salutation (i 1-9):

1. The divisions in the church (i 10-iv. 21). Factions had arisen, claiming to follow particular leaders, and doubtless characterized by special theological tendencies. He mentions a Paul-party, an Apollos-party, a Peter-party, and a Christ-party. Against them all he sets forth the dependence of all believers on Christ crucified, the inspired authority with which the gospel had first been preached to them, and the subordinate character of every one by whom it was administered, even though he were an apostle, so that none should be made the head of a party, but glory given to God in Christ alone.

2. The duty of exercising and honoring church discipline (v, vi), especially in the case of offenders against purity, of which there had been one conspicuous example.

3. Directions on the subject of marriage and divorce (vii).

4. Directions concerning practical questions arising from contact with heathen society (viii.-xi. 1). These pertained especially to the eating of food which had been offered to idols; in regard to which self-denial should control their liberty (viii), even as he sought to have it do in his own life (ix). While not needlessly inquiring as to the origin of the food they bought or ate, they should be careful not to seem to participate in recognition of the idol (x).

5. Warnings against certain abuses in public worship (xi. 2-34) with respect to the prophesying of women and the administration of the Lord's Supper.

6. Directions as to the estimate, exercise, and regulation, of miraculous gifts (xii.-xiv).

7. Instruction concerning the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, which some were disposed to doubt (xv).

8. Directions about the collections being made for the saints in Judæa, and concluding remarks about his own movements and other personal matters (xvi).

The Second Epistle to the Corinthians was written from Macedonia (ii 13, vii 5, ix 2, 4) shortly after Paul left Ephesus (Acts xx 1), and therefore in the summer or early autumn of A. D. 57. Timothy was now with him again (i 1). * Titus and another had recently been sent from Ephesus to Corinth (ii 13, vii 6, 7, 13, 14, 15, xii 18) with directions to have the church immediately discipline an offender, probably the incestuous person of 1 Cor. v 1, who had openly defied the apostle's authority and whose continued sin threatened the very stability of the church. Titus was to rejoin Paul at Troas, but the apostle, not finding him there, had gone on to Macedonia in great distress of mind. At last, however, Titus came with the good news that the Corinthians had disciplined the offender, and that the latter had humbly acknowledged his sin. Thereupon this epistle was written, and Titus, with two others (viii. 16-24), was sent back with it to Corinth. The epistle bears witness to the intense anxiety of the apostle lest the Corinthians should be false to him, and to the terrible strain he had been under because of their spiritual perils. It is the least methodical and the most personal of his epistles. It falls, however, into three main divisions: (1) i-vii, in which, after grateful recognition of God's goodness to him even amid trial (i. 1-14), he vindicates himself from the charge of vacillation (i 15-ii 4), bids them not carry too far their zeal against the offender (ii. 5-11), and describes the spiritual (iii), honest (iv. 1-6), suffering (iv 7-18), hopeful (v. 1-9), solemn (v 10, 11), Christ-impelled (v 12-17) ministry of reconciliation (v 18-21) with which, as a co-worker with God, he had been intrusted (v. 18-vi 2), in which he had appeared himself (vi 3-10), on the ground of which he appealed to them (vi. 11-18), and in their acknowledgment of which he found boldness and joy (vii.). (2) viii, ix, in which he treats of the collections for the Judæan saints and urges liberality. (3) x.-xii, in which he again gives a pathetic but confident testimony to his apostolic office and authority. He closes with a renewed warning against their besetting sins, and declares that if, when he comes to them, he find them uncorrected, he will exercise his authority upon them unsparingly. G T P.

The last section of the epistle, chapters x.-xiii., is believed by many students of the New Testament to be a separate letter, or fragment of it, written by Paul soon after his return to Ephesus from his unrecorded visit to Corinth (see foregoing remarks introductory to the First Epistle). The mind of the apostle was not wholly relieved by that visit. He had come back to Ephesus anxious about the Corinthian church, and in his sorrow he wrote a letter. It is the letter of tears and anguish of heart, alluded to in passages which refer to events connected with the unrecorded visit (2 Cor ii 4, vii. 8-12). The section, 2 Cor x-xiii., so sad in tone and revealing the apostle's distress of mind, may be this sorrowful letter. But encouraging news from Corinth at length reached the apostle, brought by Titus. The offender had been disciplined. The hostility toward Paul, shown by a minority, had disappeared, and in its stead loyalty to him and growing affection reigned. Thereupon the apostle wrote the cheerful letter preserved in 2 Cor. i-ix. The theory is, of course, interesting as a literary question (cp Mark xvi. 9-20). It involves neither the genuineness of the epistle, as a whole or in its parts, nor its inspiration. But it is not the only tenable explanation of the facts in the case, as the analysis given in the former part of this article shows; and, if the last four chapters ever existed as a separate letter, it is strange, indeed, that no trace of the fact has been left in the history of the New Testament text. J D D.

Cor'mo-rant.

1 The rendering of Hebrew Shalak, plunger; a bird ceremonially unclean (Lev xi. 17; Deut. xiv. 17). It is probably the common cormorant (Phalacrocorax carbo), a large swimming bird of the Pelican family, but distinguished from the pelican by not having a pouch below the lower mandible. The common cormorant is widely distributed. In Palestine it lives on the Mediterranean coast and on the sea of Galilee. Its appetite is proverbial; and Tristram describes it as sitting on the snag of a tree where the Jordan enters the Dead Sea, and catching the fish while they are stupefied by being carried into the briny water. Another species, Phalacrocorax pinnatus, the Pygmy Cormorant, is found sparingly on the streams which flow through Palestine to the Mediterranean.

2. The rendering of Hebrew Ka'ath in text of A V. (Is. xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14); see PELICAN.

Corn.

The generic name for the several cereal grasses cultivated in Palestine, and so staple that corn and wine stand figuratively for the entire vegetable produce of the fields (Gen xxvii 28; Deut. vii. 13, etc.). The chief were wheat, barley, spelt, and millet (Deut. vii. 8; and R. V. of Is. xxviii. 25 and Ezek. iv. 9).

Cor-ne'il-us.

A centurion of the Roman cohort called the Italian band. He lived at Caesarea, and was a devout, charitable, God-fearing gentile. On the ground of visions received by him and Peter, and the descent of the Holy Spirit upon him and his household when they believed, Peter baptized him. The descent of the Holy Ghost upon him was an event of prime importance in the early church. It marked the beginning of the calling of the gentiles and revealed that the Spirit is given to believers irrespective of nationality (Acts x 1-48).

Cor'ner Stone.

A stone placed at the angle where two walls of a building meet, and helping to bind them together. Any stone in this position, from the foundation (Job xxxviii 6, Is xxviii. 16) to the roof (Ps. cxviii 22, Zech. iv. 7), is a corner stone. Figuratively, Christ is the chief corner stone at the foundation (Rom. ix. 33, Eph. ii 20; 1 Pet. ii 6) and also the head of the corner (Mat. xxi 42; 1 Pet. ii. 7).

Cor'net.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Shophar in 1 Chron. xv 28; 2 Chron. xv 14; Ps. xxviii 6, Hos. v 8. Elsewhere, as in Lev. xxv. 9 it is translated trumpet (q v).

2. The rendering of the Hebrew M'na'an'im in 2 Sam. vi 5, A V. The R V renders the word castanets (q v).

3. The rendering of the Aramaic Karna', corresponding to the Hebrew Keren in Dan. iii 5, 7, 10, 15. It means a horn, and is so rendered in vii 20. This instrument originally consisted of the hollow horn of some mammal, but later it was generally made of metal, and was curved, like many animals' horns, instead of being straight.

Cor-rup'tion, Mount of.

A hill to the east of Jerusalem (2 Kin. xxiii 13, cp 1 Kin. xi 7). Solomon built altars on its southern side to the gods worshiped by his heathen wives. By common consent it is the southern portion of the mount of Olives. It is more familiarly known in tradition as the mount of Offense.

Cos, in A V. Coos.

An island, now called Stanko or Stanchio, in the Archipelago off the coast of Cana in Asia Minor, in a gulf between Cnidus and Halicarnassus. It lies between Miletus and Rhodes, about a day's sail from the latter city (Acts xxi 1; mentioned 1 Mac. xv. 23). It is about 21 miles long by 6 broad. Its principal city has been more than once seriously injured by earthquakes. Cos was celebrated for its wines, its ointments, and its purple dyes.

Co'sam.

A descendant of David through Nathan and an ancestor of Zerubbabel and Christ (Luke iii 28).

Cot'ton.

The rendering of the Hebrew Karpas in the margin of the R. V. in Esth. i. 6. In the court of the royal palace at Shushan were hangings of fine white cotton and blue. The word which corresponds to karpas in Sanscrit, Persian, Armenian, and Arabic denotes cotton. Cotton is the bunch of threads surrounding the ripe seeds of the cotton plants. They belong to the genus Gossypium, which is one of the mallow order. The leaves have three or five lobes; the flowers, which are large and showy, and often of a yellow color, are surrounded by an outer involucre or calyx of three great leaves. The Indian cotton (Gossypium herbaceum) was early cultivated in Persia, and was probably that of Esther.

Coun'cil.

The Jewish governing body The Persians granted to the Jews jurisdiction over their own affairs (Ezra vii. 25, 26, x. 14). After the fall of the Persian empire similar privileges were enjoyed by the Jews. A governing body arose and became known as gerousia or senate (Antiq. xii. 3, 3), and more fully as the senate of the nation (1 Mac. xii. 6). It was composed of elders (cp. xiv. 20). It represented the nation (xii. 3), and united with Jonathan, their high priest and leader, in making offensive and defensive alliance with the Spartans. Jonathan also called the elders of the people together and consulted with them about building strongholds in Judæa and increasing the height of the walls of Jerusalem (35, cp. further xii. 36; xiv. 20, 28, and 47). Under Gabinius, proconsul of Syria, 57-55 B. C., Judæa was divided into five districts, each under a sunedron or sunodoi—i. e. assembly or sanhedrin (Antiq. xiv. 5, 4, War i. 8, 5). Henceforth the highest body at Jerusalem was called sunedron, though not to the exclusion of gerousia or boulê. The arrangement, however, did not last long. In 47 B. C., Cæsar extended the jurisdiction of the sanhedrin of Jerusalem once more over all Judæa (cp. Antiq. xiv. 9, 3-5; War i. 10, 7). At the beginning of his reign Herod the Great put forty-five of its members to death (Antiq. xiv. 9, 4; xv. 1, 2), but did not abolish the council (xv. 6, 2). Under the Roman procurators, A. D. 6-66, its powers were extensive. According to Jewish authorities, it was composed of 71 members (cp. the mock council, War iv. 5, 4), and only Israelites whose descent was above question were eligible to membership. The seventy ordinary members corresponded, probably, to the seventy elders appointed by Moses to assist him as judges. The seventy-first member was the high priest, the official president of the body. It was the highest court, with power of life and death (Antiq. xiv. 9, 3 and 4, Mat. xxvi. 3, 57; Acts iv. 5, 6, 15; v. 21, 27, 34, 41; vi. 12, 15; vii. 1; xxiii. 2), though apparently it had no recognized authority to execute its sentence of death, but must submit its action to the review of the Roman authorities. It had the general administration of the government and of justice, so far as this was not exercised by the procurator and subordinate officials (cp. Acts xxii. 30). In the time of Florus, at least, the revenue was collected by the rulers and councilors, who dispersed themselves among the villages for that purpose (War ii. 17, 1). It had police at command and could make arrests on its own authority (Mat. xxvi. 47, Mark xiv. 43). Jesus was tried before the council (Mat. xxvi. 59; Mark xiv. 55, xv. 1, Luke xxii. 66, John xi. 47). It was before the council that Peter, John, and the other apostles were brought (Acts iv. 5, 6, 15, v. 21, 27, 34, 41). Stephen was taken before the council (Acts vi. 12), so also was Paul (xxii. 30, xxiii. 15; xxiv. 20). The sanhedrin was swept away at the destruction of Jerusalem.

2. A body of advisers selected by the highest Roman official of a province, in Judæa the procurator, to assist him in the administration of justice, before whom, with the official as president, cases were tried (Acts xxv. 12; Antiq. xvi. 11, 1 seq., War ii. 16, 1).

Coun'cil House.

A building in Jerusalem west of the temple, near the gymnasium and adjoining the innermost city wall (War v. 4, 2). It was burned by the Romans under Titus in the course of their struggle for the possession of the city (vi. 6, 3). The council house was probably the place where the sanhedrin met: for 1. Its name in Greek was bouleuterion, and a member of the sanhedrin was called bouleutês (Luke xxiii. 50, 51; cp. War ii. 17, 1) 2. The council is called by Josephus sunedron—i. e. sanhedrin—and boulê indifferently (Antiq. xiv. 9, 3 and 4, with xx. 1, 2, War ii. 15, 6). 3. According to Jewish authorities, the sanhedrin met in the lishkath haggazith or chamber of the gazith, which probably denoted a chamber by the gymnasium. According to the Mishna, it is true, the lishkath haggazith was situated at the east corner of the court of the temple. But gazith means hewn, especially hewn stone (Ex. xx. 25; 1 Kin. vi. 36 et pas); and as the chambers of the temple were largely constructed in this manner, the name gazith could not distinguish one from another. Now the council house stood near or adjoined the xystos or gymnasium; but xystos is the Greek equivalent of gazith, and is one of the words used in the Septuagint to translate gazith into Greek (1 Chron. xxii. 2; Amos v. 11). It can scarcely be doubted, therefore, that the xystos was called the gazith by one who chanced to be speaking Hebrew, and that the name lishkath haggazith meant the hall by the xystos (cp. Schurer, Stud. u. Krit., 1878). Similar twin names are Christos, Messiah; Peter, Cephas; The pavement, Gabbatha; Place of a skull, Golgotha; Field of blood, Aceldama (John i. 41, 42; xix. 13, 17, Acts i. 19). This evidence is perhaps sufficient to override the fact that the chamber of the gazith is stated in the Mishna, as already mentioned, to have been within the court of the temple.

Coun'sel-or.

The seven counselors of Artaxerxes (Ezra) vii. 14) were probably the seven princes of Media and Persia who saw the king's face and sat first in the kingdom, and from whom the king sought advice (Esth. i. 14). These princes were perhaps the heads of the seven chief families of Persia (Herod ii 84).

Court.

An enclosed but uncovered area either connected with a private house and often containing a well (2 Sam. xvii 18, Neh. viii 16), or in a palace (1 Kin vii 8, 9, 12; Jer xxxii 2), in front of the royal apartments (Esth iv. 11; v. 1; vi. 4) and sometimes containing a garden (i 5); or around the tabernacle and temple (Ex. xxvii 9; xl 8; 1 Kin. vi 36). As the area about the temple was divided (2 Kin xxi. 5), the word is generally used in the plural (Ps lxxv. 4; lxxxiv. 2).

Cov'e-nant.

An agreement between two or more persons. Various covenants between man and man are mentioned in Scripture, but they are no longer important (Gen. xxi 27, 32; 1 Sam. xviii. 3; xxiii 18; 1 Kin. xx 34). It is otherwise with those in which God condescended to be a covenanting party. His covenant with man is a free promise on his part, generally based upon the fulfillment of certain conditions by man. He made a promise of continued life and favor to man on condition of obedience, coupled with a penalty for disobedience (Gen ii 16, 17). He established a covenant with Noah, that Noah should be saved when the old world perished (vi 18), and that there should be no other great deluge, the rainbow being the token of the covenant (ix 12, 15, 16), with Abraham and his posterity, of which circumcision was to be the sign, to be their God and to give them the land of Canaan for an inheritance (xiii. 17; xv 18; xvii 2, 4, 7, 11, 13, 14, 19; 2 Kin. xiii 23, 1 Chron xvi. 15-18; Ps cv. 9-11; Acts vii 8; Rom iv. 13, 17); with the Israelites as a nation, to continue to be their God and to grant national protection, of which a sign was to be the Sabbath (Ex xxxi. 16), and the keeping of the ten commandments its condition (Deut iv. 13, 23). This covenant was made at Horeb (Deut. v 2; xxix. 1) and was renewed with the next generation on the plains of Moab (Deut. xxix. 1). There was a covenant with the Levites (Mal. ii 4, 8), and one specially with Phinehas to give him and his descendants an everlasting priesthood (Num xxv. 12, 13). There was a covenant with David that his posterity should forever occupy his throne (Ps. lxxxix. 20-28, 34; cp. 2 Sam vii. 1-29 and 1 Chron. xvii 1-27; 2 Chron vii. 18; Jer. xxxiii 21). In contrast with the covenant at Sinai, there was to be a new covenant, also with the Israelites, which was to be of a more spiritual character than its predecessors (Jer xxxi. 31-34; Heb viii. 8-11), administered by the Spirit (John vii. 39; Acts ii 32, 33; 2 Cor. iii. 6-9), based on faith (Gal iv 21-31), and designed for all nations (Mat. xxviii. 19, 20, Acts x. 44-47). Of this Christ is the Mediator (Heb. viii 6-13; ix 1; x 15-17; xii 24). With reference to it the Old and New Testaments would, perhaps, better have been called the Old and New Covenants.

The two tablets of stone on which were engraved the ten commandments, which were the fundamental law of God's covenant with Israel, were called the tables of the covenant (Deut ix 11), and the ark, in which these tables were deposited, was designated the ark of the covenant (Num. x 33). The book of the covenant consisted of the ten commandments with the accompanying ordinances, contained in Ex xx-xxiii, which were written by Moses in a book, formally accepted by the Israelites, and ratified as a covenant between the Lord and his people (Ex xxiv. 3-8), see THEOCRACY. Later the term is used as synonymous with the book of the law (2 Kin xxiii 2 with xxii 8, 11) and included Deuteronomy (Deut xxxi. 9, 26; 2 Kin. xiv. 6 with Deut xxiv 16).

Cow.

Cows were early domesticated. Egypt, Philistia, and Palestine, afforded excellent pasturage, and cows were kept in these lands (Gen. xli 2; Deut. vii 13, 1 Sam vi. 7). Cows were herded by Abraham and his descendants (Gen. xii 16; xxxii 15). Their milk served for food (2 Sam xvi 29). They found use in concluding a covenant (Gen. xv. 9), in the ceremony attending the profession of innocence of a death caused by an undiscoverable murderer (Deut xxi 3), for a peace offering (Lev iii 1) for a sin offering for uncleanness arising from contact with the dead (Num xix 2; Heb ix. 13), and in exceptional cases for a burnt offering (1 Sam. vi. 14).

Coz. See HAKKOZ.

Coz'bi [wēdancious].

A daughter of Zur, prince of Midian. In the idolatrous rites to which the Midianites seduced Israel the woman was publicly taken by a prince of the Simeonites. Both were thrust through by Phinehas, son of the high priest, and shortly afterwards her father also was slain (Num. xxv. 6-8, 14, 15, 18; xxxi 8).

Co-ze'ba, in A. V. Chozeba [deceitful].

A village in Judah, peopled chiefly by descendants of Shelah (1 Chron. iv. 22). It is generally believed to be the same as Achzib and Chezib. Conder, however, locates it at Kûeizib, 5½ miles north-northeast of Hebron, at the head of Pilate's aqueduct to Jerusalem.

Crane.

Hebrew 'Agûr, a migratory bird which has a note like a chatter (Is. xxxviii. 14; Jer.

viii 7) The crane is the type of a family of long-legged wading birds. It is a large and elegant bird, breeding in the north of Europe and of Asia, and migrating southward at the approach of winter. On these flights cranes go in large flocks of wedge-shaped form or in long lines. See SWALLOW 2.

Cre-a'tion.

The act or operation of God whereby he calls into existence what did not before exist. The verb always has God for its subject, and the result is an entirely new thing. God created the heavens and the earth (Gen i 1), aquatic and aerial life (21), man (27), the stars (Is. xl 26), the wind (Amos iv. 13). He creates the clean heart (Ps. li. 10). Jehovah commanded and the heavens, with all their hosts, angels, sun, moon, and stars, and the waters that be above the heavens, were created (Ps. cxlviii. 5). He spake and it was done. Upon him all living creatures depend; his hand provides for them, his look preserves them, the hiding of his face destroys them, and his creative breath renews animate life on earth (Ps. civ 27-30). God created the worlds by the Word, who is the Son (John i. 3, Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 16; Heb. i. 2).

The designation creation is used specially for the original formation of the universe by God. In Genesis a general account of the creation of the universe is first given (i 1-ii. 3), which is followed by a particular account of the formation of man and his surroundings (iii 4-25). The general account describes six successive acts, or sometimes groups of logically related acts and processes, which were willed by God on as many days; see DAY 3. All facts at present available indicate that between the successive days long periods of time intervened. The omission of the definite article in the enumeration, one day and day second, instead of the first day, the second day, etc., is favorable to this view. And the parallel tradition, as preserved by the Babylonians, expressly refers to intervals between the successive acts of creation and assigns to them long duration.

The earliest extant form of the Babylonian account is found as the introduction to the myth of the sun-god Marduk's conflict with Tiamat the watery deep, represented as a she-dragon who has attempted to reduce the ordered universe to chaos. The tablet was inscribed about 650 B. C., but the tale itself can be traced much farther back. It states that—

At the time when on high the heaven announced not,

Below earth named not a name,
[That is to say When heaven and earth did not exist]

Then primeval ocean, their generator, [and] Mummu Tiamat [the watery deep], the bearer of their totality,
United their waters as one,
When no field had been formed, no reed was to be seen

At a time when none of the gods had been brought into existence,
When a name had not been named, destiny not determined,

Then were made the gods . . .
The gods Lahmu and Lahamu were brought into existence

And grew up
Anshar [the host of heaven] and Kishar [the host of earth] were made Many days passed by God Anu [sky]

Here the tablet is broken off, but this part of the tale has also been related by Damascus. He says: "The Babylonians assumed two principles of the universe, Tauthe and Apason [i. e. Tiamat the watery deep, and Apsu the primeval ocean]; making Apason the husband of Tauthe and naming her the mother of the gods. Of these two there was born an only-begotten son, Moymis. From these same another generation proceeded, Lache and Lachos. Then also from the same [original pair] a third generation, Kissare and Assoros, from whom sprang Anos [heaven], Illinos [earth's surface, with the atmosphere], and Aos [the waters of earth]; and of Aos and Dauke Belos [the sun of spring] was born, the fabricator of the world." In these narratives of creation the Babylonians fail to give God glory; but apart from this radical defect, these traditions of theirs preserve fundamentally the same account of the development of the world as the Hebrew prophet does. Stripped of polytheistic phraseology, the Babylonian tradition taught that the primeval universe was a chaotic watery mass (cp Gen i. 2). Out of this mass there proceeded not only Moymis and Lache and Lachos or Lahmu and Lahamu, who are doubtless natural objects or forces, but have not been identified as yet, but also by a series of generations, to use Damascus' figure (cp. Gen. ii. 4), the comprehensive heavens and the comprehensive earth (cp Gen i. 6-8), then sky and dry land and sea (cp Gen i 9, 10), and then the sun (cp. Gen i. 14). How natural objects, like the sky and the planets, came to be spoken of as gods is explained in the paragraph devoted to Assyrian and Babylonian religion in the article on ASSYRIA.

Before the Reformation scholars did not interpret the day of Gen. i as a period of twenty-four hours (Augustine, de civ. dei, xi. 6). Only during the last 400 years has the narrative been thought to mean that God created the universe in one week of seven consecutive days of twenty-four hours each. At length geology and astronomy began to speak against this new interpretation. Geologists and astronomers alike became convinced that myriads of years had been required to produce the solar system and bring about the changes which the earth itself had undergone. When it became apparent that the geological claim for extended time rested on substantial grounds, Dr. Thomas Chalmers adopted the result and publicly declared in 1804 that "the writings of Moses do not fix the antiquity of the globe." Afterwards, in his Evidences of Christianity, published in 1813, he explained that many ages may have elapsed between the first act of creation described in Gen 1 1, and the others commencing with verse 2. But was not a long period involved in the work of the six days themselves? In 1857 Hugh Miller in his Testimony of the Rocks interpreted the six days, as Cuvier of Paris had already interpreted them in 1798 in the preliminary discourse to his Osséments Fossiles, as being six geological ages, and traced the correspondence between the successive stages of creation as told in Gen 1 and as written in the rocks. So geology, in speaking of the carboniferous age, the age of fishes, the age of mammals, has named the dominating feature, but not denied it a humble origin in an earlier age.

The Hebrew narrative is marked by a symmetric and grouping, which may be plausibly explained as intentional arrangement. The chronological order has been observed in the main at least, but it remains to be discovered whether it has been followed in every detail. At any rate the works of the six days were more than six acts; God spake, to use a significant biblical term, eight times (vers 3, 6, 9, 11, 14, 20, 24, 26), and on the third day the command went forth for both dry land and vegetation, on the fifth day for fish and for fowl, and on the sixth day for beast and for man. Moreover, the six days form two interrelated groups: the first day saw light, and the fourth day, the first of the second group, saw the luminaries, on the second day the waters were divided and the sky appeared, and on the second day of the other group fish were divinely wiled in the waters, and fowl to fly in the expanse of the sky, on the third day, dry land and vegetation were decreed, and on the corresponding day of the second group land animals, including man, were made, and vegetation was granted them for food. The several works of creation have been logically distributed into six groups. Hence the fiat of the Almighty which called the dry land into being is not recorded alone, but with it is the command for vegetation. God contemplated the land as clothed with verdure. The two acts of the divine will are in reality and in purpose one, even though plant life possibly did not respond to the divine decree until the sun appeared. Yet, truly, vegetation of some form probably existed on the earth before the planet Mercury at least was flung from the whirling, contracting mass, and the sun, as man knows it, had been formed.

Creep'ing Thing.

Any animal which creeps (Gen 1 24, 25), whether a land or a water reptile (vi. 7, Ps.

civ 25), and whether crawling on the belly or creeping on four or more feet (Lev. xi. 41, 42).

Cres'cens [growing, increasing].

A Christian, who was for a time at Rome while Paul was a prisoner there, and then departed to Galatia or Gaul (2 Tim. iv. 10, R V).

Crete.

A large island in the Mediterranean, lying southeast of Greece, and now widely known as Candia. The Turks retain the old name in the modified form, Kırdı. It is about 160 miles long by 6 to 35 broad. It is traversed from east to west by a chain of mountains, of which mount Ida, near the center, is 8065 feet high. Homer speaks of its fair land, its countless men of different races, and its hundred cities (Il ii 649, Ody xix 174). The half-mythic legislator, Minos, lived in Crete, and the fabulous Minotaur was feigned to dwell there too. Crete was conquered by the Romans, 68-66 B C. Many Jews settled in the island (Acts ii 11, cp 1 Mac. xv. 19-23, Gortyna being in Crete). Christianity was early introduced, and Titus was left there to arrange the affairs of the churches and to counteract Judaizing doctrine (Tit. i 5, 10, 14). Paul sailed along its whole southern coast on his voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii 7, 12, 13, 21). The Cretans were famous bowmen, but their moral reputation was bad, their unchastity and untruthfulness were proverbial (Tit i 12, and R V note). In A D 823 the island was conquered by the Saracens, who built a fort called Khandax, the Great Fortress, now corrupted into Candia, which, properly speaking, is the name of the capital only. The Greek emperor took the island from the Saracens in 961. From 1204 to 1665 the Venetians held it. Then the Turks regained possession. It secured autonomy in 1897.

Crib. See MANGER.

Crick'et.

The rendering in the text of the R. V. of the Hebrew hargol, which belongs with grasshoppers and locusts, and which does not creep but leaps, is winged, and can be eaten (Lev. xi 22). The chief leaping insects belong to three families of Orthoptera, viz. the grasshoppers, the locusts, and the crickets. The hargol almost certainly belongs to one of the three, though to which of them cannot now be determined. The crickets have long antennæ like the grasshoppers, but the wing-cases lie flat on the body instead of meeting over it like a roof. Among the few known species are the house cricket (Gryllus domesticus) and the field cricket (G. campestris). The A. V. renders hargol beetle, but the most typical species of the Coleoptera, or beetle order, are not leaping insects.

Cris'pus [curled]

The ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth. After listening to Paul's reasonings, he with all his household believed in Jesus (Acts xviii. 8), and was one of the few persons whom Paul personally baptized (1 Cor. i. 14).

Croc'o-dile. See LEVIATHAN and LIZARD.

Cross.

This word does not occur in the O T., but crucifixion was common among various nations of antiquity; see CRUCIFIXION. Cross is used in a figurative sense by Jesus (Mat. x. 38; xvi. 24). From the narrative of the crucifixion it is evident that the cross was of wood (Col. ii. 14), and was heavy, but still not too much so to be borne by a strong man (Mat. xxvii. 32; Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26; John xix. 17), and can scarcely, therefore, have been one of the massive structures which some painters depict. It was raised from the earth either before or after the victim had been affixed to it; probably, in most cases, before. Crosses are of three leading types: one, generally called the St. Andrew's cross, like the letter X; another like the letter T; and the third of the dagger form, †, with which we are so familiar. The cross of Christ was, probably, as artists believe, of the last-named type, which more easily than the others allowed the name, title, or crime of the victim to be affixed to the upper part (Mat. xxvii. 37; Mark xv. 26; Luke xxiii. 38; John xix. 19). Up to the death of Christ, and even after, the cross was evidently as much a name of horror and loathing as is the gallows now (John xix. 31; 1 Cor. i. 23; Gal. iii. 13; Phil. ii. 8; Heb. xii. 2; xiii. 13), so that to bear the cross meant to incur great reproach and obloquy, but after the crucifixion the more zealous followers of Jesus regarded the cross with wholly altered feelings. Paul gloried in the cross of Christ (Gal. vi. 14), by which he meant the atonement resulting from his crucifixion (Eph. ii. 16; Col. i. 20).

The pre-Christian cross of one form or another was in use as a sacred symbol among the Chaldeans, the Phœnicians, the Egyptians, and many other oriental nations. The Spaniards in the 16th century found it also among the Indians of Mexico and Peru. But its symbolic teaching was quite different from that which we now associate with the cross.

In the fourth century Rufinus, writing fifty years after the reputed event, relates that Helena, the mother of Constantine, was instructed in a vision to repair to Jerusalem and seek for the sepulcher of Christ. While there (A. D. 325) she found three crosses. These were shown to a sick woman. At the sight of the third she left her couch cured (Hist. eccl. i. 7, 8). Helena gave part of this cross to the city of Jerusalem, and sent the other part to the emperor, who placed it within his statue, regarding it as the palladium of the empire. Eusebius, however, who flourished in the fourth century, and was a contemporary of Helena, and on terms of friendship with the imperial family, knew nothing of the story, which meets with no acceptance from modern scholars. It is believed that the practice was to burn, instead of to bury, the crosses on which real or alleged criminals had been crucified.

Crown.

1. An ornamental headdress worn as a badge of authority or dignity. Especially (1) The royal crown. It was generally a circlet of gold (Ps. xxi. 3), and was often studded with gems (2 Sam. xii. 30; Zech. ix. 16). Sometimes several crowns were combined or intertwined (vi. 11; 1 Mac. xi. 13). The crown which David took at Rabbah from the Ammonites probably belonged to the idol Molech (2 Sam. xii. 30, R. V. margin). Its weight was a talent of gold, and in it were precious stones. The ordinary headdress of the Persian king (Esth. i. 11; vi. 8) was a stiff cap, probably of felt or of cloth, encircled by a blue and white band,

Crowns of Egypt and Assyria and the Common Radiated Diadem which was the diadem proper. The royal crown of Assyria was a conical cap, sometimes tapering in a compound curve, but more frequently shaped like the modern Turkish fez, only higher and ending in a round blunt point. It was adorned with bands of wrought gold and jewels. The king is also represented wearing a simple fillet, and it is probable that this was a common custom, the crown royal being reserved for state occasions. In Egypt there were two royal crowns. The one for Upper Egypt was a high round white cap tapering to a knob; the crown for Lower Egypt was a flat-topped red cap, rising in a high point at the back and having a projection with a curled end springing diagonally toward the front. When the two kingdoms were united under one sovereign, he wore the two crowns combined, the crown of Lower Egypt being superimposed upon that of Upper Egypt. The Egyptian king is also frequently depicted with a band or diadem. The royal headdress, of whatever shape, is nearly always surrounded by the Uraeus, the sacred serpent of the Egyptians, symbolizing power over life and death. See also illustrations under PHARAOH. The radiated diadem was a form of crown familiar to the Greeks and Romans and to the peoples under their influence. A crown or garland of some thorny plant was placed by the Roman soldiers around the temples of Jesus, with the twofold intention of torturing him and mocking his kingly claims (Mat xxvii 29). (2) The high priest's crown. It consisted of a golden plate (Lev viii 9), inscribed with the legend "Holiness to the Lord," and fastened on a lace of blue to the forefront of the miter (Ex. xxviii 36, 37; xxix 6). (3) The crown of victory (2 Tim ii 5, iv 8. Heb ii 9). It might consist merely of a wreath of leaves or be made of metal.

2 Anything resembling a crown, as the border or moulding round about the ark, the table, and the altar (Ex. xxv. 11, 24, 25, xxx. 3, 4).

Cru-ci-fix'ion

The act or operation of fixing a victim to a cross for the purpose of capital punishment. This was done either by tying his hands and feet to it, or in the more cruel way of fixing them to it by nails driven through their fleshy portions. This method of punishment existed in many ancient nations. Alexander the Great crucified a thousand Tyrians. According to Josephus, Cyrus introduced into his edict for the return of the Jews from Babylon a threat of crucifying anyone who attempted to prevent the mission from being carried into execution (Antiq xi. 1, 3; 4, 6). Darius the Persian threatened this death, apparently, to those who refused obedience to his decrees (Ezra vi 11). Antiochus Epiphanes crucified faithful Jews who would not abandon their religion at his bidding (Ant xii. 5, 4), and Alexander Jannæus (War i 4, 6) and the Pharisees crucified their enemies (War i. 5, 3). Among the Romans crucifixion was a penalty inflicted only on slaves, or on freemen who had committed the most heinous crimes; the ordinary Roman citizen was exempted from it by express legal enactment. The preliminary cruelties of scourging the victim (Mat xxvii. 26; Mark xv. 15, John xix. 1), and then, when his body was lacerated, compelling him to bear his cross (xix. 17), were not rare (cp. the proverb, Mat. x. 38). Thus the Roman procurator Florus (War ii. 14, 9) and Titus, at least on one occasion, had those scourged first who were afterwards to be crucified. If the victim was simply tied to the cross, this was no injury sufficient to produce death, which did not take place till thirst and hunger had done their work; and this was sometimes the case even when the hands and feet were pierced by nails. If it was expedient on any ground to get rid of the victims before natural death had released them from their tortures, the end was sometimes hastened by breaking their legs, as was done in the case of the robbers crucified with Jesus (John xix. 31-33). Many Jews were crucified after Titus took Jerusalem (Life 75). Constantine abolished punishment by crucifixion in the Roman empire.

Cruse.

A small pot or jug used for carrying water during a journey (1 Sam. xxvi 11; 1 Kin xix. 6) and for holding oil (1 Kin. xvii. 12; Judith x. 5), a flask, such as were made of alabaster and used for holding ointment (Mat. xxvi 7, R. V.) For cruse of honey (1 Kin. xiv. 3), a different word in Hebrew, the margin substitutes bottle, and the cruse of salt (2 Kin. ii 20) was rather a dish.

Crys'tal.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew word Z'kukth, in A V of Job xxviii 17. The R V makes it glass, since crystal occurs in the next verse. The corresponding word in Syriac is used for glass in Rev. iv. 6.

2 The rendering of the Hebrew Gabish, ice and crystal, another reputed product of cold (Job xxviii 18; in A. V. pearl).

3 The rendering of the Hebrew word Kerah (Ezek i 22, cp Ex xxiv 10). The R V. has ice on the margin, which is an established meaning of the word (Job ii 16; xxxviii. 29; Ps cxlvii 17).

4 The rendering of the Greek Krystallos (Rev iv 6 and xxii 1). It is either ice or rock-crystal, which is quartz, transparent, and when pure colorless.

Cub, in A V Chub.

A people mentioned with Ethiopia, Put, and Lud (Ezek xxx 5, R V). The Seventy apparently read Lub, i e Libya.

Cu'bit [from Latin cubitus, an elbow, a cubit].

A measure of length based on the length of the forearm. The Babylonian cubit was 20 65 or 21 26 inches. The royal Babylonian cubit was longer than the common one by three finger-breadths (Herod i 178). The Egyptian cubit contained six hand-breadths or palms (ii 149). The royal cubit was a palm longer and was equal to 20 64 inches, as appears from measuring sticks found in the tombs. The Hebrews also had two cubits, the common and perhaps older cubit (Deut. iii. 11; 2 Chron ii 3) and a cubit which was a hand-breadth longer than the common one (Ezek xl. 5; xliii. 13). The table of Hebrew lineal measure is 4 fingers = 1 hand-breadth or palm; 3 hand-breadths = 1 span; 2 spans = 1 cubit (Ex. xxv. 10, with Antiq iii 6, 5; Mishna, Chelim. xvii. 9). It is not unlikely that the royal Egyptian cubit and the cubit of Ezekiel were theoretically equal to the Babylonian cubit; so that the common Hebrew cubit was 17.70 or 18.22 inches, or, if only three fingers shorter than the long cubit, 18.36 or 18.9 inches.

Cuck'oo, the A. V. has Cuckow, using the obsolete spelling [English, from the voice of the bird]

The rendering of the Hebrew Shahaph, emaciated bird, in the A. V. A bird ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi 16; Deut. xiv. 15). The cuckoo, Cuculus canorus, is a well-known climbing bird, which, coming in spring from the south, on its annual migration, remains till the fall of the year, being frequently heard, but rarely seen. The R. V., following the Septuagint translators, renders shahaph not cuckoo but seamew.

Cu'cum-ber.

The correct rendering of the Hebrew Kisshu', a vegetable which the Israelites obtained while they were slaves in Egypt, and longed for when they could not have it in the wilderness (Num. xi 5). It is Cucumis chate, which is very common in Egypt and somewhat sweeter than the common cucumber, Cucumis sativus. The cucumber was raised in gardens in Palestine (Is. i. 8, Baruch vi 70), and both the species mentioned are grown there to-day.

Cum'min [from Hebrew kammon, Arabic kamun, Greek kuminon]

A cultivated plant sown broadcast and, when ripe, beaten with a rod to detach its seeds (Is. xxviii. 25, 27). It was one of the trifles of which the Pharisees were particular in paying tithes (Mat. xxiii. 23). Cummin is the Cuminum cyminum of botanists, a fennel-like plant bearing umbels of small white flowers. It was cultivated in Palestine for its seeds, which were eaten as a spice or relish with food. They are now in large measure superseded by caraway seeds, which are more agreeable to the taste and more nutritious.

Cun. See BEROOTHAI.

Cup.

1 A small drinking vessel (2 Sam. xii. 3), of earthenware or metal (Jer. li. 7), held in the hand (Gen. xl 11), and used for water (Mark ix. 41), or wine (Ps. lxxv. 8; Jer. xxv. 15). See BASIN.

2 Figuratively, the contents of the cup, whether pleasant or bitter; that which falls to one's lot (Ps. xxiii. 5; Is. li. 17, Jer. xvi. 7; Mat. xxvi. 39).

Cup'bear-er.

The official who poured drink into the cup and gave it to the king (Gen. xl. 9-14, where the Hebrew word is rendered butler; Neh. i. 11; ii. 1, 2). The office was one of the most dignified in an oriental kingdom, and required moral trustworthiness in its occupant, lest he be bribed to present poisoned wine to the king (Antiq. xvi. 8, 1). It said much for the character of Nehemiah that he, a stranger and a foreigner, should have been appointed to such an office at the Persian court.

Cush [Hebrew Kúsh, Old Egyptian Kash, Kesh, and Kish, Ethiopia].

1 A son of Ham and his descendants collectively. They constituted five principal peoples, Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabteca, and were located in central and southern Arabia, except Seba, which is probably to be sought on the neighboring African coast (Gen. x 6-8; 1 Chron. i. 8-10).

2 The land where the Cushites dwelt during any period. In Gen. ii 13, R. V., the term denotes territory in the same great basin as the countries drained by the Tigris and Euphrates. In most or all other passages it designates Ethiopia in Africa (2 Kin. xix 9; Esth. i 1; Ezek. xxix 10). Herodotus describes Asiatic Ethiopians in the army of Xerxes, who were different from the African Ethiopians (vii. 70). See EDEN 1.

3. A Benjamite, perhaps of Ethiopian descent (the Seventy read Cushite), who was a foe to David (Ps. vii. title).

Cu'shan [a name formed from Cush].

A country or its inhabitants mentioned in connection with Midian, and hence probably Arabia as occupied by Cushites (Hab. iii 7; see CUSH). A reference is not apparent to Cushan-rishathaim (Judg. iii. 5), called Cushan by Josephus (Antiq. v. 3, 2).

Cu'shan-rish-a-tha'im, in A. V. Chushan-rishathaim [etymology and meaning unknown].

A king of Mesopotamia, who held the Israelites in subjection for eight years. Deliverance was achieved under the leadership of Othniel, Caleb's younger brother (Judg. iii. 5-11).

Cu'shi [an Ethiopian].

1. An ancestor of that Jehudi who lived in Jeremiah's time (Jer. xxxvi. 14).

2. Father of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i. 1).

3. According to the A V. one of the two men who carried David the news of the victory over his rebellious son Absalom, but the Hebrew has "the Cushi," evidently meaning, as the R V renders it, "the Cushite," i. e. the Ethiopian. The actual name of the runner is unknown (2 Sam. xviii. 21-23, 31, 32).

Cush'ite.

An Ethiopian (Num. xii. 1, R V and margin of A V; 2 Sam. xviii. 21, R V.)

Cuth and Cu'thah [of doubtful meaning].

A city of Babylonia, often mentioned in connection with Babylon and Borsippa, and whose tutelary deity was Nergal. Colonists were brought from this place, among others, to Samaria after the deportation of the ten tribes (2 Kin. xvii. 24, 30). Its site is now fixed at the mounds of Tell Ibrahim, northwest of Babylon.

Cym'bal [from Greek kumbalon (1 Cor. xiii. 1)].

A musical instrument (2 Sam. vi. 5; 1 Chron. xvi. 5), named in Hebrew from a root signifying to tinkle or clang. One form of the name is in the dual number, which implies that the instrument is of two distinct parts. This undoubtedly suggests cymbals, as the Septuagint renders the word, which are concave plates of brass (1 Chron. xv. 19), one form of them being nearly flat, another consisting of hollow cones designed to be clashed together for then sound. See MUSIC.

Eastern Cymbals

Cy'press [from Latin cupressus, cyparissus, Greek κυπαρισσος].

1. The rendering in A V. of Is. xliiv. 14 of the Hebrew word Tirzah, referring to the hardness of the wood. The R V translates it the holm tree.

2. The marginal rendering of the Hebrew T'ashshur in R V. of Is. xli. 19, lx. 13. The text of both versions has box.

3. Rendering of B'rosh, margin R V. See FIR. The Cypress, Cupressus sempervirens, is the type of the sub-order Cupressæ, ranking under the order Pinacæ (Conifers). About ten species of the genus Cupressus are known. The common cypress is an evergreen running into two well-marked varieties, one a tall tree 60 feet high with erect closely appressed branches, and the other smaller, with the branches spreading. The cypress is a native of Persia and the Levant. It is extensively planted in cemeteries of the East.

Cy'prus.

An island celebrated in the earliest ages for the richness of its mines of copper. It is situated in the northeastern part of the Mediterranean Sea, about 41 miles from the coast of Cilicia, 60 from Syria, and 233 from Port Said in Egypt. The more compact part of the island is 110 miles in length by 30 to 50 or 60 in breadth; besides which there runs from its northeastern extremity a narrow strip of land, 40 miles long by 5 or 6 broad, projecting from the rest of the island like a bowsprit from a ship. The area of Cyprus is about 3584 square miles. The island is mountainous, with intermediate valleys, which are at certain seasons unhealthy. The mountains yield copper, and the mines were at one time farmed to Herod the Great (Antiq. xvi. 4, 5). Its ancient inhabitants were Kittim, a branch of the Greek race (Gen. x. 4), but Phœnicians from the coast of Syria colonized the island. They built as their capital the town of Kition or Citium. Later other bodies of Greeks reinforced the original stock (cp. Herod. viii. 90), so that to this day about three-fourths of the population belong to that race. Cyprus was for a short time an imperial Roman province or part of one; but in the year 27 B. C. Augustus handed it over to the senate, and henceforth it was under a proprætor with the title of proconsul. Many Jewish communities existed in the island (1 Mac. xv. 23; Acts iv. 36). There were Christians connected with it before Stephen's martyrdom; and during the persecution which followed some of them returned to it, preaching the gospel (Acts xi. 19, 20). It was visited for missionary purposes, first by Barnabas and Paul (Acts xiii. 4), and afterwards by Barnabas and Mark (xv. 39). Paul sailed past it at least twice without landing (xxi. 3, 16; xxvii. 4). Since 1571 it has constituted a portion of Turkey, though by a treaty, dated June 4, 1878, Great Britain administers and holds it as a place of arms, while Russia retains Batoum and Kars. See KITTIM.

Cy-re'ne.

An important Greek colonial city in North Africa, beautifully situated on a tableland many hundred feet above the sea level, and a few miles distant from the Mediterranean. It constituted one of five Greek cities called Pentapolis, situated in Libya Cyrenaica, now Tripoli. It is believed that it was founded by Dorians about the year 632 B. C. During the time of the Ptolemies, in the third century B. C., many Jews became resident in Cyrene (con. Apion ii. 4; Antiq. xiv. 7, 2). Simon, who was compelled to carry the cross of Jesus, seems to have been a Cyrenian Jew (Mat. xxvii. 32). Cyrenians joined with Libertines and others in forming a synagogue at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 9). Men of Cyrene early became converts and preachers (xi. 20). Among them was a certain Lucius, a prominent man in the church at Antioch (xiii. 1). Extensive ruins of Cyrene still exist, now called el-Krenna.

Cy-re'ni-us. See QUIRINIUS.

Cy'rus [Elamite and Persian, K'ur'ush].

A king twice named in the book of Isaiah as anointed of God and predestined to conquer kings and fortified places, and set the Jews free from captivity (Is. xlv. 28; xlv. 1-14). Daniel, referring to the conquest of Babylonia by the Medes and Persians, records that during the night which followed a great feast Belshazzar, the king of the Chaldeans, was slain and Darius the Mede received the kingdom (Dan. v. 30, 31). Darius was predecessor of Cyrus, or his regent, in Babylonia (vi. 28). Ezra relates that Cyrus, king of Persia, in the first year of his reign issued a proclamation permitting the Jews to return to their own land and rebuild the temple, for the use of which he restored the sacred vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar (Ezra i. 1-11; v. 13, 14; vi. 3). Many of the Jews embraced the privilege and returned to Jerusalem; but the work of rebuilding the sanctuary was greatly hindered by adversaries.

According to Babylonian inscriptions, written approximately at the time of the capture of the city, Cyrus was a son of Cambyses, grandson of Cyrus, great-grandson of Teispes, all of whom reigned as kings of Ansan, a designation which appears to denote eastern Elam with Susa as its capital. About the year 550 B. C., the sixth year of Nabunaid or Nabonidus, king of Babylon, Istuvegu or, in Greek, Astyages, king of the people of Manda, marched against Cyrus, but was betrayed by his own army and delivered into the hands of Cyrus. Cyrus then took Ecbatana and carried its spoil to his own city. In the month of Nisan, 547 B. C., Cyrus, now called king of Persia, led the Persian army across the Tigris near Arbela and carried his conquest into the western country. According to Greek authorities, he conquered Lydia about this time, taking Sardis and making a prisoner of Croesus, its king. In 539 B. C., the seventeenth year of Nabonidus, in the month Tammuz, Cyrus met the Babylonians in battle; on the 14th day he took Sippara and Nabonidus fled. Two days later, on the 16th, Ugbaru or Gobryas, governor of Gutium, at the head of a detachment of Cyrus' army, entered Babylon without fighting. Nabonidus was afterwards captured at Babylon. On the 3d of Marchesvan Cyrus himself entered Babylon, his governor Ugbaru proclaimed peace to the province, governors were appointed, and an order issued for the restoration of many captive foreign idols to their several native sanctuaries. About the 27th of Adar the king's wife died. A public mourning for her was observed for a week, followed by religious services conducted by Cambyses, son of Cyrus. Cyrus was succeeded by Cambyses in 529 B. C. So far the inscriptions. According to Herodotus (i. 190, 191), Cyrus captured Babylon by turning the waters of the Euphrates temporarily into a lake excavated for the purpose, and then entering from the nearly dry bed of the river by the gates which had been left open on the night of a festival while the inhabitants were engaged in revelry. The account given by the Babylonian priest, Berosus, who lived about the time of Alexander the Great, is as follows: "In the 17th year of Nabonidus, Cyrus came out of Persia with a great army, and, having conquered all the rest of Asia, came hastily to Babylonia. When Nabonidus perceived that he was advancing to attack him, he assembled his forces and opposed him; but he was defeated and fled with a few of his attendants and shut himself in the city of Borsippa [the twin of Babylon]. Whereupon Cyrus took Babylon; and he gave orders that the outer walls should be demolished, because the city had proved very troublesome to him and difficult to take. He then marched to Borsippa to besiege Nabonidus; but as Nabonidus delivered himself into his hands without holding out the place, he was at first kindly treated by Cyrus, who sent him out of Babylonia but gave him a habitation in Carmania, where he spent the remainder of his life and died" (contra Apion. i. 20).

D.

Dab'a-reh. See DABERATH

Dab'be-sheth, in A. V. Dabbasheth [hump of a camel].

A town on the boundary line of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 11). Conder locates it at Dabsleh, 13 miles N. E. of Acre. Improbable.

Dab'e-rath, in A. V. once Dabareh erroneously (Josh. xxi. 28) [probably pasture land].

A city within the territory of Issachar, given with its suburbs to the Gershonites (Josh. xix. 12; xxi. 28; 1 Chron. vi. 72; War. i. 21, 3; Life 62). It has been identified as the village of Deburieh at the base of mount Tabor, on the northwestern side of the hill.

Da'gon [the name probably has no reference to either fish or grain].

The national god of the Philistines. At Gaza, at Beth-dagon, and especially at Ashdod, he had a temple (Judg. xvi. 21, 23; 1 Sam. v. 1-7; 1 Chron. x. 10). Jonathan Maccabaeus, after defeating the Philistines, drove them into the temple of Dagon in Ashdod, and set fire both to the city and the temple (1 Mac. x. 84; xi. 4). Dagon was worshiped to some extent in Phœnicia and also in Assyria. The idol is considered to have had the head, arms, and upper parts of human form (1 Sam v. 4), while the lower parts tapered away into the tail of a fish. Diodorus Siculus (ii. 4) mentions an idol, called Dercetus, of similar form, as having existed at Ashkelon, another Philistine town. It is questionable whether the image of a man with the extremities of a fish, which was found at Khorsabad, represents Dagon.

Da-la'iah. See DELAIAH

Da'leth.

The fourth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The English letter D has the same origin, and represents it in Anglicized Hebrew names. It stands at the head of the fourth section of Ps cxix, in which section each verse of the Hebrew begins with this letter.

The two Hebrew letters, dalet and resh (r), are somewhat similar now, and at certain stages of their development were distinguishable only when carefully written and on close scrutiny. In the Siloam inscription, for example, they are written A and A and on Hebrew coins Q and Q. This similarity caused constant difficulty to readers and copyists, and frequently misled them as to the true spelling of words, especially of obscure names where no guide to the original form existed.

Dal-ma-nu'tha.

A place situated probably on the western shore of the sea of Galilee in the vicinity of Magdala (Mark viii. 10; cp. Mat. xv. 39).

Dal-ma'ti-a.

A region on the eastern shore of the Adriatic Sea, with the small but numerous adjacent islands. It is traversed by the Julian continued as the Dinic Alps, a part of the giant range separating Italy from France, Switzerland, and Germany. The mountain tribes were subdued in A. D. 9 by the Romans under Augustus Caesar and Tiberius, the future emperor, and the province of Dalmatia was erected. It was regarded as part of Illyricum, which constituted the limit of Paul's missionary journeys in that direction (Rom. xv. 19). His associate Titus, after being for a time with Paul in the Italian capital, departed to Dalmatia, perhaps to plant the gospel among its wild inhabitants (2 Tim. iv. 10).

Dal'phon.

A son of Haman (Esth. ix. 7).

Dam'a-ris.

A woman converted through Paul's preaching at Athens (Acts xvii. 34).

Dam-a-scene'.

A native or inhabitant of Damascus (2 Cor. xi. 32).

Dam-mas'cus.

A city of Syria, on a plateau watered by the rivers Abana and Pharpar (2 Kin. v. 12).

The tableland is about 2200 feet above the level of the sea, at the eastern foot of the Antilibanus chain of mountains, and contains about 500 square miles. Where watered by channels from the rivers, it is exceedingly fertile, so that the city is embosomed in gardens and orchards, in refreshing contrast to the neighboring desert. Three great trade routes center at Damascus; one leads south-westward to the Mediterranean seacoast and Egypt, another runs south to Arabia, and the third crosses the desert to Bagdad. The city is very ancient. It is mentioned as early as the time of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 15). In the days of David, Damascus was one of several petty states of southern Syria. It was captured and garrisoned by David (2 Sam. viii. 5, 6, 1 Chron. xviii. 5, 6). After he smote the Syrian kingdom of Zobah, a man called Rezon, a former subject of the king of Zobah, collected a band of men, seized Damascus, and founded the Syrian kingdom, which henceforth was so often in conflict with Israel (1 Kin. xi. 23, 24). Damascus was the capital of Hezion, Tabrimmon, and the Benhadads (1 Kin. xv. 18, 20, xx. 34, 2 Kin. viii. 7), of Hazael (1 Kin. xix. 17, 2 Kin. viii. 8-15), and of Rezin (xvi. 5). Tabrimmon and the first Benhadad were in league with the king of Israel (1 Kin. xv. 18; 2 Chron. xvi. 2). Ahab renewed the covenant, obtaining the right to establish streets of bazaars in Damascus (1 Kin. xx. 34). At this period Damascus took a leading part among the western nations in resistance to Assyria. In alliance with kings of the seacoast and Ahab of Israel it met Shalmaneser at Karkar in 854 B. C., but was defeated. In 841 its king Hazael was also defeated by Shalmaneser. It was the residence of Naaman, captain of the army under the second Benhadad (2 Kin. v. 1, 12). When Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel planned to assault Jerusalem, Ahaz of Judah called in Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who captured Damascus, carried the inhabitants captive to Kir, and killed Rezin (2 Kin. xvi. 5-9; Is. vii. 1-viii. 6; x. 9). This destruction is referred to by Amos (i. 3-5). But Damascus soon regained its prosperity (Ezek. xxvii. 18). From the Assyrians Damascus passed to the Babylonians, from them to the Persians, and then to the Macedonian Greeks. It was one of the ten cities originally forming the Decapolis. It was taken by the Roman general Metellus, and in the year 63 B. C. became a Roman province. Many Jews dwelt in Damascus, and supported several synagogues (Acts ix. 2; War. ii. 20, 2). Near Damascus Saul of Tarsus, when on his way to persecute the Christians of the city, was smitten to the earth and heard the heavenly voice (Acts ix. 2, 3, 10; xxii. 6, 10, 11, 12; xxvi. 12); and from the walls he was let down, now himself a Christian, to escape the fury of the Jews (Acts ix. 24, 25; cp. xxvi. 20; Gal. i. 17). The traditional street called Straight is about two miles long, and runs from northeast to southwest, almost through the center of the city. It is a poor street now, but in the time of Paul it was a magnificent thoroughfare, flanked with Corinthian columns. At its eastern end is the east gate of the city. The large gateway, 38 feet high and 20 feet wide, and the two smaller side gates were built by the Romans, probably as early as the time of Paul. Of these the central and southern archways have long been built up with masonry, leaving only the small northern side gate open. In Paul's time the city was in the hands of Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea, but it soon reverted to the Romans (2 Cor xi 32). In A D 634 Damascus was invested and in 635 captured by the Arabs under Omar. In 1300 it was plundered by the Tartars, and in 1400 by Timur the Tartar. Since 1516 it has been held by the Turks. In July, 1860, 6000 oriental Christians were massacred by a Mohammedan mob composed of Druses and Bedouin, assisted by Turkish soldiers.

East gate of Damascus

The small gate on the north of the closed Roman archway leads to the northern Roman side gate, and is the present entrance to the city. A minaret rises above the gate.

Dan [a judge].

1 A son of Jacob by Bilhah (Gen xxx. 5-6). He had one son, Hushim (Gen xlvi. 23) or Shuham (Num xxvi. 42). The future destiny of his descendants was thus predicted by Jacob: "Dan shall judge his people, as one of the tribes of Israel. Dan shall be a serpent in the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider falleth backward" (Gen xlix. 16, 17, R V.), meaning that his tribe would contend with the foes of Israel as earnestly and craftily as would any of the tribes. Speaking on the same subject Moses compared Dan to a lion's whelp that leapeth forth from Bashan (Deut. xxxiii. 22).

2 The tribe to which Dan gave origin, and the territory in Canaan which it obtained by allotment (Num. i. 12, 38, 39). Its assigned territory contained, among other towns, Zorah, Ajalon, Ekron, Eltekeh, and ended opposite Japho—i. e. Joppa (Josh xix. 40-46; xxi. 5, 23, cp. Judg. v. 17). The Danites, however, did not possess themselves of all this region, but were restricted by the Amorites to the hill country (Judg. i. 34, 35). Cramped for room, they sent spies to the extreme north of Palestine to look for a new location, who found what they desired in the town of Laish, occupied by foreigners. The Danites sent an expedition, seized the place, slew its inhabitants, and rebuilt it under the new name of Dan (Josh. xix. 47; Judg. xviii. 1-31). Ahohab and Samson were Danites (Ex xxxi. 6; Judg. xiii. 2, 24).

3 A town in the extreme north of Palestine, the phrase "from Dan to Beersheba" or "from Beersheba to Dan" denoting the land in its entire extent from north to south (Judg. xx. 1; 1 Chron. xxi. 2). The town was originally called Laish, lion, or Leshem, perhaps place of lions (Lesham from layish, as Etam from 'ayit). The name Dan was given to it after its capture by the Danites (Josh. xix. 47; Judg. xviii.). Abraham pursued Chedorlaomer as far as Dan (Gen. xiv. 14); thought by some to be Dan-jaan (q v). But Dan-jaan may be Laish, that is Dan, if so, the familiar name Dan has supplanted the older designation in Genesis (cp. Deut. xxxiv. 1). At Dan Jeroboam fixed one of his golden calves (1 Kin. xii. 29, 30; 2 Kin. x. 29; Amos viii. 14). Benhadad destroyed the town with other places in its vicinity (1 Kin. xv. 20; 2 Chron. xvi. 4); but it was rebuilt (Ezek. xxvii. 19). Dan was in a fertile valley by Beth-rehob (Judg. xviii. 9, 28), near Lebanon, at the sources of the lesser Jordan (Antiq. v. 3, 1, viii. 8, 4), near the marshes of the waters of Merom (War iv. 1, 1), and four Roman miles west of Paneas (Onom). These statements indicate Tell el-Kâdi, which signifies mound of the judge, and thus preserves, though perhaps accidentally, the sense of the old name Dan. At the base of this mound are two springs, whose waters presently unite and form the river Leddan, the shortest but most abundant in water of the three streams which flow together a few miles below and form the Jordan.

Dance.

On joyous occasions of a secular or semi-secular character dancing, accompanied by music, was practiced among the Hebrews by women, either singly or in groups, especially in welcoming a victor home (Judg. xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7; xxix. 5; cp. Jer. xxxi. 4, 13). Children, apparently of both sexes, took part in dances (Job xxi. 11; Mat. xi. 17, Luke vii. 32). Men probably engaged in dances among themselves, as they did in Egypt (Ps. xxx. 11; Lam. v. 15; Ecc. iii. 4; Luke xv. 25). Only on one occasion do we find a Jewish princess dancing publicly in an assembly of men after the Roman manner; acting a mythological story with the face masked, but with the body clothed so as to exhibit the beauty of the figure (Mat. xiv. 6; Mark vi 22). Dancing as part of a religious ceremony or as an act of worship seems to have been common among the Hebrews. It was practiced chiefly by women (Ex. xv. 20; Judg. xxi 21, the first year of Cyrus (21). In Nebuchadnezzar's second year, 603 B. C., doubtless towards its close (cp 5 and 18), Daniel interpreted the king's dream of the great image (ii 1-46). This success led to the prophet's being made ruler over the province of Babylon, and head over its wise men (46-49). He afterwards interpreted the vision which revealed the approaching madness of Nebu-23), but occasionally by men, as in the well-known instance of David's dancing before the ark (2 Sam vi 14-23; 1 Chron xv. 29, Ps cxlix 3; cl 4). Dancing before images was common among idolaters (Ex. xxxii 19; 1 Kin xviii, 26).

Dan'iel [God is my judge]

1 Son of David and Abigail, born at Hebron (1 Chron iii 1). He is called Chileab in 2 Sam iii 3.

2 A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, signed the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Ezra viii. 2; Neh. x. 6). Chronologically he is the third of the name mentioned in the Old Testament.

3 The celebrated Jewish prophet at the Babylonian court. He sprang from princely family of the tribe of Judah (Dan i 3-7). When a youth, he was carried off with other captives by Nebuchadnezzar after his first siege of Jerusalem, in the third or, reckoning accession year as first year, the fourth of Jehoiakim, 605 B. C. (i 1; Jer. xxv. 1). At Babylon the boy was selected with other young captives of good birth and parts to be trained for the state service. He and three companions obtained leave from the master of the eunuchs, under whose charge they were, to substitute simple food for the viands assigned them by the king and which were liable to be contrary to the Mosaic law and defiled by heathen rites (Dan. i. 8). The four young exiles all became proficient in Babylonian learning, while the grace of God enabled them to manifest uncompromising principle, even when it brought them face to face with death. The period of tutelage ended in the third year (5), when they were given service at court; and Daniel continued in it with varying prominence until 538 B. C., chadnezzar (iv). About this time Ezekiel cited Daniel as a notable example of righteousness and wisdom (Ezek xiv 14, xxviii 3). In the first year of Belshazzar Daniel himself had a vision and saw, under the figure of animals, four successive empires reaching to the time when the ancient of days should sit, and one like a son of man come with the clouds of heaven to set up a spiritual kingdom which should endure eternally (vii). The scene of the vision of the third year of Belshazzar was at Shushan (viii 2), the Elamite capital, and residence of the already renowned Cyrus, king of Persia (viii 20, and see CYRUS). The prophet himself was probably at Babylon (cp Ezek. viii 1-3). In this vision he saw a ram trampled by a goat, and from the head of the latter, when its power was in turn broken, four horns appearing, from one of which a little horn sprang and wrought proudly, especially toward the glorious land and its sanctuary; whereby were symbolized the Medo-Persian and Macedonian empires, the division of the latter into four kingdoms, the rise of a fierce king and his desecration of the sanctuary (viii). On the fall of the Babylonian empire, Darius, in behalf of the conqueror, appointed 120 satraps over the new kingdom, with three presidents over them, Daniel being one of the three (vi 1, 2, see CYRUS). Jealousy of Daniel on account of his ability and eminence led to a plot against him, and he was cast into the den of lions (3-23; 1 Mac ii 60). In the first year of Darius, Daniel concluded from the statements of Jeremiah (xxv. 11, 12; xxix. 10) that the captivity was approaching its close (Dan ix 1, 2). He humbled himself, confessed the sins of the nation and prayed. In consequence there was revealed to him the prophecy of the seventy weeks

(ix. 24) In the third year of Cyrus, king of Persia, he had a vision of the final conflict between the powers of the world and the kingdom of God (x.-xii.). As Daniel prophesied at the beginning of the dynasty of Nebuchadnezzar, and at its end, and in the reigns of Darius the Mede and Cyrus the Persian (vi 28), he must have lived to an advanced age. The time and manner of his death are unknown. Daniel is referred to in Ezek. xiv 14; xxviii. 3; 2 Esdras xii 11; 1 Mac. ii 60; Mat. xxiv. 15; Mark xiii. 14; Heb. xi. 33.

The book of Daniel is a book of the O. T. which in the Septuagint and English versions follows Ezekiel, but in the Hebrew canon is placed in the third division. It was not put with the prophets because its writer, although called a prophet (Mat xxiv 1.; Antiq. x. 15, 4 and 6), and one of the greatest of them (Antiq. x. 11, 7), and although he was marvelously gifted by the Spirit of prophecy, was not regarded as officially a prophet. He had the donum propheticum, but not the munus propheticum; the prophetic gift, not the prophetic vocation. He was officially a statesman, and his life was passed in the business of the state. He does not use the common prophetic declaration, "Thus saith the Lord," and he does not exhort his contemporaries, as it was the function of the prophets to do. The greater part of the book is in Hebrew; but a portion which relates almost entirely to the life of the Jews in a foreign land and to the deeds of foreign kings and to prophecies concerning foreign empires, beginning with the middle of verse 4, chap. ii., and extending to chap. vii, verse 28, is in Aramaic, the commercial and diplomatic language of the time (cp. similar phenomenon in Ezra). The book may be divided into three sections: 1. Introduction, the preparation of Daniel and his three companions for their work (i). 2. Witness borne by God through the four, at a foreign court and largely to foreigners, of his omnipotent and omniscient control of the powers of the world in their development and in their relation to the kingdom of God (ii.-vii.). This section is written in Aramaic. It includes Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the image made of four metals and its destruction (ii.); the attempt against Daniel's three companions and their deliverance from the fiery furnace (iii.); Nebuchadnezzar's dream of the tree hewn down (iv.); the writing on the wall at Belshazzar's feast (v.); the plot to destroy Daniel, and his deliverance from the lions' den (vi.); Daniel's vision of the four beasts and the being like unto a son of man (vii.). This last is placed out of chronological order that it may form the transition to 3. 3 Supplementary visions of Daniel, having the fortunes of God's people specially in view (viii.-xii.), comprising three visions: (1) Concerning the cessation of sacrifice, desolation of the sanctuary, opposition to the prince of princes (viii.; cp. 13, 25). (2) In view of the near completion of the predicted seventy years of exile, Daniel prepared for the great event by confessing national sins and supplicating forgiveness. From prophecies gone before, it might be supposed that the kingdom of Messiah would be established immediately at the expiration of the captivity; but in a vision Daniel is informed that 70 weeks must elapse after the decree to rebuild Jerusalem is issued before reconciliation is made and everlasting righteousness brought in (Dan. ix.). (3) He is further informed by a vision in the third year of the founder of the Persian empire in regard to the overthrow of that empire, the persecution of God's people that shall ensue, and the final relief of the saints and the resurrection to glory (x.-xii.).

The prophecy of the image, composed of four metals, broken by the stone (ii 31-45), and that of the four beasts replaced by a being like unto a son of man (vii.), depict four worldly powers yielding place to the kingdom of God. The fourth empire is clearly the Roman; for 1 The second empire, the Medo-Persian, cannot be divided into two, since the Median kingdom in its separate existence was never an empire of world-wide sway. Historically, Media and Persia were one empire in the days of Median supremacy. There was a change of dynasty, a Persian prince obtained the throne of Media, and then the Medo-Persian career of universal conquest began. 2 Daniel speaks of the Medo-Persian empire as one (v 28, vi 8; viii 20). 3. To divide the Medo-Persian empire into two empires requires the identification of the leopard with Persia instead of Greece. But the leopard has four heads (vii 6). Persia was not broken into four parts, but the Macedonian empire was (viii. 21, 22; xi 2-4). 4 The Roman empire was already within the prophet's view. On the common interpretation, the Romans are referred to in xi 30, and Antiochus the Great in xi. 10^b-20, who was overwhelmingly defeated by the Romans at Magnesia in 190 B. C. (see ANTIOCHUS). It may be added that in the visions a horn represents a king and a kingdom (vii. 7, 24), be it Media, Persia, or Macedonia (viii. 20-22); and a little horn signifies the rise of a new king or power, it may be among the successors of Alexander (viii 9, 23) or in the midst of the Roman empire (vii 8, 24). A horn does not always represent one and the same king, and no more does a little horn stand for the same individual.

The prophecy of the seventy weeks also concerns the sufferings of the kingdom of God (ix. 24-27). The prophetic era from which the weeks are reckoned is a decree, either of God or of an earthly king, for restoring and building Jerusalem (25). The anointed one, the prince (25), and the anointed one (26) are interpreted, with more or less soundness of reasoning, as referring to one person or two persons, and as being Cyrus or a high priest or the line of high priests or Christ. The seven weeks and sixty-two weeks and one week, amounting in all to seventy weeks (24-27), are variously distributed. They are taken successively, so as to measure a period of 490 years; or the sixty-two is held to include the seven, so that a period of 434 years only is covered; or the numbers are taken in the reverse order from their mention in verse 25, and a significant period of seven weeks is made to follow the periods of sixty-two weeks and one week. The theories which regard the decree as an edict of God are mainly two. They make the era either the beginning of the exile, 605 B C (cp Jer xxv. 11), or the destruction of Jerusalem, 587 B C. (cp xxix. 10, written soon after the beginning of Jehonachin's captivity, verse 2; xxx. 18, xxxi. 38). Need it be added that the year 450 B C has also been sought, on the theory that the seventy years of punishment were doubled (Jer. xvi. 18; but see Is xl. 2), and a divine decree of favor to Zion is implied at their close? The theories which date the era from the decree of an earthly monarch are four: 1. The edict of Cyrus, 538 B. C. (Ezra i. 2-4; vi. 3-5; cp. Is xlv. 23; xlv. 1, 13), under the provisions of which the rebuilding of the temple was begun (Ezra vi. 14, 15; Hag i. 14, 15). 2. The edict of Darius (Ezra vi. 6-12). 3. The edict of the seventh year of Artaxerxes, 457 B C. (vii. 7, 11-26); which granted to the Jews absolute authority in civil and religious matters (25, 26), and under which they proceeded to build the city walls (iv. 12). The work was temporarily interrupted by a new decree (iv. 21). 4. The edict of the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, 444 B C, which included permission to restore and fortify the city (Neh. ii. 3, 5, 8, 17, 18). The problem thus has three factors, to each of which several interpretations are given: the decree, the anointed one, and the weeks; and these factors are susceptible of various combinations. Of all these combinations, using any one of the decrees as a starting-point, and reckoning forward either sixty-two or sixty-nine weeks of seven years each, and expecting either the time of Antiochus Epiphanes or that of Christ to be reached by this measurement, only one combination yields a result. All others require an invention of history or involve an unusual chronological artifice or end in an unsolved mystery or assume a gross miscalculation of the interval by the author. The one combination which coincides with known history throughout starts with the decree of Artaxerxes in his seventh year, 457 B. C. A period of seven weeks or forty-nine years came to a close about 408 B. C., and the reformation under Ezra and Nehemiah was conducted during this period and characterized this period as a whole. When this reform ceased to be the dominating feature of God's kingdom is unknown, but Nehemiah's successor, who was a Persian and naturally not a maintainer of the exclusiveness of Jehovah's religion, was in office in 411 B C., before the close of the seventh week. Then follow sixty-two weeks or 434 years, coming down through A D 26 to the time when Jesus began his public ministry, A D 27, probably early in that year. After these threescore and two weeks an anointed one was cut off (Dan. ix. 26), making, it may well be, the reconciliation for iniquity and bringing in the everlasting righteousness, spoken of in verse 24; and in the midst of this last week one caused the sacrifice and oblation to cease, not by forbidding them, but by the one sacrifice on Calvary that rendered all others henceforth unnecessary. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the coincidence of the prophecy with the known events in the history of God's kingdom, and the significance of this correspondence, yet quite probably the seventy, and the seven separated from it at the beginning, and the one week marked off from it at the end, are all symbolical, and measure symbolically, not mathematically, a vast period in the history of God's kingdom on earth. Other numbers are so used in the book of Daniel. The symbolism of four and ten, for example, even when the number corresponds with persons or events of history, probably often determined the particular number of historical instances to be cited, and was doubtless felt by the prophet as he recalled the dream and beheld the visions.

The largeness of the outlook and the comprehensiveness of the prophecies of Daniel are realized in the light of the use made of this book by the men of the Bible. 1. Our Lord chose the title "son of man," by which he referred to himself more often than by any other title, from Dan. vii. 13, 14, and thus placed that aspect of his mission and kingdom, which this title denotes, in the forefront. See SON OF MAN. 2. Christ warned men that the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, should yet stand in the holy place (Mat. xxiv. 15; Mark xiii. 14; Dan. xi. 31; xii. 11; and ix. 27, noting Greek text; cp 2 Thes. ii. 1-12). Evidently, on Christ's explanation, the content of the prophecies was not exhausted when the idolatrous altar was erected on Jehovah's altar by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac. i. 54). Either in some, if not all, instances the prophecy relates to a different event, or else the abomination of desolation is a conception embodying an idea which will come to manifestation in concrete form whenever the idea itself is present as a potent principle in history. Likewise the apostles understood that the little horn of the fourth beast (Dan. vii. 24), and the king that speaketh marvelous things against God (xi. 36), belong to the future and are yet to be revealed (2 Thes. ii. 4; Rev. xiii. 5, 6). Characteristic features of the condict between the world and God's kingdom undoubtedly belonged to the bitter struggle in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, but not to that time only; and Christ and the apostles saw in these prophecies of Daniel an apocalypse of the future. These revelations were not exhausted by the events of the reign of Antiochus; they are big with meaning for the latter days of God's kingdom.

3. The beast which John saw coming up out of the sea (Rev. xiii. 1) is a composite picture of the four beasts which Daniel saw emerging from the sea (Dan. vii 3-7). Daniel saw a lion with eagle's wings [and one head], a bear [with one head], a leopard with four wings and four heads, and finally a beast with ten horns [and one head]. On combining these four beasts as one animal, the beast that John saw is produced: like a leopard, but with the feet of a bear and the mouth of a lion, having ten horns and seven heads. Daniel describes four kingdoms of this world which rise successively, and are as fierce and terrible as wild beasts in their antagonism to the kingdom of God. John does not view the kingdoms individually, but all the kingdoms of this world collectively. He gazes upon them as one, notwithstanding external differences. And John sees the dragon, the tempter-serpent of Eden (Rev. xii 3, 9), conformed in appearance to the beast, because the dragon is the animating and moulding spirit in the kingdom of the world. To neither Daniel nor John are the world powers presented in their political aspect, but solely as representatives of the world in its antagonism to the kingdom of God. It is not the fortunes of the nations, but their relation to God's kingdom, that is the prime object of the prophecy. This fact is important, and furnishes a clue to the revelation in chapters xi. and xii of the book of Daniel. It suggests that in these chapters also the aim is not to unfold political history, but is mainly to sketch apocalyptically great movements of the world in relation to the kingdom of God. The enemies of Zion came, and had always come, from the north and south. Developing that historical circumstance apocalyptically, the vision pictures a struggle between the contending world-powers, a war of varying fortunes; the gradual overthrow of the king of the south and the ultimate triumph of the king of the north, and his final mortal conflict with the kingdom of God. The picture is a companion piece to Ezek. xxxviii and xxxix. 4. Daniel speaks of the time of the end, that is the final time. It is the latter time of the indignation [of God] (Dan. viii. 19; cp. xi. 36), when judgment is being executed upon the kingdoms of the world and the eternal kingdom of God is being established (cp. x. 14), to be followed by the consummation (xii. 1^o-3). It is the final period of the conflict between the powers of the world and the kingdom of God, ending in the complete victory of the kingdom (xi. 40-xii. 4). The apostles also speak of this period, calling it the last hour, the last time, or the last days; and they allude to it as already begun in their day and not ended, and destined to witness a manifestation of antichrist (2 Thes. ii. 2-4; 2 Tim. iii. 1; 1 John ii. 18; Jude 18). These men of the New Testament clearly saw the scope and meaning of Daniel's prophecies concerning the final time, and they had a sense of living in that predicted period.

The unity of the book of Daniel is rarely questioned. The theory has, indeed, been advanced, and has its advocates at present, that the Aramaic section, so much at least as is comprised in chaps. ii-vi., is an independent composition, penned in Aramaic, and written one, two, or three centuries before the time of the Maccabees. But generally the essential integrity of the book is conceded; it was written by one man. In the first seven chapters Daniel is spoken of in the third person and sometimes in commendatory terms (i. 19, 20; ii. 14; v. 11, 12; vi. 3; cp. Paul of himself, 2 Cor. ii. 15; x. 8; xi. 5, 23 seq.), and in the subsequent chapters he speaks in the first person. Many critics deny that the book was composed by Daniel; and their denial extends to those parts in which the first person is used as well as to that part where the third person is employed. They generally date its publication about 168 or 167 B. C., at the time of the Maccabees, and contend that it was written to support the faith of the Jews under the dreadful persecution then raging under Antiochus Epiphanes. The chief arguments against the genuineness of the book are: (1) Daniel is not mentioned among the worthies by the son of Sirach in the book of Ecclesiasticus (xlix.), about 200 B. C., although he mentions Ezekiel, Nehemiah, and the minor prophets. (2) The writer's use of Greek words, which indicate that he lived in the Grecian period. (3) Historical inaccuracies, which show that he was not an eyewitness of the events which he describes, but lived at a remote period from them. (4) The prophecies give details of history until the death of Antiochus Epiphanes only.

These arguments are answered as follows:

(1) The son of Sirach neglects to mention Daniel, it is true; but he also fails to mention Ezra and other notable men, like Gideon, Samson, and Jehoshaphat.

(2) The Greek words are confined to the names of musical instruments and are all found in one verse, iii. 5. The Greek origin of at least two of these names is freely granted: psantērion for the Greek, psalterion, and sumponēya for sumphonia. But does this fact militate against the composition of the book by Daniel in Babylon about 530 B. C.? By no means; for instruments such as those described were in use in the Tigris and Euphrates valleys in Daniel's day. Moreover, there is no question that at that time and in that region music was a feature in triumphal processions and court life. Captives from distant lands were employed to play on their own instruments of music. Ashurbanipal so used Elamites. Sennacherib carried off from Judah singing men and singing women. Of the captive Jews the songs of Zion and the music of the harp were demanded (Ps. cxxxvii 1-3). There was sufficient intercourse also between the empires on the Tigris and the western peoples to have led to the introduction both of the Greek instruments and their names. Assyrian kings from Sargon, 722 B. C. onward, not to speak of earlier monarchs, had led off prisoners and received tribute from Cyprus, Ionia, Lydia, and Cilicia, which were Greek lands. Nebuchadnezzar warred against the cities on the Mediterranean. It would be in accordance with custom for these conquerors to introduce Greek instruments and Greek-speaking musicians to their courts. Finally, the language of the passage in question is Aramaic, not Babylonian. The Aramaeans had for centuries been in contact with the west. Their language was the international language of diplomacy (cp 2 Kin xviii, 26), and they were the intermediaries of trade, who handled the goods of Orient and Occident. Their language acquired an admixture of foreign words from these sources. The writer of the Book of Daniel is using Aramaic, and doubtless employs the names which were current among the Aramaeans for instruments of this kind. It is for those who base an argument on these words against the genuineness of the Book of Daniel, to show that they were not current Aramaic before the sixth century B C.

(3) The asserted historical inaccuracies are not statements which are disproved by history, but only statements which have seemed difficult to harmonize with the meager accounts of secular historians. No contradiction between Daniel's record and established history has been proven. The asserted historical inaccuracies have, moreover, been steadily diminishing before the increasing knowledge of the times of Cyrus. The existence of king Belshazzar was scouted: but now the records contemporary with the capture of Babylon have made him a well-known historical character; explained why he raised Daniel to the third place of power in the kingdom instead of the second, for his father and he already occupied the two higher places of authority; and have made clear why he and not Nabonidus is mentioned as king at Babylon on the night of the capture of the city (see BELSHAZZAR). They do not yet clear up the reference to Darius the Mede receiving the kingdom, but they show that the appointment of a regent for Babylonia by Cyrus was in accord with his policy. The allusions to Belshazzar as a descendant of Nebuchadnezzar agree with a custom of the time (see BELSHAZZAR). In view of the revelations of the cuneiform inscriptions, it is held to assert that there are historical inaccuracies in the book of Daniel.

(4) The prophecies do, indeed, give historical details until the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (viii). But are the prophecies not definite for the times after Antiochus? The fourth kingdom described in chap. ii. and vii can be none other than the Roman empire (see above), which succeeded to universal empire at a time subsequent to Antiochus, and in its later development is accurately described in the book of Daniel (cp. Antiq x 11, 7).

The Aramaic of the book of Daniel has been proven, by recently discovered documents, to be an Aramaic current as early as the beginning of the fifth century B. C., at least in the west.

The prophecy of Daniel is quoted by Christ as genuine and certain of fulfilment (Mat. xxiv 15). Josephus believed that the prophecies of Daniel were in existence before the time of Alexander the Great, 330 B C (Antiq xi 8, 5), yea, before the days of Artaxerxes (contra Apion i. 8). The deliverance of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego from the fiery furnace and of Daniel from the lions' den are cited in 1 Mac ii 59, 60; cp. also 1. 54 with Dan ix. 27; xi. 31.

Dan-ja'an.

A place between Gilead (or even between the land of the Hittites toward Kadesh) and Zidon (2 Sam xxiv 6). The ruin Dâniân, on the coast midway between Acre and Tyre, can scarcely be its site, for the takers of the census who left Dan-jaan did not reach Tyre until they had passed Zidon. It may be identical with Dan, the conventional extreme north of the country (cp. the connection of each with Zidon, Judg. xviii. 28). The ancient versions indicate that Dan-jaan is a corruption for Dan-jaar, and that Dan is described as being in the forest.

Dan'nah [a low place, low ground].

A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 49). The situation of the other towns of this group suggests a place much farther south than Idhna, 8 miles west by north of Hebron.

Dar'ra. See DARDA.

Dar'da [perhaps, pearl of wisdom].

A son of Mahol, family of Zerah, tribe of Judah, who was celebrated for wisdom (1 Kin. iv 31). In 1 Chron. ii. 6 the name appears as Dara.

Dar'ic.

A gold coin current in Persia, worth about five dollars, which had on one side a king with a bow and a javelin, while on the other was a somewhat square figure; see MONEY. The chronicler reckons the value of the gold contributed by the princes in David's reign for the temple in darics (1 Chron. xxix. 7), not because darics circulated in Israel as early as David's reign, but because at the time of writing the daric was familiar to his readers and a common standard. The daric was current in the Persian period (Ezra ii. 69; viii. 27; Neh. vii. 70, 71, 72; in A. V. dram). The first issue was wont to be attributed to Darius Hystaspis (cp. Herod. iv. 166); but Prof. Sayce argues that daric really comes from the Babylonian dariku, a weight or measure which, like the English pound, commencing as a weight became afterwards a coin. Dariku figures in a contract in the 12th year of Nabonidus, five years before Cyrus' conquest of Babylon, and long before Darius was elected to the throne (Sayce, Ezra, etc., p. 38). Silver darics were also coined, which were worth about a shekel.

Da-ri'us [from Zend dara, king].

1. A king described as Darius the Mede, son of Ahasuerus (Dan. v. 31; ix. 1). When about 62 years old he was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans after the capture of Babylon by the army of Cyrus, and he reigned a part of one year at least (v. 31; xi. 1) before Cyrus (vi. 28). He set 120 satraps over the kingdom (vi. 1). The satraps were subject to three presidents, of whom Daniel was one (2). Presidents and satraps were at the court of Darius (6), and he had authority to write unto all peoples, nations, and languages that dwell in all the earth or land (25). He was inveigled into issuing the foolish decree, for violating which Daniel was cast into the lion's den (vi. 1-27). In his first year Daniel saw the vision of the seventy weeks (ix. 1-27). He has not been identified with certainty, but was probably sovereign of the Babylonian empire ad interim until Cyrus, who was pressing his conquests, was ready to assume the duties of king of Babylon. Josephus says that he was son of Astyages, but was known to the Greeks by another name (Antiq. x. 11, 4). Perhaps, then, he was Cyaxeres, son and successor of Astyages and father-in-law and uncle of Cyrus (Xenophon, Cyropaed. i. 5; viii. 7); or possibly Ugbaru, governor of Gutium, apparently a province in western Media or on its borders, who led the detachment of Cyrus' army which captured Babylon, held the city for at least four months until Cyrus arrived, and is spoken of in this connection in a cuneiform inscription as Cyrus' governor.

2. A king of Persia who in point of time followed after Cyrus (Ezra iv. 5). When he came to the throne, the building of the temple had been suspended owing to complaints from the jealous neighboring tribes; but Darius, on being applied to, caused a search to be made at Achmetha, the Median capital, where the edict of Cyrus permitting the work to be undertaken was found (Ezra vi. 1-12). The erection of the sacred edifice accordingly recommenced in his second year, sixth month, and twenty-fourth day (Ezra iv. 24; Hag. i. 15; ii. 18), and on the third day of the twelfth month of his sixth regnal year was completed (Ezra vi. 15). The prophets Haggai and Zechariah prophesied during the reign of this monarch (Hag. i. 1; ii. 1, 10, 18; Zech. i. 1, 7; vii. 1), who was without doubt the Darius Hystaspis of the classical writers, the Dara Gustasp of Zend writings. He was son of Hystaspes, which Latin writers denoted by using the genitive case Hystaspis. Through his father he belonged to the family of the Achæmenides, which was already represented on the throne by Cyrus and Cambyses: but he was not in the line of succession. The leading events of his life are detailed in an inscription of Darius' own on a rock at Behistun, about 60 miles southwest of Hamadan. It is in three languages, Persian, Babylonian, and Amardian or Elamite. According to it, eight of his ancestors were kings. Cambyses, Cyrus' son, put his brother Bardes, called by Herodotus Smerdis, to death, and some time afterwards committed suicide. Then a Magian Gomates or Gaumata started up, pretending to be Bardes, who he alleged had not really been slain. According to Herodotus (iii. 67-79), with whose narrative the less detailed record on the stone essentially agrees, evidence of the fraud was discovered and a conspiracy formed against Gomates by seven men of rank, one of whom was Darius Hystaspis. In 521 B. C. they slew the Magian and saluted Darius king. Elam rose against the new monarch, but was temporarily subdued. Babylon followed under a leader called Nidmabel and stood a siege of two years (520-519 B. C.). When it became known that Darius was detained at Babylon, in conducting the siege, a general revolt of the provinces constituting the empire took place, in fact, the empire fell to pieces. Darius says: "While I was in Babylon these provinces rebelled against me: Persia, Susiana, Media, Assyria, Armenia, Parthia, Margiana, Sattagydia, and the Sacians." But he and his lieutenants subdued them all, generally ending by impaling the rebel leader. Babylon, in 514 B. C., revolted anew under Arahui or Aracus, an Armenian, but the rebellion was put down, its leader and his chief adherents being impaled. The walls of the city were this time thrown down, and a great step taken to that utter destruction which the prophets foresaw. Darius now ruled over an empire extending eastward into India and westward to the Grecian Archipelago. He administered it, on the whole, wisely and well. After an unsuccessful campaign against the Scythians near the river Don, in what is now Russia, and a quarrel with the Greeks, in which his generals Datis and Artaphernes were defeated in 490 B. C. at Marathon, Darius died at the age of 73 (Otesias) in 486 B. C., after a reign of 36 years.

3. The last king of Persia, who reigned from 336 to 330 B. C. His true name was Codomannus. He was defeated by Alexander the Great (1 Mac. i. 1; Antiq. xi. 8, 3), first at Issus in 333, when he fled into Persia, and again at Arbela in 331. He died about four months later at the hands of his servants, with Alexander in hot pursuit of him.

Dar'kon [scattering]

Founder of a family, part of the children of Solomon's servants (Ezra ii. 56; Neh vii. 58).

Date.

The fruit of the date palm or Phoenix dactylifera (2 Chron xxxi 5, A V, margin), from which honey was made (War iv. 8, 3). The text and the R V, like the Hebrew original, use the general name honey, without specifying the kind.

Da'than.

A son of Eliab, a Reubenite, who with Abiram, his brother, and On, a man of the same tribe, were prominent leaders in the rebellion of Korah the Levite. Their grievance was different from his. They thought that the leadership of Israel should have gone to the tribe to which they belonged, for Reuben was Jacob's eldest son. Then, again, they complained that Moses had taken them from a country where there was plenty, under the promise of leading them into a land flowing with milk and honey, while in fact all that he had done was to march them up and down amid naked rocks and barren sands (Num xvi 1-35, cp 13, 14; xxvi. 7-11, Deut xi. 6; Ps. cvi 17).

Dath'e-ma.

A fortress in Gilead, into which the faithful Israelites fled for safety in the time of Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac v 9). They were relieved by Judas and his brother Jonathan. It cannot be identified with certainty.

Daugh'ter.

Besides corresponding to the several senses in which son is used, especially for child or remoter female descendant or as an expression of tender sympathy for a woman (Gen xxx 21; Ex ii 1, Luke xiii 16; Mat ix 22), daughter denotes a female inhabitant of a country or town (Gen xxiv. 3; Judg. xxi 21), a female worshiper of a god (Mal ii. 11; Is xliii 6), the suburb of a city (Num xxi 25, margin), the collective body of the citizens of a town or country (Ps ix 14, cxxxvii 8; Lam. iv 21; Zech. i 10). See HEIR, MARRIAGE, SLAVE.

Da'vid [beloved].

Son of Jesse and second king of Israel. His life falls into several distinct periods.

I. His youth, which was passed at Bethlehem of Judah. He was the youngest of eight brothers (1 Sam xvi 10, 11; xvii 12-14). In the registry of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron ii 13-15) only seven of these sons of Jesse are named, probably because one died without issue. David's mother was tenderly remembered for her godliness (Ps lxxxvi. 16; cxvi. 16). His ancestral history was picturesque, inspiring, and generally praiseworthy, but yet at times tainted by sin (Gen. xxxvii. 26, 27; xxxviii. 13-29; xliii. 8, 9; xlv. 18-34; Num.

i. 7; Josh ii 1-21; Ruth iv. 17-22). In person he was ruddy and beautiful to look upon (1 Sam xvi 12). As youngest son, he was charged with the care of his father's sheep, and he displayed his fidelity and courage in this occupation by slaying both a lion and a bear which attacked the flock (11, xvii 34-36). He possessed musical gifts of high order, at this period playing skillfully on the harp and later composing psalms. When king Saul had been rejected by God, the prophet Samuel was sent to Bethlehem and directed to anoint David as Saul's successor. There was no public proclamation of David, lest the hostility of Saul should be aroused. At most, the act was performed in the presence of the elders of the town, and, so far as appears, no word concerning the purpose of the anointing was spoken to the audience (xvi 4, 5, 13), though Jesse and David were doubtless informed. It was a crisis in David's history. The Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him. Still he did not despise his humble, daily work.

II. His service under Saul. Saul, forsaken by God, distressed by an evil spirit, and subject to melancholy and insanity, was advised by his attendants to attach a harper to his person to soothe him by music when disturbed, and one recommended David as a cunning musician, a man of valor and ready for war by reason of age, skill, and courage, even though perhaps not as yet experienced in battle, discreet, comely, pious (xvi 14-18). Saul summoned him, was benefited by his music and pleased with his character, asked Jesse that he might remain, and appointed him one of his armorbearers (19-23, cp. 2 Sam xviii. 15). The service thus begun proved a school for David. He learned war and government, had intercourse with able men, and saw the dark and bright side of court life. David did not, however, as yet remain continuously with Saul. The king's condition evidently improved, and David returned frequently to Bethlehem to have an oversight over his father's sheep (1 Sam xvii 15). While he was on a visit home the Philistines invaded Judah and encamped about 15 miles west of Bethlehem. Saul led forth the army of Israel to meet them. The three eldest brothers of David were with the army, and after they had been absent from home about six weeks, their father sent David to inquire about their welfare. Goliath's challenge stirred his spirit. He felt certain that God through him would remove the reproach from Israel, and he asked who the Philistine was that defied the armies of the living God. His words were reported to Saul, who perceiving the spirit by which the young man was animated intrusted the single combat to him. David put off the armor with which Saul had armed him, urging that he had not proved it. He showed true genius. Goliath was rendered slow of motion by weight of armor; the kind of weapon he carried obliged him to fight at close quarters, and he was vulnerable only in the face, which under the circumstances was out of reach. David approached him, unhampered in movement by any armor, with a sling, in the use of which he was proficient, with five stones that could be hurled from a distance, with the consciousness of the righteousness of his cause and with implicit confidence in God. The taunts between the two champions are characteristic of ancient battle. Goliath fell, struck by a stone from David's sling. After the combat David, on his way to Gibeah of Benjamin where Saul held court or to the tabernacle at Nob, displayed the head of the giant at Jerusalem, apparently in defiance to the Jebusites, who held the stronghold, and put the armor in the tent which he thenceforth occupied (xvii. 54). The sword was deposited in the tabernacle (xxi. 9). When David had gone forth to meet Abner Saul, amazed at his spirit, asked Abner whose son such a youth could be; and when David returned triumphant the king put the same question to him, only to receive the simple answer, "I am the son of thy servant Jesse the Bethlehemite." This reply formed the sum and substance of the interview (xvii. 55-xviii. 1), David's ancestors were not notable for heroic achievement. The question of the king had also reference to the rank and maternal condition of the family, for Saul had promised to accept the victor as son-in-law and to free his father's family from taxation (xvii. 25; xviii. 18). He found that he had no occasion to be ashamed of the birth of his son-in-law. The victory over Goliath was a second crisis in David's life. The valor, modesty, and piety, which he displayed won for him the disinterested and enduring love of Jonathan (xviii. 1). He was no longer permitted to repair periodically to his father's house, but he remained continuously at court (2). The ovation which he received aroused the jealousy of Saul, who thenceforth was David's enemy (6-9). Saul saw that Samuel's prediction of the transfer of the kingdom from him to one better than he (xv. 17-29) approached fulfillment in David, and he attempted to prevent it. He endeavored to slay David with his spear (xviii. 10, 11). Failing in this, he reduced David in military rank and power (13). He gave his daughter, whom he had promised to David for a wife, to another (17-19). He endeavored to entrap him to death through his love for Michal (20-27). As David grew in favor (29, 30) Saul's fear increased, and he no longer concealed his purpose to slay David (xix. 1). This purpose was never after allowed by Saul's adherents to be abandoned, but was fostered by a party at court (xxiv. 9; Ps. vii. title). Appeased for a time, his jealousy soon revived, and he again attempted to smite David with his spear (1 Sam. xix. 4-9). Then he would have arrested David, who, however, escaped through Michal's deceit (10-17). David wrote Ps. lix.

at this time. He fled to Samuel at Ramah, whither Saul sent to seize him (18-24); fled next to Jonathan, who inquired and informed him that there was no longer safety for him at court (xx).

III The fugitive hero. Without confidence in God and sunk in despair David fled from Saul. Stopping at Nob, without faith, he told a lie (xxi. 1-9); then hurried to Gath and sought protection of Saul's enemy Achish. The lords of the Philistines, however, refused to harbor him who had formerly humiliated them, and they seized David (14, Ps. lvi. title). He feigned madness and made himself despicable, and Achish drove him away (Ps. xxxiv. title). He regained his faith in Jehovah (Ps. xxxiv.), returned to Judah, and abode in the cave of Adullam (1 Sam. xxii. 1), but placed his parents in Moab (3, 4). A motley company, mostly of unemployed and desperate men, numbering 400 at first, increasing eventually to 600, began to join him. Among these were Abiathar, the surviving priest of Nob, who brought an ephod with him, and the prophet Gad, whom David had probably met at Ramah (5, 20; xxiii. 6). David thus had religious aid and companionship. From Adullam he went to the relief of Keilah and delivered the town out of the hands of the Philistines (xxii. 1-5). On Saul's preparing to attack him there, he fled to the wilderness of Judah (14, Ps. lxi.), whither Saul, at the instigation of the Ziphites, pursued him until compelled to desist by an incursion of the Philistines (1 Sam. xxiii. 14-29). That trouble being settled, Saul sought David in the wilderness near Engedi, but was for the time conquered by the kindness of David, who had the king in his power in the cave, but spared his life (xxiv.; Ps. lvi.; cxlii.). David and his band of armed followers protected the exposed property of the Israelites from thieving marauders (1 Sam. xxiii. 1; xxv. 16, 21; xxvii. 8), and naturally enough expected some return in gifts of food. He did not levy tax or demand regular contributions of provisions. Nabal's scornful rejection of his request incensed him, and he was only saved from shedding blood in his fury by the wisdom and address of Nabal's wife (xxv.), whom David married after the death of her husband. David again came into the neighborhood of Ziph, and the Ziphites again informed Saul, who marched against David. David showed his magnanimity by not slaying the sleeping king, but merely carrying away from his side his spear and cruse of water (xxvi.). Despairing of always escaping Saul, David left Judah and obtained permission from Achish to occupy Ziklag, a frontier town toward the southern desert. Here he remained a year and four months, protecting the Philistines by warring with the desert tribes, yet sometimes wasting a remote village even of Philistia (xxvii.). When the Philistines went to Gilboa to war with Saul, David was prevented from accompanying them by the lords of the Philistines (xxviii. 1, 2; xxix.). Returning, he found Ziklag in ruins. He pursued the retreating invaders and recovered the spoil (xxx.). When he heard the result of the battle of Gilboa, he mourned the fate of Saul and Jonathan in an elegy (2 Sam. i.).

IV. King of Judah. On the death of Saul the tribe of Judah, to which David belonged, elected him king, and he began to reign in Hebron (ii. 1-10), being then about thirty years old (v. 4). The rest of the tribes, under the leadership of Abner, one of the ablest men of the time, set up Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, at Mahanaim, and for the next two years civil war raged between his partisans and those of David. It ended by the assassination, sorely against David's will, both of Abner and of Ish-bosheth (ii. 12-iv. 12). David's reign at Hebron continued for seven years and six months. He had already several wives, and among the sons born to him at Hebron were Amnon, Absalom, and Adonijah (ii. 11; iii. 1-5; v. 5).

V. King of all Israel. On the death of Ish-bosheth, David was elected king over all the tribes, and he at once set to work to establish the kingdom (v. 1-5). Various towns in the territory of Israel were garrisoned by the Philistines, and others were held by the Canaanites. David began a siege of the Jebusite stronghold at Jerusalem. It was deemed impregnable by its inhabitants, but David took it by storm. He wisely made it his capital, and erected a palace there by the skill of Tyrian artificers. The new capital stood on the border of Judah and Israel. Its situation tended to allay the jealousy between north and south. Its deliverance from the hands of the Canaanites opened the highway between Judah and the north, facilitated intercourse, and tended to further cement the kingdom. The Philistines twice invaded the land, and twice suffered defeat near Jerusalem (v. 17-25; 1 Chron. xiv. 8-17). The king followed up the second victory by invading the country of the Philistines, took Gath, and by this conquest and by brief campaigns later (2 Sam. xxi. 15-22) so completely subjugated the Philistines that these hereditary enemies ceased to trouble Israel for centuries. The kingdom being established, David turned his attention to religious affairs. He brought the ark, with ceremony, sacrifices, and rejoicing, from Kirjath-jearim (Josh. xv. 9; 2 Chron. i. 4), and placed it within a tabernacle which he had pitched for it in the city of David (2 Sam. vi. 1-23; 1 Chron. xiii. 1-14; xv. 1-3). Next he organized the worship on a magnificent scale (1 Chron. xv.; xvi.), and planned a splendid temple (2 Sam. vii. 1-29; 1 Chron. xvii. 1-27; xxii. 7-10). Through the divine favor he now became very prosperous. To insure the safety of the nation, to keep it from idolatrous contamination, and to avenge insult offered to it, he waged war with surrounding nations, and subdued the Moabites, the Aramæans of Zobah and Damascus, the Ammonites, the Edomites, and the Amalekites (2 Sam. viii. 1-18; x. 1-19; xii. 26-31), thus extending his kingdom to the limits long before promised to Abraham (Gen. xv. 18). It was during the Ammonite war that David committed his great sin in the matter of Uriah the Hittite, for which God rebuked him through Nathan the prophet, and imposed the penalty that the sword should never depart from his house (2 Sam. xi. 1-xii. 23). David sincerely repented (Ps. li.). The chastisement was partly direct and partly the natural fruit of his example and transmitted character. The child died (2 Sam. xii. 19). Lawless lust and lawless vengeance were manifested in his own family (xiii.). Lawless and unfilial ambition triumphed for a time in his family and led to civil war (xiv.-xix.). The spirit of dissatisfaction and tribal jealousy fomented by Absalom showed itself after the suppression of Absalom's rebellion once more in the revolt of Sheba (xx.). David solemnly satisfied justice, according to the ideas of that age, in avenging Saul's bloody violation of the treaty rights of the Gibeonites (xxi.). He committed a sin of pride in numbering the people, and was punished by a pestilence (xxiv.; 1 Chron. xxi.). David was much occupied during his reign with the organization of internal affairs and with the preparation of material for the erection of the temple. He closed his reign by securing the succession to Solomon (1 Kin. i.), and by providing that the guilt of some who had escaped justice in his day should not go unpunished (ii. 1-11). He died in his seventy-first year, after having reigned forty (or, more precisely, forty and a half) years, seven and a half at Hebron and thirty-three at Jerusalem (2 Sam. ii. 11; v. 4, 5; 1 Chron. xxix. 27).

David early received the distinguished designation of the sweet singer of Israel (2 Sam. xxiii. 1). Ancient Hebrew tradition, much of which was unquestionably current about David's own time and shortly after, ascribed the composition of psalms to him both directly and indirectly. His fondness for music is recorded in the historical books; he played skillfully on the harp (1 Sam. xvi. 18-23; 2 Sam. vi. 5), and he arranged the service of praise for the sanctuary (1 Chron. vi. 31; xvi. 7, 41, 42; xxv. 1). He composed a lament over Saul and Jonathan, and over Abner, and a song of deliverance and last words (2 Sam. i. 17-27; iii. 33, 34; xxii. 1-51; xxiii. 1-7). His musical activity is referred to by Amos (vi. 5), Ezra (iii. 10), Nehemiah (xii. 24, 36, 45, 46), and the son of Sirach (Ecclus. xlvii. 8, 9). Such work on the part of David accorded with the times, for poetry and music had long been cultivated by the Hebrews as well as by the Egyptians and Babylonians (Num. xxi. 14; Judg. v.). Seventy-three psalms are designated David's in their Hebrew titles; and as in many cases the intention is to indicate that he is the author (cp. iii., vii., xxxiv., li, etc.), it is possibly always the intention. Lix. and perhaps vii. are assigned to the time of his sojourn at Saul's court; xxxiv., li., liv., lvi., lvii., lxii. and cxli. to the period of distress when he was a fugitive; and iii., xviii., xxx., li. and lx., to the years of varied experiences when he was king.

Though at times David committed deep-dyed sins, for which the early and comparatively dark period of the church's history in which he lived and his own deep penitence are his only defense, yet his general fidelity to Jehovah was such that he was called the man after God's own heart (1 Sam. xiii 14). Speaking generally, he did that which was right in the eyes of the Lord, save in the matter of Uriah the Hittite (1 Kin. xv 5). He served his generation by the will of God, and then fell on sleep (Acts xiii 36). His influence on mankind can scarcely be overestimated. He, rather than his predecessor Saul, was the founder of the Jewish monarchy. His psalms, sung throughout Christendom century after century, revive his spiritual influence. He was an important link in the chain of ancestry of Him who was at once David's son and David's Lord (Mat xxii 41-45).

Da'vid, Cit'y of.

1. The Jebusite stronghold of Zion captured by David's men, and called by him the city of David, because he made it his royal residence (2 Sam v. 6-9, 1 Chron. xi 5, 7). It probably stood on the ridge, south of the later site of the temple. With the growth of population its bounds were extended. The ark was taken thither by David, and stayed there until the temple was built (2 Sam vi 12, 16, 1 Kin viii 1, 1 Chron. xv 1-29, 2 Chron v 2). David was buried there (1 Kin ii 10). Solomon's queen, Pharaoh's daughter, dwelt there for a time (1 Kin iii 1), though he afterwards erected a palace for himself and her (vii 1; ix 24, 2 Chron. viii 11). He was buried in the city of David (1 Kin. xi. 43; 2 Chron ix. 31), as were Rehoboam (1 Kin xiv. 31; 2 Chron. xii. 16) and many other kings (1 Kin. xv. 8, 24; xxii. 50; 2 Kin viii 24; ix 28; xii 21; xiv. 20; xv 7, 38; xvi. 20; 2 Chron. xiv. 1; xvi 14; xxi. 1, 20; xxiv. 16, 25; xxvii 9). Jehoiada, the high priest, was also interred there (2 Chron xxiv. 16). Hezekiah brought the upper watercourse of Gihon to the west side of the city of David (2 Chron xxxii 30; cp. xxxiii. 14). Millo was apparently within its limits (2 Chron. xxxii. 5). In Nehemiah's time there was a descent from the city of David by means of stairs (Neh. iii. 15, 16; xii. 37). It was fortified and garrisoned by the Syrians and Greeks during the Maccabean wars (1 Mac. i. 33; ii. 31; vii. 32; xiv. 36, 37). See JERUSALEM.

2. Bethlehlem, the birthplace or at least the home of David (Luke ii. 4).

Day.

1. An interval of time comprising the period between two successive risings of the sun (Gen. vii 24; Job iii. 6). The Hebrews reckoned it from evening to evening (Lev. xxiii. 32; Ex. xii. 18; War iv 9, 12). This custom was probably due to the use of lunar months, which began with the appearance of the new moon. The exact designation of the civil day accordingly was evening-morning or night-day (Dan viii 14, margin; 2 Cor xi 25). But although the evening properly introduced a new day, it was often reckoned in connection with the natural day which, strictly speaking, it followed—e g the evening which began the fifteenth of Nisan is designated by the expression "the fourteenth day at even" (Ex xii. 18; cp. 2 Chron xxxv 1; see also Lev xxiii. 32). The days of the week were numbered, not named. The only exception was the seventh day, which was also called Sabbath.

2. The interval between dawn and darkness (Gen. i 5; viii 22). It was divided into morning, noon, and evening (Ps lv 17; cp. Dan. vi 10); or its time was indicated by reference to sunrise, heat of the day, cool of the day, sunset, and the like. After the exile the use of hours became common, and the day from sunrise to sunset was divided into twelve hours (Mat xx 1-12, John xi 9); the sixth hour being noon (John iv 6, Acts x 9), the ninth the hour of prayer (iii 1; Antiq xiv 4, 3).

3. Any period of action or state of being (Zech. xii 3 seq.); as day of trouble (Ps xx. 1), day of his wrath (Job xx 28), day of the Lord (Is ii. 12; xiii. 6, 9, in the N T specially of the second advent of Christ, 1 Cor. v. 5; 1 Thes v 2; 2 Pet iii. 10). So also in the phrase "in the day that," which is equivalent to "when" (Gen ii 4, 17, Lev. xiv 2-20), and is often rendered so in the English versions (Lev xiv 57, Num. vi. 13; 1 Sam. xx. 19; Ps xx 9).

Days'man.

One who has set a day for hearing a cause; a mediator or an arbitrator (Job ix 33).

Day'star. See LUCIFER

Dea'con [Greek diakonos; in classical writers a servant, a waiting man, a messenger. It is used in this sense in Mat xx. 26, where it is translated minister, and is distinguished from doulos, bond-servant or slave, occurring in the next verse; cp. also Mat. xxiii 11; Mark ix. 35; x. 43; John ii 5, 9].

A Christian officer, whose spiritual and moral qualifications are laid down in 1 Tim. iii. 8. It is justly assumed that the seven men chosen to relieve the apostles of the secular care of the widows and other poor people in the early church were deacons (Acts vi 1-6; cp. the words ministrations, diakonia, and serve, diakoneō, in vs. 1 and 2). Their charge of the needy did not debar them from the privilege of speaking publicly for Christ, for Stephen and Philip labored also as preachers and evangelists. They did so, however, in the exercise of a personal gift rather than of an official duty. A plurality of deacons existed in the church at Philippi, and shared with the bishops the duties of the church (Phil. i. 1).

Dea'con-ess.

A female deacon; like Phœbe, servant or diakonos of the church at Cenchreæ (Rom xvi 1; see margin of R V). Deaconesses are probably referred to in 1 Tim iii 11. They existed in the churches of Bithynia as early as A D 100, for Pliny, in his celebrated letter to the emperor Trajan regarding the Christians, reports having examined "two old women" of the Christian community "who were called ministers" (ministrae).

Dead Sea.

The name now given to the sheet of water called in the Bible the salt sea (Gen. xiv 3; Num xxxiv 12, Deut iii 17; Josh iii 16), the sea of the Arabah or Plain (Deut iii. 17; Josh iii 16), and the east or eastern sea (Ezek. xlvii 18, Joel ii. 20, and R V of Zech xiv 8). Josephus calls it Asphaltitis (Antiq i 9, 1). It was named the Dead Sea by the Greeks as early as the latter half of the second century of the Christian era (Pausanias). It is situated in the deep volcanic rent or fissure which runs through Palestine from north to south, and is fed chiefly by the river Jordan, which empties into it on an average six million tons of water every twenty-four hours. Its surface was ascertained by the officers of the ordnance survey to be 1292 feet lower than the ocean level. The sea is like a long rectangle with the angles beveled off; but its regularity of form is interrupted by a projection into its southeastern side of a great promontory or peninsula called Lisan, or the Tongue. The length of the sea from north to south is on an average about 47 English miles, but it varies, a large portion of the southern shore being sometimes dry and sometimes covered with water. The breadth a little north of En-gedi is $9\frac{1}{2}$ miles, and it is nearly as much everywhere north of the Lisan. Ancient watermarks indicate that the area, especially the length, was formerly much larger (War iv. 8, 4). The Lisan is about 9 miles long from north to south. Its banks are from 40 to 60 feet high; while, according to Tristram, its highest point is about 300 feet above the water. Lieut Lynch, who in 1848 led an expedition for the exploration of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, found the maximum depth of the latter, as ascertained by sounding, to be 1278 feet; this was at a point near the mouth of the Arnon. Soundings farther north yield 1300 feet. South of the Lisan, on the contrary, the sea is quite shallow. Except on the north side, where the Jordan enters, the Dead Sea is nearly surrounded by a rampart of cliffs, which in some places leave a narrow beach between them and the water, while in others they themselves constitute the coast line. These rise in successive terraces, which also exist along the lower part of the Jordan valley. On the western side, at En-gedi, the height from the seashore to the top of the cliffs is 1950 feet; a little farther north, at Râs esh Shufk, the top is 2519 feet above the Dead Sea, i e 1227 above the Mediterranean. Farther northward the elevation gradually decreases till it reaches 1400 feet above the Dead Sea. These western cliffs contain deposits of bitumen in both liquid and solid state. On the eastern side the precipitous mountains of Moab rise from 2500 to 3000 feet above the shore.

The Dead Sea is one of the most remarkable sheets of water on the face of the earth. No other one is known to occupy so deep a hollow on the surface of the globe. Its waters are much saltier than those of the ocean, for while in the latter 100 lbs of water contain 6 lbs of salt, in the former 100 lbs of water contain from 20 to 27.8 lbs of salt. In consequence of this, eggs will float on its surface. A bather, too, finds himself buoyant, and when he comes ashore there is a greasy deposit of salt upon his skin, which tortures him if there happens to be a scratch on his body. The saltiness of the water is due to the nature of the soil, which abounds in the chlorides of sodium, magnesium, and calcium. These substances are carried into the sea by the river and the brooks; and there being no outlet, the salt remains and accumulates year by year, while the water with which it comes goes off to a large extent in vapor, evaporation being immense, since the air comes dry and thirsty from the desert.

The Scripture name, Salt Sea, has been superseded by the name Dead Sea. The old belief, however, that there is a total absence of life in and around the sea is erroneous. Organic life scarcely exists in its waters; neither shellfish nor corals are found. But vegetation flourishes on its shores at the mouth of wadies and by springs of fresh water, and birds frequent its strand or fly over its surface. According to Lartet, fish are found in small numbers south of the Lisan. As a symbol of life in the new kingdom of God, Ezekiel pictures the healing of the waters of the Dead Sea, and the multiplication of fish till the species rival in number those of the Mediterranean (Ezek. xlvii. 6-12).

Dearth. See FAMINE.

De'bir.

1 A king of Eglon, ally of Adoni-zedek; defeated, captured, and executed by Joshua (Josh x 3, 27).

2 A city in the hill country of Judah, yet in the Negeb or south land. It was also called Kirjath-sepher, which may mean city of books and indicate a literary people; and Kirjath-sannah, city of a palm tree or perhaps peak (Josh. xv. 15, 19, 48, 49). In the time of Joshua it was inhabited by Anakim, had a king, and was head of other towns. Joshua captured it and slew its inhabitants (Josh. x. 38, 39; xi. 21; xii. 13); but it was reoccupied by returned fugitives, and had to be recaptured by Othniel (Josh. xv. 15-17; Judg. i. 11, 12). It was assigned to the priests (Josh. xxi. 13, 15; 1 Chron. vi. 57, 58). The most probable site proposed (better perhaps than Dilbeh, 4½ miles southwest of Hebron) is Dhâheriyeh, nearly 12 miles southwest of Hebron, on a flat ridge, with open, rocky ground all around. It is west of the sites of Socoh, Anab, and Eshtemoah (Josh. xv. 48-50). It is supplied from cisterns. The springs mentioned in Judg. i. 15 are not distinctly connected with Debir and may be nearer Hebron.

3. A town on the boundary of the tribe of Judah, near the valley of Achor (Josh. xv. 7). The name is perhaps preserved in ed-Debr, a grotto near ed-Dumm, i.e. Adummim, on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho.

4. A place east of the Jordan, near Mahanaim (Josh. xiii. 26). The margin of R. V. has Ludebir. Perhaps Lodebar (q. v.).

Deb'o-rah [a bee]

1. Rebekah's nurse, who accompanied her from Mesopotamia and lived until Jacob's return from Paddan-aram. She had perhaps returned to her kindred in Haran after the death of Rebekah and accompanied Jacob back to Canaan, or she had gone to him when he was sojourning at Shechem. At any rate she was with him at Bethel. There she died at the age of about 155 years, for she could not have been much younger than Isaac. She was buried at the foot of the hill on which the town stood and under an oak, called in consequence Allon-bacuth, oak of weeping (Gen. xxiv. 59; xxxv. 8).

2. A prophetess, the wife of Lappidoth. She dwelt under a palm tree, called after her name, between Ramah and Bethel, in mount Ephraim, and there judged the Israelites. She summoned Barak to undertake the contest with Sisera, and accompanied him to the rendezvous of his army (Judg. iv. 4-14). Afterwards she composed a song of triumph for the victory (v. 1-31; cp. 7).

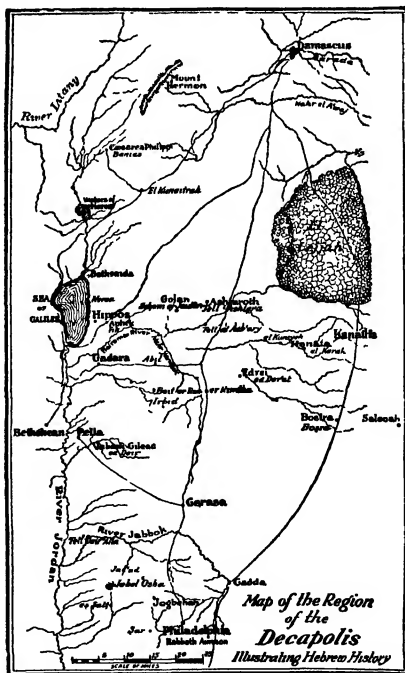

Debt'or.

One who owes another money. To foster the spirit of brotherhood and mutual helpfulness, the Mosaic law ordained that the creditor release his brother Israelite from all obligations at the year of release, which recurred every seven years (Deut. xv. 1-4). In the intervening years custom permitted the seizure and enslavement of a debtor, his wife, and his children (2 Kin. iv. 1; Neh. v. 5, 8; Is. l. 1; Mat. xviii. 25). In the time of Jesus, in accordance with Roman law, imprisonment was sometimes inflicted on a debtor (Mat. v. 25; xviii. 30; Luke xii. 58).

De-cap'o-lis [an association of ten cities].

A district, beginning where the plain of Esdraelon opens into the Jordan valley and expanding eastward, which was dominated by ten associated Greek cities. The Greek population had come in the wake of Alexander's conquest. The ten cities originally included in the association were Scythopolis, i.e. Bethshean, Hippos, Damascus; Gadara, Raphana, Kanatha; Pella, Dion, Gerasa, and Philadelphia, i.e. Rabbath Ammon (Pliny, His. nat. v. 16). Other towns were afterwards added. Ptolemy enumerates eighteen. Three roads connect Esdraelon with the commercial highway which runs between Damascus and Arabia along the margin of the desert. The ten towns stood on these three roads and on the highway. The district is called Decapoli-ta regio by Pliny (v. 15). Multitudes from Decapolis followed Jesus at an early period of his ministry (Mat. iv. 25). The Gadarene demoniac, when the evil spirit was expelled, published his deliverance in Decap-olis (Mark v. 20). Jesus traveled through its midst on his way from Tyre and Sidon to the sea of Galilee, approaching the lake from the eastern side (vii. 31).

De'dan.

A Cushite people (Gen. x. 7), but also related to Abraham through Keturah (xxv. 3). They were an important commercial people (Ezek. xxvii. 15, 20; xxxviii. 13) of Arabia (Is. xxi. 13), in the neighborhood of Edom (Jer xxv. 23; xlix. 8; Ezek. xxv. 13), where caravan routes from southern, eastern, and central Arabia converged. The name probably lingers in Daidan, to the west of Taima and southeast of Aila. Formerly two distinct tribes of Dedanites were assumed: one Semitic, living near Edom, the other Cushitic, dwelling near Raamah (Gen. x. 7), which was thought to have been situated on the coast of the Persian Gulf. Raamah, however, is better located in southwestern Arabia; and then Dedan was one people, centered near Taima, and neighbor alike to the Edomites and the inhabitants of Raamah.

Ded-i-ca'tion, Feast of.

An annual festival instituted by Judas Maccabeus in 165 B. C. to celebrate the purification and renewal of the temple, exactly three years after it had been desecrated by the introduction of Greek idolatry and other pollutions by order of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac iv 52-59; cp 1 54, 59). The festival, called also lights (Antiq. xii 7, 7), and celebrated much after the manner of the festival of tabernacles (2 Mac x 6, 7), lasted eight days, beginning on the 25th of Chislew (approximately December), and falling consequently in winter. Jesus was present at least once at Jerusalem during the festival, and delivered a discourse to the assembled multitude (John x 22). The Jews still keep the festival.

Deer.

The English name of the genus Cervus, or of the family Cervidae. The word occurs only in A. V. in the name fallow deer, but the hart is frequently mentioned. Tristram enumerates two species of the genus Cervus as still occurring in Palestine, the roebuck (Cervus capreolus) and the fallow deer (Cervus dama); whilst the teeth and bones of three others, the red deer (Cervus elaphus), the reindeer (Cervus tarandus), and the elk (Cervus alces), are found in bone breccia in caves in the Lebanon mountains.

De-grees'.

A word occurring in the titles of fifteen Psalms, cxx-xxxiv. inclusive, which are called Songs of Degrees. It is the rendering of the Hebrew Ma'alah, ascents or goings up (Ezra vii. 9), steps (Ex. xx. 26, 1 Kin. x. 19). A Jewish tradition tells that the fifteen Songs of Degrees were sung as an ascent was made by fifteen steps from the court of the women to that of the men, a view not now generally entertained. Gesenius and Delitzsch held that they were so called because there is in their composition a certain progression, the concluding words of one sentence being often the commencement of the next, as—

I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills
From whence cometh my help;
My help cometh from the Lord,
Who made heaven and earth.

But the repetition is the exception rather than the rule in these psalms. The common opinion is that they were sung by the pilgrims during the ascent to Jerusalem. Such a custom is, however, nowhere mentioned.

De-ha'ites, in A. V. De-ha'vites.

One of the tribes brought over to Samaria from the Assyrian empire to replace the ten tribes carried captive (Ezra iv. 9). Rawlinson believes that they were Dai or Dahi, a nomad tribe of Aryan descent mentioned by Herodotus (i 125).

De'ker, in A. V. Dekar [perforation].

The father of Solomon's purveyor, Bendeke (1 Kin iv 9, R. V.)

De-la'iah, in A. V. once Dalaiah (1 Chron. iii. 24) [Jehovah hath drawn out, i. e. delivered].

1 A descendant of Aaron. His family, grown to a father's house by the time of David, was made the twenty-third course of the priests (1 Chron xxiv 18).

2 A prince, son of Shemaiah, and one of those who urged king Jehoiakim not to burn the roll containing the prophecies of Jeremiah (Jer xxxvi 12, 25). Perhaps it is he or his grandson who is incidentally mentioned later (Neh vi. 10).

3 One of the Nethinim, and founder of a family (Ezra ii 60, Neh vii 62).

4 A son of Elhoenai (1 Chron iii. 24).

De-li'lah [delicate, wasted with longing or desire].

The Philistine woman from the valley of Sorek who lured Samson to his ruin (Judg. xvi 4-18).

De'los, in A. V. Delus.

A small island in the Ægean, celebrated as the birthplace of Apollo and Diana. The Roman consul Lucius wrote to Delos concerning a pact of friendship established between the Romans and the Jews (1 Mac. xv 23). It was at that time the center of an extensive commerce.

Del'uge. See FLOOD.

De'mas.

A fellow laborer of Paul, who sent salutations from Rome to the Colossians and to Philemon (Col. iv. 14, Philemon 24). Afterwards he deserted the apostle from unwillingness to suffer, and went to Thessalonica (2 Tim. iv. 10).

De-me'tri-us [belonging to Demeter, or Ceres, the goddess of agriculture and rural life].

1. Demetrius I., surnamed Soter, king of Syria 162-150 B. C., nephew of Antiochus Epiphanes. He had been kept as a hostage at Rome; but on hearing of his uncle's death he made his escape, and arriving safely in Antioch made himself master of the kingdom, and put to death Lysias and the young Eupator (1 Mac. vii. 1-4). In war with him Judas Maccabæus lost his life (ix 1-19). In 152 B. C. Alexander Balas, with the consent of the Roman senate, claimed the throne. The rivals met in a decisive battle in 150 B. C., and Demetrius was defeated and slain (x. 48-50; Antiq. xii. 2, 4).

2. Demetrius II., surnamed Nicator, son of Demetrius I. In 148-7 B. C. he raised the standard of revolt against Alexander Balas, and with the aid of Ptolemy VI. defeated him. Alexander fled into Arabia, where he was murdered, and Demetrius became king of Syria (1 Mac. xi. 15-19). But Alexander's general Tryphon almost immediately proclaimed Alexander's young son Antiochus king (39, 40). The struggle lasted until 138 B. C., when Demetrius, during a plundering expedition in Persia, was taken prisoner by king Arsaces and kept in bonds for ten years. Before his departure on this expedition he gave the Jews their independence. Although they fell under the power of the Syrians again, this event was of national importance, and they dated their independence from it (1 Mac. xiii. 36-42; Antiq. xiii. 4, 9). Demetrius regained liberty and the throne in 128 B. C. An Egyptian pretender, supported by Ptolemy VII., took the field against him. Demetrius was defeated near Damascus, fled to Ptolemais, and took ship to Tyre, where he was murdered when about to land (Antiq. xiii. 9, 3).

3. A silversmith at Ephesus, who made for sale silver models of the celebrated temple of Diana. Believing his craft to be in danger from Christianity, he excited his fellow workmen against Paul, and stirred up the riot in which the mob cried for two hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians" (Acts xix. 24-41).

4. An approved Christian, commended by John also (3 John 12).

De'mon [among the Greeks, (1) a god or deity in general; (2) one's genius; (3) one's fortune; (4) the soul of some man belonging to the golden age, now acting as a tutelary divinity; a god of inferior rank].

An evil spirit (Luke viii. 29; x. 17-20). The designation is applied especially to the gods of the heathen (Deut. xxxii. 17; Ps. cvi. 37; and margin of 1 Cor. x. 20, and cp. Rev. ix. 20; all R. V.), and to inferior evil spirits, subject to the devil (Mat. xii. 24-27; Luke iv. 33; Jas. ii. 19; Rev. xvi. 14; all margin of R. V.); see DEMONTAC.

The Jews held various notions on the subject; such as, the demons were the spirits of the wicked dead (War vii. 6, 3), and could be exorcised by means of roots and the name of Solomon (Antiq. vii. 2, 5), or driven away by fumes from the roasting heart and liver of a fish (Tob. vi. 17, 18).

De-mo'ni-ac [possessed by a demon].

A person possessed and ruled by a demon

(Mat. iv. 24, R. V. margin). The inhabitation of such a being in some cases affected the person physically, and produced certain ordinary diseases. Thus one possessed boy is described as having a deaf and dumb spirit and as being affected at intervals with morbid symptoms resembling those of epilepsy (Mark ix. 14-29; cp. Mat. xvii. 15, 18; Luke ix. 37-42). Hence the opinion of many is that possession was simply a Jewish hypothesis to account for bodily and mental diseases and for the visible effects on body and will of enslavement to sin. But this view takes no note of the fact that the demons speak (Mark i. 23, 24, iii. 11, 12; v. 7); that they possessed at times knowledge beyond that of men; as, for example, of the divinity of Christ (Mark i. 24); that they recognized their own distinct individuality independent of Jesus and independent of the person possessed (Mat. viii. 31); that the distant herd of swine became frenzied when the demons were cast out of the demoniac of Gadara and allowed to enter into them (Mat. viii. 30); that Jesus apparently recognized them as actually existing beings, and instructed his disciples, saying, "This kind can come out by nothing, save by prayer" (Mark ix. 29, R. V.); and that later, when the disciples reported that even the demons were subject unto them in his name, Jesus replied: "I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven . . . Notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rather rejoice, that your names are written in heaven" (Luke x. 17-20). Man was himself responsible for his hideous visitor. Probably not until a person was degraded and weakened by sin, personal or inherited, might he be taken captive by a demon (1 Sam. xvi. 14; with xii. 8-14, xv. 10-31).

Dep'u-ty.

One empowered to act for another, generally of higher rank than himself; as a regent ruling in place of a king (1 Kin. xxii. 47); an official invested with the powers and rank of a Roman consul (Acts xiii. 7; xviii. 12; xix. 38, A. V.); see PROCONSUL.

Der'be.

A city in the southeastern part of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor. Paul was stoned and left for dead at Lystra, on his first missionary journey. On reviving, he went to Derbe (Acts xiv. 6, 20). On his second journey he again passed through it, and either there or at Lystra made the acquaintance of Timothy (xvi. 1). Garaus was a native of Derbe (xx. 4). The ruins of a town on lake Ak Gûl near Divle have been supposed to mark the site of Derbe; but Prof. Ramsey believes with Prof. Sterrett that the site is Zosta, 47 miles south-southeast of Iconium, on the road which ran from Cilicia Tracheia through Laranda to Iconium.

Des'ert.

1. A rendering of the Hebrew Midbar and the Greek Eremos, an unenclosed, uncultivated plain, where wild beasts roam at will (Job xxiv. 5); often terrible in its solitude and desolateness (Deut. xxxii. 10; and A. V. of Is xxi. 1), yet also capable of affording pasturage (Ex. iii. 1, A. V.). The words are usually rendered wilderness (Gen. xvi. 7; xxi. 20; 1 Sam. xvii. 28; xxv. 21; Mat. iii. 1; Mark i. 13; Luke xv. 4).

2. A rendering of the Hebrew ‘arabah, arid region (Is xxxv. 1, 6; li. 3). With the definite article the word specially denotes the plain of the Jordan and Dead Sea (Ezek. xlviii. 8; 2 Sam. ii. 29), and is rendered in the R. V. as a proper name, Arabah.

3. A rendering of the Hebrew Y’shimon, a waste, a desolation (Ps lxxviii. 40; cvi. 14; Is. xliii. 19, 20). When the definite article is prefixed it is rendered as a proper name, Jeshimon (Num. xxi. 20, A. V. and margin of R. V.).

4. A rendering of the Hebrew Haraboth, waste, desolate places (Is xlviii. 21). In Ps. cii. 6; Ezek. xiii. 4 the R. V. translates it waste places.

De-u’el [Invocation of God].

A Gadite, the father of Eliasaph (Num. i. 14, vii. 42; x. 20). Called in 11 14 Reuel, which means “friend of God.” It is uncertain which of these two forms is correct. The Samaritan text has Deuel everywhere, whereas the Septuagint and the Syriac translators read Reuel; see DALETH.

Deu-ter-on-o-my [repetition of the law].

The name, derived from the Septuagint, of the fifth book of the Pentateuch. The Greek word, of which Deuteronomy is the English form, is used in the Septuagint to translate the expression “copy of this law” in chapter xvii. 18. But this book is not merely the repetition or copy of laws already given. It is a rehearsal under peculiar circumstances and for a special purpose. In Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, the legislation is represented as in process of enactment, the occasion or the time when the successive installments were received is commonly stated, and each body of statutes is severally declared to proceed from God. In Deuteronomy, on the other hand, the law is represented, not as being enacted, but as being rehearsed and expounded. Thirty and eight years have elapsed since the greater part of the old legislation was given. The new generation, on the eve of taking possession of Canaan, is summoned to hear the law of the nation, to be instructed in the application of its principles to the new circumstances which await them, to have their apprehension of its spirituality quickened, and then to renew intelligently the covenant made with their fathers. Instead of the Lord speaking unto Moses, it is now Moses at the command of God speaking to the people (i. 1-4; v. 1; xxix. 1). The book consists first and mainly of an address delivered in three installments, committed to writing, and solemnly ratified as a covenant (i. -xxx.). First Address, i. 6-iv. 40; with supplementary statement, 41-49: Rehearsal of the history of the people since the covenant was made with the preceding generation at Sinai as a motive for obedience to Jehovah’s laws. The speaker is declared to be Moses (i. 1, 3, 5, 9, 15, 16, 19, etc.): the date is the 40th year, 11th month, 1st day; after the smiting of Sihon and Og, and after the sin in the matter of Peor (i. 3, 4; iv. 3): the place is beyond Jordan in the land of Moab (i. 5, cp. Num. xxxiii. 48; xxxv. 1), in the wilderness, in the Arabah (i. 1, cp. Num. xxiii. 28, xxiv. 1). The phrase “beyond Jordan” or “other side of Jordan” was ambiguous and required precise definition. To Abraham and the Canaanites it meant the country east of the river, and as an established geographical term it meant the same to Abraham’s descendants. They had arrived there; but they still called the place where they were by the old inherited designation “the other side of Jordan,” just as they called the neighboring bluffs Abarim or “mountains of the other side.” And the people felt, too, that they were on the other side of Jordan, outside of the promised land. But with the river in front of them the phrase was ambiguous, hence its repeated elucidation by some expression like “in the land of Moab.” Second Address, v. -xxvi. Rehearsal of statutes which concerned the people, with emphasis on the spirituality of the laws and urgent insistence upon their observance. These statutes are generally either substantive laws, that is, rights and duties (the procedure not being rehearsed), or else laws which natural depravity might lead men to ignore and where the appeal must be to religious motives such as, asylum for the unintentional murderer, banishment of idolatry, and consideration for the weaker members and dependent classes of the community. The speaker is Moses (v. 1, 5, 22); the date is at the end of the forty years, on the eve of crossing the Jordan, after Balaam’s prophecy (viii. 2; ix. 1, xi. 31; xxiii. 4). Third Address, xxvii. -xxviii. Conclusion of the preceding, (1) Provision for writing the law on plastered stones on mount Ebal, (2) Blessings and curses annexed to obedience and disobedience respectively. This great address is closely followed by a brief address (xxix. -xxx.) at the ratification of the covenant as thus proclaimed (xxix. 1; xxx. 1). This covenant, like the words of the former one made at Horeb, was recorded in a book (xxix. 20, 21, 27, xxx. 10; cp. Ex. xxiv. 4-8). The place and date are alluded to in Deut. xxix. 1, 5, 7, 8.

After delivering the address which forms the body of the book of Deuteronomy, Moses publicly appointed Joshua to be his successor and gave a formal charge to him (xxxi. 1-8). Moses delivered the written law to the priests with a charge regarding its public reading (9-13) He repaired with Joshua to the tabernacle that Joshua might be charged by Jehovah, and was there instructed to prepare a song for the people (14-23). He prepared and wrote the song (22), charged the Levites who bore the ark to put the completed book, which contained law and song, beside the ark for a witness (24-29), ordered an assembly called to hear and learn the song (28), and repeated it publicly (30-xxxii. 47). Moses' farewell (48-xxxiii. 29) and death (xxxiv.).

The distinctive feature of Deuteronomy is the evident preparation for the settlement in Canaan. 1. It affects the language. For example, the people are about to live a settled life; hence the camp which figures so largely, though of course not exclusively, in the former legislation disappears from Deuteronomy, except where reference is made to future war or to the encampment at Shittim where they then are. The speaker mentions houses, towns, city gates. 2. It leads to minor modifications of existing laws to adapt them to the new mode of life. For example, the law which required animals that were slain for food to be brought to the door of the tabernacle is changed to permit the people to slay for food in the town where they reside xii. 15, 21; Lev. xvii. 3, 4; and for the same reason the firstling of animals need no longer be offered to God on the eighth day, but the sacrifice may be postponed until the owner comes up from his distant home to the sanctuary at the annual feasts (Deut. xv. 20 with Ex. xxii. 30); and in the case of the Hebrew bondman who wishes to remain attached to the household of his master, rather than claim his legal freedom, the ceremony at the door-post suffices, and there is no longer insistence upon appearance before God (Deut. xv. 17 with Ex. xxi. 6). 3. It leads to the attempt to safeguard the interests of the dependent classes, the Levites, widows, orphans, strangers, and to protect them from the evils which evidently threatened to befall them in the future, in view of the spirit of self-seeking and indifference to others that had been manifested by the people time and again during the sojourn in the wilderness. 4. It leads to insistence upon one altar for the nation in the place where Jehovah shall record his name. The unity of the altar was intended to counteract the tendency to lapse into idolatry, by preventing the people from worshipping at the numerous local sanctuaries of the Canaanites; to render the worship of Jehovah a grander spectacle and of greater pomp than the rites of the idols of the Canaanites by uniting the numbers and the wealth of the Hebrews; and to give strength to the communal feeling and aid in binding the nation together. The spirit of jealousy between individuals and between tribes, the popular proneness to idolatry, and the willingness of large sections of the people to separate from their brethren and settle in attractive pastoral regions had already become manifest. The old law of the one altar is emphatically insisted upon at this crisis. It was essential to the unity of the nation and continuance of the theocracy. See ALTAR.

It has been urged that no distinction is made in Deuteronomy between priests and Levites such as appears in the legislation of Leviticus and Numbers. The priests are frequently called "the priests the Levites," and the passage xviii. 1-8, if it be isolated, may be interpreted to mean that any Levite might become a priest. But—1. The tribe of Levi is indeed assigned priestly functions (x. 6; xviii. 1-8; xxxiii. 8, 9). But that is correct, for the tribe as a whole was called to holy service, especially to priestly service. Even when the distinction between the priests and the lower order of the Levites was firmly established, the tribe as a whole is spoken of as priestly (1 Kin. xii. 31, Mal. ii. 1-4; in 3; cp. Heb. vii. 13). 2. The title "the priests the Levites" occurs in writings which were composed after the legislation of Leviticus was, as everybody admits, in full force. It is used by Ezekiel (xliii. 19; xlv. 15) and by the Chronicler (2 Chron. xxiii. 18; xxx. 27). It should also be remembered that Jeremiah uses the expression (xxxiii. 18, 21). 3. Deuteronomy is based on previous priestly legislation, for it presupposes the technical laws of the ritual. The speaker explicitly refers to former laws on the subject of which he is speaking, and these laws are known only from the books of Leviticus and Numbers (Deut. xviii. 1, 2 with Num. xviii. 20; Deut. xxiv. 8, 9 with Lev. xiii. 1, xiv.; Num. xii.), or he makes allusions which imply these laws (Deut. xii. 15 with Lev. xvii. 3 seq.). 4. The passage Deut. xviii. 1-8 may be readily interpreted on the assumption that the laws of Leviticus were in force. Levi was to have no inheritance with Israel, but was to enjoy certain perquisites (Lev. vi. 17, 18; Num. xviii. 20, 21, 24, 26). The speaker presses this law with earnestness. The priests the Levites, the whole tribe of Levi have no inheritance; they shall eat the offerings (ver. 1). The dues of the priests, without the epithet "the Levites," are next spoken of. It is an urgent matter. The people must not defraud the priests of their income (3, 4 with Ex. xxix. 27, 28; Lev. vii. 34; Num. xviii. 11, 12, where slight changes are introduced). Finally, the rights of the Levites at the sanctuary are dwelt upon. If a Levite—not necessarily a Levite of lower rank—come from any part of the country to the sanctuary, he shall minister in the name of the Lord as all his brethren the Levites do, which stand before the Lord, and he shall fare as they do (6-8). The kind of service which he shall perform is not the matter at issue. The language covers both priestly service and the labors rendered by the lower order of the Levites (5, xvii. 12; and 1 Sam. ii. 11, 18; iii. 1; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 6; xxix. 4, 5, 11).

The point insisted upon is that all Levites shall receive full recognition at the sanctuary and be accorded their prerogatives. It goes without saying that if the Levite be a priest, he shall serve and fare like his brethren the priests; if he be not a priest, he shall enjoy the privileges that belong to his brethren who are Levites but not priests. Those in power shall not deprive him of his prerogatives because he is obscure and from a distant part of the country. See PRIEST

Dev'il [Greek diabolos, a slanderer].

1. An evil spirit (Mark i. 34; Luke iv. 33; viii. 29). A. V. and, in its text, R. V. do not observe the distinction made in the Greek original between a demon and the devil. Demons take possession of wicked men and are subject to the devil (Mat. iv. 24; xii. 24); see DEMONIAIC

2. The evil one, Satan, the greatest of all the fallen spirits (Rev. xii. 9; Mat. iv. 8-11; xiii. 38, 39; xxv. 41; cp. Jude 6). The general opinion is that the sin into which he fell was pride (1 Tim. iii. 6). He is the great enemy of God and man (1 Pet. v. 8; 1 John iii. 8), who tempted Christ and incites men to sin (Mat. iv. 1; John xii. 2; Eph. iv. 27). He is "that old serpent" who tempted Eve (Wisdom ii. 23, 24; 2 Cor. xi. 3; Rev. xii. 9; xx. 2). Perhaps with reference to this transaction he is called a murderer from the beginning, and a liar, and the father of lies (John viii. 44; cp. 1 John iii. 8). When the good seed of truth is sown the devil either steals it away (Luke viii. 12) or sows tares (Mat. xiii. 38). He is continually going about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour (1 Pet. v. 8). He lays snares or practices wiles to injure the children of God (Eph. vi. 11; 2 Tim. ii. 26), and seduces them by his subtlety (2 Cor. xi. 3); but the tempted one is not to yield to him, but to resist him, and he will flee (Eph. iv. 27; James iv. 7). He had power to produce demoniacal possession (Acts x. 38), and he instigated the imprisonment of martyrs (Rev. ii. 10). He is finally to be cast into a lake of everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels (Mat. xxv. 41; cp. Jude 6). Preeminently sinful, unrighteous men, also those imbued with the spirit of lying and murder, are figuratively called children of the devil (John viii. 44; 1 John iii. 8, 10). Judas was even called by Jesus a devil (John vi. 70). His works Christ came to destroy (1 John iii. 8). Jude alludes to a dispute of the devil with Michael for the body of Moses (9, cp. Rev. xii. 7). Whence the apostle drew this illustration is unknown. He has been thought to quote an authoritative teaching of the Jewish church, or a familiar interpretation of Zech. iii., according to which the high priest represents Mosaism, or else to cite a moral tale current among the Jews.

Dew.

Moisture condensed from the atmosphere upon cold bodies. Used in Scripture figuratively for whatever comes noiselessly and even invisibly, but proves a refreshment and a blessing, as dew does to vegetation (Deut. xxxii. 2; Ps. cx. 3; Prov. xix. 12; Mic. v. 7).

Di'a-dem [a band or fillet, as being bound round].

1. The rendering of the Hebrew words Sanaph, Sanoph, and Sanuph, something bound round. It was a head dress for man and woman (Job xxix. 14, margin of R. V. turban; Is. iii. 23, in A. V. hoods, R. V. turbans). A royal diadem of this type was worn by kings (Is. lxii. 3), and is once mentioned as worn by the high priest (Zech. iii. 5), where it is translated miter, but on the margin of R. V. turban or diadem.

2. A rendering of the Hebrew word Misnepheth, a name applied specially to the miter of the Jewish high priest (Ezek. xxi. 26 in A. V.), and regularly translated so.

3. The rendering of the Hebrew word Sephiah, circlet, crown (Is. xxviii. 5)

Di'al.

An instrument consisting of a surface which is graduated into hour lines, and furnished with a projecting gnomon to cast a shadow as the sun advances in his daily course, and thus point out the hours. The dial of Ahaz (2 Kin. xx. 11, Is. xxxviii. 8) may have been such an instrument, with either flat or concave dial and with graduated lines called steps or degrees, which Ahaz had introduced from Babylonia, where the sun dial was in use before the time of Herodotus (Herod. ii. 109), and at least as early as the eighth century B. C. Less likely it was a flight of steps at the palace of Ahaz, so designed and arranged that the shadow of an obelisk near by passed over the steps and thus indicated the time of day. The recession of the shadow on the dial of Ahaz has been variously explained as caused by a miraculous reversion of the earth's motion, or by a backward movement of the sun, or by refraction of the sun's rays, or by a solar eclipse. Unquestionably the recorded effect could have been produced by either of the two latter as well as by the former causes.

Ancient Dial

Di'a-mond.

A mineral of unequaled hardness and luster, transparent or translucent, and capable of taking a splendid polish. It is simply carbon, crystallized by the chemistry of nature, which that of art has not yet been able to imitate. Diamonds have long been known to exist in India and the island of Borneo.

Diamond is the rendering of—

1. The Hebrew Yah'lo'm, a precious stone (Ezek. xxviii. 13), one of those in the breast-plate of the high priest (Ex. xxviii. 18, in R. V. margin sardonyx; xxxix. 11).

2. The Hebrew Shamir, a hard stone used to point graving instruments (Jer. xvi. 1), elsewhere rendered adamant (Ezek. iii. 9; Zech. vii. 12).

Di-a'na.

The Roman goddess of the moon, and of field and woods, and of all forms of life and activity which were supposed to be influenced by the moon. She corresponded to the Greek Artemis, who was twin sister of Apollo, favorite child of Zeus, and huntress of the sky. She was the ideal of chastity and virginity, and is generally represented as a tall and beautiful maiden, with a quiver on her shoulder and a bow or a javelin in her right hand, and as engaged in hunting deer. The Asiatic Artemis, Diana of Ephesus, was a union of the Greek Artemis with the lusty Semitic moon-goddess, Ashtoreth. Her image was supposed to have fallen from heaven (Acts xix. 35), and it may have been originally a meteoric stone. Ancient authorities, however, state that it was of wood, though they differ as to the kind. Its form is known from ancient coins as the rude figure of a woman with crowned head, many breasts, and extended arms supported by props. Her primitive shrine near the sea, at the mouth of the Cayster, became eventually an imposing temple (see EPHEBUS). Demetrius the silversmith and his fellow-craftsmen made silver models of it (Acts xix. 24).

Coin showing Temple of Diana.

Dib'lah, in A. V. Diblah [a rounded mass, cake].

A place in Palestine in the vicinity of a wilderness (Ezek. vi. 14; cp. Num. xxxiii. 46; Jer. xlviii. 22). Grave objections lie against the proposed emendation of the text to Riblah.

Dib'la-im [twin balls or cakes].

A parent in law to Hosea, if the transaction was real and not typical (Hos. i. 3).

Dib'lath. See DRBLAH.

Di'bon [a wasting away, a consumption].

1. A town north of the Arnon, wrested from Moab by the Amorites, taken by the Israelites (Num. xxi. 30; xxxii. 3), rebuilt by the Gadites (xxxii. 34), and hence called Dibon-gad (xxxiii. 45, 46), afterwards given over to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 9, 17). It reverted to the Moabites (Moabite Stone 21, 28; Is. xv. 2; Jer. xlviii. 18, 22). It still exists, as a heap of ruins, retaining its old name Dhibān, 3 miles north of the Arnon, slightly eastward from the Roman road. Tristram describes it as a twin city covering the tops and slopes of two adjacent knolls, and surrounded by a wall. There are caverns, cisterns, vaulted underground store-houses, rude semi-circular arches, and cyclopean buildings of basalt like those of Bashan. It was among the ruins of Dibon that Mr. Klein, in 1868, found the Moabite Stone (q. v.).

2. A village in the territory of Judah (Neh. xi. 25). Probably the same as Dimonah (q. v.).

Di'bon-gad. See DIBON.

Dib'ri.

A Danite, ancestor of him who was stoned to death in the days of Moses for blaspheming the Name (Lev. xxiv. 11-14).

Did'y-mus [a twin]. See THOMAS.

Dik'lah [a palm tree].

A people descended from Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chron. i. 21), and who doubtless dwelt in Arabia and, as the name suggests, in a region abounding in palm trees.

Dil'e-an, in E. R. V. Dilan [cucumber field].

A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 38). Exact site unknown.

Dill. See ANISE.

Dim'nah. See RIMMON.

Di'mon [probably a variant of Dibon].

A place in Moab (Is. xv. 9), apparently Dibon, by a common permutation of the labials. Jerome states that in his day both names were common for the town. The form with m is chosen by the prophet for its assonance with dam, blood, used in the same verse. The waters of Dibon are best regarded as the Arnon, as the waters of Megiddo are the Kishon (Judg. v. 19).

Di-mo'nah.

A town in the southern part of Judah, near Edom (Josh. xv. 22), probably the same as Dibon (Neh. xi. 25).

Di'nah [judgment or, perhaps, judged].

A daughter of Jacob by his wife Leah (Gen. xxx. 21). Going out apparently unprotected to see the Canaanite daughters of the land, she was either led astray or outraged by Shechem, the son of Hamor the Hivite. The young prince afterwards wished to take her in honorable marriage, and her brothers apparently consented, on condition that the Hivites should be circumcised. These acquiesced in the stipulation, and carried it out; but an attack on their town was suddenly made by Simeon and Levi, two of Dinah's full brothers, who slew all the males in the place, Hamor and Shechem among the rest (xxxiv. 1-29). Jacob took no part in the treacherous and cruel deed, regarded it as inexpedient (30), and denounced it with horror on his deathbed (xlix 5-7). By this act of his sons, however, the conquered district fell to him as head of the tribe, and he bequeathed it, not to those who were answerable for the abhorred deed, but to Joseph (xlvi. 22).

Di'na-ites.

One of the foreign tribes brought over to Samaria to replace the ten tribes carried into captivity (Ezra iv. 9). Probably the Armenian people who were known to the Assyrians as Dayani.

Din'ha-bah.

The city of Bela, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 32, 1 Chron i 43). Several towns of this name are known, but none in Edom. Jerome identified it with Dannaia, a town existing in his day in Moab, a little south of the Arnon Dinner. See MEALS.

Di-o-ny'si-us [belonging to Dionusos or Bacchus, the god of wine]

A member of the Athenian supreme court of Areopagus, who was converted through the preaching of Paul on Mars Hill, where the court held its sittings (Acts xvii. 34).

Di-ot're-phes [nurtured by Zeus]

A member of the church of which Gaius, to whom John sent his third epistle, was a member. He loved to have the preeminence in the church to which he belonged, refused to receive the apostle John or the brethren who went forth for the sake of the Name, and excommunicated those who entertained them (3 John 9, 10)

Di'phath. See RIPHATH.

Dis-cl'ple.

A pupil or scholar (Mat. x. 24); especially the follower of a public teacher, like John the Baptist (ix 14). A person taught of God (Is viii. 16). It is used of all of whatever age who in faith received the divine Master's instructions (Mat. x. 42; Luke xiv 26, 27, 33. John iv 1; vi. 66), and especially of the twelve apostles (Mat. v. 1; viii. 25, x. 1; xii 1, etc.).

Dis-eas'es.

Disease arises from the violation of physical or mental laws. The observance of these laws is often a moral act, and their transgression is sin (Prov. ii 17-22; xxiii 29-32); so that disease is in certain cases the punishment imposed by the Creator for sin. God, moreover, sometimes smites a sinner with disease where no natural cause can be traced (Ex ix 8 seq; Num xi. 33; xii 9-11; Deut xxviii 21, 22, 35, 60; 2 Sam xxi. 1; xxiv. 15; 2 Kin v. 27). From the connection between sin and various diseases, the latter are sometimes attributed to Satan, who seduced the race to its fall into sin and who is still the great tempter to sin (Luke xiii. 16); but the inference is not legitimate that every sick person is a sinner or that Satan is the immediate cause of our maladies (Job iii-xlii.; John ix. 1-3). The chief forms of human disease are mentioned, such as fever (Deut xxviii 22, Mat viii. 14; John iv. 52; Antiq xiii. 15, 5), cutaneous disease (Lev xii 6-8, 30, 39), dysentery (2 Chron. xxi 15, 18; Acts xxviii 8, R. V.), ophthalmia (Rev iii. 18, Tobit ii 10; vi. 8; xi. 13), boils (Ex. ix 9; 1 Sam v. 6), paralysis (1 Mac ix 55, Mat viii 6; ix. 2, Acts ix. 33).

Di'shan [probably pygarg]

A Horite tribe (Gen. xxxvi. 21, 28) under a chief (30)

Di'shon [pygarg, antelope].

A Horite tribe (Gen xxxvi 21, 26; 1 Chron i 38), organized under a chief (Gen. xxxvi 30) and descended through Anah from Zibeon (24, 25). Many interpreters, however, discover two persons of this name: one in vs 20, 26, 30, the other in 25.

Dis-per'sion.

The body of Israelites scattered abroad in other lands than their own, the diaspora (Jer. xxv 34, A V and margin of R. V.; John vii 35, Jas i 1). Dispersion was threatened as a penalty if the people departed from the Mosaic law (Lev xxvi 33-37. Deut. iv 27, 28, xxviii. 64-68). The captivity of the ten tribes and that of the two largely helped to fulfill these prophecies; for the mass of the ten tribes were never restored to their own land, and of the two a very large number chose to remain in the region to which they had been taken rather than return to their own country. A very considerable immigration of Jews took place into the cities and towns of Alexander the Great's empire, and into the kingdoms of Egypt, Syria, etc, into which it was afterwards divided; and later when the Roman empire established its sway over these and other regions, colonies of Jews sought a settlement in all the important places. Agrippa, in a letter to Caligula preserved by Philo, says "Jerusalem is the capital not alone of Judæa but, by means of colonies, of most other lands also. These colonies have been sent out at fitting opportunities into the neighboring countries of Egypt, Phœnicia, Syria, Cœle-syria, and the farther removed Pamphylia, Cilicia, the greater part of Asia as far as Bithynia and the most remote corners of Pontus. In the same manner also into Europe: Thessaly, Bœotia, Macedon, Ætolia, Attica, Argos, Corinth, and the most and finest parts of the Peloponnesus. And not only is the mainland full of Israelitish communities, but also the most important islands: Eubœa, Cyprus, Crete And I say nothing of the countries beyond the Euphrates, for all of them, with unimportant exceptions, Babylon and the satrapies that include the fertile districts lying around it, have Jewish inhabitants." Thus the Dispersion, with synagogue and doctrine, was found in all parts of the known world (Acts ii. 5-11; 1 Pet. i. 1; War ii. 16, 4; vii. 2, 3).

Div-i-na'tion.

The attempt to read the future and utter soothsaying either by a kind of inspiration or divine afflatus (Acts xvi. 16), or else by means of signs. In the latter sense, it includes augury or foretelling the future by means of natural signs, such as the flight of birds, the disposition of the entrails (Ezek. xxi. 21); hydromancy or foretelling from the appearance of water poured into a vessel or of objects dropped into the water (Gen. xlv. 5), sorcery, in its original sense of foretelling by casting lots (Ezek. xxi. 21); and also astrology or the determination of the supposed influence of the stars on the destiny of a person (cp. Is. xlvii. 13). The Hebrews also included in divination necromancy or foretelling the future by calling up the spirits of the dead and conversing with them (1 Sam. xxviii. 8). The diviner sometimes pronounced blessing or cursing (Num. xxii. 6); not, however, as the magical spells of a sorcerer, but as prophecy revealed by the divine afflatus or familiar spirit or the sign (12, 13).

Roman Divination

Di-vin'er.

A soothsayer; a practitioner of divination. They were numerous among heathen nations (Deut. xviii. 9-12; 1 Sam. vi. 2; Is. xix. 3, Ezek. xxi. 21, Dan. ii. 2; Acts xvi. 16), and also at various times among the Israelites, who were informed of the diviner's imposture, warned against placing reliance in him, and threatened with punishment for the sin of consulting him (Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6, 27; Deut. xviii. 10; 1 Sam. xxviii. 8; Is. ii. 6; iii. 2, R. V.; Jer. xxviii. 9; xxix. 8; Ezek. xiii. 23; xxii. 28; Mic. iii. 6, 7, 11; Zech. x. 2).

He practiced his art for hire (Num. xxii. 7, 17, 18; Acts xvi. 16).

Di-vo'ce', Di-vo'ce'ment.

Annulment of the bonds of matrimony. Under the law of Moses a man could divorce his wife if he found some unseemly thing in her. She might then be married to another man. If her second husband also divorced her, the first one was not allowed to take her again. The process of divorce, when once resolved upon, was easy. All the husband had to do was to give his partner a bill of divorcement, and send her away (Deut. xxiv. 1-4; cp. Is. i. 1; Jer. iii. 8). Our Lord explained that this enactment was framed only on account of the Israelites' hardness of heart. He added that the original and just law, that of nature, is that a man cleave to his wife and they twain become one flesh, marriage being a permanent compact, and that a wife should not be divorced except for fornication, including what is now technically called adultery. If a man puts away his wife on other grounds and marries another, he commits adultery. If anyone marries a divorced woman, he also has committed the same sin (Mat. v. 31, 32; xix. 3-9; Mark x. 2-12; Luke xvi. 18, cp. 1 Cor. vii. 10-17). Protestants almost universally teach that willful, final desertion annuls the marriage bond (cp. 1 Cor. vii. 15) and a second marriage may be contracted by the deserted one.

Di'-za-hab, in A. V. Diz'a-hab [abounding in gold].

A place cited to indicate the locality and circumstances connected with the delivery of the farewell addresses of Moses (Deut. i. 1). Dhabab on the western shore of the gulf of Akaba, 75 miles south of Ezion-geber, has similarity of name in its favor, but that is all. It lies remote from the route of the Israelites. Perhaps Di-zahab was a district in Edom identical with Me-zahab (Gen. xxxvi. 39; cp. Septuagint of Num. xxi. 14, which has Zahab instead of Vahab of R. V.).

Do'dai. See Dodo 2.

Dod'a-nim

A tribe related to Javan (Gen. x. 4). Against identifying them with the Dardanians or Trojans is the difference in the name, while the situation of Dodona, a place in Epirus, in Greece, the seat of a celebrated oracle, is against locating them there. The Septuagint and the Samaritan version in Gen. x. 4, and the common Hebrew text itself in 1 Chron. i. 7, have Rodanim (q. v.).

Dod-a-va'hu, in A. V. Dod'a-vah [perhaps love of Jehovah].

A man from Mareshah, father of that Eliezer who prophesied the destruction of Jehoshaphat's ships (2 Chron. xx. 37).

Do'do

[loving].
1. A man of Issachar, ancestor of the judge Tola (Judg. x. 1).

2 An Ahohite, and the father of Eleazar, one of David's three mighty men of the first rank (2 Sam xxiii. 9, in R. V., following the present Hebrew text, Dodai; 1 Chron xi. 12). David appointed Dodai (or probably his son) as military commander over the course of the second month (1 Chron xxvii. 4).

3 A man of Bethlehem, father of Elhanan, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 24; 1 Chron. xi. 26).

Doe.

A female deer or antelope. In Prov. v. 19, R. V. it is the female ibex or wild goat of Sinai (Capra bedou), in Hebrew Ya'alah; see WILD GOAT.

Do'eg [tמיד]

An Edomite, the chief of Saul's herdmen. He was at Nob at the tabernacle, detained before the Lord on account of a vow or uncleanness or signs of leprosy (Lev xiv. 4, 11, 21), or was perhaps in sanctuary for some crime (cp 1 Kin i. 50), when David, a fugitive from Saul's court, arrived at Nob and obtained food and a sword from Ahimelech, who did not know that he was fleeing from the king (1 Sam xxi. 7, Ps. lvi. title). Doeg subsequently told Saul what had occurred, which so excited the king that he summoned Ahimelech and fellow priests and demanded an explanation. Not considering it satisfactory, he ordered the guard to kill the priests. They would not. The king then bade Doeg do the deed. He did so, slaying eighty-five men. He subsequently fell upon the village, massacred the women and children, and destroyed even the cattle (1 Sam. xxii. 7-23).

Dog.

The dog of Palestine is the same variety as the pariah or ownerless dog of India. During the earlier period of Bible history it is described as prowling about the streets and suburbs of cities (Ps lxx. 6, 14), feeding on what was thrown out to it (Ex xxii. 31), licking up blood when it was shed (1 Kin. xxii. 38; Ps lxxviii. 23), or devouring dead bodies (1 Kin. xiv. 11; xvi. 4; 2 Kin. ix. 35, 36); nay, even sometimes congregating in packs, to surround and attack human beings (Ps xxii. 16, 20). It was early trained sufficiently to aid the shepherd in protecting the flock against beasts of prey and thieves (Job xxx. 1). It was at length sometimes domesticated, accompanied its master from place to place (Tobit v. 16; xi. 4), and was in the house with him and picked up the crumbs from under his table (Mark vii. 28). Moreover, they licked the sores of beggars at the rich man's gate (Luke xvi. 21). The dog was also widely used by the ancients for hunting. But the great mass of dogs ran wild. On account of their food and habits, they were deemed unclean; and to call one a dog was a gross insult (1 Sam. xvii. 43; 2 Kin. viii. 13). The term dog is applied in a figurative sense to those who are incapable of appreciating what is high or holy (Mat.

vii. 6), who introduce false doctrines with cynical effrontery (Phil. iii. 2), who, like a dog returning to its vomit, go back to sins which nominally they had renounced forever (2 Pet. ii. 22; cp Prov. xxvi. 11), or who are so vile as to submit to lust like dogs (Deut. xxiii. 18). The later Jews were accustomed to call the heathen dogs because ceremonially unclean, and even Jesus once employed the term in order to express his doctrine of grace the more vividly (Mat. xv. 26; Mark vii. 27).

Dok, in A. V. Do'eus [watchtower].

A little stronghold near Jericho, built by Ptolemy (1 Mac xxi. 15), son-in-law of Simon Maccabæus (11, 12). Into this castle he received Simon and two of his sons, and then treacherously slew them (16). The murder was avenged by John Hyrcanus, a third son of Simon. He besieged Dok, and after a time Ptolemy fled beyond Jordan (Antiq. xiii. 7, 4, 8, 1). The name seems to remain in 'Ain Duk, a copious spring about four miles northwest of Jericho. A road leads by it from the Jordan valley into the hill country. Above the spring are traces of ancient fortifications.

Doph'kah.

A station of the Israelites on the route to Sinai between the Red Sea and Rephidim (Num. xxxiii. 12, 13). Seetzen locates it at a place called Tobbacha, but the identification has not been generally accepted.

Dor [habitation].

A town in the west of Palestine (Josh xi. 2), on the seacoast (1 Mac xv. 11), 9 Roman miles north of Cæsarea (Onomast). It was in Asher; but it belonged to the tribe of Manasseh (Josh xvii. 11; cp. xix. 26. 1 Chron vii. 29), which, however, failed to expel the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. i. 27). It was the chief town of one of Solomon's tax districts (1 Kin. iv. 11). In Maccabæe times it was called Dora. In 217 B. C. it was unsuccessfully besieged by Antiochus III. (the Great), and about 138 by Antiochus VII. (1 Mac. xv. 11-14). Subsequently it was taken by a certain Zolus, on whose death it fell into the hands of Alexander Jannæus. In 64 B. C. Pompey granted it autonomy. In 56 B. C. it was rebuilt by Gabinius (Antiq. xvi. 5, 3). Early in the Christian era it fell into decay. Remains of it exist near Khurbet Tantûra, on the coast, between 7 and 8 miles north of Cæsarea. The old town stood on a low ridge. The ruins consist of a mound with a tower, the foundations of which antedate crusading times, a harbor with the entrance cut through the rock, various buildings, rock-hewn tombs, a tank, and a causeway.

Dor'cas [gazelle, the Greek rendering of the Aramaic ḏibtha, gazelle].

A woman whose Aramaic name was Tabitha, resident at Joppa. She made garments, which she gave to the poor. When she died Peter was sent for. After prayer, he bade her arise, and her life returned. The fame thereof spread, and many believed on the Lord (Acts ix. 36-43). Dorcas societies are named from her.

Do'than [possibly wells].

A town not far from Shechem and Samaria, hard by a caravan route (Gen xxxvii 14, 17, 25; 2 Kin. vi. 13), near the plain of Esdraelon and a pass into the hill country of Judah (Judith iii. 10; iv. 6, 7). Joseph was cast into a pit in the vicinity, whence he was taken out and sold to the Midianites (Gen. xxxvii 17-28). Elisha was once besieged in the town by the Syrians; but the soldiers of the beleaguering army were miraculously struck with blindness, led to Samaria, had their vision restored, and were finally sent home without molestation (2 Kin vi. 8-23). Its site is the ruin Tell Dôthân, near a well 9½ miles north, slightly east, of Samaria.

Dove.

A bird (Ps lv 6) having fine eyes (Song i. 15; v 12), a plaintive voice (Is xxxviii 14), a gentle, affectionate disposition (Song ii. 14; v 2; vi. 9), but not much sagacity (Hos. vii. 11). It is timid, and when frightened trembles (Hos vii 11). When wild it sometimes frequents valleys (Ezek. vii. 16), making its nest in the side of holes or fissures (Jer. xlviii. 28). When domesticated it flies when alarmed to windows or cotes (Is. lx 8; cp Gen. viii. 8-12). Jesus refers to it as proverbially harmless (Mat. x. 16). It was bought and sold within the temple courts (Mat. xxi 12; Mark xi 15, John ii. 14), for it was used in sacrifice (Luke ii. 24). The dove is a symbol of the Holy Spirit (Luke iii. 22).

Dove is but another name for pigeon, though in popular usage it is usually restricted to the smaller species. It is frequently translated pigeon in the English versions (Gen xv. 9, Lev i 14; v 7, 11; xii. 6, 8; xiv. 22, 30; xv 14, 29; Num. vi. 10).

The doves constitute a family of birds (Columbidae), of which Tristram enumerates four species as occurring in Palestine: the ringdove or wood pigeon (Columba palumbus), the stockdove (Columbaenas), the rock dove (Columba livia), and the ash-rumped rock dove (Columba schimperi). The ringdove visits Palestine in immense flocks in spring and autumn during its annual migrations; individuals also remain all the winter. The stockdove is found chiefly east of the Jordan, or in the valley of that river. The rock dove is abundant on the coast and in the highlands west of the Jordan. The ash-rumped rock dove is exceedingly abundant in the interior of the country and in the Jordan valley, taking refuge in caves and fissures. It is the species described in Jer. xlviii. 28.

Dove's Dung.

A substance which rose to famine prices during the siege of Samaria by Benhadad (2 Kin. vi. 25). Dung was also eaten during the siege of Jerusalem (War v. 13, 7). Possibly, however, dove's dung was the name of some herb, as the Arabs call a species of soap plant sparrow's dung.

Dow'ry.

Among the Israelites and neighboring nations a bridegroom or his father paid a dowry to the bride's father to induce him to give her in marriage (Gen xxix. 15-20; xxxiv. 12; Ex. xxii. 17; 1 Sam xviii 25). The lowest legal amount seems to have been fifty shekels (Deut xxii 29; Ex xxii 15, 16). Occasionally the bride's father gave his daughter a wedding present (Josh. xv. 19; 1 Kin. ix. 16).

Drag'on [from Greek drakōn, a serpent, a dragon].

In the Old Testament the word dragon is often used to translate Tannin, a long animal. The word tannin denotes a land serpent (Ex. vii 9; cp. iv 3, 4; Ps xci 13; and doubtless Deut xxxii. 33), great sea animals (plural, Gen. i. 21, in A. V. whales, in R. V. sea monsters; Ps. lxxiv. 13; cxlviii. 7), and the crocodile of the rivers of Egypt (Ezek. xxix. 3). The last is described as having jaws, and scales to which fish could stick (4), and feet with which it disturbed the waters (xxxii 2), as lying in the sea and in the branches of the Nile (xxix 3; xxxii 2), as swimming (6), and as taken with great hooks (xxix. 4; Herod. ii. 70) and with nets (xxxii 3). It is used as a symbol for Egypt (Is li. 9; and probably xxvii. 1).

The R. V. recognizes that the word Tan, rendered dragon in A. V. of Job xxx 29. Ps xlii. 19, Is xlii 22; xxxiv. 13; xxxv 7; xlii. 20; Jer. ix 11; x. 22; xiv 6; xlix 33, li 37; Mic. i. 3, 8, and sea monster in Lam iv 3, should be translated jackal; and, on the other hand, that the Hebrew text of Ezek. xxix 3; xxxii. 2 should be emended to read dragon, where A. V. has once properly dragon and once whale.

The dragon of New Testament imagery is the old serpent, the devil (Rev. xii 9; xx 2), who is symbolically portrayed as in color red and having seven heads, ten horns, an enormous tail, and a huge mouth, from which he was able to cast forth water like a river after those whom he would destroy (xii. 3, 4, 15; xvi 13). He was hurled from the heavens to the earth, where he persecuted the church, but was finally chained and imprisoned in the abyss (xii 7-17; xx. 2, 3). In certain features the dragon bears resemblance to the beast of chap. xiii. This beast is a combination of Daniel's four beasts, and represents the combined powers of earth in opposition to the kingdom of God (Dan. vii). The picture of the dragon was conformed to that of the beast, because the dragon, that old serpent, is the animating and moulding spirit in the kingdom of this world, and when he was portrayed in chap. xii., features of the world-power familiarized by Daniel were combined with the distinguishing feature furnished by the serpent of Genesis iii.

HILL OF DOTHAN FROM THE WEST

Drag'on's Well, in A. V. Dragon Well.

A well at Jerusalem, apparently between the Valley Gate and Dung Gate (Neh. ii. 13; cp. iii. 13, 14).

Dream.

Ideas present to the mind during sleep. They may be classified as—1. Vain dreams (Job xx. 8; Ps. lxxiii. 20; Is. xxix. 8). 2. Dreams employed by God for the purposes of his kingdom. In producing them God works according to the laws of mind, and perhaps always employs secondary causes. They are (a) Intended to affect the spiritual life of individuals. That to the Midianite discouraged the enemy, and encouraged Gideon, who providentially heard it (Judg. vii. 13). Perhaps such was the dream of Pilate's wife (Mat. xxvii. 19). Many such providential dreams have been sent in modern times. John Newton, concerned about his soul's salvation, had a dream which made the way of salvation clear to him. (b) Directive and prophetic dreams, used when revelation was incomplete. They seem to have carried with them credentials of their divine origin. Divine communications were made in dreams to Abimelech (Gen. xx. 3), to Jacob (xxviii. 12; xxxi. 10), to Laban (xxxii. 24), to Joseph (xxxvii. 5, 9, 10, 20), to Pharaoh's butler and baker (xl. 5), to Pharaoh (xli. 7, 15, 25, 26), to Solomon (1 Kin. iii. 5), to Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. ii. 1, 4, 36; iv. 1 seq.), to Daniel (vii. 1 seq.), to Joseph the betrothed husband of Mary (Mat. i. 20), to the Magi (ii. 12). The power of accurately interpreting prophetic dreams was granted to certain favored people, as to Joseph (Gen. xli. 16) and to Daniel (Dan. ii. 25-28, 47). Dreams offered as revelations to the church were subjected to tests to determine their character. If they inculcated immoral conduct, they were by that very fact proclaimed false; and any man who sought by their means to lead Israel from the worship of Jehovah was to be put to death (Deut. xiii. 1-5; cp. Jer. xxiii. 25-32; xxix. 8; Zech. x. 2). See VISIONS.

Dress. See CLOTHING.

Drink.

The usual beverage of the Hebrews was water (Gen. xxi. 14; Ex. xxiii. 25; 1 Sam. xxv. 11; 1 Kin. xiii. 8; 2 Kin. vi. 22), though they also frequently used milk (Judg. v. 25), sour wine (Num. vi. 3; Ruth ii. 14), ordinary wine (Gen. xiv. 18; xxvii. 25; Josh. ix. 4; Judg. xix. 19; Neh. v. 15), and more rarely strong drink (Lev. x. 9).

Drink Of'fer-ing. See OFFERINGS.

Drom'e-da-ry [from Latin dromedarius, running camel].

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Rekes, quickly running thing, in the A. V. of 1 Kin. iv. 28; but in Mic. i. 13, swift beast, and in Esth. viii. 10, a mule. The R. V. everywhere translates it swift steed.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew Rammak

(Esth. viii. 10) in the text of the A. V., and on the margin of the R. V. The text of the R. V. translates it steed. Gesenius understands it to mean a mare.

3. The rendering of the Hebrew Beker, a sort of camel, swift and capable of carrying merchandise (Is. lx. 6; Jer. ii. 23). In Arabic the word denotes a young camel of an age suitable for riding and bearing burdens. The R. V. accordingly renders it in the margin young camels.

The dromedary is a variety of the Arabian or one-humped camel (Camelus dromedarius), bred for speed and endurance. It can travel about 125 miles a day. The two-humped Bactrian camel (C. bactrianus) can also be improved into a dromedary.

Dro'p'sy.

A disease marked by an unnatural accumulation of watery liquid in any cavity of the body or in the tissues (Luke xiv. 2).

Dru-sil'la.

The youngest daughter of Herod Agrippa I., by his wife Cypros. Before the death of her father in A. D. 44, and when not yet six years old, she was promised in marriage to a certain Epiphanes, son of Antiochus (not, of course, the persecuting king of that name). The bridegroom promised to accept Judaism; but, on further reflection, he refused, and the proposed alliance fell through. Azizus, king of Emesa, was next applied to, the condition offered being the same as in the former case. He had no scruples, and Drusilla became his wife. She was possessed of great beauty, and was in consequence somewhat persecuted by her eldest sister Bernice, who was plain in appearance. Felix, procurator of Judæa, conceived a sinful passion for Drusilla, to which she responded all the more readily that Bernice's petty tyranny over her made her unhappy. In defiance of Jewish law, she left her legitimate husband, and married Felix, a foreigner and an idolater. They had a son called Agrippa, who grew up to manhood and married, but who perished, however, in an eruption of mount Vesuvius (Antiq. xviii. 5, 4; xx. 7, 1 and 2). One can well understand that when Paul, then a prisoner, reasoned before Felix and Drusilla of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled (Acts xxiv. 24, 25).

Dul'ci-mer.

The rendering of Aramaic Sumphoneyah, Sumphoneya', or to follow the best attested traditional pronunciation, Sumpon'yah or Sumpon'ya' (Dan. iii. 5, 10, 15), probably meaning bagpipe, as the margin of the R. V. makes it. The real dulcimer is quite a different instrument. In its earliest and simplest form it consisted of a flat piece of wood, on which were fastened two converging strips of the same material, which were crossed by strings played by small hammers. Afterwards pegs for regulating the tension of the strings were super-added, and the flat piece of wood gave place to a resonance box.

Du'mah [silence].

1. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. xv. 14; 1 Chron. i. 30). Its territory was probably the region called Doumaitha by Ptolemy, and Domata by Pliny, on the confines of the Syrian and Arabian deserts. The town is now called Doomat el-jendel, meaning Dumah of the stones, and is situated in the district el-Jauf, in the northwestern part of the Arabian peninsula.

2. A symbolic designation of Edom, chosen on account of its assonance with Edom and in allusion to the desolation in store (Is. xxi. 11).

3. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 52). Its site is the ruin Dômeh, 10 miles southwest of Hebron.

Dung.

Dung was used for manuring plants (Luke xiii. 8; Ps. lxxxiii. 10). A dunghill, with straw trodden in it by the cattle, is referred to (Is. xxv. 10). In the East dried cowdung is constantly used for fuel (Ezek. iv. 12, 15). Beggars often lay on dunghills and ash heaps (1 Sam. ii. 8; Lam. iv. 5). As a punishment, the house of a man was sometimes made a dunghill (Dan. ii. 5), that is, probably, was converted into a privy (2 Kin. x. 27). Dung, as refuse, was swept away (1 Kin. xiv. 10; Phil. iii. 8).

Dung Gate. See JERUSALEM II. 3.

Du'ra.

A plain in the province of Babylon where Nebuchadnezzar's golden image was set up (Dan. iii. 1). Several localities in Babylon were called Duru, which means a wall or fortification.

Dys'en-ter-y.

A disease characterized by inflammation and ulceration of the lower part of the intestines, with hemorrhage from the bowels. It is so constantly attended by fever that it is often called fever and dysentery. Publius, chief man of the island of Melita while Paul was there, suffered from this complaint, but was miraculously cured by the apostle (Acts xxviii. 7, 8; R. V.; in A. V. bloody flux).

E.

Ea'gle.

A bird of prey (Job ix. 26; xxxix. 30; Hab. i. 8), large (Ezek. xvii. 3, 7), swift of flight (2 Sam. i. 23), seeing at a great distance, and which builds its nest on lofty rocks (Job xxxix. 27-29; Jer. xlix. 16). It was currently believed to bestow great care upon its young while training them to act for themselves, stirring up the nest and forcing them out, hovering over them and under them when they made their first weak attempts to fly (Deut. xxxii. 11; Ex. xix. 4, 5). Sir Humphrey Davy relates witnessing a pair of golden eagles similarly engaged above the crags of Ben Nevis. There is also probably an allusion to an ancient popular belief that the eagle, at the end of a certain period, moults and renews its youth (Ps. ciii. 5). The story was that the eagle, on reaching old age, flew upward toward the sun until its feathers were singed and it fell into the sea. Thence it emerged in the strength of youth. The allusion may, however, be to the great age to which the eagle lives and retains the vigor of youth. As a carnivorous bird, feeding on reptiles and occasionally on carrion, it was unclean (Lev. xi. 13). The Hebrews, like the Arabs, applied the name which they used for eagle to birds that eat carrion, probably, like the Greek and Roman naturalists Aristotle and Pliny, including certain larger varieties of the vulture among the eagles (Mat. xxiv. 28; cp. Prov. xxx. 17). In alluding to the baldness of the eagle (Mic. i. 16), the prophet, if he does not refer to moulting, which is an inconspicuous process in the eagle, has some vulture in mind, whose head is bald and neck but scantily feathered.

Tristram enumerates eight species of the eagle subfamily as occurring in Palestine. Seven are of the typical genus Aquila, viz.: Aquila chrysaetos, the golden eagle; A. heliaca, the imperial eagle; A. clanga, the greater spotted eagle; A. rapax, the tawny eagle; A. pennata, the booted eagle; A. nipalensis, the steppe eagle; A. Bonelli, Bonelli's eagle, and Circus gallicus, the short-toed eagle. With the exception of the booted eagle, the others are not uncommon. By far the most abundant of all is the short-toed eagle. It feeds on reptiles. It is numerous in summer and autumn. In winter it occurs more sparingly, many apparently migrating southward.

Ear'nest.

Part payment in advance of a wage, a sum of money, or anything else promised, this being intended as a pledge or guarantee to the recipient that the bargain, contract, or promise will in due time be carried out. Blackstone says that the prepayment of a penny in England will legally bind a contract, and the handing over the smallest quantity of goods ordered will bind the engagement for the remainder. The earnest, as a rule, is the same in kind as the ultimate payment, of which it is the pledge. The Spirit in the hearts of Christians is the earnest of their inheritance (2 Cor. i. 22; v. 5; Eph. i. 13, 14).

Ear'ring.

Earrings were worn by the Israelites, men, women, and children (Ex. xxxii. 2), especially by the women (Ezek. xvi. 12; Judith x. 4). They were also worn by the Midianites (Num. xxxi. 50), Assyrians, Egyptians, and other peoples. The custom was innocent in itself. But the earring sometimes served as an amulet (cp. Is. iii. 20, in R. V. amulet). As used in idolatrous worship, they were worn by the men and women of Jacob's household, until he ordered the strange gods to be put away (Gen xxxv 4). They were made of gold (Ex. xxxii. 2, cp Prov xxv. 12) or other precious metal. It is often not clear from the narrative whether earrings or nose-rings are intended (Gen xxiv 22, 30; Ex xxxv 22).

Earth.

1. The world in which we dwell as distinguished from the heavens overhead (Gen i 1).

2. The dry land, as distinguished from the sea (Gen i 10), the habitable world (Gen. i 28, x 25; xviii 18). It is frequently described in poetry. Hannah spoke of the earth standing on pillars, on which it had been placed by God (1 Sam. ii 8; Job ix 6; Ps. lxxv. 3). The psalmist speaks of the inhabited earth as founded upon the seas and established on the floods (xxiv. 2, cxxxvi 6 cp. Ex xx 4). Others speak literally or figuratively of the foundations of the earth (Is. ci 25; civ 5-9, Prov. iii 19, vii. 29, Is. xlvi. 13).

3. Vegetable soil (Gen xxvii 28; Ex xx. 24; Ps. civ. 14).

4. The inhabitants of the world or of any region in it (Gen. xi 1, Ps. xcvi 9).

Earthquake.

The quaking of the earth, a vibratory or undulatory movement extending superficially over a wide area, and downward, it is believed, from a mile or two to more than thirty miles. The vibrations are, perhaps, produced by contractions of portions of the earth's crust. Earthquakes and volcanoes are connected, and are confined to particular regions constituting continuous lines. One of these lines passes from the Taurus mountains to the gulf of Akaba, along the valleys of the Orontes and the Jordan. In severe earthquakes, at the point where the force is greatest, the hills move to and fro (Jer iv 24) and the foundations of the mountains, as it were, tremble (Ps. xviii 7), clefts appear in the earth's crust (Zech. xiv 4, 5) and chasms, into which men may fall, open and close (Num. xvi 31-33); buildings are shaken down and their inhabitants often buried in the ruins; and if the sea is near, it may leave its bed for a few minutes nearly dry, and then bring in a wave upon the land which will sweep over it with destructive effect. Judea was visited by a severe earthquake in the days of Uzziah and Jeroboam II. (Amos i 1; Zech. xiv 5, Antiq. ix. 10, 4). Another notable earthquake occurred in the seventh year of Herod the Great, which destroyed much cattle and upwards of 10,000 lives (Antiq. xv 5, 2). An earthquake, accompanied with darkness, signalized the death of Christ (Mat. xxvii. 45, 51-54), and another heralded his resurrection (xxviii 2). One occurred in Macedonia when Paul and Silas were in the jail at Philippi (Acts xvi 26).

East.

The direction toward the sunrise (as is denoted by the Hebrew and Greek words employed in Josh. xi. 3, xii. 3, etc.; Mat. i 1). The Hebrews faced the point of the rising sun when they determined direction; hence the east was the front (as is denoted by the Hebrew word in Gen. ii. 8).

East, Children of the, or Men of, or People of.

A general designation of the tribes occupying the east country, who inhabited the region bordering on Ammon and Moab (Ezek. xxv 4, 10), dwelt as far north as a district where people of Haran pastured their flocks (Gen. xxix. 1, 4), and extended far southward into Arabia.

East Country.

The region lying east of Palestine (Zech. viii 7), especially the Arabian and Syrian deserts (Gen. xxv. 1-7).

East Sea or Eastern Sea. See DEAD SEA.

East Wind.

A wind blowing, broadly speaking, from the east. In Egypt it blasts the ears of corn (Gen. xli 23, 27), and in Palestine the vines and vegetation generally (Ezek. xvi 7-10, xix 10-12). The east wind in these lands is hot and sultry, and deleterious to vegetation, because it has been blowing over the Arabian or Syro-Arabian desert (Hos. xiii 15). Doubtless this same wind is meant in Jon. iv 8, although the Ninevites themselves would not have called it an east wind.

East'er.

Originally the spring festival in honor of Eastr or Ostara, the Teutonic goddess of light and spring. As early as the eighth century the name was transferred by the Anglo-Saxons to the Christian festival designed to celebrate the resurrection of Christ. In the A. V. it occurs once, viz., in Acts xii 4, but is a mistranslation. The original is pascha, the ordinary Greek word for passover. The R. V. properly employs the word passover.

E'bal.

1. A son of Shobal, and a descendant of Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 23; 1 Chron. i 40).

2. The same as Obal (1 Chron. i. 22 with Gen. x. 28).

3. A mountain separated only by a narrow valley from mount Gerizim (Deut. xxvii 12-14), west of the western highway and near the oaks of Moreh (xi 30, R. V.), which were near Shechem (Gen. xii 6, R. V.; xxxv 4). When the Israelites passed the Jordan they were to set up great stones plastered, on which the words of the law were to be written. An altar also was to be built (Deut. xxvii. 1-8). Representatives of six tribes, those of Reuben, Gad, Asher, Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali, were to stand on mount Ebal, and pronounce curses on those who were guilty of certain heinous sins. The representatives of the remaining six tribes standing on mount Gerizim were to pronounce blessings (Deut. xi. 29, xxvii. 9-26). These directions were carried out by Joshua (Josh. viii. 30-35). Mount Ebal lies on the northern side of Nablus, the ancient Shechem, whilst mount Gerizim lies on its southern side (Antiq. iv. 8, 44). Both are west of the road from the south to the north, and the branch road to Samaria and En-gannim passes between them. Ebal rises 3077 feet above the sea, and is steep, rocky, and barren. In some places a few stunted olive trees may be discovered on its lower part, and prickly pear above; in others it is destitute of vegetation. It is now called Jebel Eslāmiyeh.

E'bed [servant]

1. Father of Gaal (Judg. ix. 28, 30).

2. A chief of the father's house of Adin, who returned from Babylon with fifty males under the leadership of Ezra (Ezra viii 6).

E'bed-me'lech [slave of the king].

An Ethiopian, a eunuch of the palace, who heard that Jeremiah had been cast into a dungeon where he would probably have soon died of hunger, and, having obtained the king's permission, drew him out by cords let down, and rags to protect the prophet's arms against their sharpness (Jer. xxxviii 7-13). Jeremiah was subsequently commissioned to inform him that, on account of the service he had rendered, he should be preserved when Jerusalem was taken (xxxix. 15-18).

Eb-en-e'zer [stone of help].

A commemorative stone set up by Samuel, evidently in Benjamin, between Mizpah and Shen, where the Lord discomfited the Philistines (1 Sam vii 10, 12). Twenty years previously the Israelites themselves had been defeated at this place by the Philistines and had lost the ark (iv. 1, where the place is mentioned by its later name).

E'ber, in A V thrice Heber (1 Chron v 13; viii 22; Luke iii. 35) [other side, region beyond]

1. A descendant of Shem through Arpachshad (Gen. x 22, 24), and progenitor of a group of peoples (x 21), embracing the Hebrews (xi. 16-26), the Joktanide Arabs (x. 25-30), and certain Aramaean tribes descended from Nahor (xi 29, xxii 20-24). The name is put for these peoples collectively (Num. xxiv 24). Originally Eber belonged to the region beyond or east of the Euphrates, perhaps also of the Tigris, with respect to the later Hebrews (cp Josh xxiv. 2, 3, 14, 15), and to the Joktanide Arabs, and not unlikely with respect to his descendants, the ancestors of Abraham and Nahor, in Ur (Gen. xi 28).

2. A priest, head of the father's house of Amok in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii 20)

3. A Gadite, head of a father's house in Gilead in Bashan (1 Chron. v. 13)

4 and 5. Two Benjamites, a son of Elpaal and a son of Shashak (1 Chron. viii. 12 and 22, 25).

E'bez. See ABEZ.

E-bi'a-saph. See ABIASAPH.

Eb'on-y.

Wood of various species of the genus Diospyros, which constitutes the type of the Ebenaceæ (Ebenads). The inner wood is black, very hard, and heavy. Ebony is used for inlaying and ornamental turnery. The men of Dedan traded with it in the markets of Tyre, having obtained it apparently from India or Ceylon (Ezek. xxvii 15). The Greeks recognized two kinds of ebony, one variegated, from India, and the other black, from Ethiopia.

E'bron, in A. V. Hebron.

A town on the boundary line of Asher (Josh. xix. 28). Perhaps identical with Abdon.

E-bro'nah. See ABRONAH.

Ec-bat'a-na. See ACHMETHA.

Ec-cle-si-as'tes [Greek ekklesiastēs, one who sits and speaks in an assembly or church, a preacher].

The name borrowed from the Septuagint and applied to the O T book called in Hebrew Kohleth. The meaning of Kohleth is disputed. It is etymologically related to the word which means congregation. The English versions follow the Greek and Latin versions in rendering it "the preacher" (i 1). The preacher is distinctly represented as Solomon, "son of David, king at Jerusalem" (i. 1), excelling all his predecessors in Jerusalem in wisdom and wealth (i. 16; ii 7, 9). The book may be regarded either as a writing of Solomon himself in his old age or as words which, though not actually uttered by Solomon, accurately sum up his completed experience, are spoken from the standpoint of his finished course, teach the great lesson of his life as he himself learned it, and express the sentiments which he might rightly be supposed to entertain as he looked at life in the retrospect. The meaning of i 12, 13 is, according to Hebrew grammar, either: "As for me, during my reign [which still continues] I have applied my heart to seek wisdom and have discovered that all is vanity," or "When I was king [as I am not now] I applied my heart to seek wisdom and discovered that all is vanity." The latter explanation is doubtless the correct one; for the language smacks everywhere of the vocabulary and grammar of the later postexilic Hebrew scriptures and of the Aramaic portions of Daniel and Ezra. The book recounts the feelings, experiences, and observations which would be unavoidable to the wise man situated as was Solomon.

The message concerns solely the present life on earth. The question is raised whether any real profit accrues to man from toil (i. 3). The method of investigation is that of the sage (i 13). By observation and experience the preacher finds that man's one source of satisfaction lies in himself, in the normal and healthy exercise of his powers of mind and body in harmony with the physical and moral laws of the universe in which he is placed (i. 24; iii. 12, 13, 22, v. 18; ix. 7-10). Vain are wisdom (i. 12-18) and pleasure (ii. 1-11). Still they have value; hence the preacher compares wisdom and folly (ii. 12-23). He concludes that the homely rewards of labor excel (24; cp. v. 12). The conclusion is strengthened by the fact that man's activities are bound to the stages of his growth. There is a time fixed and unalterable for the exercise of each power of mind and body, and everything is beautiful in its season (iii. 1-11). And other joy is often rendered impossible by injustice and oppression (16-iv. 3). Formalism and dishonesty are unwise; and wealth is often injurious, and is less desirable than health (v. 1-vi. 9). The preacher speaks of the value of a good name and the means of obtaining it (vii. 1-10), and of the value of wisdom as a safeguard (11-22), and in dealing with kings (viii. 1-9); and he insists on the general truth that godliness is the best policy (10-15). Death comes alike to all, let man find pleasure, then, in the common, humble joys of life. They are his portion (ix. 2-10). After sundry other shrewd observations, the preacher is led again to his main theme, exhorts young men to rejoice in their powers, but to use them mindful of being under moral government, makes his great appeal to youth to remember God, and sums up the matter in the pithy sentence: Fear God, and keep his commandments; for this is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every work into judgment [even now, whatever the Judge may do in the world to come] (xi. 9-xii. 14).

In his argument the writer appeals to man's relation to God in so far only as God is known in nature and experience. His references to God are thus in accordance with the methods of that philosophical school to which he belonged (see WISDOM), and are indispensable in a complete discussion of the means of adjusting oneself to the conditions which one learns by experience to be imposed upon him and under which he lives.

The startling character of some statements in Ecclesiastes led certain Jews to question its right to its place among inspired books. At last, however, its right to remain in the canon was universally accorded. There is no direct quotation from it or unequivocal allusion to it in the N. T.

Ed [a witness]

A word inserted in the A. V. and the R. V. of Josh. xxii. 34. It or a similar word was doubtless originally in the Hebrew. It is found in some manuscripts and versions, though it may be an insertion in them as it is in the English version. It is useful to the full meaning of the passage, which tells how the two and a half tribes east of the Jordan reared an altar as a witness that they were of common descent and religion with those west of the river. These latter, taking the altar to be the commencement of apostasy from Jehovah, were preparing to make war upon those who had erected it, when explanations were given and accepted as satisfactory (Josh. xxii. 1-34).

E'dar. See EDER.

E'den [pleasantness or, perhaps, plain].

1. A country in which God caused trees to grow from the ground and in this manner planted for Adam a garden, called from its situation the garden of Eden. A river went out of the country of Eden to water the garden, and being thence parted, became four heads, called Pishon, Gihon, Hiddekel, and Euphrates. Of these four rivers, the Euphrates is well known. Hiddekel is unquestionably the Tigris; the other two are doubtful. The Pishon surrounded or meandered through the land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the Gihon surrounded the land of Cush.

The main theories as to the site of the garden may be classed in two groups: I. Those which, while proposing to identify the four streams with still existing rivers, fail to find a geographical counterpart of the one stream divided into four. The site is by many sought in Armenia. The sources of the Tigris and Euphrates are in this region. The Pishon is supposed to be either the Phasis, in modern Persian Fas, or the Kur, the large tributary of the Araxes. The Gihon is identified with the Araxes, in Arabic known as Gashun er-Ras. Objections to this theory are, (a) the difficulty in explaining the one river; (b) the absence of proof that the land of Cush ever extended to this region; (c) Havilah, as located by the biblical writers, did not lie in Armenia. By others the garden is thought of as situated between the Nile and India or between India and the Oxus. Havilah is identified with a portion of India, where gold was obtained; and Cush with either Ethiopia, which is called Cush in the Scriptures, or the plateau of central Asia which was inhabited by Cossæans. The Gihon, the river of Cush, is hence either the Nile, called by the Ethiopians Geyon or Geyon, or the Oxus. The same objections, mutatis mutandis, lie against the second theory as against the first. It may be added that the identification of the Gihon with the Nile is traceable as far back as Josephus. In his case it probably rests on a misconception. The only land of Cush in the geographical knowledge of the later Israelites was Ethiopia; and accordingly Josephus understood the Nile by the Gihon, because it is the great river of the land of Cush. II. Theories which seek an exact geographical counterpart to the biblical description and identify not only the four rivers, but also the one. Calvin observed that the Tigris and Euphrates are actually united for a short distance as one stream, which then divides and enters into the Persian gulf by two mouths; and he concluded that the district watered by the united streams was the site of the garden. There is reason to believe that this particular spot was formerly the bed of the Persian Gulf. But the general locality indicated has much in favor of its being the site of the garden. Friedrich Delitzsch thinks that the river of Eden is the Euphrates. Its channel being higher than the Tigris, its superabundant waters on entering the alluvial plain north of Babylon flowed from its banks and found their way across the plain to the Tigris. The district thus watered was extremely fertile. It was even known to the ancient Babylonians as the garden of the god Dummash. Here the garden of Eden is to be sought. The word ednu in Assyrian means plain; and the two river bottoms of southern Mesopotamia and the alluvial lowland form a plain, and were spoken of as an ednu. A descendant of Cush reigned in the Babylonian plain (Gen. x 8-10); and Kashites, that is Cushites, who were related to the Elamites, early descended upon Babylonia and for a time held the political power. Hence the land of Cush may be satisfactorily regarded as having designated at one period Babylonia or its southern portion. Havilah was situated northwest of the Persian Gulf, according to Scripture notices, and may be assumed to have extended to the Euphrates and bordered on Babylonia. Under these circumstances, the Pishon may reasonably be identified with the Pallakopas canal, which was probably a natural channel originally; and the Gihon with a great Babylonian canal which branched from the Euphrates eastward at Babylon, and on which two of Nimrod the Cushite's cities, Babylon and Erech, stood. It may be the canal near Babylon whose name was Kahana or Guhana, corresponding to Gihon. This scholarly theory still lacks proof. Its weakness at present lies in its numerous assumptions, in the difficulty of showing that the bounds of Havilah ever extended to the banks of the Euphrates, and were not separated from the river by the land of Mesha, and of establishing the conjecture that the country near Babylon to the east was designated the land of Cush. Glaser offers a natural explanation of the language employed in the description. He regards the four heads, which are immediately afterwards called rivers, as the heads or tributaries of the river of Eden. These four affluents united somewhere below the garden or, to modify his theory, at the garden itself. The name Pishon he finds still lingering in the Middle Ages in the wady Faishan in northern central Arabia, which drains the rainfall toward the Persian Gulf. This region produced gold and corresponds to the location of Havilah as indicated by the biblical writers. He also believed that he found the name Gihon applied to the wady er-Rumma, which drains the country about Jebel Shamar toward the Euphrates, and he concluded that the Cushites occupied this region during their migration from the east to Africa, and caused it to be known for a long time as the land of Cush. He erred, however, in his belief that he had found the wady er-Rumma called Gihon. The Arabian poet whom he quotes is speaking of a river of Cilicia.

The site of the garden of Eden is most probably to be sought about the head of the Persian Gulf. The locality is east of Palestine, as Gen. ii 8 may mean. The Tigris and Euphrates rivers are there. Havilah was a district of northern central Arabia. A land of Cush corresponded approximately to Elam, where the names Kashshu and Cossean long lingered. The plain of Babylonia could be and evidently was called an ednu, as Delitzsch has shown. Possibly the fact that the Persian Gulf was called a river may also have some bearing on the solution of the problem. The garden of Eden is referred to in Isa. li. 3; Ezek. xxviii. 13; xxxi. 9, 16-18; xxxvi. 35; Joel ii 3; cp. Gen. xii. 10.

2. A region in Mesopotamia; mentioned in connection with Gozan, Haran, Reseph, Tellassar (2 Kin. xix. 12; Is. xxxvii. 12), and with Haran and Canneh (Ezek. xxvii. 23, 24). Apparently the locality in Amos i 5, on the margin called Beth-edon. The region is mentioned in Assyrian documents by the name Bit-Adini, situated on both sides of the Euphrates north of the Belik river.

3. A Gershonite Levite, a son of Joah (2 Chron. xxix. 12; xxxi. 15).

E'der, in A. V. once Edar (Gen. xxxv. 21) and once Ader (1 Chron. viii. 15) [a flock].

1. A tower, beyond which Jacob on one occasion spread his tent (Gen. xxxv. 21). Exact situation unknown.

2. A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 21). Exact situation unknown.

3. A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (1 Chron. viii. 15).

4. A Levite, son of Mushi, of the family of Merari (1 Chron. xxiii. 23; xxiv. 30).

E'dom; in A. V. of O. T. four times Idumea [red].

1. A name of Esau, given in memory of his having sold his birthright for red pottage (Gen. xxv. 30; xxxvi. i. 8, 19).

2. The Edomites collectively (Num. xx. 18, 20, 21; Amos i. 6, 11; ix. 12; Mal. i. 4).

3. The region occupied by the descendants of Edom, i. e. Esau. It was originally called mount Seir (Gen. xxxii. 3; xxxvi. 20, 21, 30; Num. xxiv. 18). At the time of the sixteenth or seventeenth dynasty, and probably as early as the twelfth dynasty (for these dates, see Adventures of Sinuhit), it was known to the Egyptians as Edimā. In the mind of the Israelites Edom as the name of the country was doubtless associated with the settlement of their kinsman Edom in that region. It is a mountainous and extremely rugged country, about 100 miles long, extending southward from Moab on both sides of the Arabah, or great depression connecting the southern part of the Dead Sea with the gulf of Akaba (Gen. xiv. 6; Deut. ii. 1, 12; Josh. xv. 1; Judg. xi. 17, 18; 1 Kin. ix. 26). The summit of mount Seir is believed to rise about 3500 feet above the adjacent Arabah. The lower part of the chain is of red Nubian sandstone, with dykes of red granite and porphyry; the summit is of a chalky limestone, probably of cretaceous age. Edom is not nearly so fertile as Palestine (cp. Mal. i. 2-4); but in the time of Moses it had fields, vineyards, wells, and a highway (Num. xx. 17, 19). The Edomite capital in the times of the Hebrew monarchy was Sela, believed to be the place afterwards called Petra. Other important towns were Bozrah and Teman. In the Greek period the name was modified to Idumæa (q. v.).

The wilderness of Edom was the Arabah at the southern extremity of the Dead Sea (2 Kin. iii. 8, 20).

E'dom-ites.

The descendants of Edom, i. e. Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 1-19), and others incorporated with them. As early as the return of Jacob from Mesopotamia Esau had occupied the land of Edom (Gen. xxxii. 3; xxxvi. 6-8; Deut. ii. 4, 5; Josh. xxiv. 4), having driven out the aboriginal Horites (cp. Gen. xiv. 6; xxxvi. 20-30; Deut. ii. 12, 22). The Edomites appear to have been first ruled by tribal chiefs called dukes, who were probably like Arab sheiks (Gen. xxxvi. 15-19, 40-43; 1 Chron. i. 51-54); but before the rise of the Hebrew monarchy they were governed by kings (Gen. xxxvi. 31-39; 1 Chron. i. 43-51). When the Israelites were approaching Canaan, they sought permission from the king of Edom to pass through his territory, giving assurance that the privilege would not be abused. He refused the request, and was prepared to fight if the Israelites had persisted in moving forward. But because the Edomites were descended from Abraham, the Israelites were forbidden to make war upon them and commanded to pass around their land (Num. xx. 14-21). Notwithstanding this hostility, an Edomite was regarded in the Mosaic law as a brother of the Israelites, and the posterity of the former were allowed in the third generation to become incorporated with the Hebrew people (Deut. xxii. 7, 8), while it was not till the tenth generation that the descendants of a Moabite or an Ammonite could obtain the same privilege (3-6). Saul fought against the Edomites (1 Sam. xiv. 47); and David put garrisons in Edom after conquering the country (1 Chron. xviii. 13; Ps. lx. title; and 2 Sam. viii. 13, 14, where the word Syrians is doubtless the error of a copyist who misread dalet as resh). This conquest had been predicted by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 18). Joab, David's commander-in-chief, remained in Edom for six months, cutting off every male (1 Kin. xi. 15, 16); but Hadad, one of the royal family, escaped with some others of his countrymen to Egypt, and became an active enemy of Solomon (14-22). After the death of Ahab of Israel, and during the reign of Jehoshaphat of Judah, Edomites joined with the Ammonites and Moabites in invading Judah; but a misunderstanding arising, they were attacked and destroyed by their allies (2 Chron. xx. 22-30). Jehoshaphat reduced the country to its former subjection, and put it under a deputy (1 Kin. xxii. 47); and the Edomites aided Israel and Judah in the contest with Mesha, king of Moab (2 Kin. iii. 4-27). In the reign of Joram, king of Judah, Jehoshaphat's son and successor, the Edomites revolted. Joram vanquished them in the field, but could not reduce them to subjection (2 Kin. viii. 20-22; 2 Chron. xxi. 8-10). Amaziah was more successful. He slew 10,000 Edomites in the valley of Salt, took Sela, the capital, and put 10,000 Edomites to death by flinging them from the top of the rock (2 Kin. xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12). In the reign of Ahaz, when Judah was attacked by Pekah and Rezin, the Edomites invaded Judah, and carried off captives (2 Chron. xxviii. 17); and they rejoiced when Nebuchadnezzar destroyed Jerusalem (Ps. cxxxvii. 7). The prophets foretold the calamities that should befall Edom for its inveterate enmity towards Israel (Ezek. xxxv. 5, 6), but announced its ultimate incorporation into the kingdom of God (Jer. xlix. 7-22; Lam. iv. 21, 22; Ezek. xxv. 12-14, xxxv. 15; Joel iii. 19; Amos ix. 12, Obad. 1-21). When the captivity of the two tribes rendered the territory of Judah somewhat destitute of inhabitants, the Edomites seized on it as far as Hebron, and were themselves supplanted in mount Seir by the Nabathæan Arabs. See NABAÏOTH. Judas Maccabæus retook Hebron and the other towns which the Edomites had occupied (1 Mac. v. 65; Antiq. xii. 8, 6). John Hyrcanus compelled the Edomites to submit to the rite of circumcision, and incorporated them with the Jewish people (Antiq. xii. 9, 1). The Herods were Idumæans, i. e. Edomites. Many of the Zealots who took part in the defense of Jerusalem against the Romans, and were almost as dangerous to their fellow citizens as to the enemy, were also Idumæans. After this the tribe is little heard of again in history.

Ed're-1 [strong].

1. The capital city of Bashan (Deut. iii. 10; Josh. xii. 4, xiii. 12, 31). There the Israelites fought the great battle with Og, which deprived him of his dominions and his life (Num. xxi. 33-35, Deut. i. 4, ii. 1, 10). Edrei has been identified with the modern village of Der'at, about 27 miles east of Gadara.

2. A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 37).

Eg'lah [a calf].

One of David's wives, and mother of Ithream (2 Sam. iii. 5; 1 Chron. iii. 3).

Eg'la-lai [two ponds]

A Moabite town (Is. xv. 8). Eusebius mentions a village Aigaleim, 8 Roman miles to the south of Areopolis, cp also the town Agalla (Antiq. xiv. 1, 4). It is not the same as En-eglaim.

Eg'lath-she-li'shi-yah [third Eglath].

A place in Moab (Is xv 5 and Jer xlviii. 34, R. V.). Compare the dual Eglaim.

Eg'lon [perhaps vituline]

1. A king of Moab, who captured Jericho, held it for eighteen years, and exacted tribute from Israel. He was assassinated by Ehud, the bearer of the tribute, who obtained a private interview with him on the pretext of bringing secret tidings (Judg iii 12-30).

2. A town in the lowland and assigned to Judah (Josh xv 39). Its king was one of the five allies who made war on Gibeon, but were defeated, captured, and executed, by Joshua (Josh. x 3-23, 34-37, xii 12). Its site is 'Ajlân, 16 miles northeast of Gaza.

Egypt.

For the sake of convenience, the facts regarding Egypt are grouped under three heads: the country, the people, and the sojourn of the Israelites

1. The Country.—1. Its names. The country was designated Aiguptos by the Greeks as early as the time of Homer. The ancient Egyptians themselves, however, commonly called their native land Kam-t, black, naming it from the color of the soil. To the Canaanites it was known as Misru, which probably means the fortified land, or closed land, so called on account of the fortifications along its Asiatic frontier at the isthmus of Suez, or it may denote simply the territory. This latter name the Hebrews employed almost exclusively, though they used it in the dual form Mišraim, the two Egypts, viz., upper or southern and lower or northern; like the Egyptians themselves, considering the country double

1. 2. The territory and its divisions. In ancient times Egypt was the country watered by the Nile from the Mediterranean Sea as far as the first cataract. In addition it included a series of oases in the western desert, and also the country between the eastern mouth of the Nile and the wady el-'Arish, the river of Egypt. The country is divided by nature into two tracts—a narrow valley, running from south to north, sunken in the midst of a desert; and the prolongation of the valley into a delta. These geographical divisions formed political boundaries also; Upper Egypt was coincident with the valley, and Lower Egypt with the delta. The length of the Nile country from the sea to the first cataract is 550 miles, and its breadth from the head of the delta to the cataract varies from 14 to 32 miles. The area of this tract is about 11,342 square miles, of which at the time of the French occupation 6921 square miles were cultivable. Ancient Egypt was a small country, scarcely one-half again as large as New Jersey, but, at the same time, in proportion to its width, it is the longest country in the world. It may be compared to New Jersey with its area increased by one half, elongated so as to extend from New York to Cincinnati, or from New York to Wilmington, N. C. It is nearly twice as far from Memphis to the cataract (about 460 miles) as from Memphis to Jerusalem (about 260), and the distance is greater from Memphis to the cataract than from Memphis to Damascus (about 410 miles). This long, narrow valley of the Nile, as far as the first cataract, was originally an estuary of the sea. Herodotus came to this conclusion (ii 10), and his theory has been confirmed by geology. "The Nile mud," says Fraas, "rests on a bed of sea sand. The whole country between the first cataract and the Mediterranean was formerly a narrow estuary." In the strictest sense, Egypt, as the ancient Greeks said, is "the gift of the Nile." See NILE.

1. 3. The adjacent region. Ancient Egypt was bounded on either side by desert land. The waste country gradually rises from the Sahara in the west toward the east, and terminates in a chain of mountains which skirt the Red Sea. The desert region on the east of the river, extending to the Red Sea, and containing nearly 50,000 square miles, about equal in extent to Pennsylvania, was considered as forming geographically part of Arabia (Herod. ii 8, 19), perhaps because like the Arabian peninsula in character, although it was separated from Arabia by the Red Sea and was politically no man's land, virtually uninhabited, whose scanty resources were worked by the Egyptians. The mountains rise to a height of 6600 feet. They form a broad and massive range of crystalline rock, running parallel with the coast of the Red Sea and sending forth numerous ramifications into the interior of the country. It was in these mountains, at Hammâmât on the caravan route between Kōşer and Thebes, that the ancient Egyptians quarried the hard, dark-colored stone which they used for sarcophagi and sphinxes; and at Jebel Dukha, nearly opposite the extremity of the Sinaitic peninsula, they mined copper and emerald. Extensive masses of limestone stretch from the mountains to the Nile, yielding the alabaster with which the ancient Egyptians embellished their buildings. The desert on the west of the Nile was assigned to Libya. It presents an entirely different aspect from the region east of the river. It consists of an immense, monotonous and stony tableland, 650 to 1000 feet above the level of the Nile, without mountains or valleys or even isolated hills of any considerable height, and without trace of crystalline or volcanic formations. The whole of this stony and absolutely unwatered plain consists of limestone with a few sand hills scattered here and there over it, and a barrier of sandstone penetrating into it not far from the Ethiopian border. The utter desolation of this region is relieved at five points only within the Egyptian territory by oases, mere specks in the desert, distant by a journey of from three to five days from each other, and by a journey of from three to sixteen days from the Nile. They owe their fertility to subter-

ing to the Bible, Misraim was the son of Ham and the brother of Canaan, Put, and the Ethiopian Cush (Gen x. 6). This description indicates an Asiatic origin for the Egyptians, but whether they were descended from Ham or incorporated with him is not determined.

ranean supplies of water, which are believed to be connected with the Nubian Nile or possibly with the Soudan. The combined population is about 35,000.

Ancient Egypt was thus an isolated country—sea on the north, desert and sea on the east, desert cleft only for nearly 1000 miles by the narrowest and least productive part of the Nile valley on the south, and the silent, illimitable desert on the west.

II. The People.—1. Their origin.—Accord-

Their own traditions point to their immigration from southern Arabia. The type of the ancient Egyptian is Caucasian; but at the same time anatomy, character, and language differentiate him from the Indo-European and Semitic peoples. On the other hand, many of the domestic utensils employed by the ancient Egyptians, as well as many of their customs, are said to be similar to those of the dwellers on the banks of the Zambesi and Niger, but totally different from those seen on the banks of the Indus and Euphrates. Not improbably Hamitic immigrants from Asia conquered an aboriginal race already settled on the banks of the Nile.

II. 2. Their appearance. The Egyptian was short of stature and slender of build. The head was large in proportion, and covered with black or brown hair—smooth, not woolly. The forehead was square, but receding, the eyes large, the cheeks full, the mouth wide, the lips tolerably thick. In color the Egyptian was dark, but not black. The women, not being exposed to the sun, had a lighter complexion.

II. 3. Their language. The Egyptian language is difficult to classify. Its vocabulary connects it with the Turanian tongues, and its grammar with the Semitic languages. Its modern descendant is the Coptic, which continued to be spoken in Lower Egypt until the seventeenth century. Though now dead it is known by translations into it of the O T and N T. Originally a kind of picture writing, which has been named hieroglyphic or sacred writing, was used. It consisted chiefly of representations of objects which occur in nature and art, such as birds, beasts, plants and implements, together with mathematical symbols. These delineations are partly ideographs—that is, the picture is the word or idea, and they partly represent sounds which when combined yield a word. Hieroglyphic writing was used down to the latest times; but after a time the scribes began to dispense with the details of the pictures in order to write more rapidly, and thus arose the hieratic or priestly writing. It was employed wherever ornamentation was not an object. About the eighth century B. C. the demotic or popular writing came into vogue. It was used in social and commercial intercourse for writing the dialect which had developed among the people, and was a cursive form of the old hieroglyphs. When the attention of the modern world was directed to the ancient Egyptian writings, they could not be read, and for a long time no key could be found. But when Alexandria surrendered to the British in 1801 there fell into their hands a slab of black basalt, called the Rosetta stone, from its having been found by the French near the Rosetta branch of the Nile. It is now in the British Museum. On this stone is cut a decree by Ptolemy V., about 193 B. C. It is repeated in three languages and in three forms of writing—demotic, hieroglyphic, and Greek. A bilingual inscription, Greek and hieroglyphic, was found on an obelisk on the island of Philæ near the first cataract. The Greek of these texts was, of course, easily read, being a known language, and the hieroglyphs were deciphered by comparison with it.

II. 4. Their numbers. The population of Egypt was greater in ancient than in modern times. Diodorus Siculus, contemporary of Julius Caesar and Augustus, states, on the authority of the ancient Egyptian records, that the land contained in the time of the Pharaohs more than 18,000 cities and villages; and he gives the ancient population of the country as 7,000,000. In the days of Nero, on the basis of the revenue derived from the poll tax, it was estimated at 7,500,000, exclusive of the inhabitants of Alexandria (War II. 16, 4). This number is quite reasonable in itself, for the country could support from 8,000,000 to 9,000,000 people. According to the census of 1882, the present population of Egypt proper is 6,811,448, or about 600 per square mile, and is therefore denser than that of most European states.

II. 5. Their history. When Egypt passed from the prehistoric to the historic age it seems to have existed as a number of small kingdoms. These were afterwards combined into an empire by Menes, the first historical king. Students of Egyptian chronology assign different dates to the commencement of Menes' reign. These vary from about 5700 B. C. to 2700 B. C. Manetho, a priest of Sebennytos in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, reckons thirty dynasties from the accession of Menes to the Persian conquest of Egypt in 345 B. C. These are now generally grouped into three periods: those of the Old, the Middle, and the New Empires. To the Old Empire are assigned the first seven or ten dynasties. Its great feature was pyramid building, which reached its height under the fourth dynasty. That of the Middle Empire was the conquest of at least Lower Egypt by the Hyksos, or Shepherd Kings, from the northeast. They are generally supposed to have belonged to the Semitic race, but may have been Hittites. It is believed that it was during their domination that Abraham visited Egypt and that Joseph was prime minister. At this period a great economic change took place in Egypt. In the Old Empire the nobility and governors of the nomes had possessed large landed estates; but in the New Empire royal officials are in the place of the old aristocracy, and the crown and the great temples own the landed property. The New Empire began with the eighteenth dynasty. The first notable event in it was the expulsion of the Hyksos, when they had ruled by one account 511, by another 625 years. Afterwards, under native rulers, Egypt attained to high prosperity, and began a career of conquest and domination in western Asia, Thothmes III. being its greatest warrior, and Rameses II. not much inferior. The latter was probably the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites, and his son Menephtah the Pharaoh of the exodus. Other Pharaohs are mentioned in the O. T.—Shishak, So, Tirhakah, Necho, Hophra; see PHARAOH. Tirhakah assisted in checking the advance of Sennacherib, king of Assyria, toward Egypt; but he was overthrown by Sennacherib's successor Esarhaddon. The Assyrians divided Egypt into twenty districts, and appointed a governor over each. Tirhakah stirred up revolt, and Egypt was reconquered by Ashurbanipal, who plundered and destroyed Thebes in 664 B. C. (Nah iii. 8-10). Psammetichus, one of the petty rulers, rose in revolt, and, aided by the Asiatic Greeks, restored Egypt to independence, founding the twenty-sixth dynasty. In 525 B. C. Egypt was conquered by Cambyses and became a Persian satrapy. About a century and a quarter later Nephthites succeeded in completely throwing off the Persian yoke, and became the founder of the twenty-ninth dynasty, but in 345 B. C. Egypt surrendered to Artaxerxes, and again became a Persian satrapy. In 332 B. C. it welcomed the Macedonians and Greeks, led by Alexander the Great; for it saw in him a deliverer from the Persian yoke. After his death it was ruled by the Ptolemies. In 30 B. C. it became a province of the Roman empire, and was governed by prefects until A. D. 362. Joseph, Mary, and the infant Jesus, took refuge there during the time that Archelaus ruled Judæa. In A. D. 619 Egypt was conquered by Chosroes II. of Persia, who lost it again permanently in 628. Between 638 and 640 it passed to the Saracens, and between 1163 and 1196 to the Turks.

Bast, personification of sexual passion (in Pi-beseth), and Amon, a god who animates nature. Each nome or district had its special local deity or deities, to whom it paid peculiar honors. Some among the people were henotheists or worshippers of one god as far exalted above the others and worthy of all adoration, and perhaps some were even monotheists. A remarkably clear knowledge of ethical and religious truths was possessed from very early times—truth in regard to human conduct, sin, justification, immortality, and with all their nature worship even in regard to God.

III. The Sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt.

1. The descent into Egypt. A grievous famine prevailed throughout the whole known world, or at least throughout that large part of it about the eastern and southeastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea, where dwelt a complex of nations cut off socially and, so far as obtaining sufficient supplies for the necessities of life, economically from the mountains of Asia Minor and the rich valleys of the Euphrates and Tigris (Gen. xli. 54; xlvii. 13). On occasion of this distress Joseph, who had risen to authority at the court of Pharaoh second only to that of the king, urged his father and brethren to leave Canaan and settle temporarily in Egypt (xlv. 9-11; xlvii. 4, 29, 30, xlviii. 21. 1-24). Accordingly Jacob migrated with his tribe. It consisted of the patriarch himself, his six sons and one daughter by Leah with twenty-five sons, his two sons by Leah's maid with thirteen sons and one Migration of Asiatics into Egypt during the Twelfth Dynasty.

II. 6. Their religion. The religion of the Egyptians was a spiritualized nature worship, centering about veneration of the sun and of the river Nile, two sources of life. A vast number of deities were adored. They represented the forces and phenomena of nature. Ptah, whose name occurs in Menephtah, was chief. He represented the organizing and motive power developed from moisture. The names of several others are found in the O. T.—Ra, the sun god, illuminator of the world and awakener of life (in Ramses); Thum, the evening sun, the possessor of creative power and the dispenser of the welcome evening breezes (in Pithom); daughter; his two sons by Rachel with twelve sons, of which number three were already in Egypt; and his two sons by Rachel's maid with five sons (xlv. 8-25). All the souls which came with Jacob into Egypt, which came out of his loins (even though perhaps some were yet unborn, cp. Heb. vii. 9, 10), were sixty-six souls (Gen. xlv. 26). All the souls of the house of Jacob which came into Egypt first and last, including the head of the house and Joseph with his two sons who were born in Egypt, were seventy souls (ver. 27). This is also the enumeration of Ex. i. 5 (as in Gen. xlv. 15, apparently exclusive of Jacob, but in reality inclusive of him) and Deut. x. 22. The Septuagint, however, and Stephen who follows the Greek version (Acts vii. 14) reckon seventy-five. This result is due to the addition in Gen. xlv. 20 of three grandsons and two great-grandsons of Joseph, whose names are obtained from Num. xxvi. 29 and 35 seq. The numerical correspondences of the register, a total of seventy, and the descendants of each maid precisely half those of her mistress (Leah 32, Zilpah 16, Rachel 14, Bilhah 7), suggest design, and can scarcely be altogether accidental. A comparison with Num. xxvi leads to the belief that regard was had to the subsequent national organization in constructing this table, and that its design was to include those descendants of Jacob from whom permanent tribal divisions sprang, even if in a few instances they were still in the loins of the patriarch when he led his tribe into Egypt. The tribe of Israel settled in Goshen, and remained in and about this fertile region until the exodus (Gen. xlvii. 6, 11; Ex. viii. 22; ix. 26; xii. 37).

III. 2 The sojourn as embedded in the national consciousness. The descent of Jacob and his family into Egypt, their subsequent increase and enslavement, their sufferings and their exodus in a body, were recorded in their earliest historical document (Gen. xlv. 4, 28-34; xlvii. 27; Ex. i. 9, 11, 15-22, ii. 11; xii. 31-37, xiii. 21). The feast of the passover, and to a less degree that of the tabernacles, bore testimony to the events, and kept the knowledge of them alive among the people. Psalmists pitched their songs of redemption and their hymns in celebration of Jehovah's might to its key, and from it prophets drew lessons. The standing types of the grievous oppression of the church and of God's redemptive power and love are Israel's bondage of old in Egypt and deliverance from that furnace of affliction. The tradition is not peculiar to one tribe, as though but a portion of the Hebrew folk had endured Egyptian slavery; it is not exclusively Judæan, but it is Ephraimite as well. The prophets of both kingdoms voice it—Isaiah, Micah, and Jeremiah, among the hills of Judah (Is. xi. 16; Mic. vi. 4; vii. 15; Jer. ii. 6; vii. 22), and Hosea and Amos in the kingdom of Samaria (Hos. ii. 15; viii. 13; ix. 3; xi. 1; xii. 9, 13; Amos ii. 10; iii. 1; ix. 7). The tradition is the common property of all Israel. The people as a whole had suffered Egyptian bondage.

III. 3 The duration of the sojourn. The biblical data are stated in the following terms: "He said unto Abraham, 'Thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them 400 years . . . but in the fourth generation they shall come hither again'" (Gen. xv. 13-16). "The sojourning of the children of Israel, which they sojourned in Egypt, was 430 years" (Ex. xii. 40, R V); according to the Septuagint and Samaritan Pentateuch in this passage, the sojourning "in Egypt and in the land of Canaan was 430 years." God spake to Abraham "that his seed should sojourn in a strange land; and that they should bring them into bondage, and entreat them evil 400 years" (Acts vii. 6). "The law came 430 years after" the covenant (Gal. iii. 17).

These statements are interpreted to mean—(1) The children of Israel dwelt in Egypt 215 years. For the Seventy, either to remove an ambiguity or because their Hebrew manuscripts differed from the present Hebrew text, add the words "and in the land of Canaan" to the statement in Ex. xii. 40. Now from the date of the covenant with Abram, shortly after his arrival in Canaan, to the migration of his descendants into Egypt was about 215 years (Gen. xii. 4; with xxi. 5; xxv. 26; xlvii. 9), leaving 215 years for the sojourn of the children of Israel in Egypt. This statement is also made by Josephus, who says, "The Hebrews left Egypt 430 years after our forefather Abraham came into Canaan, but 215 years only after Jacob removed into Egypt" (Antiq. ii. 15, 2). In this statement he is following the Septuagint, but he nullifies his statement by saying elsewhere, "400 years did they spend under these labors" (Antiq. ii. 9, 1; War v. 9, 4; manifestly incorrect, for the Israelites were not oppressed for 400 years). But however Josephus may vacillate, Paul dates the law at Sinai 430 years after the covenant with Abram, and the genealogies give four generations between Jacob and the exodus, which may cover 215 years, but scarcely 400 years (Ex. vi. 16-20).

The biblical data are explained to mean (2) The children of Israel dwelt 430 years in Egypt. (1) The natural interpretation of Gen. xv. 13-16 requires this. (a) The statement is not that the Israelites should be afflicted 400 years, but that the entire sojourn as strangers in a land not theirs, where they shall be eventually brought into bondage, is 400 years. (b) The event is not to take place until after Abraham's death (ver. 15). (c) The four generations are equivalent to the aforementioned 400 years. In this passage, generation does not mean each succession of persons from a common ancestor, as it does in Ex. xx. 5; Job xlii. 16, but the age or period of a body of contemporaries, and this not in our modern sense of the average lifetime of all who pass the age of infancy, but the average period of the activity of any generation, and this is determined by the normal span of life. The generation lasts while any of its members survive (Ex. i. 6, Num. xxxii. 13; Judg. ii. 10; Ecc. i. 4). The period of a generation's activity may be judged from the length of the life of Isaac, 180 years; of Jacob, 147 years; of Levi, 137; of Kohath, 133; of Amram, 137; of Aaron, 123; of Moses, 120 (Gen. xxxv. 28; xlvii. 28; Ex. vi. 16, 18, 20; Num. xxxiii. 39; Deut. xxxiv. 7). Or the period of a generation's activity may be estimated from the record of three generations between the birth of Abraham and the descent into Egypt, when Jacob was still active, a period of 290 years. A generation was about 100 years. But are not just four generations registered—namely, Levi and Kohath, who came into Egypt with Jacob, Amram, Moses, and Moses' sons? A consecutive genealogy in Levi, Kohath, and Amram is admitted; but was Moses the son of Amram and Jochebed (Ex. vi 20, 1 Chron. vi. 1-3)? A difficulty arises if the passage be so interpreted. (a) Amram and his brothers gave rise to the Amramites, Izharites, Hebronites, and Uzzielites, and these one year after the exodus amounted to 8600 males; that is, the grandfather of Moses had 8600 male descendants in the days of Moses, of whom 2750 were between the ages of 30 and 50 (Num. iii 27, iv 36). (b) In the parallel genealogy of the contemporaries of Moses Bezalel is seventh from Jacob and Joshua apparently eleventh (1 Chron. ii 18-20; vii. 23-27). The language of Ex. vi. 20 does not necessarily, nor even evidently, mean that Amram and Jochebed were the immediate parents of Moses and Aaron. In Gen. xlvii 18, great-grandsons of Zilpah are mentioned with others as sons which she bore to Jacob. In Mat. i 8 Joram is said to beget his great-great-grandson Uziah. According to Gen. x 15-18 Canaan begat nations. Where the birth of Moses is narrated in detail, he is not said to be the child of Amram and Jochebed (Ex. ii). The reason for registering only four names in the genealogy of Moses and others (Ex. vi. 16-22) is that the first three names are official and give the tribe, family, and father's house to which Moses and Aaron belonged. The three names properly and at once classify Moses and Aaron. (2) 430 years for the sojourn is also the record of Ex. xii. 40. The statement does not include the sojourn of the patriarchs in Canaan, for (a) Abraham and Isaac were not sons of Israel, and (b) the verse in the Hebrew, Chaldee, etc., except Septuagint and Samaritan, makes no reference to Canaan. (3) A sojourn of 430 years best accounts for the number of the children of Israel at the exodus. (4) On the interpretation of the data as meaning that the sojourn lasted 430 years Paul's statement in Galatians can be accounted for. It is not his object to measure the exact time between the covenant and the law. His argument only requires him to prove that the law was given long after the covenant, and hence cannot disannul it. He proves it by citing the well-known period of the sojourn which intervened between the two events; the largest and most familiar single sum of years in the interval. He does not state that the law came exactly 430 years after the covenant; but he rather says that the law came, as we all know, 430 years after the covenant. It is indifferent whether he has the Hebrew or the Greek text in mind, and whether his Galatian readers refer to the Hebrew or to the Greek edition.

III. 4. The multiplication of the Israelites during the sojourn. (1) It has been pointed out (Keil) that if from the seventy souls who went down into Egypt there be deducted the patriarch Jacob, his twelve sons, Dinah, and Serah daughter of Asher, and also the three sons of Levi, the four grandsons of Judah and Asher, and those grandsons of Jacob who probably died without male offspring, inasmuch as their descendants are not named among the families of Israel (see Num. xxvi), there will remain forty-one grandsons of Jacob (besides the Levites) who founded families; and if, furthermore, there be allowed but ten generations for the 430 years; nevertheless the forty-one men would increase to 478,224 males if each family averaged three sons and three daughters during the first six generations, and two sons and two daughters during the last four generations. These with the survivors of the ninth generation would amount to more than 600,000 men above twenty years of age. (2) It is a mistake to overlook the fact that the household of the patriarch included numerous servants (Gen. xxx 43; xxxii. 5, xlv 10), who were circumcised (Gen. xvii 12, 13) and enjoyed full religious privileges (Ex. xii 44, 48, 49, etc.), and with whom intermarriage was no degradation (Gen. xvi. 1, 2, xxx 4, 9, Num. xii. 1; 1 Chron. ii 34, 35).

III 5. The change of occupation during the sojourn. When the Israelites settled in Goshen they were a comparatively small tribe, independent, and herdsmen. But after Joseph and the men of that generation died, a new king arose who knew not Joseph (Ex. i 6-8). He saw the increasing numbers of the Israelites, and, fearing that they might ally themselves with the enemies of Egypt, took measures to render them a subject people and to check their increase. Taskmasters were placed over them, and rigorous service was exacted from them in the form of agriculture, brickmaking, and building (Ex. i 11, 14; v. 6-8), while they still provided some at least of their own support by herding (ix. 4, 6; x. 9, 24; xii 38).

III 6. The miracles wrought by Moses at the end of the sojourn. The oppression of the Israelites lasted eighty years or more (Ex. vii 7. cp. ii 2 seq.). At length their cry came up unto God, and he sent Moses to deliver them (ii 23 seq.). The humble ambassador of heaven was provided with miracles as his credentials. They were miracles; that is, in Scripture parlance, signs, wonders, and powers (Ps. lxxviii. 12, 43). They were wonderful, unusual, and intended to enforce attention. They were signs accrediting Moses as the messenger of God to the Israelites (Ex. iv. 8, 9, 30, 31, vi. 7) and to Pharaoh (iii. 20; iv. 21; vii. 3-5; viii. 22, 23). They were powers, not natural phenomena; for (1) design is apparent in them, and not the blindness of nature.

They form an orderly series; the one is in logical but not causal relation to its successor; they increase in severity, affording Pharaoh sufficient evidence at the outset of the divine authority of Moses, without inflicting unnecessary suffering upon the Egyptians; and when he refuses to let the Hebrews go, they become more intense, and bring ever-increasing pressure upon his obdurate heart until he finally yields. (2) A distinction was made, which nature does not make, between racial in itself and as appears from the narrative, they retained their organization despite their enslavement. They did not amalgamate with the master race, but remained a distinct people and preserved the twelve great family divisions. By the end of the 430 years the families of the twelve sons had become twelve tribes, and the sons' sons, and in a few instances the sons' remoter descendants, had grown into large family connections. Accordingly, at the time of the exodus there was a Brickmaking in Ancient Egypt.

the people of God and the Egyptians (viii 22, 23; ix. 4, 25, 26; x 22, 23; xi 5-7; and cp ix. 11; x. 6). (3) A pestilence might have slain a great number of the Egyptians in one night, but the tenth plague is a pestilence with a method. It is not a promiscuous death, the firstborn in every family of the Egyptians dies.

These signs, wonders, and powers belong to the first group of miracles recorded in Scripture. See MIRACLES.

III 7. The organization of the Israelites at the end of the sojourn. The forefathers of the children of Israel had descended into Egypt as a family of twelve households, and had settled together in Goshen. As is quite natural in itself and as appears from the narrative, they retained their organization despite their enslavement. They did not amalgamate with the master race, but remained a distinct people and preserved the twelve great family divisions. By the end of the 430 years the families of the twelve sons had become twelve tribes, and the sons' sons, and in a few instances the sons' remoter descendants, had grown into large family connections. Accordingly, at the time of the exodus there was a people, Israel, divided into twelve tribes; and each tribe was subdivided into families or connections, which derived their names for the most part from the grandsons of Jacob (Ex vi 14 with Gen xlii 9, and Num xxvi. with Gen xlii), and at the time of the second census numbered 57, without Levi; and each family connection into fathers' houses (Num i. 2, 18, 20). Authority of various kinds was vested in (1) Princes by birth (Ex xvi 22), heads of the tribes or family connections (Num i 4, 16). (2) Elders, who were probably heads of tribes and families, and aged (Ex iv 29; xii 21, xvii 5-6) (3) Apparently also in priests (Ex xix. 22, 24; perhaps cp Ex. xxiv 5). They were probably men out of the various tribes who were performing priestly functions for the Israelites, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as head of the family, had offered sacrifice. (4) The Egyptians had imposed further organization on the Israelites by setting officers (Ex v. 6, 10, 19) over them; Hebrews (Ex v. 15, 16), who had undoubtedly been appointed on the ground of their ability to direct. Through these various representatives Pharaoh and Moses communicated their will to all the people with dispatch. The children of Israel, grouped in tribes, families, and fathers' houses, officered and accustomed to obedience, were not an unwieldy horde, but a multitude with the organization of an army. They are fittingly called the hosts or armies of the Lord, and it is significantly said that they went out of Egypt by their hosts (Ex. xii. 41).

III. 8. The Pharaohs of the oppression and exodus Ramses II is commonly regarded as the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Menep-tah as the Pharaoh of the exodus.* This opin-

* In view of various references in the tablets of Tell el-Amarna to the Habiri making war with the inhabitants of western Palestine in the days of Amenophis IV., and the similarity of this name to the word Hebrew, and the essential agreement of this date with the date of the exodus which Usher obtained from a study of the biblical data, certain recent writers are inclined ion is based on the following considerations: (1) The Israelites had not obtained possession of Palestine in the days of Amenophis III. and IV., for the country, whose condition at that time has been revealed by the tablets found at Tell el-Amarna, was broken up into petty governments, and under Egyptian suzerainty. Ramses II, moreover, and Ramses III., both of whom warred in Palestine, make no mention of the Israelites as being in the land; and the Hebrew records are silent as to an invasion of the country by these Egyptian monarchs. (2) In Ex 11 it is noted that the children of Israel built for Pharaoh store cities, Pithom and Ramses. The site of

Storehouse for Grain in Ancient Egypt

Pithom has been identified and the ancient granaries uncovered. No remains have been found there of earlier date than the reign of Ramses II., and his name is inscribed on some of the stones. Apparently Pithom was built in the reign of Ramses II. It was Ramses II also who erected a new town, with temples and shrines, adjacent to the ancient fortress at Zoan, and on this account the place was called Pa-Ramses the city of Ramses. These correspondences with the Hebrew records indicate that Ramses II was the Pharaoh of the oppression. (3) Meneptah, a son and successor of Ramses II., in an inscription in which he records his repulse of the Libyan invasion of his fifth year, closes with describing certain consequences of this victory. He mentions the ravaging of Pa-Kanana in southern Palestine, the capture of Ashkelon and Gezer in Philistia, the reduction of a town near Tyre the spoiling of the people of Israel, and the widowhood of Khar, i. e. south-to believe that Amen-hetep II., or Thothmes IV., was the Pharaoh of the exodus. The weighty objections to this theory are—1 Habiri is not the natural transliteration of 'Ibri, Hebrew, a word which begins with unpointed ain and short i. Habiri is rather connected etymologically with such Hebrew words as Heber and Huber, and hence is regarded by philologists as most probably meaning the allies. 2 Ramses is a geographical designation (Ex 11 xi 37), and the theory in question is unable to explain how it could have been so in the days of Amen-hetep II. or Thothmes IV., years before the first Ramses ascended the throne of Egypt.

ern Palestine. The reference to the people of Israel has been plausibly explained as noting an attack on the children of Israel during their sojourn in the wilderness on the borders of southern Palestine. See PHARAOH. As already stated, Ramses III., who succeeded Meneptah after an interval, warred in Palestine, but does not mention the Israelites as being in the country. It is reasonable to believe that the Israelites left Egypt at the beginning of Meneptah's reign, but had not spent their forty years in the wilderness and arrived in Canaan by the reign of Ramses III. For the date of the exodus, see CHRONOLOGY.

E'hi. See AHIRAM

E'hud [union].

1 A Benjamite, descended through Jediahel (1 Chron. vii 10)

2. A left-handed Benjamite, descended through Gera. He assassinated Eglon, king of Moab, then the oppressor of Israel, at Jericho. Fleeing to the hill country of Ephraim, he summoned the Israelites by sound of trumpet, put himself at their head, descended to the valley of the Jordan, seized the ford of the river, and slew 10,000 Moabites as they attempted to cross. He judged Israel for the remainder of his life, and kept the people true to Jehovah (Judg. iii. 15-iv. 1)

E'ker [one transplanted, a man of foreign descent settled in a place]

A man of Judah, a son of Ram, of the house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 27).

Ek'ron [eradication]

The most northerly of the five chief Philistine cities (Josh. xii 3, 1 Sam. vi 16, 17). It was assigned to Judah (Josh. xv. 45, 46), and afterwards to Dan (xix 43); but the boundary line of Judah ran past it (xv. 11), and it was taken and possessed by the men of that tribe (Judg. i 18). After a time it was recovered by the Philistines. When the people first of Ashdod and then of Gath became afraid to retain the ark of God, they sent it to Ekron, whence it was returned to Israel (1 Sam. v 10). Ekron was apparently taken by the Israelites under Samuel, but was soon again a Philistine city (vii 14; xvi 52). Its tutelary god was Baal-zebub, whom Ahaziah, king of Israel, sent to consult (2 Kin. i. 2-16). Judgment was denounced against it and the other Philistine cities by the prophets (Jer. xxv. 20; Amos i 8; Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix 5, 7). Alexander Balas, king of Syria, gave Ekron to Jonathan Maccabæus (1 Mac. x 89). It still existed at the time of the Crusades. It is believed to be now represented by the village of 'Akir, situated among fine gardens, 6 miles west of Gezer, and 12 northeast from Azotus. No visible relics of antiquity have been found at the place; but Robinson was assured by the Mohammedan sheik of the place that in digging old cisterns the stones of handmills, etc., are occasionally brought to light.

E'la, in A. V. Elah [terebinth or like tree]. The father of one of Solomon's purveyors (1 Kin. iv. 18).

El'a-dah, in R. V. Eledah [God hath adorned].

A descendant of Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 20).

E'lah [a large evergreen tree, like the ilex or terebinth].

1. A valley near Socoh in which Saul and the Israelites pitched, confronting the Philistines, just before the combat between David and Goliath (1 Sam. xvii. 2, 19; xxi. 9). Probably the wady es-Sunt, which is formed by the junction of three other valleys, and is about 14 or 15 miles west by south from Bethlehem. It is fertile and traversed by a stream. Wady es-Sunt means the valley of the acacia (Acacia vera), of which various trees exist in the valley.

2. A duke of Edom, named from his habitation (Gen. xxxvi. 41; 1 Chron. i. 52). See ELATH.

3. A son of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. iv. 15).

4. A Benjamite, son of Uzzi (1 Chron. ix. 8).

5. The father of one of Solomon's purveyors. See ELA.

6. The son and successor of Baasha in the kingdom of Israel. He reigned part of two years. As he was drinking himself drunk in the house of his steward, in Tirzah, his capital, he was assassinated, with all his house, by Zimri, who commanded half his chariots. This fulfilled the prophecy made by Jehu, the son of Hanani, to Baasha. That it did so in no way justified the murderous deed (1 Kin. xvi. 6, 8-10).

7. The father of Hoshea, king of Israel (2 Kin. xv. 30; xvii. 1; xviii. 1).

E'lam [high].

1. A son of Shem or the inhabitants of Elam, as being Semites or becoming incorporated with the Semites by conquest (Gen. x. 22; 1 Chron. i. 17). Elam was a region beyond the Tigris, east of Babylonia. It was bounded on the north by Assyria and Media, on the south by the Persian Gulf, on the east and southeast by Persia. The name is preserved in the Greek Elumene, the Latin Elymais. Its capital was Shushan or Susa, which gave rise to the name Susiana, though sometimes Elymais and Susiana are made the names of adjacent instead of identical regions. Elam was the seat of an ancient empire. In the time of Abraham, Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, was recognized as sovereign by Babylonian states, and laid even the country on the Jordan under tribute (Gen. xiv. 1-11). In the eighth and seventh centuries B. C., when Assyria was the dominant power in western Asia, Elam was its doughty opponent; but was subjugated after repeated campaigns of the Assyrians under Sargon, Sennacherib, and Ashurbanipal. Shushan was at length taken about 645 B. C. Elamites rendered military service to the Assyrians in the invasion of Judah (cp. Is. xxii. 6). But before the close of the century, Elam was relieved of the Assyrian yoke through the capture of Nineveh by the Babylonians and the fall of the Assyrian empire. When Ezekiel prophesied the invasion of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, he mentioned a prior slaughter of the Elamites, perhaps by Nebuchadnezzar (Ezek. xxxii. 24). But Elam, joining with Media, was ultimately to capture Babylon (Isa. xxi. 2; cp. 9). To this conquest and restoration the following prophecies regarding Elam seem to refer (Jer. xlix. 34-39, Ezek. xxxii. 24, 25). Elam was a province and Shushan a capital of the Persian empire (Dan. vii. 2; Herodotus iii. 91; iv. 83; v. 49). On the return of the Jews from Babylon, Elamites, who had long before been forcibly settled in Samaria, joined with others in attempting to prevent the rebuilding of the temple and city of Jerusalem (Ezra iv. 9). Elamites were present on that day of Pentecost which was notable for the descent of the Holy Spirit (Acts i. 9). Elam or Susiana, now Khuzistan, is a province of modern Persia.

2. The fifth son of Meshelemiah, a Korahite Levite, in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxvi. 3).

3. A Benjamite, a son of Shashak (1 Chron. viii. 24).

4. The head of a family of which 1254 individuals returned from Babylon with Zerubabel (Ezra ii. 7; Neh. vii. 12), and 71 more with Ezra (Ezra vii. 7). Its representative signed the covenant in Nehemiah's time (Neh. x. 14).

5. The other Elam, of whom just as many descendants returned as of No. 4 (Ezra ii. 31; Neh. vii. 34).

6. A priest who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 42).

El'a-sa, in A. V. Eleasa.

A place at which Judas Maccabæus once camped (1 Mac. ix. 5), probably the ruins Il'asa, which lie midway between the two Beth-horons.

El'a-sah [God hath made]. The Hebrew name is sometimes Anglicized as Eleasah.

1. A son of Shaphan. He and Gemariah carried a letter from Jeremiah in Jerusalem to the exiles in Babylon (Jer. xxxix. 3).

2. A son of Pashur, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 22).

E'lath and Elloth, the singular or plural being used indifferently; also Elah and El, other forms of the singular [terebinth or other large tree].

A town on the gulf of Akaba (Deut. ii. 8; 1 Kin. ix. 26), on the eastern border of the wilderness of Paran (Gen. xiv. 6). The caravan routes between southern Arabia and Egypt and Phœnicia passed its gates, making its possession valuable to an extorcer of tribute. It was taken by Chedorlaomer from the Horites (Gen. xiv. 6). In it dwelt a duke of Edom (xxxvi. 41), and it constituted the southern limit of the Edomites (Deut. ii 8). It doubtless fell into the hands of David (2 Sam. viii. 14; cp 1 Kin. ix 26, 2 Chron viii 17). After a time it reverted to the Edomites. Uzziah rebuilt it and restored it to Judah (2 Kin. xiv. 22; 2 Chron xxvi 2). It was afterwards captured by the Syrians and long remained in their power (2 Kin xvi 6) Elath, called in the Greek and Roman period Aila and Aelana, gave the name Aelamitic to the gulf of Akaba, at the northeastern corner of which it was situated. It was long the station of a Roman legion. It was once the seat of a Christian bishopric. It was taken and retaken during the Crusades. It is now called Ailah and 'Akaba, and consists merely of extensive mounds of rubbish.

El-be'rith. See BAAI-BERITH

El-beth'-el [God of Bethel]

The name given by Jacob to an altar which he reared at Bethel, after his return from Mesopotamia. It commemorated the appearance of God to him there in a dream when he was fleeing to escape the consequences of his brother's wrath (Gen xxxv 7, cp xxviii 10 seq.). The sanctuary was named after the God to whom it was dedicated. Cp EL-EL-OHE-ISRAEL.

El'da-ah [God hath called]

A son or tribe descended from Midian and related to Abraham (Gen xxv 4, 1 Chron. i 33).

El'dad [God hath loved]

An elder and officer of the Israelites who was sunnointed with sixty-nine others to assist Moses in bearing the burden of government. Eldad and Medad for some reason failed to present themselves with the others at the tabernacle, nevertheless they, too, although absent in the camp, were filled like the others with the divine Spirit, who worketh when and where he will. Joshua was jealous for Moses' honor, which he feared would suffer because they had received the gift without the intervention of Moses, but Moses rejoiced, and only wished that the Lord would put his Spirit upon all his people (Num. xi. 26-29).

El'der.

An official who, so far as can be judged, had by virtue of his right as firstborn succeeded to the headship of a father's house, of a tribal family, or of the tribe itself (1 Kin viii 1-3; Judg viii 14, 16). When he was the head and representative of a tribe or of the larger tribal families the elder was an important prince. In the ordinary course of nature, only men of mature age came into these positions hence the designation elder. Other peoples which were organized on the tribal system had elders, as the Midianites and Moabites (Num. xxii 4, 7). The title designates high officials generally in Gen. i 7. They exercised authority over the people (Deut. xxvii 1; Ezra x. 8), and re-resented the nation in affairs of state (Ex. iii 18; Judg. xi. 5-11; 1 Sam. viii. 4), in extending honor to a distinguished guest (Ex. xviii 12), in concluding covenants (2 Sam. v. 3), and in religious acts (Lev. iv 13-15; Josh vii 6). A body of seventy elders assisted Moses in the government of the Israelites (Num. xi. 16, 24). Each town had its elders, who were probably the heads of the several family connections in the place and who administered its civil and religious affairs (Deut. xix 12, xxi 2, Ruth iv 2-11; 1 Sam. xi 3, Ezra x 14). These functions were still performed by the elders at the time of the Roman government of Judaea (Mat. xv. 2; xxi 23; xxvi 3, 47). See SYNAGOGUE and SANHEDRIN.

In the churches founded by the apostles elder or presbyter and bishop were interchangeable designations (Acts xx 17 with 28, R V; Titus i 5, 7), though not strictly synonymous. The former had primary reference to the dignity of the office, the latter to its duties. The distinction between elder or presbyter and bishop, as two separate orders of ministers, dates from the second century. The origin of the office of elder is not recorded, but elders existed practically from the beginning. In A. D. 44 they already existed in the church at Jerusalem (Acts xi. 30), Paul on his first missionary journey appointed elders in every church (xiv. 23), and they held office in churches not founded by Paul (Jas. v 14, 1 Pet. v 1). The office of elder in the Christian church was evidently suggested by the office of elder among the Jews, and was invested with similar authority. Elders were associated with the apostles in the government of the church (Acts xv 2, 4, 6, 22, 23, xvi 4, cp xxi 18). They were the bishops or overseers of the local churches (xx 17, 28, Tit. i 5), having the spiritual care of the congregation, exercising rule and giving instruction (1 Tim. iii 5; v. 17, Tit. i 9, Jas. v 14, 1 Pet. v. 1-4; cp. Heb. xiii 17) and ordaining to office (1 Tim. iv 14). There were several bishops (Phil. i 1) or elders (Acts xi 30) in a local church. There is no intimation of any division of labor among them. As in the synagogue, so in the Christian church of apostolic times, preaching was not the peculiar function of the elders, nor was it restricted to them. They were, indeed, the regular pastors and teachers. Aptness to teach was an essential qualification for the office (1 Tim. iii 2; Tit. i 9). But any man who possessed the gift of prophecy or teaching exhorted (1 Cor. xii. 28-30 xiv 24, 31).

In the government of Reformed churches the teaching elder is the minister, and the ruling elder is a layman who is an elder. The arrangement is convenient, but its existence in apostolic times is not universally admitted. Calvin interpreted 1 Tim. v. 17 as teaching two kinds of elders; first, those who both teach and rule, and second, those who rule only But there is a wide dissent from this interpretation. It is urged that the apostle is speaking of two functions of the same office, the primitive elder having been, it is contended, both teacher and ruler.

In the Apocalypse the elders are twenty-four in number, possibly with reference back to the twelve founders of tribes under the Jewish economy. and the twelve apostles under the Christian church (Rev. iv. 4, 10; v. 5, 6, 8, 14; vii. 11-13; xi. 16; xix. 4).

E'le-ad [God continueth].

A descendant, perhaps son, of Ephraim. He and his brother were killed by the people of Gath when attempting to carry away the cattle belonging to that Philistine town. Ephraim, who was alive at the time, greatly mourned his loss (1 Chron. vii. 20-22).

E-le-a'dah. See ELADAH.

E-le-a'leh.

A town rebuilt by the Reubenites (Num. xxxii. 3, 37). Later it fell into the hands of the Moabites (Is. xv. 4, xvi. 9; Jer. xlvii. 34). The ruins, now called el-'Al, are on top of a hill on the Roman road, scarcely 2 miles north of Heshbon. Tristram describes them as consisting of stone heaps with a single standing column.

E-le-a-sa. See ELASA.

E-le-a'sah [God hath made]. In Hebrew it is the same word as Elasa.

1. A descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel, but with Egyptian blood in his veins (1 Chron. ii. 39).

2. A descendant of Saul and Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 37, ix. 43).

E-le-a'zar [God hath helped]. Grecized as Lazarus, in Latin Lazarus.

1. The third son of Aaron (Ex. vi. 23; Num. iii. 2) and father of Phinehas (Ex. vi. 25). With his brothers and his father he was consecrated a priest, and afterwards acted as such (Ex. xxviii. 1; Num. iii. 4, xvi. 37-40; xix. 3). He was not allowed to mourn when his elder brothers, Nadab and Abihu, were killed for offering strange fire (Lev. x. 6-20). He then became chief of the Levites, and second only to Aaron in priestly authority (Num. iii. 32). Before Aaron died on Mount Hor, Eleazar, who had been directed to ascend the mountain with him, was invested with his sacred garments, and succeeded him in the high-priesthood (xx. 25-28; Deut. x. 6). He held this office during the remainder of Moses' life and the leadership of Joshua. He took a prominent part in distributing Canaan by lot among the several tribes (Josh. xiv. 1). He was buried in a hill belonging to his son Phinehas in Mount Ephraim (xxiv. 33), and was succeeded by Phinehas (Judg. xx. 28; 1 Chron. iv. 4, 50).

2. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mahli. Dying without sons, his daughters were taken to wife by their cousins (1 Chron. xxiii. 21, 22; xxiv. 28; cp. Num. xxxvi. 6-9).

3. A son of Abinadab. He was consecrated by the men of Kirjath-jearim to keep the ark when they nobly received it from Bethshemesh after its restoration by the Philistines (1 Sam. vii. 1).

4. One of David's mighty men, a son of Dodo, the Ahohite (2 Sam. xxiii. 9; 1 Chron. xi. 12, cp. xxvii. 4 perhaps).

5. A priest son of Phinehas. He assisted the high priest in the time of Ezra (Ezra viii. 33).

6. A son of Parosh, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 25).

7. A priest, one of those who acted as musicians at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42).

8. Surnamed Avaran, of priestly descent, a son of Mattathias and brother of Judas the Maccabee (1 Mac. ii. 5). In the battle between Judas and the Syrians at Beth-zacharias, he boldly ran into the ranks of the enemy, crept under an elephant whose trappings indicated that it carried a royal rider, and thrust it in the belly. The beast in its fall crushed Eleazar to death (vi. 43-46).

9. An ancestor, perhaps great-grandfather, of Joseph, the husband of Mary (Mat. i. 15).

El-e-lo'he-Is'ra-el [God, the God of Israel].

The name given by Jacob to an altar which he erected near Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 20).

E'leph [an ox].

A village of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23). Site unknown.

El'e-phant

The English name for a genus of animals containing two recent species—Elephas indicus, the Indian, and Elephas africanus, the African elephant, with several others now extinct. Their tusks furnish ivory (1 Kin. x. 22, A. V. margin). The elephant was used in war (1 Mac. i. 17; ii. 34), each beast being in charge of an Indian driver, and bearing on its back a tower from which two, three, or four soldiers fought (1 Mac. vi. 37, where thirty-two is an obvious error; Livy xxxvii. 40). The entire body of elephants was under a master (2 Mac. xiv. 12). Before entering battle, it was customary to inflame them by the sight and even taste of wine (1 Mac. vi. 34; 3 Mac. v. 2).

E-leu'the-rus. [free].

A river (1 Mac. xi. 7; Antiq. xiii. 4, 5) which flows from Lebanon and empties into the Mediterranean sea north of Tripoli (Pliny, Hist. nat. v. 17), and which formed the boundary between Palestine and Syria (1 Mac. xii. 30; Antiq. xv. 4, 1; Strabo xvi. 2, 12). It is now called Nahr el-Kebir.

El-ha'nán [God hath been gracious].

1. A son of Jair and perhaps a Bethlehemite, who slew [the brother of] Goliath of Gath (cp. 2 Sam. xxi. 19 with 1 Chron. xx. 5). The text of at least one passage, perhaps of both, has become corrupt. The letters of "Bethlehemite Goliath," with the particle 'eth between them, which stand together in the Hebrew text of Samuel, closely resemble those of "Lahmi the brother of Goliath."

2 A Bethlehemite, a son of Dodo, and one of David's thirty heroes of the second rank (2 Sam. xxiii. 24; 1 Chron. xi. 26)

E'li, I. [my God]

A word occurring in the utterance of Jesus on the cross, spoken in Aramaic, 'Eli, 'Eli lammah sh'baktani. "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Mat. xxvii. 46, cp. Ps. cxli. 1). In Mark xv. 34, Eloi, an Aramaic synonym of Eli containing a different word for God, is used.

E'li, II. [probably elevation, height]

A high priest of the family of Ithamar (1 Sam. i. 9; 1 Kin. ii. 27 with 1 Chron. xxiv. 3, 6). He is said to have been the first of Ithamar's line to receive the office (Antiq. v. 11, 5, viii. 1, 3), but it is uncertain which priest of the other line he succeeded. Eli was also active as a judge of Israel. Being deeply pious, he had an essential qualification for his exalted offices. But there was one serious defect in his conduct: he did not deal firmly with his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, when their behavior in the priestly office was scandalous (1 Sam. ii. 23-25, 29, iii. 13). Divine judgment was therefore denounced against him and his house by a prophet. Eli should see evil befall the sanctuary, his descendants should die in the flower of their age, his two sons should perish in one day, and a faithful priest should supersede Eli's descendants, from whom they should seek for subordinate priestly appointments that they might be fed (ii. 27-36). The message was confirmed by a similar revelation to young Samuel, which Eli received with resignation (iii. 11-18). Soon afterwards Hophni and Phinehas, as custodians of the ark, carried it to the field of battle, to aid the Israelites against the Philistines. Eli, now 98 years old and blind, being anxious for the ark, took his seat by the wayside to watch. A runner arrived from the scene of strife with the news of Israel's defeat, the death of Hophni and Phinehas, and the capture of the ark of God. On hearing that the ark of God had been taken by the enemy Eli fell backward from the seat and, being stout, broke his neck and expired (iv. 1-18). He had judged Israel forty years. Ahitub succeeded to the rank of high priest (xiv. 3); but with the death of Eli the office lost for a long time its importance, for the ark was in captivity and seclusion, and the tabernacle was no longer the place of Jehovah's gracious presence. Samuel the prophet was the religious leader of the people. The judgment against Eli's posterity was executed when Solomon deposed Eli's descendant Abiathar from the high priesthood, substituting Zadok in his room (1 Kin. ii. 35).

E-li'ab [God is a father].

1. The son of Helon, and the head of the tribe of Zebulun in the wilderness (Num. i. 9; ii. 7; vii. 24, 29; x. 16)

2. A Reubenite, son of Pallu and father of Dathan and Abiram (Num. xvi. 1, 12; xxvi. 8, 9)

3. A Levite, an ancestor of Samuel (1 Chron. vi. 27, 28). See ELIHU.

4. David's eldest brother. He was so tall and had so kingly a countenance that on seeing him Samuel exclaimed, "Surely the Lord's anointed is before him." But judged by the heart he was not worthy of the kingdom (1 Sam. xvi. 6, 7; xvii. 13). One defect which he had was his inability to appreciate the larger soul of David, his youngest brother (28, 29). His daughter Abigail married a son of David (2 Chron. xi. 18, R. V.).

5. A Gadite, of the heroic type who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 9)

6. A Levite, musician at the sanctuary in David's reign (1 Chron. xv. 20)

E-li'a-da, in A. V. once Eliadah (1 Kin. xi. 23) [God has known—a e kindly regarded].

1. A son of David, born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. iii. 8). Called also Beeliada (q. v.)

2. Father of Rezon of Zobah (1 Kin. xi. 23).

3. A Benjamite, one of Jehoshaphat's chief captains (2 Chron. xvii. 17).

E-li'ah. See ELIJAH 2 and 4

E-li'ah-ba [God hath hidden].

A Shaalbonite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 32; 1 Chron. xi. 33).

E-li'a-kim [God hath established].

1. An ancestor of Christ. He lived before the captivity, and was descended from David through Nathan (Luke iii. 30, 31).

2. Son of Hilkiah. He was over king Hezekiah's household; and when Jerusalem had closed its gates against the Assyrians, he was one of three representatives of the king who were sent to confer with the rabshakeh of Sennacherib (2 Kin. xviii. 18, 26, 37; Is. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22). Next they were dispatched to lay the answer of the rabshakeh before Isaiah, and desire him to obtain divine direction in the great crisis which had arisen (2 Kin. xix. 2; Is. xxxvii. 2). The prophet so highly commended Eliakim, and made him such promises from God, as to suggest that he must be regarded as a type of the Messiah (Is. xxii. 20-25).

3. One of Josiah's sons, made king by Pharaoh-necho, who changed his name to Jehoiakim (2 Kin. xxiii. 34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4).

4. One of the priests who officiated at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 41)

5. A descendant of Zerubbabel and an ancestor of Christ (Mat. i. 13).

E-li'am [God is one of the family].

Father of Bath-sheba (2 Sam. xi. 3); by transposition of the constituent parts of the name called Ammel (1 Chron. iii. 5). Perhaps he was David's mighty man of this name, the son of Abithophel (2 Sam. xxiii. 34).

E-li'as. See ELIJAH.

E-li'a-saph [God hath added].

1. The head of the tribe of Gad in the wilderness (Num. i. 14; ii. 14, vii. 42).

2. A Levite, the son of Lael, and prince of the Gershonites during the wilderness wandering (Num. iii. 24).

E-li'a-shib [God hath restored].

1. The ancestor from whom the eleventh priestly course took its name (1 Chron. xxiv. 12).

2. A Levite and singer whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 24).

3 and 4 Two men, a son of Zattu and a son of Bani, similarly persuaded by Ezra (Ezra x. 27, 36).

5. The high priest, the second in succession from Jeshua (Neh. xii. 10). He lived in the time of Nehemiah, and with the priests rebuilt the sheepgate of Jerusalem (iii. 1, 20, 21). As high priest he could assign chambers in the temple to whomsoever he pleased (Ezra x. 6). He was allied by marriage with Tobiah the Ammonite, and his grandson was son-in-law of Sanballat (Neh. xiii. 4, 28). Not being strict in regard to the separation of Jew and gentile, he even assigned a chamber of the temple to Tobiah (5).

6. A son of Eliehoenai, a descendant of Zerubabel (1 Chron. iii. 24).

E-li'a-thah [God hath come].

A son of Heman, and a musician in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxv. 4).

E-li'dad [God hath loved].

A prince of the tribe of Benjamin at the time when the Israelites were encamped at Shittim on the eve of entering the promised land. He was appointed a member of the commission to divide the land among the tribes (Num. xxxiv. 21).

E-li'e-ho-e'nai, in A V Eliehoenai [to Jehovah are my eyes]. See also ELIOENAI.

1. A Korhite porter, the son of Meshelemiah (1 Chron. xxvi. 3). A V has substituted the variant form Eliehoenai.

2. A son of Zeriahah. He with 200 followers accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra vii. 4).

E-li'el [God is God].

1. A Levite, family of Kohath, and an ancestor of Samuel the prophet (1 Chron. vi. 34). See ELIHU.

2. A Mahavite, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 46).

3. Another of David's heroes (ver. 47).

4. One of the Gadites who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 11).

5. A Levite, a son of Hebron. He lived in David's time (1 Chron. xv. 9, 11).

6. A Benjaminite, a son of Shimhi (1 Chron. viii. 20).

7. Another Benjaminite, a son of Shashak (1 Chron. viii. 22).

8. A chief man of the half-tribe of Manasseh east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24).

9. An overseer of the tithes and offerings in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

E-li-e'nai [probably, to Jehovah are my eyes]. Probably a contraction of Eliehoenai.

A Benjaminite, a son of Shimhi (1 Chron. viii. 20).

E-li-e'zer [God is a helper].

1. A man of Damascus, the steward of Abraham (Gen. xv. 2; cp. xxiv. 2).

2. The younger son of Moses (Ex. xviii. 4; 1 Chron. xxiii. 15, 17).

3. A Benjaminite, family of Becher (1 Chron. viii. 8).

4. A son of Zichri. He was a captain over the Reubenites in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 16).

5. A priest who blew the trumpet before the ark in David's reign (1 Chron. xv. 24).

6. A prophet, son of Dodavah of Mareshah. He predicted the shipwreck of Jehoshaphat's vessels because he had joined with Ahaziah, of Ahab's family (2 Chron. xx. 37).

7. One of those whom Ezra sent for Levites, when it was found that there were few of them among the returning exiles (Ezra viii. 16).

8, 9, and 10. Three men, one a priest, one a Levite, and one a son of Harim, whom Ezra induced to put away their foreign wives (Ezra x. 18, 23, 31).

11. An ancestor of Christ who lived between the time of David and the captivity (Luke iii. 29).

E-li-ho-e'nai. See ELIEHOENAI.

E-li-ho'reph [God is a reward].

One of Solomon's scribes (1 Kin. iv. 3).

E-li'hu [he is God].

1. An Ephraimite, son of Tohu and an ancestor of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam. i. 1), apparently called also Ehab and Ehel (1 Chron. vi. 27, 34).

2. David's eldest brother, called also Eliab (cp. 1 Sam. xvi. 6 with 1 Chron. xxvii. 18). See JESSE.

3. A Manassite captain who with others joined David on his way to Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 20).

4. A doorkeeper during David's reign, of the family of Ohed-edom (1 Chron. xxvi. 7).

5. One of Job's friends, a Buzite, the son of Barachel (Job xxxii.-xxxvii.).

E-li'jah; in A V. twice Elijah (1 Chron. viii. 27; Ezra x. 26); in A V. of N T. Elias, which is the Hebrew word transliterated into Greek and provided with a Greek termination [my God is Jehovah].

1. One of the greatest of the prophets. He was a Tishbite, having been born perhaps at

SOUTHEASTERN END OF MOUNT CARMEL

The meadow amphitheatater is believed to have been the place of Iijah's sacrifice Under the tree by the large rock to the right of center is a perennial spring

Tishbeh in Galilee; but he dwelt in Gilead (1 Kin. xvii 1); see TISHBITE. He wore a garment of skin or of coarse camel-hair, which was girt about his loins with a leather girdle (2 Kin. i. 8; 1 Kin. xix. 13). When Ahab, influenced by his wife Jezebel of Tyre, had given himself to the worship of the Tyrian god Baal, Elijah suddenly appeared upon the scene. He presented himself before the erring king, and predicted a drought of indefinite duration as a penalty for the rejection of Jehovah. On account of the famine he retired first to the brook Cherith, where he was providentially fed by ravens; see RAVEN. When the brook became dry he went to Zarephath on the coast of the Mediterranean north of Tyre. A widow trusted God and shared her last cake with Elijah. God saw to it that her jar of meal and cruse of oil did not fail until the famine was ended; and when her son died he was restored to life at the prayer of the prophet (1 Kin. xvii. 1-24; Luke iv 24-26). After many days, in the third year (1 Kin. xviii 1; Luke iv. 25; Jas v 17), Elijah was directed to show himself to Ahab. Then followed the scene at mount Carmel. The priests of Baal endeavored to secure evidence of Baal's divinity, but failed. Then Elijah gathered the people about an ancient altar of the Lord, which had probably been erected by pious Israelites of the north whom the defection of the ten tribes prevented from worshipping at Jerusalem. It had been thrown down. Elijah repaired it, taking twelve stones for the purpose, thus silently testifying that the division of the twelve tribes into two kingdoms was at variance with the divine will. To obviate every possibility of fraud, he made the people drench the sacrifice and the altar with water. Then he cried to the Lord. Fire fell, and consumed the sacrifice and destroyed the altar. Jehovah had attested his existence and his power. Baal's prophets, proven to be impostors, were taken down to the brook Kishon, at the foot of the mountain, and slain at Elijah's bidding (1 Kin. xviii 1-40; cp Deut. xvii. 2-5; xiii 13-16). The people had acknowledged Jehovah and obeyed Jehovah's prophet, and the token of God's returning favor was seen in the gathering clouds of rain; and the prophet, to do honor to the king as ruler of a realm now professedly the kingdom of God, girded up his loins and ran before the chariot of Ahab to the gate of Jezreel (41-46); see FORERUNNER. But Jezebel, furious at the destruction of her prophets, vowed the death of Elijah, who fled to mount Horeb. There, like Moses, he was divinely sustained for forty days and nights (Ex. xxiv 18; xxxiv. 28; Deut. ix 9, 18; 1 Kin. xix. 8), a foreshadowing of the similar incident in the life of Jesus (Mat. iv 2; Luke iv. 2). Elijah was rebuked, sent back to duty, and told to anoint Hazael to be king of Syria and Jehu to be king of Israel, that they might be the scourge of God to idolatrous Israel, and Elisha to be prophet to chastise by words. Elijah cast his mantle upon Elisha, calling him to the work, and entrusted to him the further execution of the commission (1 Kin. xix 1-21). When Jezebel had Naboth judicially murdered in order to obtain his vineyard for Ahab, Elijah met the king in the coveted plot of ground and denounced Jehovah's vengeance for the crime (xxi. 1-29). The death of Ahab at the battle of Ramoth-gilead was the beginning of the judgment which Elijah had uttered against the royal house (xxii. 1-40). When Ahab's son and successor Ahaziah, injured by a fall from a window, sent messengers to the idol temple at Ekron to ask whether he should recover from his hurt, Elijah stopped them and turned them back; and twice when a captain with fifty men was sent apparently to arrest him, he called fire from the sky which consumed them. The third captain begged for his life, and Elijah went with him to the king (2 Kin. i 1-16). Finally the prophet obtained the honor, bestowed before only on Enoch (Gen. v 24), of being translated to heaven without dying. A chariot and horses of fire appeared to him when he had gone with his attendant Elisha to the east of the Jordan, and, parting them asunder, took Elijah up in a whirlwind to heaven (2 Kin. ii. 1-12). The event seems to have occurred just before Jehoram of Israel ascended the throne (2 Kin. ii with i. 18 and iii 1) and during the reign of Jehoshaphat of Judah (iii 11), yet Elijah wrote a document in which he addressed Jehoram of Judah, who indeed was a co-regent with Jehoshaphat, and threatened him with divine judgment, not only for sins committed during the lifetime of Jehoshaphat, but for murder which he committed after Jehoshaphat's death (2 Chron. xxi 12, cp. 13 with 4). If Elijah was translated at the time indicated, he prophesied during his lifetime concerning future deeds of Jehoram, just as he foretold future acts of Hazael and Jehu (1 Kin. xix. 15-17). Less in accordance with the language of iii 11 is the explanation that the account of Elijah's translation is inserted where it is in 2 Kings simply to complete the narrative of his public activity, and that Elijah was still alive when Elisha was with the army of Jehoshaphat in southern Judah, and was living when Jehoram became sole king. The last two verses of the O. T. predict that God will send Elijah before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord (Mal. iv 5, 6). The N. T. explains that the reference is to John the Baptist, who was like the Tishbite in humble dress and appearance (Mat. iii 4; Mark i. 6), in fidelity and in work (Mat. xi. 11-14; xvii 10-12, Mark ix. 11-13; Luke i. 17). There are those, however, who contend that while John appeared in the spirit and power of Elijah, the O. T. prophet is yet to come, in person, before the second advent of Christ. Elijah appeared on the mount of Transfiguration as the representative of the O T prophecy to do honor to Jesus, its theme (Mat. xvii 4; Mark ix 4; Luke ix. 30); and his ascension, to which there was nothing analogous in the history of John the Baptist, doubtless foreshadowed that of our risen Lord.

The miracles which were wrought during the ministry of Elijah belong to the second of the four miracle periods of redemptive history, the period of the life and death struggle between the religion of Jehovah and Baal worship, when the adherence of the people of northern Israel to the faith of their fathers was at issue, and all other questions regarding religious observances sank to minor importance. See MIRACLE

2. A Benjamite, a son of Jeroham, resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. viii 27, R. V.)

3. A priest, a son of Harim. He married a gentile wife (Ezra x. 21).

4. An Israelite induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 26, R. V.).

E-li'ka.

A Harodite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii 25)

E'lim [strong evergreen trees; such as oaks, terebinths, palms].

The second encampment of the Israelites after the passage of the Red Sea. It was between Marah and the desert of Sin, and had twelve springs of water and seventy palm trees (Ex. xv. 27, xvi 1; Num xxxiii 9, 10). Two valleys, wady Ghurundel and wady Useit, or Waseit, are rivals for the honor of representing the ancient Elim. The former has more water, and is commonly regarded as the site. Both are fringed with trees and shrubs, though the adjacent parts of the desert are bare. The vegetation consists of palm trees, tamarisks, and acacias.

E-ilm'e-lech [God is king]

A man of Bethlehem of Judah, the husband of Naomi (Ruth i 1, 5).

E-li-o-e'nal [my eyes (are turned) toward Jehovah]. The Hebrew form is a legitimate variant of Eliehoenai.

1. A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv 36).

2. A Benjamite, family of Becher (1 Chron. vii 8).

3. A Levite (1 Chron. xxvi. 3, A. V.). See ELIEHOENAI.

4 and 5 Two Hebrews, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 22, 27).

6. A man of Judah, descended from Shecaniah (1 Chron. iii. 23, 24).

E-li'phal [God has judged]

One of David's mighty men, a son of Ur (1 Chron. xi. 35). Apparently called Eliphalet, the son of Ahasbai (2 Sam. xxiii. 34). See UR.

E-liph'a-let. See ELIPHELET.

E-li'phaz [God is strong]

1. A son of Esau, by Adah, one of his wives (Gen xxxvi. 4)

2. A Temanite, one of Job's friends (Job ii. 11; iv 1; xv. 1; xxii 1; xlii. 7, 9). Probably a descendant of No 1, who had a son Teman (Gen xxxvi 11)

E-liph'e-leh, in R. V. E-liph'e-le-hu [God is distinguished (as excellent)]

A Levite, a singer and a harper, who acted also as a porter when David brought up the ark from the house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xv. 18, 21).

E-liph'e-let, in A. V. twice Eliphalet [God is deliverance].

1. A son born to David in Jerusalem (1 Chron. iii 6). A correct Hebrew alternate form is Elpalet (1 Chron. xiv 5)

2. Another son of David's, born also at Jerusalem, probably after the death of the former (2 Sam. v. 16, 1 Chron. iii. 8, xiv. 7).

3. A son of Ahasbai, and one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxii 34). Apparently called Eliphal in 1 Chron. xi 35.

4. A descendant of Jonathan and of Saul (1 Chron. viii 39).

5. A son of Adonikam. He returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 13).

6. A son of Hashum. Ezra induced him to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 33)

E-lis'a-beth [God is an oath, i. e., a covenant maker].

A godly woman, a daughter of the house of Aaron, and bearing the name of Aaron's wife (Ex. vi 23, Elisheba). She became the wife of the priest Zacharias and the mother of John the Baptist. She bore him when she was of advanced years, his birth and mission having been communicated beforehand by an angel to her husband. Though of different tribes, she and Mary of Nazareth were kinswomen, and Mary visited Elisabeth at a village (probably Juttah) in the hill country of Judaea. Elisabeth, inspired by the Holy Ghost, welcomed Mary as the mother of the Lord (Luke i. 5-45).

E-li'sha, in A. V. of N T El-i-se'us which is an imitation of the Greek modification of the name [God is salvation].

One of the two great prophets of the older period of Israelite history who labored in the northern kingdom. He was the son of Shaphat, dwelt at Abel-meholah in the Jordan valley, and belonged to a family of means; twelve yoke of oxen plowed his father's fields. God appointed him to succeed Elijah (1 Kin. xix. 16, 19). Elijah found him plowing and cast his mantle over him. Elisha understood the significance of the act; went home, gave a farewell feast to the people, and returned to be the follower and assistant of Elijah (19-21). When Elijah went beyond the Jordan to be translated to heaven, Elisha kept by him; and when told to ask a parting gift, had the wisdom to petition for a double portion of Elijah's spirit. He saw the fiery chariot bear his master away, and taking the mantle which had fallen from Elijah, struck the Jordan with it, which divided and permitted him to cross to its western side (2 Kin. ii 1-18). His subsequent life was marked by a series of miracles, some of knowledge, others of power, expressly wrought in the name of the Lord. They belong to the second group of miracles in redemptive history. They occurred at a time when the religion of Jehovah was engaged in a desperate struggle for existence against Baal worship, and, like the miracles wrought by Elijah, were intended to accredit the prophet and to attest Jehovah to be the living God. The miraculous power was so much under Elisha's control that apparently he could exercise it at discretion; and he used it largely, as did Christ, in simple deeds of kindness. In the name of the Lord he healed with salt the waters of the spring at Jericho (19-22). He pronounced Jehovah's curse on lads who mocked in him the prophet of the Lord, and two bears presently tore forty-two of them (23-25). He foretold the success of the expedition against Moab (iii. 11-27), secured the increase of a widow's oil (iv 1-7), predicted to a Shunammite woman the birth of a son, and at his prayer that son was restored to life when he had died (8-37). He named an antidote to a poisonous plant in the pot in which food was being cooked for the prophets (38-41). As prophet of the Lord he fed a hundred men with twenty barley loaves and a few eais of corn (42-44), told Naaman to wash in the Jordan and he would be healed of his leprosy (v 1-19), and foretold its transference to Gehazi as a punishment of lying and covetousness, 20-27. He made an iron ax head, that had fallen into the river, float to the surface (vi. 1-7). He informed the king of Israel of the movements and intentions of his Syrian rival (8-12). At his prayer, the Lord revealed to the prophet's servant horses and chariots of fire surrounding them for their protection (13-17), and caused blindness to fall on the Syrian emissaries sent to arrest them (17-23). He intimated, without being told it, that a messenger from the king of Israel was at the door to take his life (vi 32, 33). He predicted great plenty and consequent cheapness of food in Samaria, while it was at famine prices during a siege, adding, however, that an unbelieving lord who discredited the prediction should not participate in the boon, and he did not, for he was trampled to death in a crowd (vii. 1-20). He informed Benhadad, king of Syria, of his approaching death (viii 7-15). He declared the destruction of Ahab and his whole house, and sent a young prophet to anoint Jehu to execute the threatened judgment (ix. 1-x. 28). He predicted three victories over the Syrians (xiii 14-19). Finally, after his death, a man hastily cast into the same sepulcher was at once restored to life on touching the prophet's bones (20, 21).

E-li's'hah.

The descendants of Javan collectively, who inhabited the country of Elishah (Gen. x. 4). This country was maritime, and exported blue and purple dye stuffs (Ezek. xxvii. 7). It has been variously explained as Hellas, Elis, Æolis, Italy, and Carthage. Philological objections weigh against the first four; and there is no proof that Carthage was ever called Elissa, and this town was besides in Africa. Alishiya, whose king exchanged correspondence with the Pharaohs of the eighteenth Egyptian dynasty, has been suggested, a country hard by Cilicia. This identification commends itself.

E-lish'a-ma [God hath heard].

1 Son of Ammihud, and prince of the Ephraimites at the beginning of the sojourn in the wilderness (Num. i 10; ii. 18), and ancestor of Joshua (1 Chron. vii 26).

2 A man of Judah, descended through Jerahmeel and Sheshan (1 Chron. iii 34, 41).

3 A son of David, born at Jerusalem (1 Chron. iii 6). See ELISHUA.

4 Another son of David (2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. iii 8).

5 A priest, one of those sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii 8).

6 A prince and scribe in the reign of king Jehoakim (Jer. xxxvi 12, 20, 21), and probably identical with the grandfather of Ishmael of the seed royal who murdered Gedaliah, the governor of Judæa under the Babylonians (2 Kin. xxv 25, Jer. xli 1).

E-lish'a-phat [God hath judged].

One of the captains of hundreds who supported Jehoiahi in the revolt against Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii 1).

E-lish'e-ba [God is an oath].

Daughter of Amminadab, and sister of Nahshon. She became the wife of Aaron, and the mother of Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar (Ex. vi 23).

E-lish'u-a [God is salvation].

A son of David, born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. v 15; 1 Chron. xiv 5). In the corresponding position in the third list of David's sons (1 Chron. iii 6) the name Elishama appears. In view of the reading of the other catalogues, and since the name Elishama was borne by another of David's sons, mentioned farther on in all three lists, it is reasonable to believe that Elishama in 1 Chron. iii 6 is a misreading of Elishua, as it is a quite intelligible one.

E-li'ud [perhaps from Hebrew 'ayhūd, God of Judah or of the Jews, a name which does not occur in the O. T.].

Son of Achim, and father of Eleazar, in the ancestry of Christ (Mat. i 14, 15).

E-liz'a-phan or Elizaphan, the forms being interchangeable in Hebrew [God hath concealed].

1 Son of Uzziel, and chief of the Koha-thites in the wilderness (Ex. vi. 18, 22; Num. iii. 30). He assisted in removing the bodies of Nadab and Abihu from the camp (Lev. x. 4).

2. Son of Parnach, and prince of the tribe of Zebulun in the wilderness (Num. xxxiv. 25).

E-il'zur [God is a rock]

The prince of the Reubenites in the wilderness (Num. i. 5; ii. 10).

El'ka-nah [God hath created]

1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar, division of Korah. He was brother of Assir and Abiasaph (Ex. vi. 24; 1 Chron. vi. 23 and perhaps 25).

2, 3, and 4. Three Levites, links in one genealogy, one the son of Joel, the second the son of Mahath, and the third the son of Jeroham. Like the preceding, they were of the family of Kohath, house of Izhar, Korhite division; but they were descended from Abiasaph (1 Chron. vi. 36, son of Joel; 26, 35, of Mahath; 27, 34, and 1 Sam. i. 1, of Jeroham). The last of the three belonged to the hill country of Ephraim, lived at Ramathaim of the Zophites, was the husband of Hannah and Peninnah, and the father of Samuel (1 Sam. i. 1; ii. 11, 20).

5. Another Korhite who had dwelt in Benjamin, perhaps because the Korhites were doorkeepers of the tabernacle which was pitched in Benjamin (1 Chron. ix. 19), and who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 6).

6. A doorkeeper for the ark during the reign of David (1 Chron. xv. 23).

7. A high dignitary at the court of Ahaz, second only to the king (2 Chron. xxviii. 7).

8. A Levite who dwelt in a village of the Netophathites (1 Chron. ix. 16).

El'kosh-ite.

A citizen of Elkosh (Nah. i. 1). The tradition that Alkush, two days' journey north of Nineveh, was the birth and burial place of Nahum is late, being unknown to early Arabian and Syrian writers, and the contents of the book of Nahum are against it. A credible, but unproven, identification is with the town Elcesi or Helcesesi in Galilee, which was pointed out to Jerome. According to another tradition, preserved by Epiphanius, Elkosh lay to the south of Begabar, in Syriac Bêt Gabrê, that is, Beit Jibrin in the lowland of Judah.

El'la-sar.

A place in or near Babylonia (Gen. xiv. 1, 9). Not improbably Larsa, the remains of which now constitute the mounds of Senkereh, to the southeast of Erech.

Elm.

An erroneous rendering of the Hebrew word 'Elah in Hos. iv. 13, A. V. The word is properly translated "oak" in Gen. xxxv. 4 and Judg. vi. 11, 19, with terebinth on the margin of R. V.

El-ma'dam, in A. V. Elmodam.

An ancestor of Christ, who lived before the exile (Luke iii. 28).

El'na-am [God is pleasantness].

The father of certain valiant men in David's army (1 Chron. xi. 46).

El'na-than [God hath given].

1. The father of Nehushita, mother of king Jehoiachin (2 Kin. xxiv. 8). He dwelt at Jerusalem, and was probably the prince El-nathan, son of Achbor (Jer. xxvi. 22, xxxvi. 12, 25).

2, 3, and 4. Three Levites, the first two chief men, and the third a man of understanding, sent for by Ezra to the brook Ahava (Ezra viii. 16).

E-lo'î [Aramaic, my God]. See ELI, I.

E'lon [an oak or terebinth]

1. A Hitite, whose daughter Esau married (Gen. xxvi. 34, xxxvi. 2).

2. A son of Zebulun, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii. 14, Num. xxvi. 26).

3. A Zebulonite who judged Israel for ten years, and was buried at Ajalon, in Zebulun (Judg. xii. 11, 12).

4. A village of Dan (Josh. xix. 43). Not identified; for Beit Ello, 8 miles northwest by west from Bethel, is not in the limits of the ancient territory of Dan.

E'lon-beth-ha'nân [Elon of Beth-hanan].

A town in Dan, to judge from its associates (1 Kin. iv. 9), perhaps identical with Elon. Its site is not Beit 'Anân, 8½ miles northwest of Jerusalem. This place is in Benjamin, a different tax district (18), and the name is differently spelled.

E'loth. See ELATH

El'pa-al [God is a reward]

A man of Benjamin, son of Shoharaim, and head of a father's house (1 Chron. viii. 11, 12, 18).

El'pa-let, in R. V. Elpelet. See ELIPHELET.

El-pa'ran. See ELATH

El'te-keh [perhaps, God is a dread].

A town of Dan assigned to the Levites (Josh. xix. 44; xxi. 23), and mentioned in the records of Sennacherib likewise in connection with Timnah and Ekron. In 701 B. C. Sennacherib destroyed the town, and in its vicinity the decisive battle between the Assyrians and Egyptians was fought. Not identified; certainly not Beit Likia, 2 miles south of the Nether Beth-horon.

El'te-kon [God is firmness].

A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 59). Exact site unknown.

El'to-lad [birth, race].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 30), assigned to the Simeonites (xix. 4). Called in 1 Chron. iv. 29 simply Tolad, with omission of what is either the word for God or the Arabic article. Exact site unknown.

E'lul.

The sixth month of the year (Neh. vi. 15; 1 Mac. xiv. 27), approximately September.

E-lu'zai [perhaps, God is my strength].

One of the valiant men who came to David to Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5)

El-y-ma'is. See ELAM

El'y-mas [apparently from Arabic 'alim, learned]

A Jewish impostor, Barjesus by name, which means son of Jesus or Joshua, who pretended to learn the future through sorcery. Paul encountered him in Paphos, a town of Cyprus, during his first missionary journey. He sought to turn from the faith Sergius Paulus, the Roman deputy or proconsul of the island, who seemed disposed to accept the doctrine of Paul and seek for baptism. The apostle, therefore, severely rebuked the sorcerer and struck him with temporary blindness, the miracle removing the last doubt which the proconsul had as to the claims of Christian truth on his acceptance (Acts xiii 6-12)

El'za-bad [God hath bestowed]

1 One of the valiant Gadites who came to David (1 Chron. xii 12)

2 A Levite of the family of Obed-edom, and a doorkeeper at the house of the Lord (1 Chron xxvi 7)

El'za-phan. See ELIZAPHAN

Em-balm'.

To attempt to preserve a dead body from decay by the use of sweet spices. The Hebrews seldom embalmed their dead (Gen 1 2, 26; cp 2 Chron xvi 14, John xix 39), but the art of embalming was practiced by the Egyptians from very early times. The embalmers were a numerous guild, who dwelt at the cemeteries. They were divided into three classes—the first made the incision in the body, the second handled the spices, and the third conducted the religious ceremonies when the body was placed in the tomb. By the time of the eighteenth dynasty, shortly before the time of Moses, they had brought their art to great perfection. The brain was drawn through the nose with an iron hook and replaced with spices. The entrails were removed, and the abdominal cavity was washed out by the injection of palm wine, and then filled with bruised myrrh, cassia, cinnamon, and other spices. Next the whole body was plunged in natron or, more exactly, subcarbonate of soda, and left in it for seventy days. Then it was rolled in linen bandages only three or four inches wide, but of the extraordinary length of 700 or even 1000 yards. Gum Arabic was used to keep the bandages in their place, and finally the corpse, now mummified, was placed in a case of wood or cartonnage, made in the shape of a man, and carved and painted to represent the deceased person. It was often enclosed in a second or outer case of wood or in a stone sarcophagus. A less expensive method required no incision; the intestines were dissolved by an injection of oil of cedar. In the case of the poor, the abdomen was merely purged and steeped in natron (Herod. ii 85-88, fully confirmed by Egyptian records and mummies). According to the Sicilian historian Diodorus, the interment of a rich man cost the relatives the equivalent of about $1200. A second-rate embalmment cost about $400, and there was a much cheaper kind for the common people. Embalming ceased about A. D. 700. Many mummies are in the British and other museums. Occasionally one is unrolled, but it tends to fall to pieces when exposed to the air.

Em-broid'ery.

Ornamentation by raised figures of needlework, executed with colored silks, gold or silver thread, or any similar material differing from that of the original cloth. Bezalel and Aholiab were able to practice, among other arts, that of embroidering in blue, purple, scarlet, and fine linen (Ex xxxv 35; xxxviii. 23). The screens for the door of the tabernacle and the gate of the court (Ex xxvi 36; xxvii 16) and the girdle of the high priest (xxviii 39, R V, xxxix 29) were embroidered. The wealthy often wore embroidered garments (Judg. v. 30; Ps xlv. 14).

E'mek-ke'ziz, in A V valley of Keziz [a vale cut off or vale of fissure]

A town of Benjamin, evidently in a valley and apparently near Jericho and Beth-hoglah (Josh xviii 21). Scarcely to be connected with wady el-Kaziz, a branch of the Kidron, which seems to lie too far west and south.

Em'er-ald [Greek smaragdos].

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Nophek. It was the first stone in the second row of those on the Jewish high priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 18; xxxix. 11). The Syrians imported precious stones of this kind into Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 16), and the Tyrians used them for ornaments (xxviii. 13). The exact stone intended is doubtful. It may be the carbuncle (R V margin; cp Septuagint).

2 The rendering of the Greek Smaragdos, meaning a precious stone of a light green color. The name was perhaps applied to any green crystallized mineral. It was used for signets (Ecclus. xxxii. 6); a rainbow is likened to it (Rev. iv. 3); it was to be the fourth foundation in the New Jerusalem (xxi. 19; cp Tobit xiii 16) The emerald is a variety of beryl, distinguished by its color, which is bright green, from typical beryl, which is pale green, passing into light blue, yellow, or white. While the beryl is colored by iron, the emerald is colored by chromium. Anciently it was found in Cyprus, in Egypt, and in the mountains of Ethiopia.

Em'e-rods [a corrupted form of hemorrhoids]

Piles; external or internal tumors in the anal region formed of dilated blood vessels (Deut. xxviii 27). They were inflicted on the Philistines of Ashdod and Ekron, to compel them to send back the ark which they had captured (1 Sam. v 6; vi. 11).

E'mim, in A. V. Emims, a double plural.

The ancient inhabitants of territory afterwards occupied by the Moabites. They were tall as the Anakim, and were once a numerous and powerful people (Deut ii 9-11). Chedorlaomer smote them in the plain of Kirathaim (Gen xiv 5).

Em-man'u-el. See IMMANUEL.

Em'ma-us.

1. A village 60 furlongs from Jerusalem, a distance which could be traversed on foot between the hour for supper and the time of an evening meeting (Luke xxiv. 13, 29, 33; cp Mark xvi 14; John xx 19). Vespasian located 800 veterans at "Emmaus distant sixty [according to another reading, thirty] furlongs from Jerusalem" (War vii 6, 6). The Talmud states that Moza is Colonia Kubeibeh, meaning the little dome, 7 miles northwest of Jerusalem on the Roman road, was pointed out to the Crusaders as the site of Emmaus. In the vicinity was the town of Mozah (Josh. xviii. 26). Three miles to the south of Kubeibeh is Kuloneh, that is colony, whose distance from Jerusalem is 4 miles or more according to the road followed. Probably, therefore, the site of Emmaus is to be found either at Kubeibeh or Kuloneh, or in the intervening country. The distance and tradition since the time of the Crusaders point to Kubeibeh; the Roman colony to which Emmaus was assigned may have left its name attached to a village in the southern part of its possessions. Conder's suggestion of the ruin Khamaseh, 8 miles southwest of Jerusalem, is not happy. The distance suits, but the name does not readily; for only rarely does the smooth breathing, which appears in the Greek form of Emmaus, represent the strong guttural h, in Arabic h, z, e, kh (cp. Huldah and Hermon).

2. A walled town of some note 18 miles, or 160 stades, westward from Jerusalem by a circuitous Roman road (1 Mac. iii. 40; ix. 50; War ii 20, 4) Now 'Amwas.

Em'mor. See HAMOR.

E'na-im [two springs].

A town on the road from Adullam to Timnath (Gen. xxxviii. 14, 21, in A. V. open)

E'nam [place of fountains]

A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv 34); probably identical with Enaim.

E'nan [having eyes, seeing].

The father of the prince of the tribe of Naphtali in the days of Moses (Num. i 15).

En-camp'ment. See CAMP.

En-chant'er.

One who practices any form of enchantment. In R. V. of Daniel (ii. 2) it is the rendering of the Aramaic Ashshaphim, and denotes conjurers and exorcists who used incantations and pronounced spells for the purpose of securing the aid of evil spirits or of freeing the supposed victims of evil spirits from their torments En-chant'ment.

The practice of magical arts or the utterance of certain words whereby the aid of evil spirits is invoked, in order to produce supernatural effects over human beings, dangerous animals, or nature generally. Enchantment is not always distinguished from divination in the English versions (Num. xxiii. 23; xxiv. 1; and 2 Kin. xvii 17, where enchantment is rather omen; and A. V. of Jer. xxvii 9). Under enchantment are properly included magic (Ex vii 11), conjuration, exorcism (Dan ii. 2, in A. V. astrologer), sorcery (Acts viii 9, 11; xiii. 8, 10). The practicing of enchantments was forbidden by the Mosaic law (Deut. xviii. 10). Enchantments practiced to prevent a venomous snake from biting (Eccles. x 11, cp Ps lvm 5; Jer viii. 17) belong, of course, to a different category. They require neither trickery nor the invocation of the powers of evil.

En'-dor. [fountain of habitation].

A town belonging to the tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xvii 11; reference to En-dor wanting in Septuagint). Sisera and his king, Jabin, perished in its vicinity (Ps. lxxxiii 10). It was the residence of the woman with a familiar spirit, whom king Saul consulted (1 Sam. xxviii 7). It has been identified as the village of Endôr or Endûr, on the northern shoulder of Little Hermon, 6 miles S E of Nazareth. See SAUL.

En-eg'la-im [fountain of two calves].

A place on the Dead Sea (Ezek. xlvii 10).

En-gan'nim [fountain of gardens].

1. A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 34). Site unknown.

2. A town on the boundary line of Issachar (Josh. xix 21), assigned to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 29). It seems to be the Ginea of Josephus (Antiq. xx. 6. 1; War iii. 3. 4). It is the modern Jenin, a village of about 3000 inhabitants, on the southern margin of the plain of Jezreel, 5 miles northeast of Dothan and about 7 southwest from mount Gilboa.

En-ge'di [fountain of a kid].

A fountain and town originally called Hazazon-tamar, meaning pruning of a palm

(2 Chron. xx. 2), in the wilderness on the western shore of the Dead Sea, in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv 62). A difficult caravan route, crowded between mountain and sea, passed the spot. In the time of Abraham it was occupied by Amorites, who were smitten at the spot by Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv 7). David took refuge in the strongholds of the vicinity (1 Sam. xxiii 29). In one of the caves where he was hiding he cut off the skirt of Saul's robe (xxiv. 1-22). The foun-

En-mish'pat [fountain of judgment].

The same as Kadesh-barnea (Gen. xiv. 7).

E'noch, in A. V. once Henoch (1 Chron. i. 3) [initiated, dedicated]. The same name, borne by others, is rendered Henoch and Hanoah.

1 and 2 A son of Cain, and the city which Cain built and named after him (Gen. iv. 17, 18).

3. A descendant of Jared, and progenitor of Methuselah. He lived 365 years, and Wilderness of En-gehi, Dead Sea, and Mountains of Moab

tain, which still bears the name of 'Am Jidy, is a copious hot spring of fresh water bursting forth about 300 or 400 feet above the base of a vast cliff, midway between the mouth of the Jordan and the southern point of the sea (cp. Ezek. xlvii 10). The hot water created an oasis, rich with semi-tropical vegetation and celebrated for palms, vineyards, and balsam (Song i. 14, Antiq. iv 1, 2).

En-had'dah [fountain of vehemence]

A frontier village of Issachar (Josh. xix 21). Not identified, though conjecturally near En-gannim.

En-hak'ko-re [fountain of him that called].

A spring in Lehi which burst forth when Samson cried to the Lord (Judg. xv 18, 19). It was long pointed out.

En-ha'zor [fountain of the village]

A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. xix 37), mentioned in the list between Kadesh and Iron. Its site has not been positively identified.

walked with God. He is the only one of the line of whom it is not said that he died. He was not, for God took him (Gen. v 18-24). He was translated, and did not see death (Eccles. xiv 16, xlix 14, Heb. xi. 5). In Jude 14, 15 there is a prophecy of Enoch's in which he declares God's just judgment of the unrighteous. The words of this prophecy are found in the pseudepigraphical Book of Enoch, which is an extravagant production, amplifying the antediluvian history, and even rendering it incredible. Jude has either made a citation from this book or else both he and the author of the book quoted an old tradition. The N. T. writers have several times quoted uninspired, and even heathen, authors.

E'nosh, in A. V. Enos, except in 1 Chron. i. 1 [man].

The son of Seth (Gen. iv. 26; v. 6-11; 1 Chron. i. 1, Luke iii. 38).

En-rim'mon [fountain of Rimmon or of the pomegranate].

A town of Judah, inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 29), and apparently consisting of the neighboring villages of Ain and Immon (see each).

En-ro'gel [perhaps, spy's or fuller's spring].

A fountain just outside Jerusalem (2 Sam. vii. 17), near the valley of Hinnom and on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 7; xviii. 16). According to Osephus, it was in the king's garden (Antiq. ii. 14, 4). During Absalom's rebellion Jonathan and Ahimaaz took up their abode there, to be able to collect and send news to David (2 Sam. xvii. 17). Near by was the stone-booth, where Adonijah instituted festivities when he conspired to seize the kingdom (1 Kin. i. 9). The traditional situation of the fountain, almost universally accepted, is at Eyub, the well of Job, just below the junction of the valleys of Hinnom and the Kidron, south of Jerusalem. This is a well, 25 feet deep, walled half way down and links the rest of the distance into the solid rock. That it is a well and not a fountain is scarcely a serious objection to the traditional identification (cp. Gen. xvi. 7 with 14). The well was doubtless suggested by the copious streams which at certain seasons are liable to rush from the ground at this spot. The identification of En-rogel with the Fountain of the Virgin in the side of Ophel has a few advocates, especially Grove and Conder.

En-she'mesh [fountain of the sun]

A fountain and town on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 7; viii. 17). It is commonly identified with Ain Haud, a little east of Bethany, on the road between Jerusalem and Jericho, and the last spring until the Jordan valley is reached.

En-tap'pu-ah. See TAPPUAH 2.

E-pæn'e-tus [praiseworthy]

A convert belonging to Achaia, and the first fruits of that region to Christ. Paul called him beloved (Rom. xvi. 5).

Ep'a-phras.

A Christian who, coming to Paul whilst he was a prisoner at Rome, gave a highly favorable account of the Colossian church, with which he was connected, perhaps as its minister. He joined the apostle in sending salutations (Col. i. 7, 8; iv. 12). He remained in Rome, and was in some sense Paul's fellow-prisoner in Christ (Philem. 23). ee EPAPHRODITUS

E-paph-ro-di'tus [lovely, charming].

A Christian whom the church at Philippi sent with a present to the apostle Paul, then prisoner at Rome. Soon afterwards he became seriously ill. It grieved him that the news of this sickness reached Philippi, and created anxiety among his friends there. In this account Paul sent him back to Philippi as soon as his health permitted (Phil. ii. 25-30; iv. 18), making him the bearer of the Epistle to the Philippians. Perhaps Epaphroditus and Epaphras were one and the same person, but there is a difficulty in accepting this view, for the former seems clearly connected with the church at Philippi, and the latter with that at Colossæ.

E'phah, I. [darkness]

1 A branch of the Midianites (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chron. i. 33), rich in camels and dromedaries (Is. lx. 6). They lived in northeastern Arabia.

2 A concubine of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 46)

3 A man of Judah, a son of Jabdai (1 Chron. ii. 47)

E'phah, II. [perhaps from Egyptian orpai, an old measure].

A measure of capacity containing ten omers (Ex. xvi. 36), and used for such articles as flour (Judg. vi. 19) or barley (Ruth ii. 17). It was equivalent to a bath or one-tenth of a cor (Ezek. xlv. 11, 14), and contained one Attic metretres or seventy-two sextaries (Antiq. viii. 2, 9; ix. 4, 5; and xv. 9, 2, where read metretres for medimnoi), and, if reckoned at 1952.17 cubic inches, contained a trifle more than 3 pecks, 5 quarts, American measure. Dishonest traders sometimes had an ephah of insufficient capacity and used it for fraud (Amos viii. 5).

E'phai [fatigued].

A Netophathite whose sons came with others to the Babylonian governor of Judæa after the fall of Jerusalem, and was promised protection (Jer. xl. 8). All were subsequently massacred by Ishmael (xli. 3)

E'pher [a calf or mule].

1 A branch of the Midianites (Gen. xxv. 4; 1 Chron. i. 33). Their exact location has not been determined

2 A man of Judah descended from Ezra (1 Chron. iv. 17).

3 A chief man in the half-tribe of Manasse, east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24).

E-phes-dam'mim [end or coast of Dammim].

A place within the territory of Judah, between Socoh and Azekah (1 Sam. xvii. 1). Called Pas-dammim in 1 Chron. xi. 13, a form perhaps due to corruption of the text. Commonly identified with the ruins Damun, about 4 miles to the northeast of Socoh.

E-phe'si-ans, E-pis'tle to the

This epistle was written by the apostle Paul when he was a prisoner (in i. 1; iv. 1; vi. 20), probably at Rome (ad 62, though some assign it to the Cæsarean imprisonment (Acts xxiv. 27). It is addressed to the saints which are at Ephesus and the faithful in Christ Jesus. E. V. notes, however, that some very ancient authorities omit the words "at Ephesus." The two chief N. T. manuscripts (Sinaitic and Vatican) omit them, and from very early times a difference of opinion appears as to its intended readers, though the tradition of the church called it "to the Ephesians." The most probable explanation is that it was a circular letter intended for all the churches of the province of Asia, and that, since Ephesus was the chief of these, the epistle naturally came to be considered as addressed to it. Perhaps the address was blank, and copies left in each city with the blank filled. Its circular character seems to be confirmed by the absence from it of local allusions and discussions. It is a doctrinal and ethical treatise in the form of an epistle. Like that to the Colossians, it was sent by Tychicus (vi 21), and the similarity of language and thought shows that the two were written at the same time. Compare for example

 " 1 3, 20, 11 6, 10 10, vi 12 with Col 1 5, 11 1-3

These are but examples, to which even the reader of the English Bible can add many more. The two epistles were evidently the product of the apostle's mind acting under the same circumstances. And Ephesians seems to have been written just after Colossians. In it the thought is carried further. The theme of Colossians is the preeminence of Christ's person and work. That of Ephesians is the establishment of the church, considered as the entire number of the redeemed. The Ephesians, in fact, may be said to sum up all Paul's previous teaching for the purpose of stating the purpose of God in the mission of his Son, which was the redemption of his chosen people to manifest to all the universe the riches of his grace. Hence, assuming salvation through faith, the divinity and finished work of Jesus and the calling of the gentiles, it advances to a complete theodicy. In chap. i. we have what may be called the divine side of the church's history, which originated in God's sovereign and eternal purpose (3-6), was effected by Christ's work (7-12), and is certified by the sealing of the Spirit (13, 14). He prays that they may understand the hope of Christ's calling, of which the risen and exalted Saviour is the first fruit and pledge (15-23). In chap. ii we have the human side of the history, being taught that the elect are delivered out of sin and condemnation by unmerited grace (1-10), and are united, Jew and gentile, through Christ into one spiritual temple (11-22). In chap. iii, the apostle states his own position as the minister to the church of this divine mystery (1-13), and prays that they may realize and enjoy what God has prepared for them (14-21). Chapters iv.-vi. are an extended exhortation to walk worthily of their high calling in all the relations of the present life. The Epistle to the Romans, addressed from the East to the West, was Paul's complete statement of the way of salvation. The Epistle to the Ephesians, addressed from the West to the East, was his complete statement of the whole purpose of God in human history. It may be said to mark the climax of his theological instruction. G. T. P.

Before the Epistle to the Ephesians was written, Paul had seen a new spiritual community arise in the world, composed of persons of different races, he had been teaching that this community, the church, is the body of Christ (Rom xii 5; 1 Cor. xii. 27, Col i. 18, 11 19), and he had been emphasizing the importance of harmony among its members (Rom xii 4-8; 1 Cor. xii 12-30). In writing at this time to the churches in the province of Asia, whose membership was composed of the most diverse racial elements and among whom speculative theories were rife which tended to subordinate Christ, it was natural for the apostle to give prominence to the conception of Christ as the head of the body, the church (Eph 1 22, 23), from whom the whole body fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth, according to the working in due measure of each several part, maketh the increase of the body unto the building up of itself in love (iv 16, R V, cp 11 11-22). And not only was the prominence of this thought natural at this time in a letter from Paul to Christians in the province of Asia; but such an expression of his mature thought about Christ was to be expected under these conditions from one whose deep interest in the subject is witnessed by his earlier epistles. Eph'e-sus [according to tradition, permission]

A city of Lydia on the western coast of Asia Minor, at the mouth of the river Cayster, nearly midway between Miletus on the south and Smyrna on the north. Situated at the junction of natural trade routes, and near a far-famed shrine of an Asiatic nature goddess, whom the Greeks identified with Artemis, its growth was assured. In the eleventh century B. C. the town was seized by the Ionians, a section of the Greek race. Ephesus became one of the twelve cities belonging to their confederation, and itself the capital of Ionia. About 555 B. C. the city submitted to Croesus, king of Lydia, whose capital was at Sardis, but it soon fell under the Persian domination. When the victories of Alexander the Great overthrew the Persian empire, Ephesus came under Macedonian-Greek rule. Hitherto it had been confined to a low, alluvial plain liable to be flooded. About 286 B. C., however, Lysimachus extended it to an adjacent eminence which the water could not reach. By this change of location the temple of Artemis was left outside the city walls. In 190 B. C. the Romans, after defeating Antiochus the Great at Magnesia, took Ephesus from him, and gave it to Eumenes II, king of Pergamos. On the death of Attalus III. of Pergamos in 133 B. C. it reverted to them, and eventually became the capital of the Roman province of Asia. In A. D. 29 the city was much damaged by an earthquake, but was rebuilt by the emperor Tiberius. Many Jews with Roman citizenship resided at Ephesus, and maintained a synagogue (Antiq. xiv 10, 11 was one of the seven churches of Asia addressed in the book of Revelation (Rev. i 11; ii 1-7), and according to tradition the apostle John spent the last years of his life in the city. The third general council of the church was held at Ephesus, A. D. 431, and defined the doctrine of the person of Christ so far as affirming that Christ has two natures and one person; and in 449 a synod was convened, the so-called Robber Council, which restored Eutychus. The silting up of the harbor by mud brought down by the Cayster led to the decay of the city. Among its remains are the ruins of the wall and a gate, the stadion, a fine theater, Roman and 13; Acts xviii 19; xix 17); and Paul, on his way to Jerusalem, toward the end of his second missionary journey, paid a short visit to the place, preached in the synagogue, and left Aquila and Priscilla there, who continued the work (Acts xviii 19-21). On his third journey he labored at Ephesus at least two years and three months, leaving the city after the riot which was stirred up by Demetrius, a maker of small silver models of the temple, who found his craft endangered by the preaching of the apostle (xix 1-41; cp 1 Cor xv 32; xvi. 8; 2 Tim i. 18). Paul left Timothy behind to prevent the church from being corrupted by false doctrine (1 Tim i. 3). Subsequently, returning from Europe and unable to revisit Ephesus, he summoned the elders of the church to him at Miletus (Acts xx. 16, 17). Tychicus was afterwards sent to Ephesus with the Epistle to the Ephesians (Eph i 1; vi. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 12). The church at Ephesus baths, and a library. The site of the great temple is a swamp.

An earlier Ionic temple was set on fire by Herostratos in 356 B. C. and destroyed, but it was rebuilt within a few years. The new structure was a magnificent work of Ionic architecture, four times as large as the Parthenon at Athens, and ranked as one of the seven wonders of the world. It stood on a platform about 425 feet in length and 239½ feet in width, measured from the lowest step. A flight of ten steps led to the pavement of the platform, and three more steps to the pavement of the temple. The temple itself was 342½ feet in length and 164 feet in width. It consisted of two rows of eight columns each in front and rear, and two rows of twenty columns each on either side of the sanctuary. These with two columns at each entrance of the sanctuary made one hundred in all. Each was a monolith of marble 55 feet in height, and the eighteen at each end were sculptured. The roof was covered with large white marble tiles. The cella or inner sanctuary, which these columns surrounded, was 70 feet wide and 105 long. Its internal ornamentation was of surpassing splendor, adorned with works of art by Phidias and Praxiteles, Scopas, Parrhasius, and Apelles. See illustration under DIANA. It was destroyed by the Goths about A. D. 260.

The theater was one of the largest known of all that have remained to modern times. The auditorium was semicircular, 495 feet in diameter, and the orchestra was 110. The stage was 22 feet wide. The theater contained 65 rows of seats, and afforded room for an audience of 24,500 persons.

Eph'lal [judicious]

A man of Judah of the family of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 37).

Eph'od [a covering].

1 An upper garment worn by the Jewish high priest. It was one of six sacred vestments which he was required to put on when about to conduct the worship of God (Ex. xxviii. 4), and was of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen. It consisted of two shoulder pieces joined by the two edges (6, 7), and falling over the front and back part of the body. There was a hole in the top, doubtless for the head, with a woven border of the same materials around, to render the cloth less liable to tear (8, cp. 32). On it, so as to stand upon the shoulders of the priest when the ephod was worn, were two onyx stones, each having engraved upon it the names of six tribes (xxviii. 9; xxxix. 6, 7). In front, to rings attached underneath close to the coupling, the breastplate was bound with a lace of blue, so that the breastplate itself might be supported (xxviii. 25, 27, 28; xxxix. 19-21). David, desiring to ask counsel of God in the presence of the high priest, had the ephod brought near (1 Sam. xiii. 9-12; xxx. 7, 8), for with it were the Urim and Thummim (Ex. xxviii. 30). An ephod might thus readily become an object of adoration or be used in the worship of an idol (Judg. viii. 27; xvi. 5). The robe of the ephod was a garment distinct from the ephod, was blue, and was sleeveless, fringed at the bottom with alternate bells of gold and pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet (Ex. xxviii. 31-35; xxxix. 5; xxxix. 22-26).

A more simple ephod of linen, probably without the ornamentation, was worn by ordinary priests. The eighty-five whom Doeg slew all wore the linen ephod (1 Sam. xxii. 18). Samuel, also, wore an ephod while he was a child in charge of Eli, the high priest (1 Sam. ii. 18). David wore one apparently of simple linen (2 Sam. vi. 14; 1 Chron. xv. 27).

2. The father of Hannei, prince of Manasseh in the time of Moses (Num. xxxiv. 23).

Eph'pha-tha.

An Aramaic imperative signifying "be opened" (Mark vii. 34).

E'phra-ím [double fruitfulness].

1 The younger son of Joseph and Asenath, daughter of Potipherah, priest of On. He was born while Joseph was prime minister of Egypt (Gen. xli. 45-52). When the two sons were brought to Jacob on his sickbed, to receive their grandfather's blessing, Jacob intentionally laid his right hand (the hand of greater honor) on the head of Ephraim, the younger grandson, and his left on that of Manasseh, the elder. Being remonstrated with by Joseph, he explained that both should become a people, but Ephraim should be the greater and should be the ancestor of a multitude of peoples or tribal families (Gen. xlviii. 8-20). Ephraim and Manasseh, though only grandchildren of Jacob, were treated as if they were his children, and their descendants were consequently regarded as two tribes instead of one. Ephraim had the sorrow of losing two of his sons, who were slain while making a raid on the cattle of the Philistines (1 Chron. vii. 20-22).

2 The tribe of which Ephraim was the progenitor (Josh. xvi. 4, 10; Judg. v. 14). The growth of the tribe was for a time retarded by the death of several of his sons in a fray against the Philistines (1 Chron. vii. 21-23). At the first census in the wilderness the Ephraimites numbered 40,500, being the lowest in number of the tribes excepting only Manasseh and Benjamin (Num. i. 33). They fell off during the wanderings, and at the second census numbered only 32,500, being now the lowest of all the tribes except Simeon (xxvi. 37), still the double tribe of Joseph was the largest of the tribes, and numbered 85,200 men, besides women and children (34, 37; cp. Deut. xxxiii. 17). When Joshua was the leader of Israel, the tribe rose rapidly in reputation, for he was himself an Ephraimite (Josh. xix. 50, xxiv. 30). The tribe was allotted territory west of the Jordan. Its southern boundary line ran from the Jordan at Jericho to Bethel, Luz, Ataroth-addar, Upper Beth-horon, Lower Beth-horon, Gezer, and the sea (Josh. xvi. 1-3, 5). The northern line ran through Michmethath, near Shechem, eastward to Taanath-shiloh, Janoah, Ataroth, and Naarah, reached Jericho and the Jordan (6, 7), and passed westward from Michmethath to En-tappuah, the river Kanah and the Mediterranean (8; cp. xvii. 7). It had the territory of the half-tribe of Manasseh, west of the Jordan, on the north, and Benjamin on the south; it reached the Mediterranean on the west and to the Jordan on the east. Shechem was within the territory of Ephraim (Josh. xxi. 20, 21; 1 Kin. xii. 25, 1 Chron. vi. 67). The Ephraimites failed to expel the Canaanites from Gezer, which was within the lot of Ephraim; but, either alone or in conjunction with their kindred the Manassites, they captured Bethel (Judg. i. 22-26, 29). They acted patriotically in the fight celebrated in song by Deborah (v. 14). They quarreled with Gideon, who was a Manassehite.

site, for not having called them to aid him in expelling the Midianites from Canaan (viii. 1-3). They resolutely encountered in battle Jephthah, the deliverer of Israel, for not having summoned them to assist him in the Ammonite war, 42,000 of the tribe falling in the struggle (xii. 1-6). Micah, of graven image notoriety, resided in mount Ephraim (xvii. 1); and the Levite, the ill-treatment of whose concubine led to the hostilities against Benjamin, sojourned there (xix. 1). Jeroboam was a man of Ephraim, and after he had become king over the revolted ten tribes, he rebuilt Shechem in mount Ephraim to be his capital (1 Kin. xii. 25).

The hill country of Ephraim, or mount Ephraim, as it is sometimes called, was so much of the central range of Palestine as was occupied by the tribe of Ephraim. It did not include the towns of Taanach, Megiddo, Beth-shean, and Abel-meholah, on the north and east (1 Kin. iv. 8, 12), nor Kirjath-jearim, Gibeah, or the territory of Benjamin on the south (Judg. xviii. 12, 13, xix. 16; 1 Sam. ix. 4; 1 Kin. iv. 8, 18; 2 Chron. xv. 8). If it included territory north of Shechem (1 Chron. vi. 66, 68, with 1 Kin. iv. 12), it was thus bounded on three sides by the southern border of the plain of Esdraelon, the Jordan valley, and the territory of Benjamin. The term did not properly designate any part of the district occupied by Benjamin. Even Judg. iv. 5 and 2 Sam. xx. 1, 21 do not necessarily imply any broader use of the term. But after the establishment of the northern kingdom with its shifting southern frontier, the southern limits of the hill country of Ephraim were no longer clearly defined.

The wood of Ephraim, in which the battle took place between the forces of David and those of the rebel Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 6, cp. xvii. 22, 24, 26, 27), was evidently east of the Jordan, and near Mahanaim, but its exact situation is unknown. It probably took its name either from the defeat of the Ephraimites in the time of Jephthah (Judg. xii. 1 seq.), or because it was opposite to the territory and mountain of Ephraim.

For the gate of Ephraim, see JERUSALEM II., 3.

3. The ten tribes of which Ephraim became the head. Used in this sense especially by the prophets (Is. vii. 2, 5, 9, 17, ix. 9, xvii. 3, xxviii. 3; Hos. iv. 17; v. 3; ix. 3-17).

4. A city to which Baal-hazor was adjacent (2 Sam. xiii. 23), probably the same place as Ephraim near to the wilderness (John xi. 54), and Apharema, which at one time belonged to Samaria (1 Mac. xi. 34). The Roman general Vespasian took Ephraim and Bethel during his advance on Jerusalem (War. iv. 9, 9). Robinson identifies it with Ophrah of Benjamin, and locates it at the modern village of Taiyibeh, on a conical hill standing on high land 4 miles east-northeast of Bethel. The identification has met general acceptance.

E'phra-im-ite.

A member of the tribe of Ephraim (Judg. xii. 5). More frequently Ephrathite, as in the original.

E'phra-in.

See EPHRON 2.

Eph'ra-thah, in A V Ephratah [fruitfulness, fruitful land]. A shorter form, occasionally used in the Hebrew text and preserved in the versions, is Ephrath.

1 The original name of Bethlehem in Judaea (Gen. xxxv. 19, xlviii. 7, Ruth. iv. 11). It is sometimes called Bethlehem-ephratah (Mic. v. 2).

2 A wife of Caleb, son of Hezron. She was the mother of Hur (1 Chron. ii. 19, 50; iv. 4).

3. The territory of Ephraim (Ps. cxxxii. 6; see EPHRATHITE 2); or better, Kirjath-jearim, which belonged to Caleb-ephratah (1 Chron. ii. 50, 51), and where the ark had been kept for a long time.

Eph'rath-ite.

1 A native or inhabitant of Ephrath, i. e. Bethlehem (1 Sam. xvii. 12; Ruth. i. 2).

2. An Ephraimite, one belonging to the tribe of Ephraim (1 Sam. i. 1, 1 Kin. xi. 26).

E'phron [vrituline]

1 A Hittite, resident at Hebron, and owner of the cave of Machpelah, which he sold to Abraham (Gen. xxiii. 8; xxv. 9).

2 A city which was taken from Jeroboam by Abijah (2 Chron. xiii. 19). Abandoning the Hebrew text for the traditional pronunciation of the synagogue, A V and the margin of the R V have Ephraim [two calves or fawns], an Aramaic dual. Commonly identified with the town of Ephraim.

3 A city east of the Jordan in the territory of Manasseh, in a pass on the road between Karnaim and Beth-shean. It was captured by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac. v. 46-52, 2 Mac. xii. 27, 29; Antiq. xii. 8, 5).

4 A mountain ridge between Nephtoah and Kirjath-jearim, on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 9).

Ep-i-cu-re'ans.

One of the leading philosophic sects of Greece and Rome. It derived its name and its existence from the great philosopher Epicurus. He was born 341 B. C. in the island of Samos, but was of Athenian descent, and made Athens the scene of his lifework. In 306 B. C. he founded a school or college with a garden attached, in which he taught for the next thirty-six years, till his death in 270 B. C. He is said to have written about three hundred philosophic books, nearly all of which are lost. In physics he, like Democritus, attributes all nature to changes among atoms in themselves eternal. He does not recognize a Creator, but, with curious inconsistency, finds a place in his system for a multitude of gods, who, however, supremely happy in themselves, take no part in human affairs. With regard to his ethics, a popular misconception prevails. He desires that pleasure shall be pursued and pain avoided; but the notion that by pleasure he meant only sensual gratification is erroneous. He included under the term the pleasure derived from the exercise of the intellect and the moral faculty. Personally he was so pure that some thought he was destitute of passions. The Epicureans were mostly men of soft temperament, the very opposite of the Stoics, who were cast in an iron mould. Both philosophic sects rejected Paul's doctrine at Athens, but both showed their tolerance by taking the apostle to the court of Areopagus to have his teaching examined, in place of exciting a riot against him, as had been done at various places where he had preached (Acts xvii 18-20).

Ep-i-lep'tic.

A person affected with the falling sickness, a disease which in its severe form is characterized by recurrent attacks of loss of consciousness with spasms (Mat xvii 15, in A. V. lunatic, Mark ix 18). In this case the disease was occasioned by demoniacal possession.

E-pis'tles.

The name given to twenty-one books of the N T. The earliest of them antedate the gospels, Paul having written his epistles to the Thessalonians about A. D. 52. They are letters which were written by the apostles, or which received apostolic sanction; and they are addressed to particular churches, and deal with doctrinal and practical questions, or to individuals, yet contain matter of wide import, or to Christians generally, and not to any one person or church. With the exception of the Epistle to the Hebrews and 1 John, they open, according to the custom of the time, with the name or title of the writer and that of the person or church addressed, and then follow words of greeting.

The epistles are classed in three groups, but the groups are neither exhaustive nor mutually exclusive. 1 Pauline; for the first thirteen begin with the statement that the letter was sent by Paul or by him in conjunction with other Christian workers, as Sosthenes (1 Cor i. 1), Timothy (2 Cor. i. 1; Phil i. 1, Col i. 1; Philem 1), or Silvanus and Timothy together (1 Thes i. 1, 2 Thes. i. 1). Paul, as a rule, employed an amanuensis to write from his dictation (Rom xvi 22), the apostle adding the salutation in his own hand, which he says was the token in every epistle (1 Cor xvi 21, Col iv 18; 2 Thes iii 17). In the case of the Epistle to the Galatians, however, he departed from his rule, and wrote the whole letter with his own hand (Gal vi 11). 2 Within the group of Pauline epistles are three known as the pastoral epistles, namely, 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus. They are addressed to the persons whose names they bear, and contain directions for the training and governing of churches and the proper treatment of individual members. 3 Five epistles are called general in the titles prefixed to them in the A. V.: James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1 John, and Jude. In the early church, however, seven were classed as catholic; 2 and 3 John being included (Eusebius, Hist Eccles ii. 23), although these two are simple personal letters addressed to individuals. The word catholic was probably used in its sense of general, to denote an encyclical letter to the church at large; and the elect lady and Gaius, to whom 2 and 3 John respectively are addressed, were probably understood to represent the church universal.

The epistolary form was not a mere literary device, chosen for a doctrinal treatise. Usually at least the epistles were written in the way of ordinary correspondence. They were prompted by personal motives and were due to the writer's own initiative (Philemon, 2 John); or they were penned in reply to letters, or were based on information otherwise obtained, concerning matters requiring attention in any particular church (1 Cor i. 11, 2 Cor vii 5-7, 1 Thes iii. 5, 6). But they are adapted to all persons in like circumstances, Paul requested that certain of his epistles be read by others than by those only to whom they were addressed (Col iv. 16). The apostles claimed that these epistles are the word of God (1 Thes. ii. 13; 1 Pet i. 12), and from the beginning they ranked with the other Scriptures. Peter in A. D. 68 spoke of Paul's epistles as part of the Scriptures (2 Pet iii 15, 16), and Polycarp in A. D. 115 quoted the Psalms and Ephesians side by side as equally Scripture. See CANON.

The titles of the epistles were not part of the original composition, but were prefixed afterwards. They are lacking in early manuscripts, and are no part of Scripture. Most of them are founded on the first verse of the epistle; but that prefixed to the Epistle to the Hebrews is not derived from the letter itself, and is of doubtful accuracy. The notices appended to the epistles in the A. V. regarding the place where the letter was penned were likewise no part of the original composition.

Er [awake on the watch]

1 A son of Judah who died in Canaan by a judgment of God for his wickedness (Gen. xxxviii 1-7, xlvii 12, 1 Chron. ii 3).

2 A descendant of Judah, of the family of Shelah (1 Chron. iv 21).

3 An ancestor of Christ, about midway between David and Zerubbabel (Luke iii 28).

E'ran [watchful]

A descendant of Ephraim through Shuthelah, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi 36).

E-ras'tus [beloved]

A Christian, one of those who ministered to Paul. He was sent with Timothy from Ephesus into Macedonia just before the riot at the former place (Acts xix. 22). He is probably the person mentioned in 2 Tim. iv.

20 as having abode at Corinth, who was doubtless the Christian in high official position, chamberlain of the city of Corinth, who joined with Paul in sending salutations to the Roman converts (Rom. xvi 23).

E'rech [Assyrian Uruk and Aḫḫu].

A city of Shinar or Lower Babylonia, one of those constituting part of Nimrod's kingdom (Gen. x 10). It is now represented by the mounds of Warka, a considerable distance south of Babylon, on a marshy region, east of the Euphrates. The extreme antiquity of the city has been established by the Babylonian inscriptions. Archevites were settled in Samaria by Asnapper (Ezra iv 9).

E'ri [watching].

A son of Gad and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlv. 16; Num. xxvi. 16).

E-sa'ias. See ISAIAS.

E-sar-had'don [Ashur hath given brothers].

The favorite, though not the eldest, son of Sennacherib, king of Assyria. The partiality so annoyed two other brothers, Adrammelech and Nergalsharezer, that they assassinated their father, escaping afterwards into Armenia (2 Km. xix. 36, 37. 2 Chron. xxxii 21, Is. xxxvii 37, 38). When this base murder was perpetrated, Esar-haddon was himself conducting a campaign in the northwest, probably in Armenia. On receiving news of the event, he at once started with his army for Nineveh, but was met on the way by the rebel forces. The confederates were, however, defeated, and Esar-haddon was able to ascend the throne of Assyria on the 8th of Nisan, 680 B.C. The partiality of the father had not been misplaced. Esar-haddon was equally eminent as a military general and a political ruler. In his first year he defeated the son of Merodach-baladan in southern Babylonia. Later he commenced the restoration of the city of Babylon which Sennacherib, provoked by its continual revolts against the Assyrian domination, had given up to plunder. Esar-haddon also waged war against the Chimerian barbarians who had descended upon the more civilized south from beyond the Caucasus; against the mountaineers of Cilicia, and against the children of Eden who were in Telassar (cp. Is. xxxvii 12). In his fourth year he captured and pillaged Sidon, deported its inhabitants, razed the city to the ground, and erected a new town on the old site. Its king had escaped by sea, but he was pursued, taken, and beheaded. The same fate befell his two royal allies. Afterwards twelve tribes on the mainland and ten in Cyprus submitted to the Assyrian dominion. Among others were Manasseh, king of Judah, and the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Gaza, Ashkelon, Ekron, and Ashdod. Esar-haddon successfully accomplished two most difficult military enterprises, the penetration of the Arabian desert and of far off Media. He turned his attention to a yet greater undertaking, the conquest of Egypt, but he was for a time diverted from his purpose, being compelled in his eighth year to war with a tribe at the head of the Persian Gulf and near Ur. At length in his tenth year he made his great expedition against Egypt. Marching past Tyre, he left the city under siege. He entered Egypt, captured Memphis, and laid the entire country and its petty kings at his feet. He divided the valley of the Nile from Thebes to the Mediterranean into twenty satrapies. Over the less important in a spirit of conciliation he set governors of native descent, but over the more important he placed Assyrian governors. He died 669 or 668 B.C., leaving his eldest son, Ashurbanipal, who for a short time previously had been associated with him in the government, to ascend the throne.

E'sau [hairy].

Son of Isaac and Rebekah, and elder twin brother of Jacob. Esau was so named because he was all over like a hairy garment (Gen. xxv. 21-26). As he grew up he became a skillful hunter, and was accustomed to bring home venison, doubtless the flesh of various antelopes, to his father Isaac. On one occasion he returned from the chase famishing, and asked for some red pottage which Jacob had just made ready. Jacob asked from him the surrender of his birthright as payment, and Esau, esteeming the higher blessings lightly, and caring more for present gratification, sold his birthright rather than wait for the preparation of food. From the red pottage, which was its price, Esau obtained a second name, Edom, i.e. Red (27-34, Heb. xii 16, 17). When he was 40 years old he married two wives, Judith or Oholimamah and Basemath or Adah, both Hittites (Gen. xxvi 34, 35; xxxvi 1, 2). Afterwards he wedded Mahalath, called also Basemath, the daughter of Ishmael (xxvii 9, xxvii 3). When Isaac was old and nearly blind, he designed to confer the covenant blessing on Esau, who was his favorite son. But Jacob was Rebekah's favorite, and she induced him to personate Esau and fraudulently obtain the blessing. Esau resolved to kill his selfish brother, but did not like to carry out the murder while his father was living (xxvii 1-41). To give time for this anger to cool, Jacob fled to Mesopotamia, and for twenty years was an exile (xxvii 42-xxxi 55). On his return he took means to appease his justly offended brother; and Esau, who was of a generous nature, dismissed his vindictive feeling, and gave Jacob a fraternal reception (xxxii 3-xxxiii 15). Prior to this Esau had taken up his abode in mount Seir, to which he at once returned (16). The reconciliation between the brothers was permanent, and both met to bury their father (xxxv. 29). Esau's descendants increased and ultimately dispossessed the original inhabitants of mount Seir and became the Edomite people (Deut.

ii 4, 12, 22). Mount Seir could, accordingly, be called the mount of Esau (Obad. 8, 9, 19, 21). For the election of Jacob to be the child of promise and the rejection of Esau, see Gen. xxv. 23; Mal i 2, 3, Rom. ix 12, 13.

Es'dras.

The Greek form of Ezra. It is used in the Septuagint and the Apocrypha, but does not occur in the canonical Scriptures. See APOCRYPHA.

E'sek [contention]

A well dug by Isaac in the valley of Gerar, which the Philistine herdmen claimed (Gen. xxvi 20).

E'shan, in A V Eshean [support].

A village in the mountains of Judah, grouped with Dumah and Hebron (Josh. xv. 52). Septuagint has Soma, hence it may be identical with the ruin es-Sinna, near Dumah, and about 8½ miles southwest by south of Hebron.

Esh'ba-al. See ISHBOSETH.

Esh'ban [reason, intelligence]

A son of Dishon, descended from Seir the Horite (Gen. xxxvi 26, 1 Chron. i. 41).

Esh'col [a cluster, specially of grapes]

1 One of three Amorite brothers, residing near Hebron and confederate with Abram (Gen. xiv 13, 24).

2 A valley near, probably north of, Hebron (Num. xiii 22, 23, Deut. i 24). The region round about Hebron is celebrated for its large clusters of luscious grapes. It is uncertain whether the valley bore this name before the time of Moses or not. At any rate the name henceforth suggested to the Israelites the spot where the spies, whom Moses had sent to spy out the land, cut the famous cluster which two of them carried suspended on a pole between them to save from being dashed and broken (Num. xiii 24).

E'she-an. See ESHAN.

E'shek [violence, oppression]

A Benjamite, a descendant of Saul (1 Chron. viii. 39).

Esh'ka-lon-ite. See ASIKELONITE.

Esh'ta-ol [perhaps petition]

A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 33), eventually allotted to the Danites (ix. 41). It is commonly mentioned in connection with Zorah (Judg. xiii. 25; xvi 31; xviii 2, 8, 11, 1 Chron. ii 53). It has been identified as the village of Eshû'a about 1½ miles east by north from Zorah, and 13 miles west, slightly north from Jerusalem.

Esh'ta-ul-ite, in R V Eshtaolite.

An inhabitant of Eshtaol (1 Chron. ii 53).

Esh-te-mo'a, once Eshtemoh (Josh. xv 50) [obedience].

1. A town in the hill country of Judah, given with its suburbs to the priests (Josh. ix. 50; xxi. 14; 1 Chron. vi. 57). David sent it some of the spoils obtained on the recapture of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 28). The site has been found at Semû'a, 9 miles south of Hebron, a considerable village with the foundation of ancient walls designed for a large town.

2 A Maacathite, son of Hodiah (1 Chron. iv. 19, R. V.).

Esh'ton [possibly uxorious].

A descendant of Chelub, reckoned in the genealogy of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 12).

Esh'ti [perhaps from Hebrew 'esh, at my side (is God)].

An ancestor of Christ who lived after the captivity (Luke iii. 25).

Es'rom. See HEZRON.

Es-senes'.

An order of men among the Jews in the time of Christ, who numbered about 4000, and devoted themselves to a more or less ascetic life. Hoping by isolation to escape ceremonial defilement, they formed colonies by themselves. The wilderness of Judæa near En-gedi was a favorite place for their settlements, but there were colonies in various towns of Judæa also. Each colony had its own synagogue, a common hall for meals and assemblies, and provision for daily bathing in running water. Whoever became a member of the order gave up all that he possessed to it. They read the law of Moses daily and nightly, and endeavored to regulate their lives in every detail according to it. Their habits were simple. Their food and clothing were plain. They passed the day in husbandry and other useful industry. Money was almost unnecessary, as they supplied their needs by their own labor; and when they traveled, they found lodging and food free of cost among their brethren. They had no slaves, as they recognized no distinction between men save that of clean and unclean. They did not deny the fitness of marriage; but they abstained from wedlock, except one party among them. Their morality was lofty. They promised "to honor God, to be righteous toward man, to injure no one, either at the bidding of another or of their own accord, to hate evil, to promote good, to be faithful to every one, especially those in authority, to love the truth, to unmask hars, and to keep the hand from theft and the conscience from unrighteous gain" (Antiq. xviii. 1. 5, War ii 8. 2-13).

Es'ther [from Persian sitāreh, star].

A beautiful maiden, daughter of Abihail, and probably of the tribe of Benjamin (Esth. ii 15; and cp. 5 with 7). Her Hebrew name was Hadasah, myrtle. Early left an orphan, she was brought up at Susa, the Persian metropolis, by Mordecai, her cousin, who adopted her. Ahasuerus, king of Persia, who by common consent is identified with Xerxes, when in wine, ordered Vashti the queen to be brought into the banquet hall and displayed in royal regalia to the revelers. Angered by her refusal to submit to such indignity, he followed the advice of his obsequious courtiers, and decreed her permanent seclusion and had his realm searched for a fair maiden to take her place. Eventually, in the seventh year of the king, Esther was selected and installed in the palace as queen. It was not known at the time that she was a Jewess. She came to the throne at a critical time. The royal favorite was Haman. Five years after Esther's elevation (Esth. ii. 16; iii. 7), Haman, annoyed by Mordecai's refusal to do him obeisance, wished to revenge himself by the massacre, not simply of Mordecai, but of all the large Jewish population scattered throughout the empire. He secured the king's consent by the offer of a heavy bribe and by allusion to the stubborn adherence of the Jews to their own laws and customs; and he sought to get the aid of the rabble in the work of slaughter by an appeal to their greed (Esth. ii. 5-ii. 15). Mordecai urged Esther to interfere for the protection of her race. She was afraid; but, on being solemnly addressed by her guardian, she, after fasting and prayer, risked her life by coming unbidden into the king's presence. With great prudence and tact she made a favorable opportunity for bringing to the king's attention the fact that Haman's plot invaded the palace and included her; and, since the edict of destruction could not be recalled, she gained permission for the Jews to defend themselves, and even to take the offensive against their foes. The time and manner of Esther's death are unknown. If Ahasuerus is Xerxes, as is universally believed, Esther was one of Xerxes' wives (cp. the wives of Xerxes' father, Herod. iii. 88; vii. 2, and also 2 Sam. iii. 2-5, xi. 26, 27; 1 Kin. i. 11; vii. 8; xi. 3; Dan v. 2, 10), of whom one was Amestris, the daughter or granddaughter of Otanes, first definitely reported as already Xerxes' wife in 479 B. C., his seventh or eighth regnal year (Herod. ix. 109; cp. vii. 61; Ctesias, Exc. Pers. 20). Vashti was the reigning wife in Xerxes' third year (Esth. i. 3, 9), the year in which he convoked a great assembly to consult about a war with the Greeks (Herod. vii. 7, 8), and Esther was put into her place in the tenth month of the seventh year (Esth. ii. 16, 17), and was queen in the twelfth year also (iii. 7; v. 3).

The book of Esther is the last of the historical books of the O. T. In the Hebrew canon it stands among the Hagiographa; formerly, according to the Talmud, between Daniel and Ezra, but now just after Ecclesiastes and immediately before Daniel. This latter position is due to its being grouped with four other rolls which were used on five solemn anniversaries. The last of these anniversaries is Purim, hence Esther has been placed last among the Five Rolls. Long after the completion of the canon, the right of Esther to its place in that canon was called in question by the Jews, probably, however, not seriously, but to afford opportunity for intellectual display in its defense. The Jews now regard it with special honor. Christians have been more divided on the subject of its merits. Melito of Sardis and Gregory of Nazianzus omitted it from their lists of canonical books; Athanasius classed it with non-canonical books, and Luther denounced it. Opposition to it was based mainly on the fact that the name of God does not occur in it even once. But iv. 14 implies the existence of Providence; iv. 16 recognizes fasting as a religious practice, and ix. 31 not merely fasting, but a cry or prayer. The great lesson of the book is, in fact, the overruling power of Providence.

Investigators who seek for a possible mythological or legendary origin for the narratives of the Old Testament argue that the book of Esther springs from such a source. The theory of a Babylonian origin is most in vogue. In its principal form at present it rests its claim for acceptance mainly on the evidence that Esther is a late form of the name of the Babylonian goddess Ishtar; and that Esther's other name Hadassah is the Babylonian word hadashatu, bride, originally myrtle, and is used as a title of goddesses. Mordecai is the same as Marduk, the patron deity of Babylon. He is the cousin of Esther, and it is possible thus to relate Marduk to Ishtar. Haman, the adversary of Mordecai, represents Humman or Hamman, a chief god of the Elamites, in whose capital Susa the scene is laid; and Zeresh, the wife of Haman, may be the same as Kirisha, an Elamite goddess, presumably the consort of Humman. Vashti is also an Elamite deity, presumably a goddess. The successful resistance of Mordecai and Esther to Haman, Zeresh, and Vashti is the conflict of the gods of Babylonia with the gods of Elam, in other words, it is the struggle between Babylonia and Elam for supremacy, which lasted for a thousand years and ended in the victory of Babylonia (Jensen, Wiener Zeitschrift f. d. Kunde des Morgenlandes, vi. 47 ff., 209 ff.; Gunkel, Schöpfung und Chaos, 310-314, who admits that the basis is lacking so long as the word Pur remains unexplained, 314). If this theory were established, it might show that the Jews of the dispersion, feeding their hopes on the prophecies of deliverance, instituted a joyous feast and made use of the contest of Marduk and Ishtar with Humman and Vashti to illustrate or typify the certain victory of the Jews over all their foes.

Before this theory is adopted, however, its foundations must be critically examined:

I. Regarding the Elamite deities. 1 The identification of Haman, the archenemy of the Jews, with the chief god of the Elamites. (1) The name of this deity was ordinarily written by the Assyrians Humba, but in certain phonetic connections it was reproduced by them as Umman, with a final nun, and this form could be represented in Hebrew by Human or Haman. So far good; but (2) the book of Esther tells more about Haman than his name. It knows him as the son of Hammedatha, and an Agagite (iii 1, 10; viii 5, ix 24); and gives the names of ten sons of his (ix. 7-10). The Elamite theory does not account for these names, and fails to explain this descent. 2 Regarding Haman's wife Zeresh, whom the theory would identify with an Elamite goddess, there should be noted (1) the argument for the goddess Kirisha, thus: The deity Kirisha is apparently identical with the deity Kirišha, who may have been a goddess. A temple was dedicated to Humba and Kirišha, and hence Kirišha or Kirisha may have been the wife of Humba (WZKM vi 63). The argument lacks cogency. (2) Some texts of Josephus give the initial letter in the name of Haman's wife as G (Antiq xi 6, 10; see Niese's edition), and reading Geresh instead of Zeresh, the sound approximates that of Kirišha, the Elamite deity, perhaps a goddess. But other copies of Josephus agree with the great manuscripts of the Septuagint (A, B, and Lucian). These typical texts support the Hebrew form of the name in this essential point and attest in various ways the sibilant z, z and not g, as the first letter in the name of Haman's wife. They allow scant resemblance to the name Kirišha. 3 The name of the Elamite deity Vashiti (not Bar-ti, as Professor Sayce, using the alternative sound of the first sign, writes the name) may, for phonetic reasons, be pronounced Vashiti, and thus correspond to Vashiti, the queen in the opening chapters of the book of Esther. Vashiti was "probably a goddess" (WZKM vi 51). Evidently much that is essential to the theory remains to be proven. Even if the assumption regarding the sex of this deity were established as a fact, it would be necessary to inquire whether Vashiti was not the abbreviation of a compound name containing the name of this deity (cp Ben-hadad). But, after all, Vashiti may be a good Persian name, as befits the queen of Ahasuerus (see VASHITI).

II Regarding the Hebrews who figure in the narrative. 1 Possibly the parents of Esther named their daughter, or friends of later years called the handsome maiden, after the bright and beautiful star of evening and morning (Is xiv 12; Rev. xvii 16; cp. Lehana). But (1) there are obstinate etymological facts against identifying the name of Esther with that of the star-goddess Ishtar. The initial letter of Esther is aleph, whereas of Ishtar it is ain. All the Semitic dialects, east and west, in which the name of the goddess occurs, without exception preserved this distinction and maintained it until centuries after the book of Esther had been written and the celebration of Purim had become universal among the Jews throughout the world. It is reported, indeed, that the plural of Ishtar is written with aleph, not ain, in some Jewish incantations on sherds found in Babylonia. The date of these sherds is not stated. But whether they are as early as the book of Esther or much later, this form of Ishtar is abnormal and sadly degenerate. The citation of it is irrelevant, for the vocabulary of the book of Esther is not degenerate. There is, however, no need to think of Ishtar at all; since Esther, as a Persian word, is the good name Stella, a star. (2) The evidence that hadashatu denotes a bride is valid. But there is no evidence whatsoever that it signified myrtle, and none that it was used as a characteristic epithet of goddesses. The comparison of it with Esther's own Hebrew name Hadassah is peculiarly unfortunate from the standpoint of etymology; for the Assyrian counterpart of Hadassah would be 'adassatu, not hadashatu. (3) Finally, Esther is known in the book that bears her name as the daughter of Abihail and a queen of Ahasuerus, and the theory utterly fails to explain these relationships. 2 Mordecai means either belonging to Marduk or is a diminutive or hypocoristic form of Marduk. Now (1) the name Marduk and its diminutive Marduka were quite frequently borne by men in Babylon. (2) The form of the name in the book of Esther points to a man, not to a god. (3) Such names were not wanting among godly Hebrews: compare Apollos, Henadad, Shenazzar. The name Mordecai itself was borne by another Jew of the exile besides the cousin of Esther (Ezra ii 2). (4) The narrative takes Mordecai's lineage back through several ancestors to the tribe of Benjamin (Esth. ii 5).

Thus, on removing the mere surmises from the mass of evidence offered in support of the theory, the name Esther may perchance be, but yet scarcely is, a form of Ishtar in this narrative. Mordecai is certainly derived from Marduk, and Haman and Vashiti may represent Elamite deities. But granting all this in favor of the theory, nevertheless: 1 No substantial ground has been found for regarding the personages who bear these names in the narrative as deities rather than people, and, moreover, the hypothesis fails to account for the ancestry of the chief actors in the events described. And why does king Ahasuerus appear? 2 Against the theory of a heathen origin is the acceptance of the event as historical, and the universal celebration of the festival in the first century by the Jews throughout the world (Antiq. xi 6, 13; Septuagint; 2 Mac. xv. 36). 3 The principal events of the narrative are expressly claimed to be recorded in the state chronicles of Persia (Esth. ii 23; vi. 1, 2, x. 2). 4. Finally, so far as any form of the theory assumes a heathen festival as the origin of Purim, the grand objection is that no heathen celebration has yet been discovered for the fourteenth and fifteenth days of Adar, the twelfth month of the year. See other articles, such as MORDECAI, PROVINCE, VASHITI.

The language of the book of Esther is Hebrew, like that of Ezra and Nehemiah, but with more Persian words. From x 2 it would seem that Xerxes was dead when it was penned. Its date is generally fixed about 425 B. C., forty years after his assassination, or at least in the reign of Artaxerxes, 465-425; and there is no valid reason to date it later. The book is not quoted in the N. T., nor alluded to. Certain additions to it appear in the Septuagint. Jerome separated them and put them at the end of the book, and they now find place in the Apocrypha.

E'tam [place of beasts of prey]

1. A village on the border of the south country and the lowland, transferred from Judah to Simeon (1 Chron. iv 32; cp. Josh. xv 32 and 42). In the cleft of a rock near by Samson dwelt for a time (Judg. xv 8, 11), having gone down thither from Timnah. Perhaps the site is 'Aitun, about 11 miles W. S. W. of Hebron. But the rock of Etam may have been nearer Samson's home. Chiefly for this reason Conder locates the cleft at Beit 'Atab, 5 miles S. E. of Zorah, Schick at Arak Isma'in, in wady Isma'in, 2½ miles E. S. E. of Zorah.

2. A town in the neighborhood of Bethlehem, fortified by Rehoboam for the defense of Judah after the secession of the ten tribes (1 Chron. iv 3; 2 Chron. xi 6; and Josh. xv. 60 in Septuagint). According to the Talmud, the temple at Jerusalem was supplied with water conducted from the spring of Etam, and an ancient aqueduct extends for 7 miles from the temple hill, past Bethlehem, to three pools, the lowest of which is fed by a neighboring spring, situated on the south, called 'Ain 'Atan. Josephus relates that Solomon was fond of driving out in the early morning to Etan (written also Etam), distant 2 schoinoi or 7 miles from Jerusalem, where there was a delightful prospect of gardens and rivulets (Antiq. viii 7, 3, cp. Song vi. 11, 12; Eccl. ii 5, 6). Here, then, at 'Ain 'Atan, near the village of Urtas and about 2 miles southwest of Bethlehem, was the site of Etam. The three reservoirs were discovered by pilgrims at quite a late date and named the pools of Solomon. The aqueduct is ancient, antedating the Christian era and the Roman period. Pontius Pilate probably used it as the last section of the great conduit which he undertook to build for the purpose of bringing water to Jerusalem from a distance of 200 stadia or 23 miles (Antiq. xviii. 3, 2; or 400 stadia, War ii. 9, 4). Another section extends from the three pools to the wady el-'Arrub near Hebron, and a third reaches a few miles southward from the pools to the wady el-Biar.

E'tham [perhaps boundary].

The first encampment of the Israelites after leaving Succoth, as they were departing from Egypt. It was on the edge of the wilderness (Ex. xiii. 20; Num. xxxiii. 6). It apparently did not lie on the direct road from Egypt to the Philistine country (Ex. xiii. 17). The name was extended to a portion of the wilderness of Shur, requiring at least three days to cross it, and apparently reaching to or even including Marah (Num. xxxiii. 8; cp. Ex. xv 22). Identifications have been proposed, but are all conjectural.

E'than [firmness, perpetuity]

1. A descendant of Judah, belonging to the tribal family of Zerah (1 Chron. ii 6). He seems to have been the person of this name who was celebrated for his wisdom (1 Kin. iv. 31; Ps. lxxxix, title).

2. A Levite, of the family of Gershon, house of Libni (1 Chron. vi 42, 43; cp. 20 and Num. xxvi 58).

3. A Levite, of the family of Merari, house of Mushi. He was a son of Kishi or Kushi, and was appointed a singer in the time of David (1 Chron. vi. 44, 47; xv 17, 19). His name, it appears, was changed to Jeduthun, praising one, after his appointment to service in the tabernacle at Gibeon (1 Chron. xvi. 38-41; cp. xv. 17, 19 with xxv 1).

Eth'a-nim [incessant rains]

The seventh month (1 Kin. viii 2), called also Tishri. It was approximately October. Within it fell the feast of trumpets, the great day of atonement, and the feast of tabernacles. See YEAR.

Eth'ba-al [with Baal, or, to judge from the Greek form, with him is Baal]

A king of the Tyrians and Sidonians, and father of Jezebel (1 Kin. xvi 31, Antiq. viii 13, 1 and 2, ix 6, 6). He was priest of Ashtoreth, but slew his brother and seized the throne (contra Apion 1 18).

E'ther [abundance]

A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv 42), but allotted to the tribe of Simeon (xix 7). It is called Tochen in 1 Chron. iv 32. The best suggestion as to its site is the ruined village of 'Atr, about a mile northwest by north of Beit Jibrin.

E-thi-o'pi-a [Greek Authiopia, sunburnt. Possibly, however, this may have been substituted for the Egyptian Ethiush, Ethiopia, with which it nearly agrees in sound].

1. A country called in the Hebrew language Cush, which is continually mentioned in connection with Egypt (Ps. lxxviii. 31; Is. xxi 3-5; Ezek. xxx. 4, 5; Dan. xi 43; Nah. iii. 9) and sometimes with Libya or the Libyans (2 Chron. xvi 8; Ezek. xxx. 5; xxxviii. 5; Dan. xi 43; Nah. iii. 9), and must certainly have been in eastern Africa. It ran southward from Syene, the southern point of Egypt (Ezek. xxix 10, R. V. margin; cp. Judith 1 10). It was manifestly the upper region of the Nile, the Soudan, Nubia with Kordofan, Sennar, and northern Abyssinia, a region in large measure desert, though in places fertile. This general region was known to the Egyptians as Kes. The rivers of Ethiopia (Is. xviii. 1; Zeph. iii. 10) were probably the White and Blue Niles, with the Atbara or Tacazze. The topazes of Ethiopia were celebrated (Job xxviii. 19). Its inhabitants were tall (Is. xlv. 14). They were colored men, probably black (Jer. xii. 23). They engaged in mercantile transactions, selling the productions of their country in foreign lands (Is. xlv. 14), and as a consequence became wealthy (xliii. 3). When the Ethiopians, led by Zerah, invaded Judah, they were signally defeated by king Asa (2 Chron. xiv. 9-15; xvi. 8). An Ethiopian dynasty, the twenty-fifth, established itself in Egypt; to it belonged that Tirhakah who met Sennacherib in battle at Eltekeh (2 Kin. xix. 9; Is. xxxvii. 9). Isaiah (xx. 1-6) and Zephaniah (ii. 12) prophesied against the Ethiopians, while the psalmist predicted that Ethiopia would haste to stretch out her hands unto God (Ps. lxxviii. 31, cp. lxxxvii. 4). The prophecy obtained fulfillment in the conversion of the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts viii. 26-40) and the introduction of the gospel into Abyssinia, which still remains a Christian kingdom.

2 There was an Asiatic as well as an African Cush. See CUSH 1 and 2.

Eth-ka'zin, in A V It-tah-ka'zin, with the case-ending.

A place on the boundary line of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 13).

Eth'nan [gift hire]

A man of Judah, family of Hezron (1 Chron. iv. 7; cp. 5 and ii. 24).

Eth'ni [bountiful, munificent].

A Gershonite Levite (1 Chron. vi. 41). In ver. 21 he is called Jeathra. The main difference is found in the last consonant. A scribe seems to have confounded the Hebrew letters nun and resh.

Eu-bu'lus [well advised, prudent]

A Roman Christian (2 Tim. iv. 21).

Eu'me-nes [well disposed]

King of Pergamos, 197-159 B. C. When the Romans defeated Antiochus the Great at Magnesia in 190 B. C., they assigned the greater part of the defeated king's realm north of the Taurus mountains to Eumenes in return for the services which he had rendered them (1 Mac. viii. 6-8, Lxxv. xxxv. 44). They bestowed Lycia and Caria on the Rhodians. The report, which Judas Maccabæus heard, that the Romans had taken India and Media also was not true.

Eu-ni'ce [blessed with victory].

A pious Jewess, mother of Timothy (Acts xvi. 1, 2 Tim. i. 5).

Eu'nuch [having the couch].

Properly a chamberlain: but in the East persons who had been rendered impotent were employed for this office, hence an impotent man (Is. lvi. 3; Mat. xix. 12). There is scarcely a doubt that the word is used in this sense throughout Scripture, even when it is rendered into English by some other term. There have been, and still are, married eunuchs (Gen. xxxix. 1, rendered officer, and 7). Eunuchs often obtained high position and great authority. The captain of the guard of Pharaoh and his chief butler and his chief baker were eunuchs (Gen. xxxvii. 36; xl. 2, 7, translated officer). Eunuchs ministered at the court of Babylon (Dan. i. 3). They served in the presence of the Persian king, and acted as doorkeepers of his palace (Esth. i. 10; ii. 21); a eunuch was over his harem (ii. 3, 14), and a eunuch was deputed to attend his queen (iv. 5). They served also at the court of Ahab and his son Jehoram, and they waited upon Jezebel (1 Kin. xxii. 9, 2 Kin. viii. 6; ix. 32). Even in Judah, although eunuchs were legally excluded from the congregation of the Lord (Deut. xxiii. 1), they were employed at David's court (1 Chron. xxviii. 1), and, in the last days of the monarchy, at the degenerate court of the successors of Josiah (2 Kin. xxiv. 15 with Jer. xxxix. 2; 2 Kin. xxv. 19). The eunuchs in Judah were probably in most, if not in all, cases foreigners (Jer. xxxviii. 7). The cupbearer of Herod the Great was a eunuch, as were also the official who brought him his food and the one who assisted him to bed, and his favorite wife Mariamne was served by a eunuch (Antiq. xv. 7. 4; xvi. 8. 1). A eunuch was over the treasure of queen Candace of Ethiopia, and he was admitted to baptism (Acts viii. 27, 37, cp. Is. lvi. 3).

Eu-o'di-a, in A V Euodias [fragrance].

A Christian woman at Philippi blemished by bickering with Syntyche (Phil. iv. 2).

Eu-phra'tes [Greek modification of the Hebrew Prath, which is variously explained as meaning sweet or broad or with good fords].

One of the great rivers of western Asia and the world. It is formed by the junction of two streams: the Murad, rising in Armenia, between lake Van and mount Ararat, being the more easterly, and the Frat or Kara, rising about 40 miles northeast of Erzeroum, the more westerly. Sometimes the name Frat, cognate with the Hebrew Prath, is applied to both of these streams. They run in a westerly direction to about latitude 39° N., and longitude 39° E., after which the combined waters turn southward, break through the southern chain of the Taurus mountains, and at various places are not more than 50 miles from the Mediterranean. Then the river bends south-eastward, constituting the western boundary of Mesopotamia. About latitude 31° N., longitude 47° E. the Tigris unites with the Euphrates, to constitute what is now called the Shat el-Arab, which, after a course of about 90 miles more, falls into the Persian Gulf. The whole length of the Euphrates is about 1800 miles. It was one of the rivers of Paradise (Gen. ii. 14). It was familiarly known to the Hebrews as "the great river" or simply "the river" It formed the limit in the northeasterly direction of the Hebrew dominion when its extension was at the greatest (xv 18; cp 2 Sam viii 3, 1 Chron. xviii 3; 1 Kin iv. 21, 24) It was a boundary between east and west, between Egypt and Assyria-Babylonia, each power desiring to possess the country between the brook of Egypt and the Euphrates. In the Persian period also it separated east from west (Ezra iv. 10, 11; v 3, vi 6; Neh ii. 7). It was a boundary of the Seleucid kingdom (1 Mac iii. 32; vii 8), and it was regarded as the eastern limit of the Roman empire The greatest city on its banks was Babylon. Another important place was the old Hittite capital Carchemish, the scene of various battles, especially of one between the Babylonians and the Egyptians, the latter led by Pharaoh-necho (Jer xlii 2) In the book of Revelation certain angels are described as being "bound in the great river Euphrates" (Rev ix 14), and the sixth vial was poured out upon the Euphrates itself (xvi. 12).

Eu-pol'e-mus [good at war]

Son of that John who obtained special privileges for the Jews from Antiochus the Great (1 Mac viii 17, 2 Mac iv 11). Eupolemus was one of two ambassadors sent by Judas Maccabæus to Rome to make a treaty with the Romans Some think that he is the Jewish historical writer Eupolemus whom Alexander Polyhistor quotes so frequently.

Eu-ra'qui-lo [from Greek eurakulôn, the northeast wind]

A tempestuous northeast wind which blows over the Mediterranean (Acts xxvii. 14; in A. V. Euroclydon) The wind from that quarter, now called Gregali, blows generally in early spring, and is the most violent wind on the Mediterranean It is sometimes termed a Levanter

Eu-roc'ly-don [from Greek eurokludôn, perhaps a wind from the southeast or east].

A tempestuous wind which blows from the southeast or the east It brought the vessel in which Paul was sailing toward Rome first into danger, and then to shipwreck (Acts xxvii 14, A. V.) But the revisers prefer the reading Eurakulôn, which is in some manuscripts, and render Euraquilo.

Eu'ty-chus [fortunate].

A young man of Troas, who, falling asleep while Paul was preaching there, fell from the third loft or floor. He was taken up dead, but was miraculously restored to life by the apostle (Acts xx. 9, 10).

E-van'gel-ist [from Greek euaggelistês, a messenger of good tidings]

An order of men in the primitive church distinct from apostles, prophets, pastors, and teachers (Eph. iv. 11). Their name implied that their special function was to announce the glad tidings of the gospel to those before ignorant of them, and as they were not pastors of particular churches, they were able to go from place to place preaching to those who as yet were without the Christian pale. Philip, who was the means of converting and baptizing the Ethiopian eunuch, was an evangelist (Acts xxi 8), and we find him successively at Jerusalem (vi 5), in Samaria (viii. 5), on the road between Jerusalem and Gaza (26), in the cities north of Ashdod (40), and finally at Cæsarea (40; xxi 8). Timothy was also commanded by Paul to do the work of an evangelist (2 Tim iv 5). At a later date the name was given to the writers of the four gospels

Eve [life].

The name given by Adam to the first woman because she was the mother of all living (Gen iii 20). Soon after his creation, she was brought into being to be a help meet for him (21, 22). The narrative has been variously interpreted as meaning that—1 Woman was formed from the rib of man, Adam being in a trance and beholding the operation, but feeling nothing; 2 Woman was not actually formed from man's rib, but Adam had a vision by which he was taught his oneness of nature with woman and her rights and privileges; 3 Woman's relation to man is set forth in allegory From a literary point of view the third explanation is unlikely; for it is improbable that the writer intended to insert an allegory in the midst of historical narrative which includes the creation of the universe, the creation of man, and the flood The two human beings were placed in the garden of Eden, and in order to test their obedience, they were forbidden to touch or taste the fruit of one particular tree. But the serpent under Satanic influence led Eve to question the goodness of God, and then to eat the forbidden fruit. She afterwards persuaded Adam to eat, who thus shared her guilt The result was the fall of man (iii 1-24, 2 Cor xi. 3, 1 Tim ii. 13) After the expulsion of the guilty pair from the garden, Eve successively became the mother of Cain, Abel, Seth, with other sons and also daughters (Gen. iv. 1, 2, 25, 26; v. 1-5).

E'vi.

One of the five kings of Midian, allies or vassals of Sihon, slain in the war waged by Moses against the Midianites because they seduced the Israelites to licentious idolatry (Num. xxxi. 8, Josh. xiii. 21).

E'vil.

The origin of evil is a problem which has perplexed speculative minds in all ages and countries. God is not the author of sin, but he permits it He has permitted it, because the revelation of his infinite perfection is the highest conceivable good and the ultimate end of all his works, and there could be no manifestation of certain of his attributes if sin were not permitted. Were there no misery, there could be no mercy shown by God; and there could be no revelation of his grace and justice, if there were no sin (Rom ix. 22, 23). Sin is permitted that God's justice may be known in its punishment, and his mercy in its forgiveness. Holiness and sin may be nearly balanced on earth; but in the universe, sin is very limited in comparison with holiness, and the number of lost men and angels is doubtless small compared with the whole number of the rational creatures of God.

E-vil-mer'o-dach [in Babylonian, Avil-marduk, man of god Merodach]

Son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar. He ascended the throne as early as the seventh month of 562 B. C., and reigned only two years. In the first of these two he took Jehoiachin, the captive king of Judah, from his prison, and placed him above all the other rulers whom he had in thiall, giving him a daily allowance of food during the remainder of his life (2 Kin xxv 27-30; Jer li 31-34). A conspiracy was formed against Evil-merodach, his own brother-in-law, Nerigissar or Nergalsarusur, being at its head. The king was accused of lawlessness and intemperance, and was put to death in 560 B. C. Nerigissar, the chief conspirator, then ascended the throne (Antiq x 11, 2, contra Apion i 20).

Ex'o-dus [a going out, a way out]

1 The departure of the Israelites from Egypt, after they had been divinely emancipated from bondage in that land. There is considerable difficulty in settling the exact route of the Exodus. The miracles by the hand of Moses were wrought at Zogán, that is Tams (1's lxxviii 12), and Rámeses was a suburb of that capital. Thence the Israelites journeyed to Succoth (Ex xii 37), the site of which is marked by Tell el-Maskhutah in the wady Tumilat, 32 miles south-southeast of Tams and 11 miles west of Isma'ihya. They did not take the shortest route to Palestine, which lay through the land of the Philistines, but they went by the way of the wilderness by the Red Sea (xiii. 17, 18). Their first encampment after leaving Succoth was Etham. The site has not been identified; but it was on the edge of the wilderness (20). Thence they turned back and encamped before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon (xiv 2, Num xxxiii 7). This camp has not been definitely located. It was, however, west of the Red Sea. From this place they marched through the Red Sea into the wilderness of Shur (Ex. xv. 4, 22; Num xxxiii 8), and thence along the coast of the Red Sea toward mount Sinai (Ex. xvi 1; Num. xxxiii 10, 15). For the date of the exodus, see CHRONOLOGY.

2. The book of Exodus, the second book of the Pentateuch. In the Hebrew Scriptures the title consists of the opening words, "And these the names." The name Exodus was appropriately given to the book by the Greek translators, because it narrates the departure from Egypt which was a turning point in Israel's history.

The book is a continuous narrative, and may be divided into three sections. 1 In Egypt (i-xii. 36). The period of several centuries immediately following the descent of Jacob into Egypt is passed over with a single remark about the increase of the people after the death of Joseph (i 7). Oppression of the Israelites (8 seq.) Birth, earlier life, and call of Moses (ii-iv). Struggle with Pharaoh and infliction of the plagues; in connection with the last plague, institution of the pass-over (v-xii 36). 2 From Egypt to Sinai (xii 37-xix 2). Departure from Ramses (xii. 37-42). Supplementary regulation respecting the passover, stating the condition upon which foreigners could partake of it (43-51). Sanctification of the firstborn enjoined upon Moses (xiii 1, 2). announcement to the people of a seven days' festival to be observed henceforth in connection with the passover, and of God's command to sanctify the firstborn (3-16). Passage of the Red Sea (xiv), song of deliverance (xv 1-19), bitter water at Marah, manna and quails (20-xvi). At Rephidim: water from rock in Horeb, victory over Amalek, and visit of Jethro (xvii. xviii). 3. At Sinai (xix 3-xl 38 and uninterruptedly to Num. x 10). Establishment of the theocracy: theocratic covenant proposed by God on condition of obedience (xix 3-6), approval of the terms by the elders of the people (7, 8), the ten commandments and subsidiary laws enacted and written in the book of the covenant (xx-xxiii; xxiv 4, for analysis and form of these laws, see THEOCRACY, AMRAPHEL). Ratification of the covenant by the nation (xxiv 1-8), and the covenant meal of the contracting parties (9-11). Moses in the mount, architectural specifications for the tabernacle and its furniture, tables of stone (12-xxxi, for analysis, see TABERNACLE). The golden calf (xxxii, xxxiii). Moses' second sojourn in the mount, with summarizing urgent repetition of covenant laws (xxxiv). Construction and erection of the tabernacle (xxxv-xl). See PENTATEUCH.

Ex'or-cist [in Greek, administrator of an oath; expeller by adjuration].

One who professes by using words and ceremonies to eject evil spirits, and deliver from their malign influence. Certain impostors of this sort, vagabond Jews, were encountered by Paul at Ephesus (Acts xix. 13-19).

Ez'baï.

2. The head of a father's house, family of Bela, tribe of Benjamin (1 Chron vii 7).

Ez-e-ki'as. See HEZEKIAH.

E-ze'ki-el [God doth strengthen; or, perhaps, God is strong].

One of the greater Jewish prophets, a son of Buzi, and of priestly family (Ezek i. 3). He grew up, until beyond the years of childhood, in the home-land; near Jerusalem, since he was of priestly descent, during the ministry of the prophet Jeremiah. He was carried captive from Judah with Jehoiachin, eight years after Daniel's deportation (xxxiii 21, xl 1, cp 2 Kin xxiv 11-16). Josephus says that he was a youth at the time (Antiq x 6, 3). He was not a child, but was under the age when Levites assumed their duties and were reckoned in the census as men. He lived with the Jewish exiles on the river Chebar in Babylonia, probably at Tel-abib (Ezek i 1, 3, in 15), married probably as early as the sixth, at least by the ninth, year of the captivity, and had a house (viii 1; xxiv. 1, 18).

His prophetic ministry began in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, seven years before the destruction of the temple at Jerusalem, while he was dwelling on the Chebar (i 1, 2). He was then in his thirtieth year (i 1), the age at which Levites entered upon service (Num iv 3). The theory that the thirtieth year does not refer to Ezekiel's age, but is a date reckoned either from the accession of Nabopolassar, Nebuchadnezzar's father, or from the reforms of Josiah, fails in view of Jer. xxv 1, 3, 2 Kin xxiii 36, xxv. 2-6; Ezek 1, 2. Though an exile in a foreign land, Ezekiel had freedom to utter his prophecies, and was resorted to for advice by the elders of the people (viii 1, xiv 1; xx 1), but his words were not followed faithfully (xxxiii 30-33). It is evident from the affinities of thought and language, that he was quite familiar with Jeremiah's teaching. Perhaps as a frequenter of the sanctuary he had heard Jeremiah preaching at the temple or listened to the public reading of Jeremiah's prophecies there (Jer vii 2, xix. 14. xxvi 2; xxviii 5, xxxvi 8); or later, while an exile in Babylonia, he may have had a collection of these discourses in written form (xxix 1, 31; xxxvi. 32, Dan ix. 2). At any rate he takes up brief doctrinal remarks, or suggestive allegories, or short speeches of Jeremiah, and develops and expands them, and often gives to them a literary finish as the caldron (Jer i. 13-15; Ezek xi 2-11; xxiv 3-14), the two sisters (Jer iii 6-11; Ezek. xxiii 1-49), forgiveness for the condemned, when penitent (a nation, Jer xviii. 5-12, an individual, Ezek xviii. 21-32), the evil shepherds replaced by the Davidic king (Jer xxiii. 1-6; Ezek. xxxiv. 1-24), individual responsibility in view of the proverb about the fathers eating sour grapes (Jer xxxi. 29, 30; Ezek. xviii. 2-31), the new spiritual nature (Jer. xxxi 33, 34; Ezek xi 19, 20; xxxvi 25-29), the exiles, not the Jews in Jerusalem, the hope of the future (Jer xxiv. 1-10; Ezek xi. 15-21; xxxvii 1-14). Ezekiel's prophetic activity extended over a period of at least twenty-two years (1, 2 with xxix 17). The time and manner of his death are unknown. The late tradition that he was slain by a prince of the people because he denounced idolatry is worthless.

The book of the Prophet Ezekiel stands in the English Bible between Lamentations and Daniel. As these two books are placed among the Hagiographa in the Hebrew canon, Ezekiel's place in the Hebrew Scriptures is between Jeremiah and Hosea. The prophecies are arranged nearly, though not quite, in chronological order, and they are dated according to the years of Jehoiachin's captivity in which they were delivered. The book falls into three divisions.

I. Prophecies delivered before the capture of Jerusalem, foretelling its overthrow for its sins. In the fifth year the priest is called to the prophetic office and prepared for his work by a vision (i-iii 21), and then is directed to prophesy, by symbolical actions and their interpretation, the destruction of the city (iii 22-vii 1). In the sixth year, are denunciations of Judah for idolatry (viii), symbolical departure of Jehovah from the temple because of its profanation (ix-xi 13); comfort, the exiles are still God's people, he will be a sanctuary to them (16), restore them to the land of Israel (17), give those that reform their lives a new heart (18-21). Unbelief and adherence to false prophets are the reasons for Jehovah's forsaking his city (xi-xiv); the event is certain (xv-xvii), but the repentant shall enjoy God's favor (xviii). Lamentation for the princes of Israel (xix). In the seventh year, it is prophesied that, because Jehovah's name has been profaned in the sight of the heathen, he will punish the people, but will afterwards restore them for his name's sake (xx 1-44), the doom is certain, the transgressions are come to remembrance before God (xx 45-xxiii). In the ninth year, the siege of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the people are symbolized by a caldron (xxiv).

II. Prophecies of judgment against the nations: in the ninth year, against Ammon, Moab, Edom, and Philistia (xxv.); in the eleventh year, against Tyre and Sidon (xxvi.-xxviii); and in the tenth, twenty-seventh, and eleventh years, against Egypt (xxix.-xxxii).

III. Prophecies concerning the restoration, delivered after the capture and destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. In the twelfth year, the evening before the news of the fall of the city reached the prophet, he received a second formal call to the prophetic work (xxxiii 1-22). He is further taught that, after the judgment, the people shall recognize that Jehovah is God, and that a true prophet has been among them (23-33), a good shepherd, even David, shall be raised up (xxxiv), their present foes punished (xxxv), the people sanctified and restored to their land (xxxvi), revived as from the dead, their twelve tribes reunited (xxxvii), and their foes finally overthrown (xxxviii-xxxix). In the twenty-fifth year, the reestablishment of God's church is disclosed, being symbolically exhibited in the vision of the temple enlarged and holy throughout, and the people cleansed and accepted by Jehovah (xl-xliii), its holy services (xliv-xlvi), the river of life issuing from it and making the desert to rejoice (xlvii), and the distribution of the land among the tribes, and their common city known as the place where Jehovah is (xlviii).

In this vision the temple that Ezekiel had known so well in his younger days is quite changed in appearance. Instead of the little hill of Zion, he beholds a high mountain, crowned by the buildings of a new and grander sanctuary. An angel, with a measuring rod and line, is standing at the gate. The new temple is modeled, indeed, after the old in its general arrangements, but it is so located with reference to the habitations of men, and its courts and chambers are so disposed, as to safeguard the holiness of Jehovah, who is soon to dwell there, and impress upon the worshippers Jehovah's separateness from both moral and ceremonial impurity. Many years earlier Ezekiel had seen in vision Jehovah leaving the old, desecrated temple (x 18, 19; xi 22-24); now the prophet beholds Jehovah returning by the same gate into the temple and the glory of Jehovah filling the house, and he hears a voice from within saying, "This is the place of my throne, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever, and the house of Israel shall no more defile my holy name" (xlii. 1-7). In the inner court, before the holy house, Ezekiel sees the altar of atonement provided for the new Israel and hears the declaration, "And I will accept you, saith the Lord Jehovah" (13-27). The worship of accepted Israel is now described to the prophet. In the new theocracy the reality will correspond to the divine ideal. The uncircumcised in heart or flesh will not enter into the sanctuary. The Levitical families who proved unfaithful of old will not be allowed to officiate at the altar; yet they will be given a place, albeit a humble one, in the temple. The priests, the sons of Zadok, whose very name means righteous, that had remained faithful, will alone fill the high office of priest before Jehovah (xlv). An oblation unto Jehovah will be made of a portion of the land for the support of the services and ministry of the sanctuary (xlv. 1-6). For the prince also suitable provision will be made from the oblation-land, enabling him to maintain the public services in the name of the people, and he shall not abuse his power by oppressing the people or encroaching on the prerogatives of the priests (7-12; xlv. 2, 16-18). The people likewise shall assemble in their own appointed place in the temple, when they worship (9). All members of the theocracy, official and lay, know and perform the duties in reference to atonement which belong to them in their several places and relations. Ezekiel is next shown a river issuing from the temple, swelling into a mighty stream, and bringing life and health to the regions of barrenness and death (xlvii 1-12). The bounds of the land to be occupied by the restored community are described (xlvii. 13-20), and the location of the tribes (21-xlviii 29), the oblation-land being divided between priests, Levites, the crown, and the city (xlviii 8-22). The city belongs to all Israel in common (15-20, 30-31, cp 19 and xlv 6), and its name is Jehovah-shammah, Jehovah is there (xlviii 35), symbolizing the central thought of the entire prophecy.

What was Ezekiel's contribution to Israel's thought? Critics of the school of Wellhausen regard Ezekiel as the father of the later formal Judaism. They assert that the description of the new Jerusalem in chaps xl-xlviii is a program, and gave rise to the characteristic priestly regulations contained in Leviticus and Numbers. This theory is rejected by critics of the school of Ewald, however, and by all scholars who take the biblical view of the origin of Israel's institutions; and they cite evidence both that the characteristic legislation of Leviticus antedates Ezekiel, and also that the prophet did not intend these chapters as a program. Further the picture that is unfolded in those chapters is not an ideal which the prophet expected would be realized literally, but is purely symbolical, for in no other way is it possible to understand the high mountain of the new Zion, and the measurements, and the allotments of the land which are geometrical and not geographical, and the healing waters that issue from the sanctuary and presently become a mighty river, and the trees whose fruit is produced every month and whose leaves are for healing. Ezekiel's enrichment of Israel's thought, through these chapters and his other prophecies, is found in the spiritual teaching. Among other things he contributed: 1. To the thought of God. While others speak of Jehovah shepherding his people (Gen xlviii. 15; Ps xxiii), gathering the scattered flock of Israel (Jer. xxiii. 3; xxxi. 10), and tenderly caring for them (Is. xl. 11), Ezekiel represents God as seeking his lost sheep (xxxiv 11-16; cp Mat xviii. 12-14; Luke xix. 10). 2. To the vision of the new Jerusalem: the high mountain (Ezek. xl. 2; Rev. xxi. 10), the holy city, God's tabernacle among men (Ezek xxxvii 27, Rev xxi 3), the glory of God in it (Ezek. xliii. 2-5; Rev xxi 11), the city foursquare (Ezek xlviii. 16, 30, Rev. xxi. 16), having twelve gates (Ezek xlviii. 30-34; Rev xxi 12, 13), the river of life (Ezek. xlviii. 1, Rev xxi. 1), and the trees on either side of the river, whose leaves are for healing (Ezek. xlviii 7, 12; Rev xxii. 2). As in Ezekiel, so in John the vision is symbolical. 3. But above all Ezekiel contributed to the spiritual conception of the Jerusalem of the future. Ezekiel depicts, indeed, as his predecessors had done, the fertility of the land in the new age (Ezek xxxvi 29, 30); but this aspect does not call forth his enthusiasm. Taking up a germinal teaching of Jeremiah's, he lays the emphasis on the renewed nature of the people and the holiness of the kingdom as the crowning glory of the coming time (xi 19, 20 xxxvi 24-29). The spiritually regenerate Zion is henceforth definitely before the minds of God's people as a noble idea and the great hope.

1. A man who is registered with Judah (1 Chron. iv 17).

2. One of the chief priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh xii 1, 7). A father's house bore his name in the next generation (ver 13).

3. A priest descended from Zadok and from Phinehas (Ezra vii 1-6). He was a ready scribe in the law of Moses, making the written law, which was in his hand (14), the subject of study and teaching (10, 11). In the seventh year of Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia from 465 to 425 B. C., he was commissioned by the king to go to Jerusalem to inquire into the civil and religious condition of the Jewish community and conform it to the teaching of God's law (14). He was given orders on the authorities in the province. Beyond-the-river for money and goods for the temple and for the exemption of the temple officials from taxation (21, 24). He was authorized to lead a fresh company of Jewish exiles to Palestine, in addition to those who had accompanied Zerubbabel and the high priest, Jeshua, eighty years before. On gathering together those who proposed to return, and mustering them, he found no Levites of the lower order; but on sending word to their chief, a few were persuaded to join him. After fasting and seeking God's guidance for the journey, the party, numbering over 1700 men, set forth on the twelfth day of the first month, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes, 458-457 B. C. (viii 1-23, 31). On reaching Jerusalem four months later, on the first day of the fifth month (vii. 8), Ezra gave over the vessels he had received for the temple, offered sacrifice, and presented the king's orders to the neighboring governors (viii 33-36). He was grieved to discover that Jews of Palestine, including even some of the priests, contrary to the law of Moses, had married heathen wives; but he succeeded in inducing most of them to divorce these foreign women (ix, x). Thirteen years later, after Nehemiah had come to Jerusalem and repaired its walls, Ezra took the leading part in reading the law of Moses to the people of the colony (Neh viii). He died, according to Josephus, about the time of Elashib's succession to the highpriesthood (Antiq. xi. 5, 5). He was certainly for a while contemporary with Elashib (Neh. iii 1; viii 9). Ezra marks the transition from the prophets to the scribes. For his relation to the law and to the O. T. books, see CANON.

The book of Ezra consists of two parts: 1. A narrative of the return of the Jews from Babylonia under Zerubbabel in the year 538 B. C., the restoration of divine service, and the erection of the temple in the face of Samaritan opposition (i-vi) 2 An account of the return of a second body of exiles under Ezra in the year 458-457, and of Ezra's energetic and successful measures to put a stop to the marriage of Israelites with foreigners (vii-x). The book is largely composed of copies of public records and official documents. The provincial documents and history are written in Aramaic (iv 8-vi 18; vii 12-26), namely, copies of the letters sent to the Persian kings by officials of the province Beyond-the-river (iv 8-16; v 7-17; vi 6-12), the royal replies and decrees imposing commands on these officials (iv 17-22, vi 3-5, and vii 12-26, cp 21, 24) and the brief connecting history referring primarily to provincial affairs (iv 23-v. 5, vi 1, 2, 13-18). Aramaic had been for several centuries the language of international commerce and diplomacy. The remainder of the book records the proper domestic history of Judah, and is written in Hebrew. It includes the royal edict issued in behalf of the Jews (i 2-4), copies of Jewish archives (ii 1-67; viii, x, 18-44), and the connecting history. It has been supposed that the Aramaic narrative was written by a contemporary of Zerubbabel and eyewitness of the events described (cp. v 4, where the pronoun we is used), but, since documents of the time of Artaxerxes are inserted (iv 9-16, 17-22), the written narrative cannot date earlier than Ezra's time, and the pronoun we was employed in speaking of a past generation because the writer felt his identity with the Jewish people, past and present, as in ix 6-15 and Neh ix. 29, 33. Some would date the narrative even later, but see below.

At least a section of the book was written by Ezra, beginning with vii 27, for it is expressed in the first person. Ezra, therefore, wrote history, and he may have compiled the book which bears his name, for the narrative closes during his lifetime. But why, it may be asked, if Ezra compiled the book which bears his name, are two passages in which Ezra is prominent, namely the ten opening verses of chapter vii and the last chapter of the book, which is inseparable from the preceding ninth chapter, not expressed in the first person? The ten introductory verses are primarily genealogical. The use of the third person is natural. As the introduction was begun in the third person, it is with propriety concluded in the third person. Parallel changes of person occur in the book of Daniel, which is regarded as the work of one author. As to the last chapter of the book, it would seem that Ezra's record stopped at the ninth chapter and the narrative was concluded by another person, though not unlikely he was a contemporary of Ezra and acted under Ezra's authority, and was the scribe who drew up the protocol of the proceedings and wrote down the official list of the men who gave pledge (x 18-44).

Some have supposed that those sections in which the pronoun I is not used were inserted in Ezra's narrative by another editor, whose hand is thought to be discernible in Nehemiah and Chronicles also, and many modern critics place the date of the supposititious editor after 330 B C. The argument rests ultimately upon the fact that the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were reckoned as one book in the Hebrew canon, and upon the belief that the genealogies in the book of Nehemiah are carried down until the time of Alexander the Great; hence Ezra and Nehemiah must have been edited in the Grecian period. Now it is a credible, but not a necessary, supposition that the books of Ezra and Nehemiah were combined and supplemented by an editor. But apart from the possible implication of the genealogies (see NEHEMIAH), there is no reason to suppose that this hypothetical editor belonged to a younger generation than Ezra and Nehemiah. His supposed additions concern events in which Ezra and Nehemiah were participants, and the history is related as by an eyewitness (cp. above and see NEHEMIAH). And assuming that the books were not edited, and are entirely distinct from each other in authorship throughout, as they are confessedly in large part, there was reason for reckoning them as one. This reason is scarcely found in the purpose to conform the number of books to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, twenty-two, or, by peculiar computation, twenty-four; but the reason is found rather in the fact that the books of Ezra and Nehemiah form a continuous narrative of post-exilic Jewish history, and are concerned with the interrelated work of the contemporary rulers of the community, Ezra the priest and Nehemiah the civil governor. The two books were known to be of diverse authorship (Neh. i 1), but were reckoned as one, just as the twelve minor prophets were counted as one book, although it was recognized that the twelve writings were by twelve different prophets.

Ez'rah. See EZRA 1

Ez'ra-hite [alternate form of Zarhite].

A descendant of Zerub, belonging to the tribe of Judah, as Ethan (1 Kin iv 31; Ps. lxxxix, title, cp 1 Chron ii 6) and Heman (Ps lxxxviii, title, cp 1 Chron ii 6).

Ez'ri [probably, (God is) a help].

Overseer of the laborers who tilled David's fields (1 Chron xxvii 26).

F.

Fair Ha'vens.

A harbor in Crete, near the city of Lasea, where Paul's ship touched (Acts xxvii. 8). Mr Smith of Jordanhill located it about 5 miles east of Cape Matala, a promontory on the southern shore of Candia, just west of which the coastline turns northward.

Faith.

As far as a difference exists between belief and faith, belief is assent to testimony, and faith is assent to testimony, united with trust. Faith is an active principle, it is an act both of the understanding and the will. The distinction between belief and faith is that between "believe me" and "believe on me." The verb believe thus does service for the two nouns faith and belief. In the Bible faith or belief is confidence in the absolute truthfulness of every statement which comes from God (Gen. xv 6, Deut. xxxii 20; Mark xi 22, Rom. iv 3-5). In this faith the heroes of Scripture acted (Heb. xi). In a special sense, faith is reliance on God's testimony regarding the mission and atoning death of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ (John v 24), and on the testimony of Jesus regarding himself (cp. John iii 18; Acts iii 16; xx 21, Rom. iii. 25). Faith in the Redeemer, whereby a sinner rests upon him alone for salvation, is essential to salvation (John iii 15, 16, 18; Eph. ii 8, etc.). Belief in his historical existence and in the truth of his claims may be produced by evidence, but faith in him, reliance upon him for salvation, cannot be. It is the gift of God (Eph. ii 8), the Spirit applies the truth to the soul. Human means should be used, in cooperation with his Spirit, for its production (Rom. x 17). It may exist in larger or in smaller measure (Rom. iv 19, 20; xiv 1). The apostles when they deplored the weakness of their faith prayed to Jesus for its increase (Luke xvii. 5). It works by love (Gal. v. 6), and overcomes the world (1 John v 4). But with all its importance it is not the greatest of the three primary Christian graces, that position being occupied by love (1 Cor. xiii. 13).

The system of doctrine given by revelation of God is termed the faith (Acts vi. 7; xxiv. 24; Rom. i. 5, etc.).

Fal'con.

A diurnal bird of prey other than a vulture. The family includes among its genera falcons strictly so-called, hawks, kites, eagles. The word is used in R. V. to render the Hebrew 'Ayyah (Job xxviii 7; in A. V. vulture), an unclean bird (Lev. xi 14; Deut. xiv 13; in A. V. kite). Several varieties are mentioned by Tristram as occurring in Palestine: the hobby hawk (Falco subbuteo), the red-legged hobby (F. vespertinus), the Eleanora falcon (F. eleonoræ).

Fal'low Deer [deer of fallow or yellowish hue].

The rendering of the Hebrew Yahmur in A. V. of Deut. xiv. 5; 1 Kin. iv. 23. R. V. has roebuck (q. v.). The genuine fallow deer (Dama vulgaris) has horns, with their upper part palminated. The hair in summer is yellowish-brown all over, with spots; in winter the tints are less bright. The male is about three feet high at the shoulder. Its native country seems to be the Mediterranean region.

It occurs sparingly in Galilee and mount Lebanon.

Fa-mil'iar Spir'it.

The spirit of a dead person which professed mediums claimed to summon to consultation (Deut. xviii 11), and which appeared to speak from the earth (Is. xxix 4), or to dwell in the controlling medium (Lev. xx 27, in Hebrew). The medium was called the possessor or lord of a spirit (1 Sam. xxviii 7, in Hebrew). It revealed the future (Is. viii. 19). It was either a special spirit which was believed to always respond to the summons of the medium, as the English rendering would lead one to suppose, and who might raise other ghosts, or it was any spirit whom the medium desired. 1 Sam. xxviii 8 is capable of either interpretation, "Divine by the ghost" in you or "whom I shall name." To consult familiar spirits was apostasy from Jehovah (Lev. xix 31, Is. viii. 19). Under the Mosaic law a person pretending to possess the power of consulting a familiar spirit was to be put to death (Lev. xix 31, xx 6, 27; Deut. xviii. 11). Saul carried out this enactment, but when sorely troubled about his fate, he sought out a woman of Endor who had a familiar spirit, asked her to bring back Samuel to the world, and believed her statement that she had succeeded (1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 5-25). Manasseh favored them that professed to have familiar spirits (2 Kin. xxi 6; 2 Chron. xxxiii 6). His grandson Josiah carried out the Mosaic law against them (2 Kin. xxiii 24). They probably included ventriloquists, and the voice of the spirit, which appeared to come in a whisper from the ground, emanated from the human pretender himself.

Fam'ine.

Deficiency of food, generally produced either by failure of rain leading to the withering of the crops, or by the prevention of the entrance of food into a beleaguered city. Famine compelled Abraham to leave Canaan and sojourn in Egypt (Gen. xii 10). It was the first of a series of famines connected with the history of the patriarch and his descendants, and which led the Hebrews to temporarily withdraw from Palestine (xxvi 1; xli. 27-56; xlvii. 13). Other famines occurred in the days of the judges which made Elimelech remove to Moab (Ruth i. 1), in David's reign (2 Sam. xxi 1), in the time of Elijah (1 Kin. xvii. 1-xviii 46), in Elisha's time (2 Kin. iv. 38; viii. 1), and in the reign of Claudius, A. D. 41-54, when severe local famines swept in succession from Judæa in his fourth year to Greece in his ninth year and Italy in his eleventh year (Acts xi 28; Antiq. xx 2, 5; 5, 2, Tacitus, Annals xi. 43). The chief famines produced in besieged cities by the foe outside preventing provisions from entering are those during the siege of Samaria by Benhadad (2 Kin. vi. 24-vii 20) and during the sieges of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (xxv 1-3; Jer. li. 1-6) and by Titus (War v 10, 2 and 3).

Fan.

The winnowing fan, in Hebrew Mizreh, still called muthra by the Arabs, was a fork with six prongs, with which grain, after it had been threshed, was thrown up against the air to clear it of the chaff (Is xxx. 24; Jer xv 7). A shovel was also used for the same purpose. See THRESHING.

Far'thing.

1 A Roman Quadrans, a small brass coin equal to the fourth part of an as. The Greeks used the Roman name, calling the coin kodiantes. In the time of Christ its value was about one-half of an English farthing, or one-quarter of a cent (Mat v 26, Mark xii 42).

2 An Assanion, diminutive of the Latin as, a copper coin equal to about one cent (Mat. x 29).

Fast.

Abstinence from food, or the period during which it takes place.

1 Involuntary, arising from the fact that nothing to eat is procurable. Of this type were apparently the forty days' fast of Moses on mount Sinai (Ex xxxiv 28; Deut ix 9), of Elijah on his journey to Horeb (1 Kin xix 8), and of our Lord during his temptation in the wilderness (Mat iv 2, Mark i 13; Luke iv 2), also of Paul (2 Cor vi 5).

2 Voluntary, from religious motives. In this sense it is often used regarding prescribed periods of abstinence. There do not appear to be any injunctions regarding fasting in the Mosaic law, and neither the verb "to fast," nor the nouns "fast" and "fasting," occur in the Pentateuch. If fasts are prescribed at all, it is in the ambiguous language "Ye shall afflict your souls" (Lev. xvi 29, xxiii 27, Num xxix 7). The first mention of voluntary fasting is in connection with king David, who refused food when he supplicated God for the life of the child borne to him in sin by the wife of Uriah (2 Sam xii 22). Many instances of the same unprescribed fasting are found in the later books of the O. T. (Ezra viii 21, Neh. ix 1; Esth iv 3; Ps xxxv 13, lxxix 10, cix 24; Dan vi 18, ix. 3). Sometimes fasts were proclaimed at periods of calamity (Jer xxxvi. 9, Joel i 14), the object being to chasten the soul (Ps xxxv 13, lxxix 10) and make the voice heard in heaven (Is lviii 3, 4). The public fast signified that a load of guilt was resting on the people, for which they humbled themselves before God (1 Sam vii 6; 1 Kin xxi. 9, 12). True fasting must not be confined to externals, but involves abstinence from iniquity and illicit pleasures (Is lviii). In Zechariah's days there were stated fasts in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months (Zech. viii. 19), to commemorate the commencement of the siege of Jerusalem in the tenth month (2 Kin. xxv 1), its capture in the fourth month (3; Jer li 6, 7), the destruction of the temple in the fifth month (2 Kin xxv. 8, 9), and the murder of Gedaliah and the Jews that were with him in the seventh month (25). Anna served God with fasting (Luke ii. 37). The Pharisee did so twice in the week (Luke xviii. 12). When religious formalists fasted, they sometimes ostentatiously put on a sad countenance. This practice was denounced in the Sermon on the Mount (Mat. vi. 16, 17). The disciples of John the Baptist fasted; those of our Lord did not, at least while he was among them (Mat ix, 14, 15; Mark ii 18, 19; Luke v. 33-35), but afterwards in certain circumstances they did so (Acts xiii 3, xiv. 23).

There are no injunctions laid upon Christians to fast, and the revisers, on the ground of textual criticism, have removed the word from Mat xvii 21, Mark ix 29, Acts x 30; 1 Cor vii 5.

Fat.

1 Abel offered the fat of the firstlings of his flock to Jehovah (Gen. iv 4; cp Num. xviii 17). The principle was laid down in the Mosaic law that to the Lord belongs all the fat of sacrificial animals (Lev iii. 16; vii 23, 25). Neither it nor the blood was eaten (iii 17), but was burned as an offering to Jehovah (Ex xxix 13, 22; Lev iii 3, iv 8, 9). In view of the settlement in Canaan and the remoteness of the majority of the people from the altar, this provision was apparently abolished with respect to animals slain solely for food (Deut xii. 15, 16; 21-24), the animals of the flock and herd being eaten as were non-sacrificial animals.

2 A vat (Joel ii 24). It occurs in composition in the word winefat (Is lxiii 2).

Fa'ther.

1 The immediate progenitor of a person (Gen xlii 13), or grandfather (xxviii 13), or more remote ancestor (xvii 4). See PARENTS.

2 The founder of a trade (Gen. iv. 20) or of anything. The ancestor or head, or one of the heads, of the inhabitants of a town (1 Chron ii 51, iv 14, 18).

3 One who acts toward another with paternal kindness and wisdom (Gen xlv 8, Judg. xvii 10; xviii 19). A title of respect and honor bestowed upon an authorized teacher, especially when aged (1 Sam x 12; 2 Kin. ii 12), and upon royal advisers and prime ministers (Gen xlv. 8).

4 God, either as the Creator of the human race (Mal ii 10, Antiq. iv. 8, 24, cp Acts xvii 28), or as the begetter and loving guardian of his spiritual children (Rom viii 15, Gal. iv 6), or as standing in a more mysterious relation to Jesus (Mat xi 26; Mark xiv 36, Luke xxii 42). See GOD.

Fath'om.

A measure much used in reckoning depth of water (Acts xxvii. 28). It is the rendering of the Greek Orgua, which denotes the length of the outstretched arms, and was estimated at 4 cubits or 24 palms (Herod ii 149). The English fathom is 6 feet.

Feast.

1. A sumptuous meal attended by mirth and joyfulness (Dan v 1)

2. A time set apart by the canons of some religions for sacred joy. Besides the appointed seasons, called feasts or set feasts in the English versions (Lev. xxiii. 2, R V. margin), which included the weekly Sabbath, the memorial of trumpet-blowing on the first day of the seventh month, and the day of atonement (3, 24, 27), the Mosaic law enjoined three annual celebrations expressly called feasts or rather festivals. They were the passover on the evening of the fourteenth day of the first month, with the accompanying feast of unleavened bread commencing on the fifteenth and lasting seven days (5-8); the feast of weeks, called also feast of harvest and day of first fruits (Ex xxiii 16, xxxiv. 22, Num xxviii 26), and in later times, because celebrated on the fiftieth day after the passover, Pentecost (Acts ii. 1); and the feast of tabernacles or ingathering, which commenced on the fifteenth day of the seventh month and continued for seven or eight days (Lev. xxiii 34-44). These three annual festivals were deemed so important, that when they came every adult male not incapacitated by disease or infirmity was required to appear before the Lord at the sanctuary (Ex xxiii. 17; Deut xvi. 16). For further description of these feasts, see the appropriate articles. As Jesus desired to fulfill all righteousness, it may be assumed that he was customarily present at Jerusalem three times a year, on occasion of the three festivals (John ii. 23, vii 2-37, etc., Mat xxvi 17; Mark xiv. 12, Luke xxii 8, John xiii 1). In addition to the festivals prescribed by the law, a festival called Purim was instituted to commemorate annually, on the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar, the deliverance of the Jews from the plot of Haman (Esth ix 21-28). Later still the festival of dedication was appointed, which was instituted by Judas Maccabeus, to be celebrated annually for eight days, from the twenty-fifth day of Chislev, in commemoration of the rededication of the temple after its pollution by the agents of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac iv 41-59, John x 22). The Lord's Supper, instituted by Christ, or more broadly the Christian's life of faith, is also a feast (1 Cor v. 8).

Felix [happy].

A freedman of the emperor Claudius, who was appointed procurator of Judæa. The date of his appointment to office in Palestine is disputed. Cumanus succeeded the procurator Tiberius Alexander in A. D. 48 (Antiq. xx. 5, 2). According to Tacitus, Cumanus governed Galilee, and Felix ruled part of Samaria until, on the deposition of Cumanus, he was appointed procurator of the whole province by Quadratus, governor of Syria

Josephus, who was a boy in Jerusalem in A. D. 48, and became historian of the Jews, represents Cumanus as procurator of Judæa, and states that Felix was sent as successor of Cumanus by the emperor Claudius to administer the affairs of Judæa in 52 (Antiq. xx. 7, 1, War ii. 12, 8). Probably Cumanus and Felix exercised a joint procuratorship, with Cumanus higher in authority. In this article A. D. 52 is assumed as the date of his sole procuratorship in Judæa. He seems to have obtained this appointment partly through the influence of his brother Pallas, who was a great man at the court of Claudius. Nero, the successor of Claudius, transferred four Galilean cities from Felix to Agrippa. Felix was cruel and tyrannical, and in the exercise of power showed the disposition of a slave (Tacitus, Hist. v. 9; Annals xii 54). Jonathan, the high priest, had supported the appointment of Felix to the procuratorship, but displeased Felix by the fidelity with which he counseled him regarding his government of the Jews. Jonathan was murdered by the robbers, the so-called Assassins, encouraged, Josephus says, by Felix. The impunity with which this gross crime was committed emboldened the robbers. They became the terror of Judæa. Felix undertook to suppress them. He captured many of them, and crucified the ordinary sort, but sent their leader, Eleazar, to Rome (Antiq. xx. 8, 5; War ii 13, 2). Next false prophets arose and led people in multitudes into the wilderness, where they were told God would show them the signals of liberty. Felix, believing these gatherings in the wilderness to be the commencement of revolt, attacked the people present and slew them in large numbers (War ii 13, 4). An Egyptian soon afterwards made his appearance as a prophet and led out a great mob to the mount of Olives, under the pretense that they would see the walls of Jerusalem fall down, allowing them to enter the city. Felix attacked them with troops, slew about 400 and took about 200 prisoners. The Egyptian escaped. His insurrection was in A. D. 55; and when about five years later the riot about Paul arose, the Roman commandant at Jerusalem suspected that the apostle was the Egyptian back again to excite fresh troubles (Acts xxi 38; Antiq. xx. 8, 6). Paul, arrested on the false charge of profaning the temple, was sent for protection from Jewish violence to Cæsarea, the seat of the Roman government for Judæa (Acts xxiii. 26), and the trial took place before Felix (xxiv 1-23). Felix' wife Drusilla, a Jewess, whom he had seduced from her lawful husband (Antiq. xx. 7, 1, 2), was present at an interview when Paul reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, with such power that Felix trembled. He did not repent, however. Nor did he set Paul free, for he hoped that his prisoner would buy freedom (Acts xxiv. 24-26). On going out of office he left the apostle bound in order to please the Jews (27). This favor did not, however, prevent them from complaining of him after he had ceased to be procurator and returned to Rome, about A. D. 60. They represented that he had not acted well in the recent riots between Jews and Syrians at Caesarea, and he would have been punished by Nero had not the powerful intercession of his brother Pallas, who was a favorite with the reigning emperor, been exerted in his favor (Antiq. xx 8, 9, cp 8, 7, War ii. 13, 7). He was succeeded in the procuratorship by Pontius Festus.

Fenced Cities.

Towns fortified by walls, towers, gates, and bars (Deut in 5; 2 Chron viii 5; Neh iii 1-32). Such were the cities of the Canaanites and the Amorites when the Israelites warred against them (Num xii 28; Deut in 5; Josh. xiv 12). After the Israelites had occupied Canaan, they like their predecessors, had fenced cities (Deut xxviii 25, 2 Sam xx 6; 2 Kin xiv 13, 2 Chron xii 4; Jer v. 17; Hos viii 14, Zeph i 16). For illustration and description of the walls, see JERUSALEM and LACHISH.

Fer'et.

The rendering of the Hebrew "nahah, a ceremonially unclean animal, classed by the Hebrews with reptiles (Lev. xi 30; in R V gecko).

Fes'tus [festal, joyful].

Pontius Festus, who succeeded Felix as procurator of Judæa in the reign of Nero, while Pallas was still the emperor's favorite and Burrus was still alive (Antiq. xx 8, 9). Pallas was put to death in A. D. 62, and Burrus died not later than February of the same year. Two years before the arrival of Festus, Paul could say that Felix had been for many years a judge unto the nation (Acts xxiv 10, 27). If the procuratorship of Felix be reckoned from A. D. 48 (see FELIX), he would have been many years in office in Palestine in A. D. 54 or 55, and Festus may have succeeded him in 55 or 56, the second and third years of Nero respectively. This date is adopted by some authorities, with the result of putting the dates of important events in Paul's life, among others his imprisonment, four or five years earlier than the date generally accepted by leading investigators who date Felix' accession in 52 and Festus' appointment in 60. Festus fell on troublous times. The Assassins were murdering and pillaging. An impostor led a crowd of adherents into the wilderness, where the forces of Festus routed them with great slaughter. King Agrippa built a dining-room to the royal palace of Jerusalem, and its windows overlooked the courts of the temple. The Jews were annoyed, and built a wall to block the view. But the wall prevented the Roman guards also from seeing the inner courts, and Festus ordered its demolition.

On appeal to Nero, however, it was allowed to remain (Antiq. xx. 8, 11). The character of Festus contrasts favorably with that of Felix (War ii 14, 1). He reinvestigated Paul's case, and was satisfied of his innocence; but, in attempting to please the Jews, he suggested that the apostle be tried at Jerusalem. It was against this injudicious proposal that Paul appealed to Cæsar (Acts xxv 1-xxvi 32). Festus died at his post, and was succeeded, about A. D. 62, by Albinus, who is not mentioned in the Scripture narrative (Antiq. xx, 9, 1).

Fe'ver.

A disease, or rather a genus of diseases, attended by dryness and heat of the body, with consequent thirst, a high pulse, and other symptoms. Fevers are of three leading types, intermittent, remittent, and continued. Fevers of all the types now named doubtless existed in ancient Palestine, though it is not possible in all cases to identify them with certainty. Fever is the rendering of the Hebrew Kaddath, burning (Lev. xxvi 16, in A V burning ague. Deut xxviii 22). In the latter passage it is associated with inflammation and fiery heat, both febrile symptoms. Fever is likewise the correct rendering of the Greek Pyretos, from Pyro, fire (Mat. viii. 15; Luke iv 38, John iv 52, Acts xxviii 8). Galen and the Greek physicians divided fevers into greater and lesser. Luke in the passage quoted does so also, as might be expected from one who was himself a medical man. Fever so uniformly attends certain diseases that the two are mentioned together, as in the designation "fever and dysentery." When the sword, the famine, and the pestilence, are mentioned in this order of succession the pestilence was probably typhus fever.

Field.

In biblical usage, unenclosed ground, whether pasture or tillage (Gen. xxxvii 7, 14-16), of whatever extent, from a small area to the territory of a people (xiv 7, margin of R V.; xxiii 9, Ruth i 6, rendered country; Mat. vi 28; xiii 24). It might be wooded (1 Sam xiv 25, rendered ground). Boundaries, when artificially marked, were indicated by stones (cp Deut xix 14).

Fig.

A tree producing good fruit (Judg. ix 10) and the fruit itself (Num. xiii 23), both called T'enuh in Hebrew, while in Greek the tree is Sake and the fruit Sukon. The tree is native in western Asia. The young tree does not bear fruit unless the ground is cultivated (Luke xiii 6-9), and old trees speedily degenerate and fail when neglected (Prov. xxvii 18). The young fruit, or rather blossom, appears in spring before the leaves open, on branches of the last year's growth. It is the green fig (Song ii 13). If blown from the tree (Rev. vi 13), it is eaten, though immature. If green fruit is not on the tree when the leaves have opened, no figs will be borne. The first ripe fruit is ready in June, in favored localities earlier (Is xxviii. 4; War iii 10, 8). The late figs grow on the new wood, keep appearing during the season, and are ripe from August onward. They are dried for preservation, pressed into cakes, and form a staple article of food (1 Sam. xxv. 18; xxx. 12). The tree was highly prized, and is often mentioned along with the vine (Deut viii 8; Ps cv 33; Jer. v. 17; Joel i. 12), and to sit under one's vine and one's fig tree was the symbol of prosperity and security (1 Km iv 25; Mic iv 4; Zech. iii 10). The barren fig tree of our Lord's parable meant the Jewish nation. Figs were used in medicine, and there is mention of their employment as a poultice (2 Km xx 7).

The fig, the Ficus carica of cultivation, is a tree 20 to 30 feet high. The leaves, which come forth late in spring and are shed at the approach of winter, are often 8 or 10 inches across. They are heart shaped with three or four lobes. The fruit is of so anomalous a construction that botanists have had to give it a distinct name and place among fruits. It is a hollow receptacle, with minute flowers on its inner side, which later produce the true fruit. The tree is wild in southern Europe and the north of Africa. It is indigenous in Palestine, where it grows wild in fissures of rocks and on walls, besides being everywhere cultivated (Deut viii 8).

Fir and Fir Tree.

The rendering of the Hebrew Brish, Aramaic Broth (2 Sam vi 5; Song i 17). The R. V. places cypress on the margin. The tree grew with the cedar in Lebanon (1 Km v 8, 10; Is xiv 8; xxxvii 24, lx 13; Zech xi. 2). It was used for the woodwork of Solomon's temple along with cedar (1 Km v 8, 10; vi 15, 34; 2 Chron ii 8, iii 5), for the planks of ships (Ezek xxvii 5), for spears (Nah ii 3, R. V.) and for musical instruments (2 Sam vi 5). The stork made its nest within its branches (Ps civ 17). The Vulgate translates the Hebrew word once by cypress (Song i 17), but elsewhere by abies, fir, except 2 Sam vi 5; 2 Chron ii 8, Nah ii 3. The Septuagint commonly renders it by cypress, but also by pine and juniper. All of these trees belong to the Coniferae or pine family. The only true fir of the region is Abies cilicia. It grows on the higher parts of Lebanon and in the mountains northward, attaining a height of from 30 to 75 feet. The cypress (Cupressus sempervirens) is a tall tree, from 20 to 60 or 75 feet. The wood is reddish yellow, pleasant to the smell, and durable. It was much used for cabinet work. It is extensively planted in burial grounds in the East, for which its slender pyramidal form and gracefulness render it well adapted. See CYPRESS. The Syrian or Aleppo pine (Pinus halepensis) is found in the mountains of western Palestine, and is one of the characteristic trees of the lower Lebanon. It is inferior in size to the fir and the cypress. The stone pine (Pinus maritima) grows on the coast and in sandy plains, but is not common. In Gilead there are extensive forests of Pinus carica on the highest mountains above the line where the evergreen oaks cease. A tall, fragrant juniper (Juniperus excelsa) grows abundantly on Lebanon. For Is. xlv 14, see Ash.

Fire.

Fire was found to be indispensable (Ecclus. xxxix 26). It was used in the arts (Gen iv. 22), in the preparation of food (Ex xvi. 23; Is xlv 16), and for warmth (Jer xxxvi 22; John xviii 18; Acts xxviii 2). Offerings were made to Jehovah by fire (Gen viii 20). The fire carried, as it were, the sacrifice to God, who took delight in the offering, or, to speak figuratively, smelled a sweet savor (21). The offerer kindled the fire himself (xxii 6). Moses offered burnt offerings on the great altar, newly erected (Ex xl 29), but at the conclusion of the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood, fire came forth from the presence of the Lord and consumed the sacrifice (Lev ix 24). God accepted and appropriated the offering. This fire was not allowed to go out (vi 9-13). Likewise at the dedication of the temple and the new altar, fire came from heaven and consumed the sacrifice (2 Chron vii 1). On other occasions also God indicated his acceptance of a sacrifice by causing it to kindle (Judg vi 21, 1 Km xviii 23, 24, 1 Chron xvi 26, as to this matter, cp Gen xiv 24, Ex ix 23, 2 Km i 12). Among the heathen there were fire worshippers (Wisd xiii 2). The worshippers of Moloch and some other idolaters burnt their children in the fire as an act of piety (2 Km xvi 3, xxi 6; Jer vii 31; Ezek xvi 20, 21).

Fire'pan.

A pan made of brass, gold, or silver (Ex xxxvii 3, 1 Km vii 50, 2 Km xxv 15), and used for carrying fire (Lev xvi 12, where it is rendered censer).

Fir'kin.

A measure of capacity (John ii 6). It is the rendering of the Greek Metētēs, which, reckoned at 1952.17 cubic inches, held nearly 8 gallons, 3½ pints, wine measure, American standard.

Fir'ma-ment [Latin firmentum, a support, a firm foundation].

The sky or heaven (Gen i 8), an expanse beaten out as it were if we employ the figure embodied in the Hebrew word (cp Ezek i 22), which divided the primeval watery mass (Gen. i 6), so that part of the waters were above it and others were below it (i 7, Ps cxlviii 4). The stars and planets were placed in it, where they move unimpeded (Gen i 14, 17). Birds fly in front of it (20, R. V. margin). The heavens, and presumably the firmament, are compared to a tent spread above the earth (Ps. civ. 2; Is. xl 22), are likened in strength to a molten mirror (Job xxxvii 18), and are spoken of as though having doors and windows, through which the rain pours and God's blessings descend (Gen vii 11: 2 Kin. vii 2; Ps. lxxviii. 23; civ. 13). This conception was current in ancient Semitic thought. The doctrine of the division of the primeval fluid chaos is not unacceptable to modern thought, other features are regarded as naive. They are not taught in the Scriptures as facts. They lingered in Hebrew speech and imagery as an inheritance, and were used in both poetic and prose writings even when, for example, the agency of the clouds in bringing rain was understood (Gen ix 14, Job xxvi 8; xxxvi 27-29; xxxvii 11; xxxviii 34; Ps. lxxvii 17; cxlxxv. 7; Is. v 6; Jer. x. 13).

First'born or First'ling, the former being used chiefly of men, the latter always of beasts

To the firstborn offspring of men and animals God the giver has the first claim (cp Gen iv. 4). Among the Israelites an additional reason existed in the fact that Jehovah had purchased the people from Egyptian bondage. The tenth and last plague of Egypt had slain the firstborn of the Egyptians, and the firstborn of the Israelites had been preserved only by sprinkling blood on the lintels and door posts of the houses within which they resided (Ex. xii 12, 13, 23, 29). Saved in this manner, they became consecrated to Jehovah. Every firstborn male of man and beast was holy to the Lord (xiii 2, xxxiv 19), and could not be used by man (Lev. xxvii. 26), but belonged to the sanctuary for sacrifice; but the firstborn of man was redeemed (Ex. xiii 13, 15; xxxiv 20, cp Lev xxvii 6). On this occasion he was brought to the sanctuary and presented to the Lord (Luke ii 22; cp Num. xviii 15). The Levites were afterwards substituted for the Israelite firstborn (Num. iii 12, 41, 46; viii. 13-19; cp. Ex. xxxii. 26-29; Deut xxviii 9), and served at the sanctuary. Those of animals also, against which the tenth plague was partly directed, became similarly consecrated to Jehovah, but there were distinctions among them. The firstling of clean animals was sacrificed. Unclean animals, of which the ass is named as representative, either had the neck broken or were replaced by a lamb (Ex xiii 13, 15, xxii 30, xxxiv 20). On the establishment of the priesthood at Sinai, the disposition of these animals was specified. The fat of the clean animal was burned and the flesh was given to the priest. The unclean animal was redeemed or sold (Lev xxvii 27; Num xviii 15-18). Later, in view of the new circumstances in which it was foreseen that the people would be placed in Palestine, and the inconvenience and expense of the journey to the sanctuary, a delay was authorized in presenting the firstling at the house of God. The firstling might be kept beyond the eight days originally prescribed until the time of an annual festival; and the flesh, instead of falling as a perquisite to the priest, was given to the pilgrim who brought the animal, and to his family, to eat at the sanctuary (Deut. xv. 19, 20). But defective animals were eaten at home without religious ceremony (21-23).

For the legal privileges of the firstborn son, see BIRTHRIGHT.

First'fruits.

The fruits first ripe, the plucking of which was an earnest of the coming harvest. First-fruits were to be given as an offering to Jehovah on behalf of the nation, a sheaf at the feast of unleavened bread and two loaves at the feast of weeks (Lev xxiii 10, 17); and by individuals (Ex. xxiii 19; Deut. xxvi. 1-11). The term is used figuratively in Rom. viii 23; xi. 16; xvi 5. 1 Cor xv 20, 23; xvi. 15, Jas i 18, Rev xiv. 4 See FIRSTBORN.

Fish'ing.

Fishing went on largely in Egypt in the main channel of the Nile and in the several branches into which it separates before reaching the Mediterranean (Is. xix. 8), and the Israelites when in bondage in Egypt did eat fish freely (Num xi 5). The fishing along the Mediterranean coast of Palestine was largely in the hands of the Tyrians and Sidonians in the north (Neh xiii 16) and the Philistines in the south. To the Israelites belonged the sea of Galilee, which was their chief fishing ground. Tristram enumerates twenty-two species of fish in its waters, many of which pass down the Jordan also; but any that reach the Dead Sea die in its briny water. In certain places there were artificial fish ponds (Song vii 4). Fish were on sale in Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14; Neh. xiii.

16). For fishing, lines, hooks, and spears were used (Job xli 1, 7; Is xix 8; Amos iv. 2; Mat xvii. 27), and nets were cast from boats (Luke v 4-7).

Flag'on.

- 1 A vessel for holding liquids (Is xxii. 24, in Hebrew Nebel)
- 2 The rendering in A. V. of the Hebrew

Fishing with a Net in Ancient Egypt

Fitch [obsolete form of English retch]

A tare (Ficia), an herb much cultivated as a forage plant (Is xxviii 25, 27, Hebrew Keṣah). The plant so designated was sown broadcast; and when its fruits were ripe, they were beaten out with a staff to separate the seeds. R V., following Septuagint, Vulgate, and the Rabbins, places black cummin (Nigella sativa) on the margin, and considers the plant to have been what is now called, from its fennel-like leaves, fennel flower. It is of the crowfoot or buttercup order (Ranunculaceæ). It is a foot and a half high, with yellow or, more rarely, blue petals, many stamens, and several seed vessels, with numerous black acrid and aromatic seeds, which are used in the East for seasoning dishes and as a carminative. It grows wild in the Mediterranean lands, and is cultivated in Palestine for its seeds.

The Hebrew Kussemeth is likewise translated fitch in Ezek iv 9, A V; but elsewhere in A. V it is rendered rye, and everywhere in R V it is translated spelt.

Flag.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew 'Ahu in Job viii 11. On the margin of R V it is translated reed grass, and also in the text of Gen xli. 2, R. V., where A. V renders it meadow. It was a water plant; and grew, among other places, on the edge of the Nile. It is not likely that it was the flag, which is an iris, with three brightly colored petals. It seems to have been the Egyptian designation for the crowded mass of water plants, rushes, reeds, sedges found along the margin of the Nile.

2 The rendering of Suph (Ex ii 3, 5; Is. xix. 6), a plant growing by the brink of the Nile. It also grew in salt water (Jon. ii. 5, where it is rendered weeds). The Red Sea in Hebrew is called the sea of Suph. It is evident that the plant meant is not the flag, which does not grow in salt water. The word denotes aquatic vegetation, whether seaweeds or fresh water reeds and sedges.

word 'ashishah, something pressed closely together (2 Sam vi 19, 1 Chron xvi 3; Song ii 5; Hos ii 1). The R V correctly translates it cake of raisins.

Flax.

The rendering of the Hebrew words Pish-teh and Pishtah and of the Greek Linon (Is xlii 3 with Mat xii 20). It was a plant cultivated in Egypt and elsewhere (Ex ix. 31). It had stalks, which were spread on flat roofs of houses and dried by exposure to the heat of the sun (Josh ii 6). Its fibers were fine (Is xix 9), and were woven like wool (Prov xxxi 13, cp Hos ii 5). It is undoubtedly the flax plant (Linum usitatissimum), the type of the botanical order Linaceæ, or flaxworts. It is a small plant, with solitary erect stems, five sepals, five fugitive petals, with five perfect and as many rudimentary stamens. It is now found only in a state of cultivation. The woody fiber of the bark furnishes the flax fiber of which linen is woven, and the seeds constitute the linseed of commerce, valued on account of its oil.

Flea.

An insect, called in Hebrew Par'osh, leaper (1 Sam. xxiv. 14; xxvi 20). The species is very common in Palestine; so much so that it has become a popular saying that the king of the fleas has his court at Tiberias.

Flesh.

1. The muscles of the animal body, whether of man, beast, bird, or fish; or, less precisely, all its softer parts (Gen xl 19; Ex xii 8, xvi. 8, Lev xxi 5; Job x 11; Luke xxiv 39, 1 Cor xv. 39). It is distinct from the spirit (Job xiv 22, Is x. 18, Hebrew, xxxi 3, Mat xxvi. 41; Col. ii. 5).

2 All beings possessed of flesh, man and the inferior animals, especially man (Gen vi 13, 19; viii 17, Acts ii 17, Rom ii 20, 1 Cor i 29); often in contrast with God who is spirit (Ps lvi. 4; Is. xxxi. 3, xl. 6-8; Joel ii. 28; Mat xvi. 17).

3 Human nature deprived of the Spirit of God, dominated by the appetites and obeyed by the mind (Rom. vii. 5; viii. 5-7; 2 Cor. vii. 1; Gal. v. 16-20; 2 Pet. i. 10), thus including the whole unregenerated and unsanctified nature of man (Rom. viii. 8, 9; cp. John iii. 6).

Flint.

In Scripture, any hard or intractable rock (Deut. viii. 15, xxxii. 13; Ps. cxiv. 8), and hence figuratively, uncompromising firmness in the discharge of duty (Is. i. 7; Ezek. iii. 9). In it the miner sinks his shaft in quest of gold (Job xxviii. 9, R. V.). Broken fragments were used as rude knives (Ex. ix. 25; Josh. v. 2, R. V., where in Hebrew the generic word for rock is used).

Flood.

A stream, especially a great stream (Job xiv. 11; xxviii. 11 in A. V.), as the Nile in its inundations (Jer. xli. 7; Amos viii. 8 in A. V.), the Euphrates (Josh. xxiv. 2, A. V.), the Jordan (Ps. lxxvi. 6, A. V.). An inundation (Dan. ix. 26, Nah. i. 8, Mat. vii. 25, 27, Luke vi. 48). A great restless mass of water, the sea and its currents (Ps. xxiv. 2, Jon. i. 3).

Specially, the deluge in the time of Noah. It was sent as a divine judgment on the antediluvians for their wickedness (Gen. vi. 5-13). Secondary causes were employed to bring on the catastrophe. Two are mentioned: the fountains of the great deep were broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. Thus part of the water was that of the ocean, the rest was produced by a downpour of rain continuing forty days and nights (vii. 11, 12). All the high mountains under the whole heaven were covered, fifteen cubits upward the waters prevailed, and all flesh died that moved on the earth, man, bird, beast, and creeping thing. Noah only was left and they that were with him in the ark (vii. 19-23); see ARK. The waters prevailed 150 days, until at length the ark rested on the mountains of Ararat. Two and a half months later the tops of the mountains were seen (viii. 3-5). Three months later, after investigating the state of the water by means of birds which he sent forth, on New Year's day Noah removed the covering from the ark and saw that the face of the ground was dried, but eight weeks more elapsed before God gave command to go forth from the ark (viii. 13-15).

The months are reckoned at thirty days each, and the number of days which measure an interval is the difference between the dates obtained by simple subtraction (vii. 11 with viii. 3, 4). On this mode of reckoning, and dating from the day of entrance into the ark as first day, it is interesting to note the days and weeks. The first day which dawned fair and beautiful after the forty days and nights of rain was the forty-second, a recurring seventh day, fit reminder of divine rest and favor. Land was seen on a recurring first day, the new world wherein dwelt righteousness began like the old on a first day. Noah released the birds, at intervals of a week, either on successive sixth days, in expectancy of the morrow, or on seventh days. Noah removed the covering on New Year's day, old reckoning, but it was also a recurring seventh day. And eight weeks later, on the recurring seventh day, God released Noah from the ark.

description originated with eyewitnesses. Its language must be understood in the sense

As is now generally known, the account of the flood was handed down by tradition. The which it bore to the authors and promulgators of the narrative centuries before the days of Moses. The extent of the flood cannot be determined from the account of it which has been transmitted. The deluge may have been universal and covered the globe, or it may have been confined to a locality of greater or less extent. All the mountains under the whole heaven, that is within the horizon of the inmates of the ark as they drifted on the waters, were covered (compare the employment of similar language in Col i 23). The purpose of the flood was to destroy the corrupt race of man (Gen. vi. 7, 13, 17; vii 4), and with man all animals dependent upon the existence of dry land were involved in destruction. This was also the result as discerned by those who were saved in the ark (vii 21-23), and as confirmed by their descendants when they migrated in the earth. They met no survivors. They found the world uninhabited. Noah had been instructed to take the male and female of every kind of animal, and to gather food for them (vi 20, 21). The language of the command was intended to be understood in its usual sense, as any man of that age would understand it. Noah doubtless took specimens of every animal of which he had knowledge and food suitable for them (cp Dan vi 25); but there is no evidence that he believed himself to be commanded to seek for species as yet unknown, or if under supernatural impulse the animals unsought came to him (as some would unnecessarily interpret vii 8, 9), to gather peculiar food and provide peculiar shelter for strange animals of different kinds and from different climes.

The tradition of the flood was current among the people from whom the Hebrews sprang. In the ancestral home of Abraham the flood was remembered as a great crisis in human history. An Assyrian scribe, recording the names of ancient kings, remarks concerning certain of them, that they "were after the flood." Ashurbanipal refers to inscriptions "of the time before the flood." The Babylonian priest Berosus devoted the second volume of his history to the ten antediluvian kings of the Chaldeans, considering that the flood marked the close of the first period of human history. The tradition of the deluge which was current in Babylonia and Assyria differed in some details from the Hebrew account. The Hebrews, Assyrians, and Babylonians once dwelt together in Babylonia, and were one people with one tradition, but in course of transmission from age to age this tradition underwent slight changes and received unessential additions. When the Semites of Babylonia became three nations, dwelling apart and diverse in religion, the tradition of the flood which each preserved bore the impress of the national peculiarities. The Hebrew account was monotheistic, the Assyrian and Babylonian narrative is polytheistic. It is further observable to the attentive reader that the Hebrew account not only as a whole, but in minute particulars, is credible, and reflects the conditions of a primitive age, which cannot be said of the Assyrian and Babylonian.

The Assyrians and Babylonians themselves had slightly divergent traditions. The story, as current in Babylonia in the time of Alexander the Great, was recorded by Berosus (Antiq. i. 3, 6, con. Apion i 19), and is quoted in full by the church historian Eusebius. A form which is much older, which in fact is the oldest known and the best preserved, though even variations of it were current, is embodied in the epic that celebrates the deeds of Izdubar or Gilgamesh, king of Erech. Izdubar had been smitten with disease, and he determined to seek help from his ancestor Sitnapshtim, who had been translated to the gods, was dwelling "at the mouth of the rivers," and had knowledge of life and death. After a long journey, in which he encountered many difficulties and dangers, Izdubar found Sitnapshtim. He belonged to a generation long past, but still enjoyed the freshness and vigor of youth. Astonished, Izdubar exclaimed: "How camest thou, Sitnapshtim, to see life amid the gods?"

"I will open to you, Izdubar," replied Sitnapshtim, "the concealed story, and also the oracle of the gods [with reference to the cure of your disease] will I declare. You know the city of Surippak, which stands on the Euphrates. That city was old when the gods who dwelt therein were moved at heart to bring about a flood-storm. God Anu was there among others, and Bel and Nimb. The god Ea, however, deliberated with them, and he revealed unto me their purpose [by means of a dream (l 177)]: 'Man of Surippak, son of Ubaratutu,' said he, 'lean down the house, build a ship, debase property, and save life. Bring into the ship seed of life of every kind.' I paid attention, and said to god Ea, 'O my lord, what thou hast commanded I will respect by carrying out.'

"On the morrow [preparations were begun]. On the fifth day I laid the framework—140 cubits its height, 140 cubits its extent above. I divided its interior, I provided a rudder. Over the outside I poured three measures [sars] of bitumen and likewise over the inside. When the ship was completed I filled it with all that I possessed—with silver, gold, and seed of life of every kind. I took on board all my men-servants and maid-servants, the cattle and the beast of the field, and the airbans.

"The sun-god set a time. 'When the sender of violent rain causes a heavy rain to pour down in the evening, enter into the ship and shut the door.' The set time came. He who sends violent rain caused a heavy rain to fall in the evening. The dawning of the day I feared, I trembled to behold the morning. I entered the ship, closed the door to shut it in, and committed the immense structure with its cargo to Puzur-bel, the pilot.

"As soon as the dawn appeared, a dark cloud ascended on the horizon. In the midst of it the storm-god rolled the thunder. The gods Nebo and Marduk marched on before, went as guides over hill and dale, the mighty pest-god tore loose the ship, the god Nimb caused the streams to overflow their banks. The Anunnaki, spirits of the subterranean regions, lifted torches and made the land flicker by the light. The storm-god raised billows which reached to heaven. All light was turned to darkness. Man saw not his fellow, human beings were not discerned by those in heaven.

"The gods also were terrified at the flood-storm, sought refuge, ascended to heaven, and crouched at the wall like a dog in his lair. Then the goddess Ishtar, like a woman in travail, cried out—he of beautiful voice called. 'Man-kind which was is become mud, the very evil which I foretold in the presence of the gods and just as I foretold it to them. A storm for the annihilation of my people. I declared it would be. I brought forth men, but to what purpose? Like fry of fish they fill the sea.' The gods over the spirits of the subterranean regions wept with her, sitting bowed in tears, their lips covered.

"Six days and six nights * wind, flood-storm, and rain prevailed. on the seventh day the rain abated, the flood, the storm which had withered like a woman in travail, rested, the sea withdrew to its bed, and the violent wind and the flood-storm ceased.

"I looked on the sea, at the same time shouting, but all men were become mud. I opened a window, and, as the light fell upon my face, I shrank back and sat down weeping, over my cheeks the tears coursed. I had looked on every side—a wide expanse, sea.

"A bit of land, however, rose to the height of twelve measures. To the country of Nisir the ship took its course. A mountain of that land stranded the vessel and kept it from moving farther. On the first day and on the second day mount Nisir held the ship, on the third day and on the fourth day likewise, on the fifth and sixth days likewise. When the seventh day came I released a dove. The dove flew hither and thither, there was no resting place, so it returned. Next I sent forth a swallow. The swallow also flew hither and thither, and, as there was no resting place returned. Then I sent forth a raven. The raven flew away, and, when it saw that the waters had fallen, it approached, alighting but not returning †.

"I then sent forth [all the animals] to the four winds. I poured out a libation, I made an offering on the summit of the mountain. I set vessels by sevens, and underneath them spread sweet cane, cedar, and herbs. The gods smelled the savor and like flies gathered about the offering.

"When the goddess Ishtar arrived, she raised aloft the great ornament which the god of the sky had made at her request. 'By the ornament of my neck, never will I forget, I will think of these days, and to eternity not forget them. Let all the gods come to the offering except Bel, for he inconsiderately caused the deluge and consigned my people to the judgment.' But Bel came also, and, when he saw the ship, was filled with wrath against the gods of the heavenly spirits. 'What soul has escaped?' he cried, 'not a man shall survive the judgment.' Then god Ninib opened his mouth and spake to the valorous Bel. 'Who else than god Ea has done this thing? Ea knows surely every exorcism.' Ea

* Mentioning the nights as well as the days, as does the Hebrew narrative at the same point Delitzsch reads "six days and seven nights." His text thus contains a formula often found elsewhere, e. g., 1 188. The majority of Assyriologists who have examined the tablet discern the marks for six days and six nights, not for seven nights.

† Or, the raven flew away and saw the abatement of the waters, [thereupon] he eats, alights carefully, but does not return.

also opened his mouth, and said to the valorous Bel. 'Thou, valorous chieftain of the gods, so utterly without reflection hast thou acted and caused the flood. On the sinner lay his sin, on the evil doer his evil deeds. Desist [from wrath] that he be not cut off, be gracious also. Instead of causing a flood-storm, send the lion and the hyena, famine and pestilence, and let them diminish men. And as for me, I did not reveal the purpose of the great gods, I sent Atrahasis* a dream and he perceived the purpose of the gods.'

"Then Bel became reasonable, and went up into the ship, grasped my hand and led me up. He led up my wife also, and made her kneel at my side. Then turning to us he placed himself between us and blessed us, saying, 'Heretofore Sinapishtim was a [mere] man, now let him and his wife be exalted to equality with the gods, and let him dwell afar off at the mouth of the rivers.' Thereupon he took me away and placed me afar off at the mouth of the rivers.†

The account of the flood existed in this form among the Assyrians and Babylonians before the seventh century B. C., for the colophon affixed to the tablet on which it is recorded states that the document is the property of Ashurbanipal, who reigned over Assyria from 668 to about 626 B. C., and that the words were copied from an older tablet. It existed in the same form centuries earlier, for fragments of it have been found which were written in the time of Ammizaduga, the fourth successor of Hammurabi, king of Babylon, who is believed on good evidence to have been Abraham's contemporary Amraphel.

A coin bearing a picture of the flood was struck at Apamea in Phrygia in the reign of the Roman emperor Septimius Severus, 193–211 A. D. A boat, inscribed with the letters NOE, the Greek spelling of Noah, floats on the waves. A man and a woman are in it. A bird perches on it, and another bird flies toward the vessel.

Coin of Apamea, representing Noah and the Ark

In the account which Berosus wrote in Greek, this name is written Xisuthrus, the constituent parts being transposed. It is another name of Sinapishtim.

† Such is essentially the cuneiform story. As here reproduced, it is slightly abridged, chiefly, however, by the omission of mutilated lines and of sentences whose translation is still uncertain.

sel, bearing a branch between its feet. Before the ark the former inmates are seen, having quitted it and got on dry land. Apamea was formerly called Kibotos, the Ark. The coins of towns frequently exhibited some prominent event in their history or local traditions Flute.

A musical instrument used in Babylon (Dan. iii 5); in Aramaic Mashroqitha', whistle, pipe. Pipes consisting of one, two, or more reeds were in use. According to the Septuagint, it was Pan's pipe, which consisted of several reeds, joined side by side in a series, and gradually diminishing in length.

A flute or pipe, in Greek Aulos, was played in the house of mourning (Mat ix 23) and on occasions of joy (Rev. xviii. 22). See PIPE.

Flux. See DYSENTERY.

Fly.

1 A flying insect; a two-winged insect, one of the order Diptera, specially the domestic fly (Musca domestica). So troublesome are flies of various kinds in hot countries (Is. vii 18; Ecc x. 1) that the Ekronites worshipped a god Baal-zebub, lord of flies, who was supposed to be able to keep the annoyance within bounds (2 Kin i 2).

2 The rendering of the Hebrew 'Arob, a voracious, biting insect of Egypt (Ex viii 21; Ps cv 31). It devoured (Ps lxxviii 45) and destroyed (Ex viii 24, margin). According to the Septuagint, the dog fly.

Folly.

The absence of wisdom, disregard of the true nature of things in their relation to man and God. Hence injudicious action or conduct (Prov xv. 21; Ecc i 17; x 1-2 Cor xi 1), and wickedness (Gen xxxiv 7, Deut xxii 21, Josh vii 15; Judg xix 23. xx 6).

Food.

The food of the Hebrews, when they lived a simple nomadic life, consisted largely of bread and the products of the herd, such as milk, curds, and occasionally meat (Gen xviii 7, 8; Judg. v 25). Wild honey was also eaten (Judg xiv 8, 9). When they adopted a settled life in Palestine, the products of garden, vineyard, and olive yard were added, such as lentils, cucumbers, beans (2 Sam xvii 28), pomegranates, figs, grapes (Num xiii. 23; xx 5; Mat. vii 16). Sweet and sour wine were important articles of food. Fish were eaten, locusts also, and fowl and eggs (1 Kin iv. 23, Neh. xiii 16; Mat iv 18, Luke xi 12). A simple repast consisted of bread and lentils (Gen xxv 34) or other pottage (2 Kin. iv 38), or bread and wine (Gen. xiv. 18), or roasted grain and sour wine (Ruth ii. 14). Abraham honored his unexpected guests with a more pretentious meal, consisting of butter and milk, cakes made of fine flour, and the flesh of a calf (Gen xviii. 3-8). A greater variety of foods came on the tables of the rich and great (1 Kin. iv 22, 23, Neh v. 18). See MEALS.

Fool.

One destitute of understanding or wisdom (2 Cor xi 16); especially a wicked man, the doctrine taught being that nothing shows a greater want of understanding than for a man to commit wickedness. The greater the talents, the greater the responsibility, and consequently the folly of misusing them for evil ends (1 Sam xxvi 21; 2 Sam in 33, xiii 13, Ps xiv 1; cp. 2, 3, etc., Prov xxvi 10, Mat. v 22). See FOLLY, PHILOSOPHY, and WISDOM.

Foolishness.

The same as folly (2 Sam xv 31. Prov xxii 15).

Footman.

1 A soldier who marches and fights on foot, in contradistinction to one on horseback (Num xi 21; 2 Kin xiii 7, 1 Chron xviii 4).

2. A runner (1 Sam. xxii. 17, A V.), one of the king's bodyguard. See RUNNERS.

Foreigner, in A. V. usually STRANGER.

A gentile; a person belonging to another people than Israel and owning other allegiance than to Israel and Israel's God (Deut xxix. 22, 24), as the Egyptians (Ex ii 22); Jebusites (Judg. xix. 12); Philistines (2 Sam. xv. 19); Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Sidonians, Hittites (1 Kin. xi 1). As a technical term foreigner does not include 1. Slaves bought with money and captives taken in war; for they were in the power of their masters and subject to the laws of Israel (Gen. xii 12; Ex. xxi 20, 21). 2. Proselytes to the religion of Israel (Gen xxxiv 14-17, Is lvi 6-8; Acts ii 10). 3. The so-called sojourners or strangers (See STRANGER).

Israel was Jehovah's peculiar people (Deut. xiv. 1, 2); therefore idolatrous Canaanites specifically were not to be received into covenant relations of any sort (Ex xxiii 32), and all foreigners were debarred from eating the passover (Ex. xii 43), entering the sanctuary (Ezek. xlv. 9; Acts xxi 28, cp. Deut xxiii 3, 7, 8), and ascending the throne as king (Deut. xvii. 15). Intermarriage with them on equal terms was forbidden (Ex xxxiv 16; Deut. vii. 3; Josh. xxiii. 12, specifically Canaanites; cp. Gen xxiv 3, 4, xxvi 34, 35; xxviii 1; xxxiv 14-17. Judg xiv 3; Ezra x 2; Neh. xiii 26 27; Tob vi 12). The flesh of animals that died, which the Israelites were not allowed to eat, might be sold to foreigners (Deut xiv. 21); money might be lent to them on interest (xxiii 20; cp. Ex xxiii. 25); and debts could be collected from them even in the year of release, when they were remitted to Israelites (Deut xv 3). In later times strict Jews abstained from even eating and drinking with gentiles (Acts xi 3, Gal. ii 12). Yet access into Judaism was always open to the gentiles (Gen. xvii 27, xxxiv 14-17; Matt xxii. 15); and their ultimate engrafting into the kingdom was Israel's expectation.

Fore-run-ner.

A precursor; as 1. A runner who immediately precedes the horse or chariot of high officials in order to clear the way or make proclamation (see the verbs in Gen. xli. 43, 1 Sam. viii. 11; 2 Sam. xv. 1; 1 Km. i. 5, xviii. 46; Esth. vi. 9). 2. Descriptive of a herald (Hesod. i. 60). 3. The advance guard of an army (Wisdom xii. 8; Herod. iv. 121, 124; cp. ix. 14). 4. First fruits (Num. xiii. 20, Septuagint).

As a forerunner Christ has entered on our behalf into heaven, the holy of holies, into the immediate presence of God (Heb. vi. 20).

For'est.

An extensive wood (Is. xlv. 14). One grew on Lebanon, famed for its cedars and firs (1 Km. vii. 2), another stretched from the Mediterranean Sea well into the hill country of Ephraim (Josh. xvii. 15, 18), a third was in Judah (1 Sam. xxii. 5), and a fourth existed beyond Jordan near Mahanaim (2 Sam. xviii. 6-9).

For-tu-nat'us [fortunate]

One of three messengers, apparently from Corinth, who reached Paul, and supplied what was lacking on the part of the church in that city (1 Cor. xvi. 17).

Foun'tain.

A spring arising from under a rock or a bank, or welling up from the ground (Deut. viii. 7). In the geography of Palestine it requires to be carefully distinguished from mere wells, pools, and cisterns. Strong fountains are numerous in Palestine. They are the permanent source of rivers and give life and fertility to the soil. Many towns are named from them, as En-dor and the other compounds of En. Figuratively, fountain symbolizes the permanent and inexhaustible source of spiritual blessings (Ps. cxxxvi. 9, Jer. ii. 13, Rev. vii. 17, xxi. 6). Children are also described as a fountain proceeding from the parents (Deut. xxxiii. 28, Ps. lxxviii. 26).

Foun'tain Gate. See JERUSALEM II. 3.

Fowl.

Any bird (Gen. i. 26; Lev. xi. 13-19).

Fowl'er.

One who catches birds by a net or other snare (Ps. cxxiv. 7; Prov. vi. 5); hence figuratively one who ensnares the innocent or unwary, and takes their life, or lures them to moral and spiritual ruin (Ps. xci. 3, cxxiv. 7, Hos. ix. 8).

Fox.

An animal which dwells in holes (Mat. viii. 20), especially among solitary ruins (Lam. v. 18), and is sly and careful for its own safety (Luke xiii. 32; Ezek. xiii. 4). Tristram enumerates two species as occurring in Palestine, the Egyptian fox (Vulpes nilotica), and the tawny fox (Vulpes flavescens). The former is abundant in central and southern Palestine, as well as east of the Jordan, and the latter, which is somewhat larger, and may perhaps be only a variety of the common fox (Vulpes vulgus), in the wooded parts of the country.

Under the general name of fox, Shu'al, the Hebrews, like the modern inhabitants of Palestine, appear to have comprehended the jackal, which belongs to the dog family, although they had a special name for the jackal. The jackal is perhaps intended in Judg. xv. 4 (cp. R. V. margin), for it abounds in the lowland of Philistia, goes about by night in bands, and spends the day as a pack in some cave. It is thus easily caught; whereas the fox is a solitary animal and difficult to capture. The jackal also devours carrion (Ps. lxxiii. 10), which the fox is loath to do. The jackal eats fruit as well as flesh, and may be intended in Song ii. 15, yet the fox tramples and destroys vineyards.

Frank'in-cense.

A fragrant gum of a tree (Ecclus. i. 8; Song iii. 6). It is white in color, as its Hebrew name Libnanh denotes. It was an ingredient in the holy anointing oil with which priests were consecrated to their sacred functions (Ex. xxx. 34). It was added with oil to the meal offerings (Lev. ii. 1, 2, 15, 16, R. V.), Frankincense (Boswellia Carteri).

and ultimately burned (vi. 15). No frankincense was added to sin offerings (Lev. v. 11) and offerings of jealousy (Num. v. 15). Pure frankincense was poured upon the twelve loaves of showbread (Lev. xxiv. 7; cp. also 1 Chron. ix. 29; Neh. xiii. 5). The dromedaries of Midian, Ephah, and Sheba, brought it to Palestine from Arabia (Is lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20). The hill of frankincense (Song iv. 6) was probably a retired spot in the palace gardens, among exotic frankincense trees (cp. Ecc. ii. 5; Antiq viii 6, 6; ix. 1, 2). The frankincense of antiquity, the olibanum of European commerce, comes from Boswellia floribunda, one of the Amyridaceæ (Amyrids), growing in India, or from other species of the genus, especially B. Carteri, B. Frereana and B. serrata, of which there are two varieties, B. serrata proper, the B. thurifera of Roxburgh, and the variety B. glabra. The first and fourth species are Indian; the second and third occur on the Somali coast of Africa and on the south coast of Arabia. The frankincense itself is gum resin, which is dry, consists of tears often an inch long, with a balsamic odor, especially when burnt. A poor quality, reddish in color, is obtained in the spring; the best is gotten later, and is white.

Friend of the King.

A high court-official (Gen. xxvi 26; 1 Kin iv. 5), probably the king's confidential adviser. Under the Syro-Macedonian kings there was a specially privileged class known as the king's friends (1 Mac. ii. 18, iii 38, vi. 10). See PRIEST.

Frog.

An amphibious animal (Ex viii 3, Rev. xvi. 13); in the Old Testament probably Rana punctata, the dotted frog of Egypt.

Front'let.

A band for the forehead; then, figuratively, the constant public exhibition of a trait or obedience to a command (Ex. xiii 16; Deut. vi. 8, 9; xi. 18; cp Prov iii 3). The injunction was interpreted literally by the later Jews. See PHYLACTERY.

Full'er.

One who cleanses undressed cloth from oil and grease, and renders it thick or compact by the application of pressure, or else one who thoroughly cleanses soiled garments (Mark ix. 31). The clothing was steeped in soap and water (Mal. iii. 2) and trodden, as the Hebrew name denotes. A fuller's field lay outside of Jerusalem. It had a highway and the conduit of the upper pool (Is. vii 3; xxxvi. 2), and was so near the city that the Assyrian ambassadors, standing in the field and speaking, were heard and understood by the people on the city wall (2 Kin xviii 17). The conduit is commonly regarded as the channel which conducts the water from the Birket Manilla, in the upper Hinnom valley northwest of Jerusalem, into the city. If, however, the conduit referred to is the tunnel connecting the fountain of the Virgin with the pool of Siloam, the fuller's field was in the valley of the Kidron.

Fur'long.

The rendering of the Greek noun Stadion (Luke xxiv. 13; John vi. 19; xi. 18; Rev xiv.

20). The Greek stadion was 600 Greek and 606½ English feet, or about ⅓ of a Roman mile. It is a little less than an English furlong, which is 660 English feet, or ⅓ of an English mile. See MEASURE.

Fur'nace.

1. An oven for smelting iron from the ore (Deut. iv. 20; 1 Kin. viii 51). See IRON.
2. A crucible for refining gold and silver, and for melting gold, silver, brass, tin, and lead (Prov. xvii 3, Ezek. xxxii 20). See SMITH.
3. A bake oven; so in Neh iii. 11; Is. xxxi 9. See BREAD.

G.

Ga'al [loathing]

A son of Ebed. With a band of followers he came to the city of Shechem, and, having gained the confidence of its inhabitants, began to vilify Abimelech, then absent king, and to assume authority. Zebul, the governor, sent word to Abimelech of what was going on, and advised him to lie in wait by night and advance against the town at dawn. He did so. Gaal went forth and gave him battle, but was put to flight (Judg ix 26-41).

Ga'ash [trembling, earthquake]

A hill in the hill country of Ephraim, south of Timnath-serah (Josh xxiv 30, Judg ii 9; 2 Sam xxiii 30, 1 Chron xi 32). Exact situation unknown.

Ga'ba. See GEBÄ.

Gab'bal [tax gatherer]

A Benjamite who consented to live in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh xi 8).

Gab'ba-tha [an elevated place]

The equivalent in Aramaic of the Greek word Lithostraton, a pavement of tessellated work (John xxi 13). On it stood the public tribunal on which Pontius Pilate sat to decide cases. Probably it was an open space in front of Herod's palace (cp War ii 14, 8). There is no reason to believe that Pilate, like Cæsar on his campaigns, carried a transportable pavement about with him, which he laid wherever he wished to erect his tribunal.

Ga'bri-el [man of God].

An angel of high rank sent to interpret a vision to the prophet Daniel (Dan viii 16-27). He was commissioned again to visit the prophet to give him skill and understanding, and reveal to him the prophecy of the seventy weeks (ix. 16-27). At a long subsequent period he was dispatched to Jerusalem to announce to Zacharias the birth of John the Baptist (Luke i. 11-22), and to Nazareth to hail the Virgin Mary as chosen to the high privilege of being mother of the Messiah (26-31). Gabriel described himself as habitually standing in the presence of God (19). Thence, doubtless, he departed at longer or shorter intervals to carry the divine messages to and from this earth or other worlds.

Gad [good fortune].

1 A son of Jacob by Zilpah, Leah's hand-maid. At his birth Leah said, "Fortunate" and she called his name Gad (Gen xxx 10, 11; cp 13, R V). Jewish tradition adopted a different reading from the text, and made Leah say, "A troop or fortune cometh." Jacob prophesied: "Gad, a troop shall press upon him: but he shall press upon their heel" (Gen xlix 19, R V). Moses blessed God who enlarged Gad, and praised the valor of the tribe and its fidelity to duty (Deut xxxiii 20, 21). Gad had seven sons (Gen xlii, 16), each of whom, with the possible exception of Ezbon, founded a tribal family (Num xxvi 15-18).

2 The tribe of which Gad was the progenitor, the Gadites (Num i 14, Deut xxvii 13, Ezek xlviii 27, 28, 34). At the first census in the wilderness the Gadites capable of bearing arms were 45,650 (Num i 24, 25), at the second there were 40,500 (xxvi 15-18). Valiant Gadites joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron xii 8). The territory occupied by the tribe was east of the Jordan and was assigned them by Moses, but with the proviso that, before finally settling down in it the warriors of the tribe should cross the river with their brethren, and give assistance in the conquest of Canaan (Num xxxii 21-32). The territory of the Gadites was situated between that of Reuben on the south and the half tribe of Manasseh on the north. It included the southern part of mount Gilead from the Jahbok southward to Heshbon, and from the vicinity of Rabbath-ammon on the east westward to the Jordan valley. In the valley it took in the entire eastern bank from Beth-nimrah, near the northern end of the Dead Sea, to the lake of Gennesaret (Josh xii 24-28; Deut iii 12, 16, 17). The country was adapted to pasturage (Num xxxii 1-4). Ramoth in Gilead was in the territory of Gad, and was appointed a city of refuge (Josh xx 8). 2 Sam xxiv 5 probably means that the enumerators passed from the Arnon toward Gad and unto Jazer.

3 A prophet, David's seer, who, when David was in the cave of Adullam, advised him to quit that place of refuge and seek safety elsewhere (1 Sam xxii, 5), and who later gave the king the option from God of three kinds of punishment for his having numbered the people (2 Sam. xxiv, 11-14). He aided in arranging the musical service of the sanctuary (2 Chron. xxix, 25), and he wrote an account of David's reign (1 Chron xxix, 29).

4 Perhaps a heathen deity was known by the name of Gad, for Isaiah represents the Israelites as engaging in idolatrous worship, and setting a table for Fortune [Hebrew Gad] and filling up mingled wine unto Fate [Hebrew Meni] (Is. lxxv, 11, R. V.).

Gad-a-renes'.

Natives or inhabitants of Gadara, which Josephus calls the metropolis of Peræa and a place of strength, adding that it had wealthy inhabitants (War iv, 7, 3). He also describes it as a Greek city (Antiq. xvii 11, 4). Eusebius places it east of the Jordan, nearly opposite to Tiberias and Scythopolis. It has been identified as Umm Keis, on a bold headland about 5½ English miles southeast from the southern side of the sea of Galilee, with the sea in full view and the river Yarmûk between. The most imposing ruins are the remains of two theaters. The hot springs belonging to Gadara are north of the Yarmûk, while Umm Keis lies to the south of that river. Gadarenes is the reading approved by textual criticism in Mat. viii, 28 (cp. Mark v. 1; Luke viii, 26, 37, A. V.). See GERGESENE.

Gadaritis was the designation of a political district east of the Jordan (War iii, 10, 10), having Gadara as its capital and extending to the southeastern shore of the sea of Galilee. But perhaps Matthew, in mentioning the country of the Gadarenes, speaks more broadly, since Gadara was a great city and its mention sufficiently indicated the general locality.

Gad'di [fortunate].

The spy from the tribe of Manasseh in the exploration of Canaan (Num. xiii, 11).

Gad'di-el [God hath given fortune].

The spy representing Zebulun in the exploration of Canaan (Num. xiii, 10).

Ga'di [a Gadite].

Father of king Menahem (2 Kin. xv, 14).

Ga'ham [flaming, burnt].

A son of Nahor and Reumah (Gen. xxii, 24).

Ga'har [hiding place].

Head of a family of Nethinim who returned from captivity (Ezra ii, 47; Neh. vii, 49).

Gal [valley].

A locality near Ekron, probably Gath (1 Sam. xxvi, 52, R. V.; context and margin).

Ga'ius [a common Roman name, sometimes written Caius].

1. A Macedonian, one of Paul's companions who was dragged into the amphitheater during the riot at Ephesus (Acts xix, 29).

2. A man of Derbe, who accompanied Paul on his last journey to Asia (Acts xx, 4).

3. A Christian of Corinth, baptized by Paul, noted for hospitality to his fellow Christians (Rom. xvi, 23, 1 Cor i, 14). Perhaps he was the person to whom John addressed his third epistle (3 John 1).

Ga'l-a-ad. See GILEAD.

Ga'la [a rolling, as e. g., the rolling of one's way on the Lord].

1. A Levite (1 Chron. ix, 15).

2. Another Levite, the son of Jeduthun (1 Chron. ix, 16; Neh. xi, 17).

Ga-la'tia.

A district of central Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Bithynia, Paphlagonia, and Pontus, on the east by Pontus and Cappadocia, on the south by Cappadocia and Lycaonia, on the west by Phrygia and Bithynia. Its name was derived from the fact that certain Gallic tribes, after having about 280 B. C. invaded Macedonia and Greece, migrated to Asia Minor and received this territory from Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, in return for services rendered him in war. Other Gallic tribes passed onward through central Europe, finally settling in Gaul, i. e. France. The Gauls were commonly called Galatai by the Greeks. The chief cities of Galatia were Pessinus, Ancyra, and Tavium. The territory, however, varied in size at different times according to the fortunes of war. In 189 B. C. the Galatians were subdued by the Romans, but retained their self-government, and were favored by their conquerors, since they were valuable allies. Hence under their last king, Amyntas, their territory was much extended to the south, so as to include part of Phrygia, Pisidia, Lycaonia, and Isauria; and, after the death of Amyntas (25 B. C.), this enlarged region became the Roman province of Galatia. In 7 B. C. Paphlagonia and part of Pontus were added on the north, and after A. D. 63 other territorial changes were frequently made. During the travels of Paul therefore the term Galatia was applicable both to the original Galatic territory and to the large Roman province. In which sense it is used in Acts xvi. 6 (where the A. V. has "when they had gone throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia," and the R. V. "they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia," but which Prof. Ramsay translates "they went through the Phrygo-Galatic region"), and in Acts xviii. 23 (which translation is open to similar differences of opinion), and in Paul's epistle to the "churches of Galatia," is disputed. If Galatia meant the Roman province, then Paul evangelized it on his first missionary journey (Acts xiii, xiv) in company with Barnabas. If it meant the old territory of Galatia, then he evangelized it on his second journey (Acts xvi. 6). The churches of Galatia are also mentioned in 1 Cor. xvi. 1. In 2 Tim. iv. 10 we read that Crescens had gone to Galatia, which, however, many think meant Gaul (now France). 1 Peter was addressed to the Christians of Galatia among others (i. 1), and there Galatia clearly means the Roman province. There are, however, serious difficulties in so understanding it in The Acts and in the Epistle to the Galatians. G. T. P.

Galatians, E-pis'tle to the.

A letter addressed to the churches of Galatia (i. 2), showing that there were a number of them in different parts of the territory. What churches are thus described depends on the meaning we attach to the term Galatia (q. v.). The date of the epistle also turns on this point. If Galatia be the Roman province, and the churches of Galatia those founded on Paul's first journey (Acts xiii, xiv), then the epistle was probably written toward the latter part, or at the close, of Paul's second journey, since Gal. iv. 13 ("the first time," R. V.) implies that he had visited them twice, and since it seems necessary to date the epistle later than those to the Thessalonians, for the letters to the Thessalonians contain no allusion to the Judaistic attacks. If, however, Galatia means Galatia proper, and if it was evangelized on the second journey (Acts xvi. 6), then the epistle could not have been written before the apostle's sojourn in Ephesus, since Acts xviii. 23 mentions his second visit, on this interpretation, to Galatia. In conformity with this latter view are the facts, first, that the apostle appeals to his readers as if he alone had been their spiritual father (Gal. iv. 13-20, v. 1), whereas on his first missionary journey Barnabas was associated with him, and, secondly, that Paul's description of his reception as an angel of God (iv. 14) hardly comports with any known experience of his on his first journey. Most scholars take this latter view, conclude that Galatia proper was evangelized on the second journey, and date the epistle in A. D. 55 or 56. Others, however, put it still later, thinking that its resemblance to Romans shows that it was written shortly before that epistle, say in the winter of 57-58. Whatever its readers and date, it was occasioned by the operations of certain Judaizing teachers among the Galatians, who assailed Paul's authority, and taught the necessity of observing the Mosaic laws. They declared that Paul, not being one of the original apostles, was dependent on others for his knowledge of the gospel. They seem also to have charged him with being himself inconsistent in his preaching of gentile freedom from the law. They also attacked his doctrine, and persuaded his converts to adopt Jewish observances. The very gospel being thus at stake, Paul wrote this epistle with great intensity of feeling and vigorous argument.

This epistle is the magna charta of Christian liberty. After the introduction (i. 1-10), in which the apostle opens the subject of their error in listening to false teachers, and vehemently asserts the divineness of the gospel which he had preached, he defends his apostolic authority (i. 11-ii. 21) as given directly by Christ and not dependent on man. He also shows that the Jerusalem church and the original apostles agreed with his position (ii. 1-10), and that (ii. 11-21) he had never changed his teaching, even when Peter at Antioch had seemed by his conduct to oppose it. In chap. iii he defends his doctrine of justification by faith alone, appealing in proof to their own experience of salvation through faith (iii. 1-5), to the teaching of Scripture regarding the original Abrahamic way of salvation (iii. 6-9) and to certain facts, fully taught in Scripture, concerning the law, namely, that the law, since it requires perfect obedience as the condition of salvation, brings only a curse or penalty (in 10-12); that Christ has redeemed us from the curse, having become a curse for us (in 13, 14); that God ratified his covenant of salvation by faith with Abraham and his seed, and hence the law, which came later, cannot disannul the original compact (in 15-18), but was intended as a temporary discipline to make men realize that sin is a transgression of God's commandments (in 19, 20), that the law was therefore a tutor to bring sinners to Christ (in 21-24). In chap. iv the apostle advances three more reasons for their fidelity to his gospel, namely, the analogy of sonship and its rights under the civil law (iv, 1-11), their personal affection for himself (iv 12, 20), and the illustration which the narrative of Genesis provided in the account of Hagar and Sarah and their sons (iv 21-31). In v-vi 10 he applies the doctrine of freedom from the law, bidding them to maintain, yet not to abuse, their liberty, and to exercise it with meekness and a sense of responsibility. The closing verses, vi 11-18, form the conclusion, probably in the apostle's own handwriting (see ver. 11 in R. V.), in which he summarizes the substance of his instruction.

The Epistle to the Galatians is of immense value. 1 It is important for the details it gives about the apostle's life. Its harmony with the account in The Acts of Paul's life, and of his relation to the church, has been much contested, but may be completely proved (see PAUL and the remarks, made at the proper chronological point in the article, concerning Paul's first visit to Jerusalem after his conversion, Gal 1 18, 19, Acts ix 26-29, and concerning the council at Jerusalem, Gal ii 2-10 and Acts xv.). 2 The epistle proves also that the older apostles were in accord with Paul, though to him was allotted the work among the gentiles. 3 It gives in briefer outline, and with special application, the same scheme of salvation and the same view of the Hebrew dispensation which is more elaborately and calmly presented in the Epistle to the Romans. All men being under law, and condemned as sinners by the law, salvation is impossible by the works of the law. Christ alone can save, since he has by his death met the claims of the law against those who believe. The law was never intended to save, but to be a schoolmaster (i. e. a slave who led children to school) to bring us to Christ. By faith Abraham was saved, and by faith alone do we become children of Abraham, partakers of the blessing and heirs of the promise. Judaism, as a method of salvation, was therefore a misinterpretation even of the Old Testament itself, and the distinction between Jew and gentile has been done away. The declaration of these truths made Christianity a world religion instead of a Jewish sect.

The Epistle to the Galatians was much used by early Christian writers. certainly by Polycarp, and in the Epistle to Diognetus, and by Justin Martyr, during the first half of the second century, and by Melito in the third quarter; and in the last quarter it is quoted by name, according to their custom in citing, by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian. It is contained in the Old Latin version, and is listed in the Muratorian fragment. G. T. P. (supplemented) Gal'ba-num.

A fragrant spice (Ex xxx 34; Eccles xxiv 15), in Hebrew Helbanah, in Greek Chalbanê. The Greek and Roman Galbanum was a gum brought from Persia. It is generally supposed to have come from two umbelliferous plants, Ferula galbaniflua and F. rubricaulis. The Levant galbanum of European commerce is a different plant. The umbelliferous plant from which it comes is imperfectly known.

Gal'e-ed [heap of witness].

A cairn erected by Jacob in mount Gilead, north of the Jabbok. The exact situation is unknown. It was between the respective homes of Laban and Jacob, and was intended as a memorial of the covenant concluded between them there, that neither would pass that place to do the other injury (Gen xxxi 45-54). see MIZPAH. The two names Gilead and Galed are never confused in Hebrew. Their pronunciation is different, and the former is a common noun rather than a proper name, and took the definite article.

Gal'ga-la, in R V Gilgal.

A place (1 Mac ix 2), presumably one of the towns known as Gilgal.

Gal-i-læ'an.

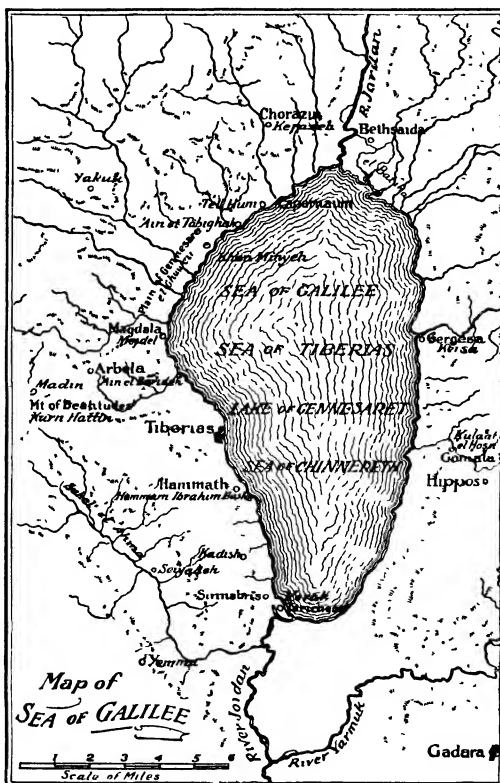

A native or inhabitant of Galilee (Mark xiv 70, Luke xiii 1).

Gal'i-lee [Hebrew galil, circle, region, district].

Originally a district in the hill country of Naphtali (2 Kin xv 29, 1 Chron vi 76), Kedesh being one of its cities (Josh xx 7, xxxi 32). The twenty unimportant towns given by Solomon to Hiram were in the land of Galilee (1 Kin ix 11). In this region many of the Canaanites remained (Judg i 30-33, iv. 2), and the expression "Galilee of the nations" or "gentiles" implies that the district or region so called was inhabited chiefly by a non-Jewish population (Is ix 1; cp 1 Mac v 15 and Mat iv 15). The name Galilee gradually extended until it included the country as far south as the plain of Esdraelon (1 Mac. v. 55; x. 30; xii. 47, 49). Many of its inhabitants had been carried away, especially during the Assyrian wars (2 Kin xv 29, 1 Kin xv 20), and the few Jews who settled in Galilee after the return were taken to Judæa by Simon Maccabæus about 164 B. C. (1 Mac. v. 23); but Galilee soon after became thoroughly Jewish. It formed part of the kingdom of Herod the Great, and on his death passed under the authority of Herod the tetrarch. It was the most northerly of the three provinces west of the Jordan into which (if Phœnicia be ignored) Palestine was divided in the times of the Romans. At the period of the Jewish war, A. D. 70, it was divided into Upper and Lower Galilee, and was bounded on the north by Tyrian territory, on the south by the northern boundary line of Samaria and Scythopolis to the Jordan, on the east by Hippene, Gadara, Gaulonitis, and the kingdom of Agrippa, that is, by the Jordan and its lakes, village Japha (Life 45). The mixture of races tended to produce a distinct accent or even dialect (Mark xiv 70; Luke xxii 59; cp Acts ii 7). The people also was supposed to be one which never would produce a prophet (John vii 41, 52). Nevertheless, nearly all the apostles of Jesus were natives of Galilee, and he himself was brought up in it and made it the chief scene of his ministry, laboring on its eastern limits by the sea of Galilee, and within its area at Chorazin, Bethsaida, Capernaum, Nain, Cana, and Nazareth.

and on the west by Phœnicia. Lower Galilee lay to the south of Upper Galilee, and extended from Tiberias to near Ptolemais, now Acre, on the Mediterranean Sea (War iii 3, 1, Life 13, 14, 37; cp also Judith i 8). It was at that time densely populated. It furnished an army of 100,000 men (War ii 20, 6). There were 240 cities and villages within the limits of the two Galilees (Life 45). The smallest of them, it is incorrectly stated elsewhere, had 15,000 inhabitants (War iii 3, 2). The largest city was Sepphoris, and the largest Galilee is about 60 miles long by 25 broad. It is generally mountainous, with fertile valleys between. Its scenery is picturesque. Lower Galilee is divided from Upper Galilee on a line running almost due west from the northern end of the lake to Acre. It is a grain-growing region, with a less elevation above the sea level than Upper Galilee, its mountains being all under 1850 feet high. Upper Galilee has summits of 2000, 3000, and 4000 feet altitude. It is characterized by olive groves.

Gal'i-lee, Sea of.

A fresh-water lake, fed by the river Jordan. It was called originally sea of Chinnereth (Num. xxxiv. 11), later lake of Gennesaret (Luke v. 1; Antq. xviii. 2, 1; cp xiii 5, 7; 1 Mac. xi. 67), and sea of Galilee or Tiberias (John vi 1; xxi 1). The latter name is preserved in the Arabic form Bahr Tabariya.

It is enclosed by hills, save where the Jordan enters and leaves. The hills on the eastern side rise to the height of 1000 feet and more; those on the western side toward the southern end of the lake are of like character, but toward the northwest they are lower and less steep. It is designated a sea, from its considerable extent, though its water feet. Lying so low, it has a semitropical climate, and ice-crowned Hermon being at no great distance, sudden and violent storms at times rush down the mountain slope and terminate on the lake. The water abounds in fish. Tristram enumerates twenty-two species, two of Blennidæ, seven of Chromidæ, one of Saluridæ, and twelve of Cyprinidæ. Some are called after biblical personages, viz., Chromis Andreæ, C. Simonis, and C. Magdalensæ. The best fish for the table of all now in the lake are the sheatfish (Clarias macracanthus) and the barbel (Barbus loupiceps). The sheatfish, called by Josephus Coracinus (War iii 10, 8), belongs to the same family as the American catfish, and attains is fresh. Its length from the entrance to the exit of the Jordan is 12½ miles; its greatest breadth, which is opposite to Magdala, is 7½ miles. Its eastern side is destitute of conspicuous indentations, while on the western side there is a swelling bay extending from Tell Hum on the north to Tiberias on the south. The depression of the surface of the lake below that of the Mediterranean is 682.5

a length of three feet. The most abundant fish is Chromis tiberiadis. Tristram saw them in shoals of over an acre in extent, so closely packed that it seemed impossible for them to move. Their dorsal fins, rising above the water, gave it at a distance an appearance as if a heavy shower were pattering on one spot of the glassy lake. The fish are taken in nets both from boats and from the shore.

Of course, the same kinds of fish are found in the Jordan and its tributaries also. For

Gall [remotely from Greek cholē, bile]

1 The bitter secretion of the liver, bile (Job xvi 13 xx 25). In Hebrew Mrerah and M'orah, as being fluid or bitter. The poison of asps was anciently believed to come from their bile (xx 14). Venomous, malignant feeling against what is good was called the gall of bitterness (Acts viii. 23).

2 A poisonous, bitter herb (Deut xxix. 18. xxxii. 32, 33; Ps lxxix 21), called in Hebrew Rosh, in Greek Cholē. It grew up spontaneously in the furrows of fields (Hos x 4, where the English versions translate it hemlock, though in all other passages they call it gall). It was associated in rhetorical language with wormwood (Deut xxix 18). A sore punishment was likened to a drink of gall water (Jer viii 14, ix 15, xxiii 15). A stupefying drink, made of wine mingled with gall, was mercifully offered to Jesus at the place of crucifixion (Mat xxvii 34). The characteristics do not well agree with hemlock, which is not bitter, nor with the poppy. They suit the colocynth, which, however, is called in the Bible the wild gourd.

Gal'ler-y.

A long room or corridor, or a partial story in a building (Ezek xli. 15, 16, xlii 3, 5). A different Hebrew word, rendered galleries in A V of Song vii 5, doubtless means tresses, as it is translated in R V.

Gal'ley,

A low flat-built vessel with one or more banks, i. e. rows of oars (Is. xxxiii 21; 2 Mac iv 20).

Gal'im [heaps]

1 A village near Gibeah of Saul and Anathoth (Is x 29, 30), apparently not a great distance from Bahurim (1 Sam xxv 44, 2 Sam in 13-16).

2 A town of Judah called Gallim, mentioned by the Septuagint in a group with Tekoa, Bethlehem, Etam, and especially in connection with towns southwest of Jerusalem (Josh. xv. between 59 and 60).

Gal'li-o.

Roman proconsul of Achaia at the time of Paul's first visit to Corinth. His original name was Marcus Annaeus Novatus; but he was adopted into the family of Lucius Junius Gallio, and took the name Junius Annaeus Gallio. He was the brother of the Roman philosopher Seneca, and, like him, was put to death by the emperor Nero. When the Jews, maddened by the success of Paul at Corinth, dragged him before the proconsul's tribunal, Gallio refused to take notice of religious questions, and summarily dismissed the case. He remained equally indifferent when the crowd took Sosthenes, the ruler of the synagogue, and beat him before the judgment seat (Acts xviii 12-17). See SOSTHENES.

Gal'lovs.

Haman had a gallows made fifty cubits high, on which to hang Mordecai (Esth v. 14, R V. margin, tree). Hanging by a rope about the throat was not a Persian method of punishment. Haman no doubt intended to impale Mordecai (cp. ii 23. Herod ii 159).

Ga-ma'li-el [God's reward].

1. Son of Pedahzur and head of the tribe of Manasseh in the wilderness (Num i 10; ii 20, vii 54, 59).

2. A member of the Jewish sanhedrin, of the Pharisee sect, and a doctor of the law, held in high reputation by the Jewish people. He advised against persecuting the apostles, on the ground that if their work were simply man's, it would eventually fail; while if it were from God, opposition to it was wicked and vain (Acts v 34-39). Gamaliel had Paul for one of his pupils in the law (xxii. 3). According to the Talmud, Gamaliel was the grandson of the celebrated rabbi Hillel. Its further statement that Gamaliel long presided over the sanhedrin is improbable, for at this time the presidency was held by the high priests. He died about A. D. 50.

Games.

In the N. T. there are numerous allusions, more or less clear, to the games of ancient Greece. The most important of these were four in number: the Olympic games, at Olympia, in the district of Elis, in the Peloponnesus; the Pythian games, at Delphi, in Phocis; the Nemean games, at Argos, in Argolis, in the Peloponnesus; and the Isthmian games, on the isthmus of Corinth. The contests carried on were chariot, horse, and foot racing, quoiting, boxing, wrestling, hurling the spear. The intending competitors went through a long course of severe training. Immense multitudes were spectators of their skill, and though the direct rewards of the victors were but slight, the honor given to them by their fellow citizens and countrymen was beyond measure great. Similar games were introduced into Judæa by hellenizing Jews in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, and were fostered by Herod the Great (1 Mac. i 10, 14; Antiq. xv 8, 1), see GYMNASIUM. As the Isthmian games were held in the vicinity of

Grecian Games of Pulling and Wrestling

Corinth, and the other three at no great distance, it is natural for Paul's two epistles to the Corinthians to contain metaphors or comparisons borrowed from the games. In 1 Cor. ix. 24-27 there is allusion to the training of a competitor in the games, to running, and to fighting, the object in view being to gain a prize. There are scattered allusions of a similar kind through other epistles (Gal. ii. 2, v 7, Phil. ii 16, in 14, 2 Tim. ii 5). In Hebrews there is a notable passage (xii 1, 2). The vast multitude of men and women who have borne testimony to their faith in God is likened to the immense concourse of spectators at a foot race. The competitor lays aside every weight to make himself lighter, and the long, flowing garment, which else would beset him and perhaps throw him down. He requires patience to go forward perseveringly, but obtains it by looking at the umpire seated at the end of the course, ready to confer the prize if it be fairly won. Every one of these details had a distinct spiritual reference, which would come home with great power to every reader of the epistle who had seen any of the Grecian games.

Gam'ma-dim, in A V improperly Gammadims [valorous men].

Brave people who manned the towers of Tyre (Ezek. xxxvii 11, A V and E R V).

Ga'mul [recompensed]

A descendant of Aaron whose family in David's reign was made the twenty-second course of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 17).

Gar'den.

The first garden or park mentioned in Scripture was that of Eden, which God caused to grow for man in his state of innocence (Gen. ii. 8-iii. 24; Ezek. xxviii. 13; xxxi. 8, 9). Gardens were watered by the foot in Egypt (Deut. xi. 10) with water raised from the Nile by sweep and bucket, or by wheel from wells, and poured into the irrigation ditch. By opening or closing this furrow by the foot the water was led to the spot desired. Irrigation was practiced in Palestine also (Ecc. ii. 6; Is lviii 11; Jer xxxi 12). Herbs were cultivated in gardens (1 Kin. xxi. 2); so also were lilies and other flowers (Song v. 1; vi. 2), and fruit trees (Jer. xxix 5, 28; Amos ix 14). The garden of Gethsemane seems, from its name, to have been an olive grove, and to have had a press in it wherewith to express the oil from the fruit. There was a royal garden at Jerusalem (2 Kin. xxv. 4), another at Etam near Bethlehem (Antiq. viii. 7, 3; cp Song vi 11; Ecc ii 5), another in the palace at Shushan (Esth. i. 5). To protect gardens against depredators they were enclosed with a wall or hedge (Song iv 12; Is v 2, 5), and occasionally a lodge was placed within them, attended by a watcher (Is i 8). In the seclusion and coolness of gardens people walked (Hist. of Susanna i 7), sometimes bathed (15), spread repasts (Esth i 5), engaged in devotion (Mat xxvi 36), practiced idolatrous rites (Is. i 29; lxxv 3; lxxvi 17; cp 2 Kin xvi 4), and occasionally buried their dead (John xix. 41).

Ga'reb [rough, scabby]

1. An Ithrite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam xxii 38; 1 Chron xi 40).

2. A hill near Jerusalem on the west (Jer. xxi 39; cp 38, 40). Exact situation unknown.

Gar'lic.

A bulbous plant resembling the onion, and in Hebrew called from its odor Shom. It was much eaten in Egypt (Herod ii 125), and the Israelites when there used it for food (Num xi 5). It is Allium sativum, of the same genus as the onion, but with more taste and scent than that esculent. It is a native of central Asia, is grown largely in the Mediterranean region, and is eaten by the common people as a relish to their bread.

Gar'ment. See CLOTHING

Gar'mite [pertaining to Gerem, or bony].

An appellation of probably the father of Keilah (1 Chron. iv. 19).

Gar'ner.

A place for storing grain, a granary (Ps. cxliv. 13; Joel i 17; Mat. iii. 12).

Gar'nish.

To adorn, to decorate with ornamental additions (2 Chron iii 6; Job xxvi 13; Mat. xii. 44; xxiii. 29; Luke xi. 25; Rev. xxi. 19).

Gar'ri-son.

A military post; a body of troops stationed in a fort (1 Sam xiv. 1, 15; 2 Sam xxiii 14-16; 2 Cor. xi. 32). A different Hebrew word from that used in the foregoing passages from the O. T. is also rendered garrison by the Vulgate and English versions in 1 Sam x 5; xiii. 3. But this word certainly means a pillar in Gen. xix. 26, and an officer stationed at a place in 1 Kin. iv. 19. What does it mean in 1 Sam. x. 5; xiii 3? There is no authority for rendering it by garrison except that that meaning yields good sense in these and some other passages. The author of the Books of Samuel, however, uses a different word for garrison. Pillar is suitable in the first of these passages. If this is the true meaning, then the Philistines had erected memorial columns in the land of Israel as monuments of their victory or dominion, such as the Hebrews set up at Mizpah (1 Sam vii 12). It was quite customary for conquerors to erect memorials in the conquered country. Egyptian and Assyrian kings carved records of their conquests on the cliff at the Nahr el-Kelb near Beirut, which were never effaced, not even when the Phoenicians regained their independence, but exist to this day. Driver believes that the word means pillar in xiii 3 also, and cites Amos ix 1 in proof that Jonathan could be said to have smitten a pillar. But as the word means officer in 1 Kin. iv. 19, as this attested meaning yields good sense, not only in 1 Sam x 5 and xiii 3, but also in 2 Sam viii 6, 14, and as a different word is evidently used to denote a garrison, it is better to believe that the author of the double Book of Samuel always uses it in the sense of officer. The smiting of a Philistine officer by Jonathan was an act of rebellion and a just cause of war. It was so regarded by the Philistines. His overthrow of a pillar would have been a mere act of wanton violence, unless there was a body of Philistines posted in its vicinity to protect it from desecration, and it was not customary to guard such monuments.

Gash'mu. See GESHEM.

Ga'tam [puny]

A descendant of Eliphaz (Gen xxxvi 11, 1 Chron i 36), and chief of a tribe of the sons of Esau (Gen xxxvi 16).

Gate.

In walled cities or palaces a gate was essential for the egress and ingress of the inhabitants, and for defense against the entrance of an enemy. It was often protected by a strong tower (2 Chron xxvi 9), indeed the gateway frequently led through the tower. There were bars to place across the gates, and render them stronger against assault (Deut. iii. 5, 1 Kin. iv. 13; 2 Chron viii 5; xiv 7). The gate was a place of public concourse where business was carried on (1 Kin. xxii 10; 2 Kin vii. 1; Ezek. xi. 1); legal transactions conducted and witnessed (Gen xxiii. 10, 18; Ruth iv. 1-11); cases tried and judgment pronounced (Deut. xxi 19, xxii 15, xxv. 7-9; Job xxxi 21; Amos v. 15). There were gates in the enclosures connected with the mansions of the aristocracy (Luke xvi. 20), where love of magnificence and display found expression (Prov xvii. 19).

Gath [wine press].

One of the five great Philistine cities (Josh xiii. 3; Judg iii. 3, 1 Sam vi. 17; vii. 14; xvi. 52). It was noted as the residence of a remnant of the Anakim, men of great stature (Josh. xi. 22; cp Num xiii 33; Deut. ii 10, 11). To this race, Goliath and the other gigantic warriors probably belonged (1 Sam. xvii. 4, 2 Sam xxi 15-22; 1 Chron. xx 4-8). The town was captured by David (1 Chron. xviii 1). During Solomon's reign, it had a king of its own who was probably subject to the king at Jerusalem (1 Kin ii. 39, 42). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron xi 8), but soon again reverted to the Philistines. It was captured by Hazael (2 Kin xii. 17). Uzziah broke down its wall (2 Chron xxvi 6); and henceforth it drops out of history. Micah, indeed, names it, but he uses an ancient form of speech (i 10, cp 2 Sam i 20). When afterwards the Philistine cities are mentioned, Gath is missing (Jer xxv. 20. Zeph ii 4, Zech ix. 5), and it is not referred to in Maccabees, nor by Josephus, when he relates events subsequent to the year 750 B C. Numerous theories have been offered as to its site. It has been located—1 Near the sea, at Yebnah (so the Crusaders). 2 In or on the border of the Shephelah, at Beit Jibrin or Dair Dubban, 4½ miles north of Beit Jibrin or Kefi Dikkerin, 4 miles to the northwest of Beit Jibrin; or, following the same highway 4 miles farther, at Tell es-Sifich on the vale of Elah, at the junction of the Shephelah with the maritime plain or Tell Zakariya, 5 miles east up the valley. All that is known is that Gath lay inland, on the borders of the Hebrew territory, and in a sense between Ashdod and Ekron, but apparently southwest of the latter town and nearer the mountains (1 Sam. v. 8, vii. 14, xvii. 52).

Gath-he'pher, in A V once through missapprehension Git-tah-he'pher [wine press of the well]

A town on the boundary line of Zebulun (Josh xix. 13). It was the birthplace of the prophet Jonah (2 Kin xiv 25). In Jerome's day it existed as a small village, 2 Roman miles east of Sepphoris. This location corresponds with the village of el-Meshhad or Meshhad, 3 miles northeast of Nazareth. Here one of Jonah's tombs exists, its chief rival being at the site of ancient Nineveh.

Gath-rim'mon [pomegranate press].

1. A town of the tribe of Dan (Josh xix 45), assigned to the Kohathite Levites (xxi 42; 1 Chron. vi. 69). Exact site unknown.

2. A town in Manasseh west of the Jordan, assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 25); probably an erroneous transcription of Ibleam or Bileam (q. v.).

Gauls. See GALATIA.

Ga'za, thrice Azzah in A. V. and once in R V (1 Chron. vii. 28), according as one or other Greek modification of the Hebrew word 'Izzah is imitated [strong]

1. The most southerly of the five Philistine cities (Josh xiii. 3; 1 Sam vi. 17; Jer. xxv. 20), and very ancient (Gen x 19; el-Amarna letters, 15th century B C). It stood on the main road, between Mesopotamia and Egypt, at the edge of the desert and at the junction of a trade route from southern Arabia. Assigned to Judah (Josh. xv 47), it was captured by the men of that tribe (Judg i 1b), but reverted to the Philistines (cp Judg. vi. 4). Samson carried off the doors of the city gate (Judg xvi 1-3). When his eyes were put out, it was in the prison house of Gaza that he had to grind (20, 21). The tutelary god of Gaza, as of Ashdod, was Dagon. The last act of Samson's life was to bow with his strength against the two middle pillars of the temple of Dagon and throw them from their place (23-31). Gaza was the limit of Solomon's dominion toward the southwest (1 Kin iv. 24). Hezekiah smote the Philistines as far as Gaza's gates (2 Kin xviii. 8). Pharaoh took the city (Jer. xlvii. 1), probably Pharaoh-necho or Pharaoh-hophra, i. e. Apries (Herod ii 159, 161). Judgment was denounced against it and the other Philistine cities by the prophets (Jer xxv. 20; xlvii 1, 5. Zeph. ii. 4. Zech. ix. 5). One sin specified was its sale of captured Hebrews to the Edomites (Amos i 6). It held out against Alexander the Great for five months, and when it fell its inhabitants were massacred. Jonathan Maccabees was shut out of Gaza, and burnt its suburbs, but he eventually made peace without storming the place (1 Mac xi 61, 62). It was afterwards captured by his brother Simon (xiii. 43-48; Antiq xiii 5, 5). About 96 B C, after a year's siege, it was devastated by Alexander Jannæus (Antiq xiii. 13, 3). In 62 B C Pompey placed it under the jurisdiction of Syria (xiv. 4, 4). Gabinius, the Roman governor of Syria, built it in 57 B C, probably on a new site, and the old town perhaps became known as Desert Gaza (xiv. 5, 3, Strabo xvi. 2, 30, cp. Acts viii 26). About A D 65 the Jews destroyed Gaza, but it rose again, and coins are extant belonging to it which were struck in honor of Titus and Hadrian. Later it became the seat of a Christian bishopric. In A D 634 it was taken by the Arabs and, except during the brief intervals when it was held by the Crusaders, has remained in Mohammedan hands. It is called Ghuzzeh by the Arabs; is about 2½ miles from the Mediterranean, from which it is separated by a waste of sand; and is situated on a low, round hill, about 50 or 60 feet above the plain, but extends from the hill across the plain to the east and north. On the north there are immense olive groves, the finest in Palestine; and the great staple of the city is soap, manufactured from the olive oil. Ghuz-zeh is not fortified; but there are indications of the course of the ancient walls, and ancient remains are found near the town. The population is estimated at 18,000.

2 A town of Ephraim (1 Chron vii 28, R V), possibly represented by 'Azzun, twelve miles west by south of Shechem.

Ga-za'ra. See GEZER

Ga'zath-ite. See GAZITE

Ga-zelle'.

A small antelope, called in Hebrew sebi. Where A. V. renders this word by roebuck, R V substitutes gazelle; and where A V. renders it by roe, R V. generally places gazelle on the margin. There is no doubt that the gazelle (Gazella dorcas) is intended. It was ceremonially clean (Deut xii 22, xiv 5), was hunted (Prov vi 5; Is xiii 14), and was swift-footed (2 Sam ii 18; 1 Chron xii 8). Its beauty and grace rendered it a term of endearing comparison (Song ii 9, 17, viii 14). It is about 3 feet 6 inches long by 1 foot 9 inches high. The horns are larger in the male than in the female, the limbs and whole form in both sexes graceful, the fur mostly fawn colored about the head, more fulvous on the other parts. It is found in Syria, Egypt, and Arabia, mostly in small groups or nearly solitary. It is timid, and flees from a pursuer rapidly and with great bounds. Tristram found a second species of gazelle (Gazella arabica), larger than the common one, east of the Jordan.

Ga'zer and Ga-ze'ra. See GEZER

Ga'zez [shearer]

A son and perhaps also a grandson of the elder Caleb (1 Chron ii 46).

Ga'zite, in A. V. once Gazathite.

A native or inhabitant of Gaza (Josh xiii. 3; Judg xvi 2).

Gaz'zam [devourer].

Founder of a family of Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 48).

Ge'ba, in A. V. three Gaba [a hill].

A city within the limits of Benjamin (Josh xviii. 24), which was allotted to the priests (xxi. 17). It must be distinguished from Gibeah of Saul (Is. x 29). Geba was the northern extreme of the kingdom of Judah (2 Kin xxiii 8; Zech xiv 10). A village, still bearing the old name, marks the site, 6 miles N N E of Jerusalem and 2 miles S. W of Michmash.

Ge'bal [mountain].

1 An ancient city on the Mediterranean Sea, 17 miles north of Beirut (Ezek xxvii 9; cp. Josh. xii 5; 1 Kin v. 18, R V). It was a great seat of the lascivious worship of Adonis.

2 The northern portion of the mountains of Edom (Antiq ii 1, 2; ix 9, 1, Ps lxxxiii. 7); known also as Teman.

Ge'ber [a man, a hero]

Solomon's purveyor for the territory of southern Gilead (1 Kin. iv 19), and probably father of the purveyor for northern Gilead and Argob (13).

Ge'bim [cisterns, locusts]

A village north of Jerusalem (Is. x 31). Exact site unknown.

Geck'o.

The rendering of the Hebrew 'anakah, a ceremonially unclean animal which the Hebrews classed with creeping things (Lev xi 30, R V). The gecko is a wall lizard. It has white spots on its back; and it emits a plaintive wail, whence the Hebrew name. The common gecko or fan-foot (Phryodactylus gecko) is very common in Palestine. It frequents houses, running over the walls and ceiling. It is able to do this by reason of the peculiar construction of its toes, which are provided with plates under which a vacuum is created when the animal walks, thus causing it to adhere.

Ged-a-li'ah [Jehovah is great]

1 A harper, son of Jeduthun (1 Chron xxv 3), and head of the second of the twenty-four companies of twelve musicians each which David appointed for the service of the sanctuary (9).

2 An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph i 1).

3 A son of Pashhur in Jeremiah's time (Jer xxxviii 1).

4 A man of Judah of high birth, son of Ahikam, son of Shaphan. He was appointed by Nebuchadnezzar governor of Judah after the capture of Jerusalem. He fixed his residence at Mizpah, where he was treacherously assassinated by Ishmael of the seed royal (2 Kin xxv 22-26, Jer xxxix. 14, xl 5-xli 18).

5 A priest whom Ezra induced to divorce his foreign wife (Ezra x. 18).

Ged'e-on. See GIDEON

Ge'der [a wall]

A town, apparently in the extreme south of Judah (Josh xii. 13). Exact site unknown. It may be the same as Beth-gader or Gedor 3.

Ge-de'rah [wall, enclosure, sheepfold]

1 A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh xv 36). Conder locates it at Jedireh, a ruin 4 miles and 4½ miles respectively to the northwest of Zorah and Eshtaol (33). See GEDEROTH.

2 A village of Benjamin (cp 1 Chron xii 4). Conder suggests Jedireh, a ruin about 6 miles north by west of Jerusalem.

Ge'der-ite.

A man of Geder or Gederah (1 Chron xxvii 28, cp Josh xv 36).

Ge-de'roth [enclosures, sheepfolds]

A town in or near the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 41). In Abaz' reign it was taken by the Philistines (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). Its site, or that of Gederah, is commonly fixed at Katrah, called in 1 Mac xv 39 Kidron in the maritime plain about 4 miles southwest by south of Ekron.

Ged'e-ro-tha'im [two enclosures, two sheep-folds]

A town within the territory of Judah (Josh xv. 36), otherwise unknown. The Septuagint regards it as a common noun, and translates it "its cattle-enclosures." It is in favor of this rendering that, while the towns are reckoned up as but fourteen, fifteen names are given, including this one. Still this word must not be summarily rejected.

Ged'or [wall, fortress, walled enclosure]

1 A son of Jehiel, and a brother of Ner, the ancestor of Saul (1 Chron viii 30, 31, ix 35-37).

2 A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh xv 58, 1 Chron iv 4, 18). Its site is marked by the ruins Jedur, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles N by W of Hebron.

3 A town, apparently in the territory of Simeon, not far from the southwestern boundary of Palestine (1 Chron iv 39), see GEDER. The Septuagint, however, reads Getai.

4 A village, apparently in Benjamin (1 Chron xii 7, cp 1).

Ge-har'a-shim. See CHARASHIM.

Ge-ha'zi [valley of vision]

Elisha's servant. He told the prophet of their hostess' desire for a son, but when the lad that was given her died and the mother cast herself at Elisha's feet, Gehazi would have thrust her away (2 Kin iv 14, 27). To teach that it is not magic, but faith and prayer which avail, Elisha sent Gehazi to lay the prophet's staff on the dead child. He did so, but without effect (29-37). When Naaman the Syrian followed the directions of Elisha, and was cured of leprosy, he wished to make the prophet a present. The man of God refused; but Gehazi, regretting that the Syrian had been spared, ran after him, and told him that Elisha asked a talent of silver and two changes of raiment for needy friends. As penalty for his avarice and lying, and for bringing the prophetic office into contempt, the leprosy of Naaman cleaved to him (2 Kin v 20-27). More sayings and doings of Elisha's servant are subsequently reported, but the person referred to was probably Gehazi's successor.

Ge-hen'na. See HELL 2.

Gel'i-loth [encles, regions]

Apparently the same place as Gilgal, opposite the ascent of Adummim (cp Josh xv. 7 and xviii 17).

Ge-mal'il [probably, possessor or rider of a camel]

Father of the spy Ammiel (Num viii 12).

Gem-a-ri'ah [Jehovah hath completed or perfected].

1 A son of Hilkiah. He was one of two messengers sent by Zedekiah to Nebuchadnezzar. Jeremiah took advantage of the opportunity to send by them a letter to the captives in Babylon (Jer xxxix 3).

2. A prince, son of Shaphan the scribe, and brother of Ahikam. He occupied a chamber in the temple. He joined in requesting Jehoiakim not to burn Jeremiah's writings (Jer. xxxvi 10, 11, 12, 25).

Gen-e-al'o-gy.

The tracing backward or forward of the line of ancestry of an individual or a family. The regulations of the commonwealth of Israel necessitated this being done to a large extent. Succession to the royal sovereignty, the high-priesthood, the headship of tribe, tribal family, and father's house, depended upon lineage. There was general knowledge on the subject from the earliest period. Genealogy was revealed of itself by reason of the constitution of tribes, which were divided on the lines of growth into great families, and these in turn into smaller families and so-called houses. Birth in a household declared one's relation to the several divisions of the tribe as distinctly as the native place determined one's classification according to the geographical divisions and subdivisions of a kingdom. Definite genealogical records are traceable from the beginning of the Hebrew nation (Num 1 2, 18, 1 Chron v. 7, 17). Claimants in the days of Ezra sought their register among those that were reckoned by genealogy, but could not find it, on which account they, as polluted, were expelled from the priesthood (Ezra ii. 61, 62. Neh vii 63, 64). The endless genealogies against which Timothy and Titus were warned seemed to have been Gnostic genealogies of æons and other imaginary beings (1 Tim 1 4, Tit 1 9).

Two genealogies of Christ are given; one by Matthew in the direct, and one by Luke in the reverse, order of descent (Mat 1 1-16 and Luke iii 23-38). Matthew's purpose is to show Christ's legal title to the throne of David and to the covenant with Abraham (Mat. 1 1). Luke begins with the second Adam, the eternally begotten Son of God, and ascends to the first Adam, the son of God by creation (Luke iii 38). Apparently to help the memory, either Matthew or the official record from which he quoted made $3 \times 14 = 42$ generations for the period between Abraham and Jesus; viz, fourteen generations between Abraham and David, fourteen between David and the Babylonian captivity, and fourteen more between the Babylonian captivity and Jesus Christ. To carry out this artificial division Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah are omitted between Joram and Uzziah in the second fourteen. There may be similar omissions in the last fourteen. In Luke there are forty-one names in the line of descent from David to Jesus against twenty-eight, or, with the omitted three, thirty-one in Matthew. If the Shealtiel and Zerubbabel of Matthew are the same as those of Luke, as can scarcely be questioned, the difficulty arises that in Matthew Shealtiel is the son of Jechoniah, but in Luke the son of Neri; indeed, the two line of descent from David to Jesus are different.

in the two evangelists. They diverge from David; one line passes through Solomon and the other through his brother Nathan. Putting both in the direct order of descent, they stand thus:

From Matthew's genealogy.	From Luke's genealogy.
David	David
Solomon	Nathan Mattatha.
Rehoboam	Menna
Abijah	Mela
Asa	Ehakim
	Jonam
Jehoshaphat.	Joseph.
Joram.	Judas
	Symeon.

Achim	Nahum
	Amos
Ehud	Mattathias
	Joseph
Eleazar	Jannai
Matthan	Melchi
Jacob	Levi
Joseph, the husband of Mary	Matthat
	Heli
	Joseph, the husband of Mary

Two explanations of these divergent genealogies are possible.

I The early church generally explained both tables as recording the genealogy of Joseph. Julius Africanus (A. D 220), the first known investigator of the question, adopted the theory that Joseph's grandfathers in the two genealogies, Melchi [Africanus has a corrupt text] and Matthan, had married successively the same woman, and that consequently Heli and Jacob were half-brothers, having the same mother but different fathers. Heli married and died childless; and Jacob, according to the law of Levirate marriage (Deut. xxv. 6), took the widow to wife, and raised up seed to his brother Heli by begetting a son Joseph. Hence Matthew can say, "Matthan begat Jacob, and Jacob begat Joseph," and Luke can say, "Joseph the son of Heli, the son of Matthat"

A readier solution of the problem on the lines of this theory is that the table in Matthew contains the legal successors to the throne of David, while that in Luke gives the paternal ancestors of Joseph. The line of Solomon became extinct in Jechoniah, otherwise known as Jehoiachin; and the succession passed over to the collateral line of David which sprang from David's son Nathan. The representative of this line was Shealtiel. For a brief space the royal line and the natural lineage of Joseph were identical, but after Zerubbabel the two lines separated. The family of the elder son, in whom the title to the throne inhered, at length became extinct, and the descendants of the younger son succeeded to the title Matthat of this line (by some identified with Matthan) became heir apparent. He is supposed to have had two sons, Jacob and Heli. The elder Jacob had no son, but probably a daughter, the Virgin Mary. The younger Heli had a son Joseph; and Joseph, since his uncle Jacob had no male descendant, became heir to his uncle and to the throne. Broad genealogical terminology enables Matthew to say "Jacob begat Joseph," and Luke to say "Joseph, the son of Heli."

II Since the Reformation a different conception of the two genealogies has won favor, and is probably correct. According to this opinion, the table in Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph, and exhibits him as heir to the throne of David, while the table in Luke gives the genealogy of Mary, and shows Jesus to be the actual son of David. With the clear declaration of Luke that Jesus had no human father, with the customary Hebrew usage of the word son for descendant however remote, and on the basis of the approved Greek text, the advocates of this view render Luke iii. 23, "Jesus, being son (as was supposed of Joseph) of Heli, etc." Jesus, according to Luke, is grandson of Heli, Mary's father, and thus a lineal descendant of David. A difficulty, not however peculiar to this theory, but lying equally against the first-mentioned hypothesis, is Matthew's record that Shealtiel was begotten by king Jechoniah, whereas Luke makes Shealtiel the son of Neri. Perhaps the simplest solution is the following. Jechoniah, who spent years in captivity, appears to have been the surviving nominal king of Judah in the year 562, twenty-five years after the fall of Jerusalem (2 Kin. xxv. 27). He apparently had no sons when carried off captive in 598 B. C. He was comparatively young, and children are not mentioned in the enumeration of his family (2 Kin. xxiv. 8, 12, 15). Jeremiah prophesied that no son of his should occupy the throne (Jer. xxii. 30, cp what is said of his father, xxxvi. 30). In the genealogy as given in Mat. i appears the entry, "After the carrying away to Babylon, Jechoniah begat Shealtiel." All Scripture references are in harmony, and the two genealogies are intelligible, if this notice in Matthew be understood as a broad declaration in genealogical form denoting legal succession to the throne. The title passed from Jechoniah on his death to Shealtiel, a lineal descendant of David. There may of course have been close kinship between Jechoniah and Shealtiel. If Jechoniah had no son surviving him, but only a daughter, the inheritance passed to her children according to the law (Num. xxvii 8-11). The phraseology of the genealogies is therefore explained on the assumption that Neri married the daughter of Jechoniah and begat Shealtiel by her. Shealtiel's lineage was reckoned as usual through his father back to Nathan and David, but his title to the throne was reckoned through his maternal grandfather Jechoniah to Solomon and David.

In 1 Chron iii 17 is the record "The sons of Jechoniah; Assir [not to be rendered "the captive," for the definite article is not used], Shealtiel his son, and Malchiram, etc." The epithet "his son" is peculiar to Shealtiel, peculiar also in that it is deemed necessary to apply it to one of a group already designated as sons of Jechoniah. It marks Shealtiel as the king's successor. He could be called his son, if his daughter's son, just as Abiezer, son of the sister of Gilead, son of Manasseh, is reckoned among the sons of Manasseh, and apparently even among the sons of Gilead (1 Chron vii 14, 18; Num xxvi 30).

Hebrew genealogical tables are apt to differ in the principles of construction from modern registers of pedigree. 1 Symmetry is often preferred to the exhibition of the unbroken descent from father to son. Hence links were freely omitted, and the enumeration was otherwise left incomplete. Ten in the genealogy from Adam to Noah, and ten from Shem to Abraham. Seventy sons of Noah's sons, and seventy souls of the house of Jacob (Gen xlii 27, see further EGYPT III 1). 2 The genealogy may be tribal, rather than personal, and son may denote the inhabitants of a country (Gen x 2-4, 6, 7, 22), a people or tribe (4, 13, 16-18, the words ending in "im" being gentile adjectives in the plural), a town (15), rarely an individual (8-10). Similar phenomena are found elsewhere (Gen. xxv 2-4, 1 Chron ii 50-55; see SOX). 3 The words bear and beget and father are used with a corresponding breadth of meaning; as bear or beget a grandchild (Gen xlii. 12 with 15, 18, 25), or great-grandchild (12, and probably 21, 22), or grandchild's grandchild (Mat i. 9), or country (Gen xxv. 2, 3).

Gen-er-a'tion.

1 A begetting or producing, or the person or thing produced (Gen. ii. 4; v. 1); in Hebrew only plural Tol'doth.

2 Each succession of persons from a common ancestor (Gen i. 23; Ex xx. 5; Deut. xxiii. 2); in Hebrew expressed by a modification of the proper numeral or by Doi with an ordinal number.

3 The age or period of a body of contemporaries, not in the modern sense of the average lifetime of all who survive infancy, but the average period of the activity of any body of contemporaries as determined by the normal span of life. The generation lasts as long as any of the members survive (Ex i 6, Num xxxii. 13; Judg ii 10, Ecc. i 4), in Hebrew Dor.

Gen'e-sis [Greek genesis, origin (of the world)]

The name, borrowed from the Septuagint, of the first O T book, called by the Hebrews from its initial word B'reshith, "In the beginning." It naturally divides itself into three sections: first, the history of the universe, showing God's relation to it, and introducing human history (i-ii 3); second, a sketch of human history before Abraham, showing God's relation to the human race, and introducing the history of the chosen people (ii 4-xi 26), and third, the history of the covenant people down to the descent into Egypt (xi 27-1). The second section includes the creation of man and his original condition (ii 4-25), the fall (iii), the progress of sin (iv 1-15), the worldly race (16-24), the godly line (25-v 32), the increase of wickedness (vi 1-8), the flood (vi 9-ix 17), the re-peopling of the earth (ix 18-x 32), the building of the tower of Babel (xi 1-9), and the Semitic race in its earliest germs (xi 10-26). The third section includes the early history of Abraham, his call, and his sojourn in Canaan (xi 27-xxv 10), the life of Isaac from his father's death to the departure of Jacob for Mesopotamia (xxv 11-xxvii 40), the life of Jacob from his departure for Mesopotamia to the death of Isaac (xxvii 41-xxxv 29), the descendants of Esau (xxxvi), the early history of Joseph to the time when he was sold into Egypt (xxxvii), Judah's sin and shame (xxxviii), Joseph in Egypt (xxxix-xlv), Jacob and his whole household with Joseph in Egypt (xlvi-xlix), and the death of Jacob and Joseph (l).

The writer of the book has embraced his narrative after the introduction in ten successive sections, each under a caption beginning with the formula, "These are the generations of" (ii 4; v 1; vi 9; x 1; xi 10; xi 27, xxv 12, 19, xxxvi 1; xxxvii 2). For unity and authorship, see PENTATEUCH.

Gen-nes'a-ret; in A V. of 1 Mac. Gennesar, in R V of same Gennesareth [perhaps, garden of Hazer]

A land adjacent to the lake of Gennesaret, on its western shore (Mat xiv 34; Mark vi. 53); described by Josephus as a fertile plain, 30 stades in length by 20 in breadth, watered by a fountain called Capharnaum, and producing walnuts, palms, fig trees, olives, and grapes (War iii 10, 8). It is almost certainly identical with the plain called el-Ghuweir, formed by a recession of the hills from the shore just north of Magdala.

The lake of Gennesaret (Luke v. 1; Antiq. v 1, 22; xviii 2, 1 and 3) or Gennesar (War. ii 20, 6), or the water of Gennesareth or Plain of Gennesaret, viewed from the Northeast.

Gennesar (1 Mac xi 67, Antiq xiii 5, 7), was a common name for the sea of Galilee.

Gentiles.

All nations of the world other than the Jews (Is. xlix 6, Rom ii. 14; iii 29). The Jews were the chosen people of God; their religion was sublime, and its truth stood in strong and favorable contrast to the untruths of the gentile religions, and strict laws were enacted to prevent the corruption of manners and of the true religion through contact with idolaters. These things led the Jews, though unjustly, to feel contempt for the gentiles. The Israelites had been chosen for a purpose. They were to be a light to the gentiles (Is. xlix 1-6). The gentiles were embraced in the promises (Is. ii 2-4; Amos ix. 12; Zech ix. 7). The attitude of the Jews recalls that of the Indian Brahmins, who will not eat with their countrymen of inferior caste, and much less with those of no caste at all, or with strangers of another nation. When Peter, taught by the vision at Joppa, broke through caste restriction, visiting and eating with the gentile Cornelius, it gave offense to even Christian Jews (Acts x 28; xi 3); and when Paul, speaking from the steps of the castle of Antiochia, declared that God had commissioned him to preach to the gentiles, the audience of Jews in the temple court cried out for his death (xxii. 21, 22). The early churches consisted largely of gentiles, and the first Council of Jerusalem declined to impose on the former the burden of the Mosaic law (xy. 1-29).

Ge-nu'bath [theft, robbery]

The son of the Edomite prince Hadad and the Egyptian queen's sister (1 Kin xi. 20).

Ge'rah [a gram]

1. A son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin (Gen xlii 21; 1 Chron viii 3)

2. Another descendant of Bela, perhaps remoter than son (1 Chron viii 3, and probably 7)

3. A Benjamite, father of Ehud (Judg iii 15)

4. A Benjamite, father of that Shimei who cursed David (2 Sam xvi 5)

Perhaps 3 and 4 denote the founder of the family to which Ehud and Shimei belonged, and are identical with the grandson of Benjamin Ge'rah. See WEIGHTS.

Ge'rar [water pot or a course or dry]

An ancient city on the southern border of Palestine near Gaza (Gen x. 19, 2 Chron xiv. 13), and early occupied by Philistines (Gen xxvi. 1). The country subject to it extended toward Kadesh and Shur (xx. 1, 9 with xxvi. 6, 17, 18). It is commonly identified with the ruins Ummi Jerrar, 6 miles south of Gaza on the wady Ghuzzeh. A location about 50 miles south, in the immediate vicinity of Kadesh, has been less plausibly urged, namely, the wady Jerur, a branch of the wady el-Sheraif which drains into wady el-Arish. Possibly this indicates the considerable extent of the region dominated by Gerar.

EASTERN SLOPE OF GERIZIM AND EBAL

In the plain, at the foot of Mount Gerizim, the square walled enclosure about Jacob's well is distinctly seen in the center of the picture on the right of the road that runs north and south, Joseph's tomb may be discerned, and farther to the north, to the left of the road, lies the village of Askar on the slope of Mount Ilat

Ger-a-senes'.

The people of Gerasa (R. V. of Mark v. 1 and Luke viii. 26, 37, manuscripts vary between Gerasenes, Gadarenes, Gergesenes); Gerasa is probably still echoed by Kersa, the name of a ruin on the eastern shore of the sea of Galilee, opposite Magdala, 5 miles from the entrance of the Jordan into the lake. A short distance south of the site is the only place on this coast where the steep hills come down close to the water (viii. 32). The city of the Decapolis, known as Gersa, now Jerash, does not meet the conditions of the narrative, being 37 miles southeast of the sea of Galilee and 32 miles southeast of Gadara.

Ger-ge-senes'.

The people of Gergesa (Mat viii. 28, A V., but in R V. Gadarenes). The introduction of the name Gergesenes into the text is ascribed to Origen, who is said to have felt that Gadara was too far from the lake, and was told by people acquainted with the region that an old town named Gergesa existed, and near it was the declivity down which the swine rushed. The ruin Keisa is probably this old town. See GERASENES.

Ger'i-zim [plural of Geriz, Gerizites, cp. Girzite].

A steep rocky mountain forming the southern boundary of the valley in which Nablus, the ancient Shechem, lies, and facing the more elevated mount Ebal, on the northern side of the valley. Mount Gerizim rises 2849 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and 700 feet above the town. When the Israelites conquered central Palestine Joshua carried out the direction given to Moses, and placed half of the tribes in front of mount Gerizim to pronounce blessings, and the other half over against mount Ebal to pronounce curses (Deut. xi. 29; xxvii. 12, 13; Josh. viii. 33-35). Jotham, the son of Gideon, standing on mount Gerizim, proclaimed his parable to the men of Shechem (Judg. ix. 7). Josephus (Antiq. xi. 8, 2, 7) says that Manasseh, brother of Jaddua, the high priest in the time of Alexander the Great, had married the daughter of a foreigner, Sanballat. The elders at Jerusalem commanded him either to divorce her, or no longer to approach the altar. Manasseh thought of divorcing her, though she was still dear to him; but her father, Sanballat, deprecating this step, promised to build for his son-in-law, if he retained his wife, a rival temple to that of Jerusalem. He kept his word, erecting one on mount Gerizim. This was the origin of the Samaritan temple on that mountain, and must be dated before 330 B. C. If Sanballat was the Samaritan of that name who was an opponent of the Jews in the time of Nehemiah, about 445 B. C. (Neh. iv. 1; xiii. 28), and not an official sent by Darius Codomanus (Antiq. xi. 7, 2; xii. 5, 5), the temple was built considerably before 330, perhaps about 380 B. C. It was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, 129 B. C. The erection of the edifice made Gerizim the Samaritan sacred mountain. It was to it that the woman of Samaria and Jesus referred as "this mountain" (John iv. 20, 21; cp. Antiq. xii. 1); and Jacob's well, at which they were conversing, was at the foot of mount Gerizim. Gerizim, now called Jebel et-Tôr, is a high table-land stretching far toward the east and southeast of Nablus. From the days of Benjamin of Tudela, a Jewish rabbi who traveled in Palestine about A. D. 1160, on to recent times, the view was held that Gerizim, the mountain of blessings, was fertile, and Ebal, that of curses, barren. But with the exception of a small ravine coming down from Gerizim near Nablus, both mountains are equally barren. See illustration under SHECHEM.

Ger'shom [often interpreted as meaning "stranger there," but the vocalization and the variant form Gershon with its patronymic show that the Hebrews did not regard the word as having that meaning. It rather signifies "banishment." In Ex. ii. 22, the author, according to custom, plays upon the general sound].

1 Gershon, the son of Levi (1 Chron. vi. 16, 17, 20, 43, 62, 71). See GERSHON.

2 The elder son of Moses, born to him in Midian (Ex. ii. 22; xviii. 3). He gave rise to a father's house which was reckoned among the Levites, not among the priests (1 Chron. xxiii. 14-16).

3 A descendant of Phinehas the priest, and head of a father's house in that line in the time of Ezra (Ezra viii. 2).

Ger'shon [banishment]

A son of Levi, and founder of the Gershonite family (Gen. xlii. 11; Ex. vi. 16; Num. iii. 17). He is sometimes called Gershom, which is formed by a different affix, but has the same meaning. His two sons, Libni and Shimei, gave rise to two subdivisions of the greater tribal family (Ex. vi. 17; Num. iii. 18, 1 Chron. vi. 17).

Ger'shon-ites.

The children and descendants of Gershon, constituting one of the three great divisions of the Levitical body. In the wilderness they encamped on the western side of the tabernacle, and had charge of the tabernacle itself, the tent with its hangings, and those of the courtyard (Num. iii. 23-26, iv. 21-28). To aid them in moving the tabernacle there were assigned them two wagons and four oxen (vii. 7). They consisted of two families, those of the Libnites and those of the Shimeites, and at the first census in the wilderness numbered 7500 males (iii. 21, 22). Of the thirteen cities assigned to them, two were in the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond the Jordan, four were in Issachar, four in Asher, and three in Naphtali (Josh. xxi. 27-33). They were reorganized by David (1 Chron. xxiii. 7-11).

Ge'ruth Chim'ham [the lodging-place of Chimham]

Probably a khan (Jer. xli. 17, R. V.). See CHIMHAM

Ger'zites. See GIRZITE.

Ge'shan, in A. V. Gesham, an error which crept into the later editions, the original of 1611 having Geshan

A man of Judah, a son of Jahdai (1 Chron. ii. 47).

Ge'shem and Gashmu, the latter being the Arabic form, of which Geshem is the regular Hebrew modification [rain, body]

An Arabian, a great opponent of the Jews after their return from captivity. He ridiculed the proposal of Nehemiah to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem, as if this were tantamount to rebellion (Neh. ii. 19). Not succeeding in deterring the Jew by this means, he joined with others in plotting violence, if not even actual murder, against him. Failing in this purpose also, he allowed the report to be circulated far and wide on his authority that Nehemiah was fortifying the city preparatory to rebelling against Persia and proclaiming himself king (vi. 1 seq.)

Gesh'u-rites, in A. V. twice Geshuri, the Hebrew instead of the English term being employed.

1. The people of Geshur (Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5; xiii. 11, 13)

2. A people who dwelt in ancient times in the country south of Philistia in the direction of Egypt (Josh. xiii. 2. 1 Sam. xxvii. 8)

Ge'ther.

A family of the Aramæans (Gen. x. 23; 1 Chron. i. 17). Their locality has not been determined.

Geth-sem'a-ne [an oil press]

A garden, presumably of olives and furnished with a press to squeeze oil from the fruit. It was east of Jerusalem, a little beyond the brook Kidron, and at or near the foot of the mount of Olives (Mat. xxvi. 30 with 36; Mark xiv. 26 with 32, John xviii. 1). It was a favorite spot with our Lord, who often resorted to it for retirement (Luke xxii. 39; John xviii. 2), and it is now forever sacred as having been the scene of his agony and of his betrayal and arrest (Mat. xxvi. 36-56, Mark xiv. 32-52, Luke xxii. 39-53, John xviii. 1-12). The traditional site of

The Traditional Garden of Gethsemane.

Ge'shur [a bridge]

A district lying between Hermon and Bashan and marching on Argob (Deut. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5; xiii. 11, 13; 1 Chron. ii. 23). Evidently it was situated to the eastward of Maacah, for Maacah bordered on Naphtali. It constituted an Aramæan kingdom (2 Sam. xiii. 37; xv. 8). Here David obtained a wife, and hither his son Absalom fled after the murder of Amnon (2 Sam. iii. 3, xiii. 37).

Gethsemane lies a little east of the bridge by which the road from St. Stephen's gate of Jerusalem crosses the Kidron. The garden is situated at the angle made by the division of the road into two branches, one, the most northerly, leading directly up the face of the mount of Olives, while the more southerly one winds gently around the southern brow of the hill. The garden is nearly square, and the Latins have recently enclosed it with a wall, its northern side 150 feet and its western one 160 feet. Eight venerable olive trees are within, on which it is said the tax levy can be traced back to the occupation of Jerusalem by the Arabs in the seventh century, and many equally old are outside on the slope of the mount. These trees, however, did not witness our Lord's agony, for all the trees around Jerusalem were cut down during the siege of the city by Titus (War v 12, 4). Robinson thinks that the spot is the same as that described by Eusebius as at the mount of Olives, and afterwards more definitely by Jerome as at the foot of the mount; but he is doubtful if it is the genuine Gethsemane. Thomson regards the position as too near the city, and too close to the great thoroughfare eastward to have served as a place for retirement on that dangerous and dismal night. He believes Gethsemane to have been in a secluded vale several hundred yards northeast of the traditional site. Barclay thinks it evident that the present enclosure, from its narrow dimensions, can occupy only in part the site of the ancient garden, and finds a better position higher up in the valley. The Greeks have recently enclosed an adjacent piece of ground to the east, on the slope of the mountain, as being the garden.

Ge-u'el [majesty of God].

The spy who represented the tribe of Gad in the exploration of Canaan (Num. xiii. 15).

Ge'zer, in A. V. twice Gazer [a place cut off]. In A. V. of 1 Mac. the Greek forms Gazera and Gazara are used.

An ancient Canaanite town (el-Amarna letters, 15th century B. C.), not far from Lachish and the lower Bethhoron (Josh. x. 33). It was on the boundary line of Ephraim (xvi. 3; cp. 1 Chron. vii. 28), and with its suburbs was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh. xxi. 21; 1 Chron. vi. 67). The Ephraimites failed to expel the Canaanite inhabitants, and occupied the city with them at least for a time (Josh. xvi. 10; Judg. i. 29). More than one battle in David's reign was fought at or near Gezer (2 Sam. v. 25; 1 Chron. xiv. 16; xx. 4). One of the Pharaohs captured Gezer from the Canaanites, who seem again to have possessed it in every part. After burning it, he gave the ruins over to Solomon as a dowry with his daughter when she was married to the Hebrew king. The city was at once rebuilt. It was an important place in the wars of the Maccabees. Bacchides strengthened its fortifications (1 Mac. ix. 52). It was besieged and taken by Simon, and made stronger than before (xiii. 43, R. V. 48, 53; xiv. 34). M. Clermont Ganneau identified the site by inscriptions; one of which, perhaps as old as the Herods, marked the limits of Gezer, and gave in Hebrew letters the actual name. It is now called Tell Jezar and is situated about 18 miles west-northwest of Jerusalem, and 5½ east of Ekron.

Gez'rite. See GIRZITE.

Gi'ah [breaking forth, as of a spring]

A village somewhere between Gibeon in Benjamin and the ford of the Jordan near the Jabbok (2 Sam. ii. 24, cp. 16, 29).

Gi'ant.

A man of abnormally tall stature; like Og, king of Bashan, whose bedstead or sarcophagus was nine cubits long by four broad (Deut. iii. 11), Goliath of Gath, whose height was six cubits and a span (1 Sam. xvii. 4), and the man whom Benaiah slew, whose height was five cubits (1 Chron. xi. 23). A stalwart race of men like the Anakim and other early nations of Canaan and the country east of the Jordan (Deut. i. 28; ii. 10, 11, 20, 21; ix. 2). When Hebron was captured by the Hebrews, the Anakim who escaped destruction took refuge in the Philistine towns. Goliath of Gath, Ishbi-benob, and other huge Philistines were probably of this expelled race of the Anakim (1 Sam. xvii. 4; 2 Sam. xxi. 15-22). The valley of the Rephaim or giants near Jerusalem was a perpetual reminder, by its name, of the early stalwart race which long inhabited it (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 16). The exact meaning of ne'philim, the word rendered giants in Gen. vi. 4; Num. xiii. 33, A. V., is uncertain, and accordingly it is left untranslated in R. V. It may refer to largeness of stature or fierceness of disposition or debased character or illegitimacy of birth. In the latter passage the word describes the Anakim. In the former passage the Nephilim, as the name is transliterated in R. V., are described as mighty men, men of renown. The description is the same as that given of David's most noted warriors (1 Chron. xi. 10, 24).

Gib'bar [mighty man, hero].

A man whose children, or a place of whose former inhabitants some descendants, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 20). In the parallel passage in Neh. vii. 25 Gibeon stands in place of Gibbar.

Gib'be-thon [perhaps, conical height].

A town of Dan (Josh. xix. 44) assigned to the Levites of the family of Kohath (xxi. 20-23). The Philistines gained possession of it. Nadab was assassinated there while laying siege to the place (1 Kin. xv. 27). Omri before he ascended the throne also besieged the town (xvi. 15, 17).

Gib'e-a [a hill].

Probably a village (1 Chron. ii. 49); cp. GIBEAH I.

Gib'e-ah [a hill].

1. A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 57); probably south or southeast of Hebron. Jeb'ah (Jeb'a), on an isolated hill eight miles west by south from Bethlehem, lies outside the group included in verses 55-57.

2. A town of Benjamin near Ramah (Judg. xix. 13, 14); called also Geba, the masculine form of the same name (xx. 10, R. V. margin, with 4). It is designated Gibeah of Benjamin (ibid ; cp 1 Sam xiii 2), and Gibeah of the children of Benjamin (2 Sam xxiii 29); and appears to be identical with Gibeah of Saul (1 Sam. xi 4; 2 Sam xxi 6; Is. x 29). Its inhabitants by their misbehavior brought down punishment, not merely on themselves, but on the whole tribe of Benjamin (Judg. xix., xx). Gibeah was Saul's place of residence when he was called to be king (1 Sam. x. 26), and it remained his home and served as the political capital of his kingdom (xv. 34; xxii 6. xxiii. 19). It existed in the days of Isaiah and of Hosea (Is x 29, distinguished from Geba; Hos ix 9, x 9). The town was situated on the highway from Jerusalem to the north, about midway between Jerusalem and Ramah (Judg xix 13; Antiq. v. 2, 8, cp. viii 12, 3; War v. 2, 1). It is commonly identified with Tell el-Fûl, 2½ miles north of Jerusalem, although no ancient remains have been discovered except the ruins of a watch-tower.

3. A hill or town in the hill country of Ephraim, belonging to Phinehas; where Eleazar the high priest, the son of Aaron, was buried (Josh xxiv 33, Antiq v 1, 29). Perhaps Jibia with ancient ruins, 8½ miles God, 4 miles northwest by north of Ramah, has been proposed. The determination depends largely upon the identification of Rachel's sepulcher and Zuph (cp. ver. 2-5 with xiii. 3).

Gib'e-ath [a hill].

A town of Benjamin, mentioned in immediate connection with Jerusalem (Josh. xviii. 28). The name is a mere variant of Gibeah.

Gib'e-ath-ite.

A native or inhabitant of Gibeah (1 Chron. xii. 3).

Gib'e-on [pertaining to a hill].

The chief city of the Hivites, a people of Canaan (Josh. xi. 19), included in the general designation Amorite (2 Sam. xxi. 2). They possessed also Chephurah, Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim (Josh ix 17). They obtained a treaty with Joshua by false pretenses. The deceit was discovered and they were made slaves of the Israelites (ix 1-27). But the treaty was respected, the Gibeonites were aided against their enemies (x); and several centuries later, when Saul violated its provisions by a massacre of Gibeonites, the sense of justice was satisfied by the execution of seven of Saul's sons (2 Sam xxi 1-9).

Gibeon

west-southwest of Scilun (Shiloh), and 3½ miles east by south of Tibneh (Timnath). The tradition of the Samaritans, which locates the grave at 'Awertah, 4½ miles south of Shechem, is late.

4. Gibeah or hill of God (1 Sam. x. 5). Probably essentially the same as Gibeah of Saul, for it appears to have been Saul's home (ii. 14). For the reason of the name, see ver. 5. Its identity with Ram Allah, height of Gibeon was within the territory assigned to the Benjamites (Josh. xviii. 25); and was given, with its suburbs, to the family of Aaron (xxi. 17). Saul's ancestors dwelt for a time in the town, and were men of influence (1 Chron. viii. 29; ix. 35). In the contest between Ish-bosheth and David, a battle took place here (2 Sam. ii. 8-17, 24; iii 30). Here David gained a victory over the Philistines (1 Chron. xiv. 16; in 2 Sam v. 25 Geba). In its vicinity Joab murdered Amasa (2 Sam. xx. 8). There also, in David's reign and in the early part of Solomon's reign, before the temple was built, stood the tabernacle and the brazen altar; and there Solomon sacrificed and in a dream received a message from God (1 Kin. iii. 4-15; 1 Chron. xvi. 39, 40; xxi. 29; 2 Chron. i. 3, 6, 13). Gibeonites returned from the exile (Neh. vi. 25), and aided in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 7). According to Josephus, Gibeon was 40 or 50 stadia (about 4½ to 6 miles) from Jerusalem (Antiq. vii. 11, 7; War ii. 19, 1). Its site is found at the modern village of el-Jib, 5½ miles northwest by north of Jerusalem. An oblong or oval hill stands in the midst of a basin consisting of broad valleys in a high state of cultivation. The hill is steep of ascent, being composed of horizontal layers of limestone rock that form great steps from the plain upward. The village is built on a broad summit at the northern end. The houses number forty or fifty, and are almost all, in whole or in part, ancient.

Southeast of the village, and quite a distance down the hill, is a fine fountain of water, which flows into a subterranean reservoir artificially cut. Not far from it, among olive trees, is an open reservoir 59 feet long by 36 feet broad, it was doubtless intended to receive the superfluous waters of the cavern. On the west is a tank, 11 by 7 feet in size, cut in the rock, and called el-Bukeh, the pool. In the plain a little lake, 6 to 8 acres in extent, is formed during the winter. One or other of these was doubtless the pool or great waters of Gibeon (2 Sam. ii. 13; Jer. xli. 12).

The wilderness of Gibeon was perhaps simply the uncultivated plateau between Gibeon and Ramah. If a desert is meant, it was at considerable distance east from the city (2 Sam. ii. 24).

Gib'e-on-ites.

The inhabitants of Gibeon or of that city with its three dependent towns (2 Sam. xxi. 1-4, 9).

Gib'ites, in R. V. Gebalites.

The people of the town and kingdom of Gebal (Josh. xiii. 5; 1 Kin. v. 18; in text of A. V. stonesquarers).

Gid-dal'ti [I have magnified]

A singer, a son of Heman (1 Chron. xxv. 4), and head of the twenty-second of the twenty-four companies of twelve musicians each which were appointed in David's reign for the service of the sanctuary (29).

Gid'del [he hath magnified].

1. Head of a family of Nethinim (Ezra ii. 47; Neh. vii. 49).

2. Head of a family of Solomon's servants (Ezra ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58).

Gid'e-on, in A. V. of N. T. Gedeon in imitation of the Greek pronunciation [a cutting off, a hewing down].

A son of Joash, family of Abiezer, tribe of Manasseh, who dwelt at Ophrah (Judg. vi. 11). He was divinely summoned to deliver the Israelites from the tyranny of the Midianites, who had invaded and seized Palestine. As he was threshing wheat in the wine press at Ophrah, to hide it from the Midianites, an angel saluted him, and commissioned him to undertake the deliverance of his people. The first step was directed against his father's altar of Baal, which he threw down. The idolatrous worshippers demanded his death; but his father Joash called on his opponents to hand over the pleading for Baal to Baal himself. If he was a god, of course this was within his power. The multitude were pacified, and Gideon received a second name, Jerubbaal, "Let Baal plead," and, as Baal was regarded as abominable, Jerubbeseth, "Let the shameful thing plead" (2 Sam. xi. 21; cp. Ish-bosheth). Having summoned the men of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali (Judg. vi. 35), he yet hesitated until his call had been confirmed by the miracle of the fleece (36-40). Going forward to the battle with his followers intentionally reduced to 300, that the glory of the victory might be not with man but with Jehovah, he made a night attack on the Midianite camp, which was pitched in the valley of Jezreel (33), by the hill of Moreh (vii. 1). In the confusion thus produced the Midianite soldiers slaughtered each other. Then inducing the Ephraimites to seize the fords of Jordan, who inflicted fresh losses on the fugitives as they attempted to cross, he himself, with the tribesmen of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali (vii. 23), pursued the enemy across the Jordan to the confines of the desert. In this flight Oreb and Zeeb, Zebah and Zalmunna were captured and slain. This victory was the celebrated day of Midian (Is. ix. 4; x. 26; Ps. lxxxiii. 11). Having delivered the northern Israelites from the foreign yoke, he pacified the Ephraimites, who were angry because he had slighted them, as they supposed, in the war. A movement now set in to make him king, but he refused the crown offered him for himself and his descendants, and returned home (Judg. viii. 22, 29). Unwisely, however, he had the earrings of the Midianites made into an ephod. If it was patterned after the ephod of the high priest, it was costly, for it was wrought with gold thread and bore precious stones set in gold. Gideon put it in his own city, where the angel of the Lord had appeared unto him, where he had erected an altar, and where he had been divinely authorized to offer a sacrifice (vi. 21-28; cp. Ex. xx. 24, 25). These high privileges had led him to consider the priestly office open to him, and he made the official ephod, and probably the Urim and Thummim, in order to use them to inquire of the Lord; and the thing became a snare to Gideon and his family and a means of seduction to Israel (Judg. viii. 24-25).

27). He had many wives, and seventy sons, besides a son Abimelech, a concubine's child, who made himself king on the death of his father Gideon died in a good old age (vii. 19; Heb. xi. 32).

Gid-e-o'ni [a cutting off].

Father of the prince of the tribe of Benjamin in the time of Moses (Num. i. 11).

Gi'dom [a cutting off].

A village apparently in Benjamin, between Gibeah and the rock of Rimmon (Judg. xx. 45).

Gier' Ea'gle.

1. The rendering in the A. V. of the Hebrew Raham, so named from its affection for its young. In R. V. the word is translated vulture, which is the meaning of gier. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi. 18, Deut. xiv. 17). Undoubtedly the Egyptian vulture, Pharaoh's hen or chicken (Neophron percnopterus), is meant, which the Arabs still call rahām. Its general color is white, but the primary feathers of the wings are black. The young are brown. The length of the adult is a little over two feet. It ranges in summer from the south of France, by southern Europe and northern Africa, to the west of India, where it is replaced by a closely allied species. The Egyptian vulture is a funereal-looking bird, generally seen acting as a scavenger in Eastern cities, camps, and outside hospitals. It is common in Palestine during its northern migration, and breeds in that country.

2. The rendering in the R. V. of the Hebrew Peres (Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12). See OSSI-FRAGE.

Gifts.

Gifts were given by fathers to sons (Gen. xxv. 6), or as dowry to daughters on their marriage (xxxiv. 12), or by people present by invitation at a wedding (Ps. xlv. 12). They were bestowed upon fellow men out of good will (Esth. ix. 22) or to secure favor (Prov. xviii. 16). It was forbidden to offer them to judges for the purpose of bribery (Ex. xxiii. 8; Deut. xvi. 19; Prov. xxix. 4). Monarchs bestowed them as a reward for service (Dan. ii. 48), or as a gracious favor to cause public rejoicings (Esth. ii. 18). They were brought by subjects as tribute (2 Sam. viii. 2, 6; 2 Chron. xxvi. 8; Ps. xlv. 12; lxxii. 10; Mat. ii. 11). Gifts were required for the expenses of religious worship (Mat. v. 23, 24; viii. 4; Luke xxi. 5). Essentially the same customs as to gifts still prevail throughout the East.

The gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ (John iv. 10; Rom. vi. 23). Christ received gifts for men (Eph. iv. 8). He not only opened up a way for them to God, and enables them to stand before the just and holy One, but he has obtained for them the gift of the Holy Ghost (John xiv. 16; xvi. 7; Acts ii. 38), and all the manifestations of the Spirit in the hearts and lives of believers, repentance (Acts v. 31), faith (Eph.

ii. 8), love (Rom. v. 5), joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness, temperance (Gal. v. 22). All Christian virtues are graces, that is gifts. God bestows various gifts upon men, qualifying them severally as he will for different forms of work in the kingdom (Rom. xii. 6; 1 Cor. vii. 7; xii. 4, 9; Eph. iv. 7-16). See MIRACLE, TONGUE.

Gi'hon [bursting forth, as a fountain or stream; a stream, river].

1. One of the four rivers of Paradise (Gen. ii. 13). See EDEN.

2. A spring in a valley outside the walls of Jerusalem from which the city obtained part of its water supply (2 Chron. xxxii. 30; xxxiii. 14; Antiq. vii. 14, 5). It was not in sight of the stone of Zohaleth, near En-rogel; but the sound of the trumpet and the noise of the shouting at Gihon were heard at En-rogel (1 Kin. i. 40-45). There was an upper and presumably a lower Gihon, as early as the time of Hezekiah at least (2 Chron. xxxii. 30). Upper Gihon is commonly identified with Birket Mamilla, and lower Gihon with Birket es-Sultan. The former of these pools is less than half a mile west, the latter not the third of a mile south, of the Jaffa gate. These pools, however, are not now fed by living springs. Largely on this account the question has been raised in recent years whether Gihon should not be identified with the fountain of the Virgin, on the eastern slope of Ophel, and distant some 400 yards from the pool of Siloam, with which it is connected by an ancient tunnel.

Gi'l'a-lai [perhaps weighty].

A Levite, a musician who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem when rebuilt under Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 36).

Gil-bo'a [a bubbling fountain].

The mountain on which Saul sustained defeat by the Philistines and met his death (1 Sam. xxviii. 4; xxxi. 1, 8; 2 Sam. i. 6, 21, xxi. 12, 1 Chron. x. 1, 8). It is the northeastern spur of mount Ephraim, and forms the watershed between the Kishon basin and the Jordan valley. The ridge lies west-north-west and east-southeast, being about 8 miles long and 3 to 5 miles in breadth; and is divided by ravines into several plateaus. The highest point, which is at Jebel Abu Madwar, is 1648 feet above sea level, and about 1200 feet higher than the plain of Esdraelon at its foot. The western slopes of the range are gradual, but those facing north are steep and rugged, with precipices in many places. The eastern slopes over the Jordan valley are also steep, in places precipitous, especially toward the south. On the table-lands and gentle western slopes pasture land is found, wheat and barley grow, and olives and figs are cultivated. The rest of the ridge is naked rock, or is covered with wild grass and brushwood. A village, Jelbon, preserves the memory of the name Gilboa.

Gil'e-ad, in A V of Maccabees Galaad [hard, rugged, rough]

1 The son of Machir and grandson of Manasseh. He founded a tribal family (Num. xxvi 29, 30, Josh. xvii. 1).

2 Father of Jephthah (Judg. xi 1).

3 A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 14).

4 The mountainous country east of the Jordan, extending from the table land of Moab northward to the Yarmuk at least (Deut. iii. 16, 17; 1 Sam. xxxi 11), and perhaps further, since the ruggedness of the land continues unchanged north of that river. It is divided by the Jabbok into two parts (Josh. xii 2). The southern half was assigned to the tribe of Gad, and the northern half was included in the territory of half Manasseh (Deut. iii 12, 13; Josh. xiii 24-31). The name is still connected with a mountain south of the Jabbok in its designation Jebel Jil'ad. The last interview between Laban and Jacob took place in mount Gilead (Gen. xxxi 21). It was a place well suited for cattle (1 Chron. v. 9, 10; Song iv), and the sight of Gilead and the land of Jazer (cp. 1 Chron. xxvi 31) suggested to the Reubenites and the Gadites, who had large flocks and herds, the expediency of applying to Moses for permission, which was conditionally granted them, of settling permanently on the eastern side of the Jordan (Num. xxxii 1-42, Josh. xii 8-11). Within the limits of Gilead grew the celebrated balm (Jer. vii 22, cp. Gen. xxxvii 25). In an extended sense the term Gilead includes the whole region east of the Jordan (Deut. xxxiv 1, Josh. xxii. 9; Judg. xx 1, 2 Sam. ii 9; 1 Mac. v. 17, 24-27, 36; Antiq. xii 8, 3; in ix 8, 1, Gilead and Bashan are distinguished).

5 A mountain abutting on the valley of Jezreel (Judg. vii 3; cp. ver. 1 and vi 33). While Gilead in this passage may be a misreading for Gilboa, it must be remembered that the spring which best corresponds in position with that at which Gideon's men drank, and the mountain from which it issues, and the river down which the discomfited Midianites fled, are called respectively the spring, mountain, and river Jalud, which is Arabic for Goliath. To spring, mountain, and river, are thus attached a name which possibly perpetuates Gilead in a corrupt form. There is perhaps better evidence than the present name. Gilead was part of Naphtali (2 Kin. xv. 29). It may be that Naphtali extended across the Jordan to the east, but it is quite possible that Gilead denoted a rugged district of Naphtali west of the Jordan; and if so, the correctness of the text of Judg. vii. 3 is confirmed.

6 A city in the region of Gilead (Hos. vi. 8, cp. xii. 11).

Gil'gal [act of rolling, wheel, a circle]

1. The first encampment of the Israelites after crossing the Jordan, and their headquarters during the conquest of Canaan (Josh.

iv. 19-24). The special association which they had with the name was the rolling away of their reproach by their circumcision after long neglect of the ordinance in the wilderness (Josh. v. 7-9). The camp was pitched between the Jordan and Jericho. On its site arose a town, which was on the northern border of Judah (xv. 7). There were quarries in its vicinity (Judg. iii. 19). These last two references are, however, believed by some authorities to indicate the existence of another Gilgal at the foot of the mountains. It is uncertain whether this town or another place of the name was on Samuel's circuit (1 Sam. vii 16), and where, it may be judged, Saul, the opposition to him having ceased, was made king and the kingdom renewed (xi 15). At any rate, it was at Gilgal in the Jordan valley where a muster of the people took place to form an army which should encounter the Philistines then oppressing the land, when Saul, finding it difficult to hold the people together until Samuel should come and offer sacrifice, himself offered burnt offerings (xiii. 4, 7, 8; cp. 12, 15). For his disobedience the forfeiture of his kingdom was announced to him (13, 14). There, too, Saul incurred a second rebuke for his disobedience in sparing Agag (xv 12, 21, 33 cp. 34). It was to Gilgal also that the representatives of the tribe of Judah went to welcome David back after the death of Absalom (2 Sam. xix 15, 40). Like other holy places, it became a focus of idolatry under the kings who succeeded Jeroboam, and it was in consequence denounced by the prophets (Hos. iv 15 ix 15, xii 11, Amos iv. 4 v. 5). It is probably the house of Gilgal or Bethgilgal mentioned after the captivity (Neh. xii. 29). Its site is Jiljühch, a ruin 2 miles east of Jericho.

2 A village from which Elijah and Elisha went down to Bethel (Deut. xi. 30; 2 Kin. i 1-4, iv 38 (?)). It was probably the present village of Jiljula, on the top of a high hill, 7 miles north by west of Bethel, though when the levels are taken, its site is actually lower than that of Bethel.

3 A town associated with Dor and Tirzah (Josh. xii 23), probably Jiljühch, a little north of the brook Kânah, and 5 miles north-east by north of Antipatris.

Gil'loh [exile].

A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv 51); enumerated with towns lying to the south of Hebron.

Gil'o-nite.

A native or inhabitant of Giloh, as Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 12; xxiii 34).

Gimel.

The third letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The Greek letter gamma, and consequently the English C have the same origin; but in the spelling of Hebrew and Greek names in the English versions, gimel and gamma (though not these letters only) are represented by G, their approximate equivalent in sound and a form fabricated out of C

Gimel stands at the head of the third section of Ps. cxix. in several versions, since each verse of the section begins with this letter in the original.

Gim'zo [abounding in sycamores]

A town with dependent villages situated in Judah. It was taken by the Philistines during the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron xxviii. 18). Robinson identified it with Jimzu, on an eminence about 3 miles east-southeast of Lydda.

Gin.

A noose or trap, laid on the ground, in which birds, beasts, and even men are caught (Job xviii 9; Amos iii 5). The two words Mokesh and Pah, of which it is the translation, are usually rendered by snare.

Gi'nath.

Father of Tibni (1 Kin xvi. 22)

Gin'ne-thoi, in A V Ginnetho [gardener]

A chief of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. xii. 4, 7). In the next generation, a father's house among the priests, which occupies the same position in the corresponding catalogue, bore the name Ginnethon (ver. 16). The difference is merely that between a jod and a final nun. Probably Ginnethon stood originally in ver. 4.

Gin'ne-thon [gardener]

1. A father's house among the priests in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 16), see GINNETHOI

2. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed a covenant to worship Jehovah (Neh. x. 6)

Gird'le. See CLOTHING and HIGH PRIEST

Gir'ga-shites, in A V. once Girgasites [perhaps, dwellers on clayey soil].

A tribe of Canaan (Gen. x. 15, 16; xv. 21; Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10; xxiv. 11; Neh. ix. 8). It is not known what part of the country they inhabited. They must not be confounded with the Gergesenes.

Gir'zite, in A V Gezrite; in margin Gizrites and Gerzites respectively, following a Hebrew tradition.

A people living south of the Philistine country and mentioned with the Amalekites and Geshurites (1 Sam. xxvii. 8).

Gish'pa, in A V Gispa [blandishment]

An overseer of the Nethinim in Nehemiah's time (Neh. xi. 21).

Git'tah-he'pher. See GATH-HEPHER.

Git'ta-im [two wine presses].

A village of Benjamin (Neh. xi. 31, 33), to which the Beerothites fled probably at the time of Saul's cruelty (2 Sam. iv. 3; cp. xxi. 1, 2). Exact site unknown.

Git'tite [of Gath]

A native or inhabitant of Gath (2 Sam. vi. 10, 11; xv. 18, 19, 22).

Git'tith [Gittite].

A musical term (Ps. viii, lxxxi, lxxxiv, titles). It is the feminine form of the Hebrew adjective for Gittite, and it denotes either a musical instrument in use in Gath, or a vintage song to the tune of which the psalm should be sung, or a march of the Gittite guard (2 Sam. xv. 18).

Gi'zo-nite.

The designation of Hashem, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 34), pointing either to his paternity or to his birthplace. But neither man nor place with a name like Gizoh is found in the Bible; and perhaps Gizonite is a corruption of Gunite (Septuagint, Lucian's text; cp. Num. xxvi. 48).

Giz'rite. See GIRZITE.

Glass.

1. A mirror (Ex. xxxviii. 8; Job xxxvii. 18, 1 Cor. xiii. 12, all A V); see MIRROR

2. The rendering of Hebrew Zkudith (Job xxviii. 17, R V, where A. V. has crystal) and of Greek Ualos and its adjective (Rev. iv. 6, xv. 2, xxi. 18, 21). It is probably real glass. Glass was known to the Greeks as early as the time of Herodotus, and to the Egyptians long before the exodus.

Glean'ing.

Gathering the grain which the reapers have failed to remove, or the grapes which remain after the vintage (Judg. viii. 2; Ruth ii. 2, 7, 9, 16; Is. xlvii. 6). For the benefit of the poor, the fatherless, the widow, and the stranger, the owner was instructed by the law not to glean his harvest field or vineyard, nor return for a forgotten sheaf, nor gather fallen fruit (Lev. xix. 9, 10; xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 19).

Glede [the glider]

The common kite (Deut. xiv. 13). The word is used to render the Hebrew Ra'ah; which, however, is a copyist's error for Da'ah, see DALETH. A later scribe seems to have written Dagynah on the margin as a correction, which afterwards crept into the text (for it is not mentioned in the corresponding list in Lev. xi.), and is rendered kite in R V, vulture in A V.

Gnat.

The rendering of the Greek Kônops, a small insect (Mat. xxiii. 24), abounding in marshes and vexatious by reason of its bite, from which the Egyptians protected themselves at night by sleeping under nets (Herod. ii. 95). It is evidently some species of Culex, a genus known by its hairy antennae, plumed in the males, its proboscis, its slender body, its two gauzy wings, its long legs, and its blood-sucking propensities. "To strain at" in the A V. is a misprint in the original edition of 1611 for "strain out." The earlier English versions have "out," and the R V. corrects the error of A V, and translates "to strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel." To anxiously strain out any small insect which has accidentally fallen into the water one is about to drink, but unconcernedly to swallow a camel, is to be particular about minute points of ceremony or of duty, while practicing gross violations of the moral law.

Goad.

A long pole sharpened at the point or iron-tipped, used to urge cattle forward (1 Sam xiii 21). With one Shamgar slew 600 Philistines (Judg iii 31). "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (Acts ix. 5, A V) is the metaphor of a recalcitrant animal injuring itself against the ox goad. The words of the wise are compared to goads (Eccles. xii 11).

Go'ah, in A. V. Goath [lowing].

A place near Jerusalem to the west or south (Jer. xxxi 39).

Goat.

The rendering of quite a number of Hebrew words in the Old Testament, and of more than one Greek word in the New. 'Attud, he goat, probably as leader of the flock; Taynsh, he goat, perhaps as butting; Saphur, he goat, as the leaper; 'Ez, she goat, also a goat without regard to sex; Sa'or, he goat, and S'irah, she goat, as shaggy; and the Greek words Tragos, he goat, 'Aiz, goat, as the springer, 'Euphos and 'Euphon, a young goat, kid. Goats were tended with the sheep by the same shepherd (Gen xxvii 9; xxx. 32), but in separate companies (Mat. xxv 32). Their hair was woven into cloth (Ex xxv 4; xxxv 26), the flesh and milk were used for food (Lev vii 23, Deut xiv. 4; Prov xxvii 27), and in extremity their hairy skin served as clothing (Heb. xi 37). They were an important item of a cattle owner's wealth (Gen xxx 33 43, xxxi 1; 1 Sam xxv 2; 2 Chron xvii 11). The goat was a sacrificial animal, used for burnt offering and sin offering (Gen xv 9; Ex. xii. 5; Lev i 10; iv 24; Num vii 17; xv 27; Ps. lxxi 15; Is i 11; Ezra vi 17; viii 35, Heb. ix 12). The domestic goat (Capra hircus) belongs to the great family of Bovidae, or hollow-horned ruminants. The closest affinity is believed to be to the sheep, and there is a series of connecting links between the two animals. One of the few points of difference is that in the goat the horns are simply curved backward. Their habits are different. In Palestine the sheep may be seen grazing the tender herbage and grass, while the goats browse tender twigs and leaves. Every flock of goats has its own stately leader (cp. Jer i. 8). The goat was very abundant in ancient Palestine, as was to be expected in a hilly and somewhat dry country. It is now more numerous than the sheep, and constitutes the chief wealth of the country. The ordinary goat of Syria is black in color, and has pendant ears a foot long hanging down below the recurved horns. It is Lanneus' Capra membrica. His Capra hircus, variety angorensis, the Mohair goat, is also occasionally bred in the north of Palestine.

Goat, Wild.

An animal, in Hebrew Ya'el, eminent. Its refuge is among the high hills (Ps. civ. 18) and rocks (Job xxxix 1), En-gedi being its special haunt in Palestine (1 Sam. xxiv. 2). It is a species of ibex (Capra bedon), called by the Arabs bedon. It is of a much lighter color than the European ibex. Its horns are more slender and recurved, wrinkled, and knotted on the front face only. It is found in Egypt, Arabia, Persia, Moab, and in the wilderness of Judaea near the Dead Sea. Tristram met with it twice at its favorite spot, En-gedi, and found its teeth fossil in cave breccia on Lebanon, where it does not now occur. Wild goat is also the rendering of the Hebrew 'Akko, perhaps meaning graceful neck (Deut xiv. 5). It may be the same species.

Go'ath. See GOAH.

Gob [small pit, cistern, or locust]

A place at which war was waged with the Philistines twice in the reign of David (2 Sam xxi 18, 19). Site unknown. The text is uncertain. In 1 Chron xx. 4 the seat of war is Gezer.

God.

The English word God is derived from a root meaning to call, and indicates simply the object of worship, one whom men call upon or invoke. The Greek word which it translates in the pages of the N T., however, describes this object of worship as Spirit; and the O T Hebrew word, which this word in turn represents, conveys, as its primary meaning, the idea of power. On Christian lips, therefore, the word God designates fundamentally the almighty Spirit who is worshipped and whose aid is invoked by men. This primary idea of God, in which is summed up what is known as theism, is the product of that general revelation which God makes of himself to all men, on the plane of nature. The truths involved in it are continually reiterated, enriched, and deepened in the Scriptures; but they are not so much revealed by them as presupposed at the foundation of the special revelation with which the Scriptures busy themselves—the great revelation of the grace of God to sinners. On the plane of nature men can learn only what God necessarily is, and what, by virtue of his essential attributes, he must do; a special communication from him is requisite to assure us what, in his infinite love, he will do for the recovery of sinners from their guilt and misery to the bliss of communion with him. And for the full revelation of this, his grace in the redemption of sinners, there was requisite an even more profound unveiling of the mode of his existence, by which he has been ultimately disclosed as including in the unity of his being a distinction of persons, by virtue of which it is the same God from whom, through whom, and by whom are all things, who is at once the Father who provides, the Son who accomplishes, and the Spirit who applies, redemption. Only in the uncovering of this supernal mystery of the Trinity is the revelation of what God is completed. That there is no hint of the Trinity in the general revelation made on the plane of nature is due to the fact that nature has nothing to say of redemption, in the process of which alone are the depths of the divine nature made known. That it is explicitly revealed only in the N T is due to the fact that not until the N T stage of revelation was reached was the redemption, which was being prepared throughout the whole O. T. economy, actually accomplished. That so ineffable a mystery was placed before the darkened mind of man at all is due to the necessities of the plan of redemption itself, which is rooted in the trinal distinction in the Godhead, and can be apprehended only on the basis of the Trinity in Unity.

The nature of God has been made known to men, therefore, in three stages, corresponding to the three planes of revelation, and we will naturally come to know him, first, as the infinite Spirit or the God of nature; then, as the Redeemer of sinners, or the God of grace; and lastly as the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or the Triune God.

1. God, the Infinite Spirit.—The conviction of the existence of God bears the marks of an intuitive truth in so far as it is the universal and unavoidable belief of men, and is given in the very same act with the idea of self, which is known at once as dependent and responsible and thus implies one on whom it depends and to whom it is responsible. This immediate perception of God is confirmed and the contents of the idea developed by a series of arguments known as the "theistic proofs." These are derived from the necessity we are under of believing in the real existence of the infinitely perfect Being, of a sufficient cause for the contingent universe, of an intelligent author of the order and of the manifold contrivances observable in nature, and of a lawgiver and judge for dependent moral beings, endowed with the sense of duty and an ineradicable feeling of responsibility, conscious of the moral contradictions of the world and craving a solution for them, and living under an intuitive perception of right which they do not see realized. The cogency of these proofs is currently recognized in the Scriptures, while they add to them the supernatural manifestations of God in a redemptive process, accompanied at every stage by miraculous attestation. From the theistic proofs, however, we learn not only that a God exists, but also necessarily, on the principle of a sufficient cause, very much of the nature of the God which they prove to exist. The idea is still further developed, on the principle of interpreting by the highest category within our reach, by our instinctive attribution to him, in an eminent degree, of all that is the source of dignity and excellence in ourselves. Thus we come to know God as a personal Spirit, infinite, eternal, and illimitable alike in his being and in the intelligence, sensibility, and will which belong to him as personal spirit. The attributes which are thus ascribed to him, including self-existence, independence, unity, uniqueness, unchangeableness, omnipresence, infinite knowledge and wisdom, infinite freedom and power, infinite truth, righteousness, holiness and goodness, are not only recognized but richly illustrated in Scripture, which thus puts the seal of its special revelation upon all the details of the natural idea of God.

2. God, the Redeemer of Sinners.—While reiterating the teaching of nature as to the existence and character of the personal Creator and Lord of all, the Scriptures lay their stress upon the grace or the undeserved love of God, as exhibited in his dealings with his sinful and wrath-deserving creatures. So little, however, is the consummate divine attribute of love advanced, in the scriptural revelation, at the expense of the other moral attributes of God, that it is thrown into prominence only upon a background of the strongest assertion and fullest manifestation of its companion attributes, especially of the divine righteousness and holiness, and is exhibited as acting only along with and in entire harmony with them. God is not represented in the Scriptures as forgiving sin because he really cares very little about sin, nor yet because he is so exclusively or predominatingly the God of love, that all other attributes shrink into desuetude in the presence of his illimitable benevolence. He is rather represented as moved to deliver sinful man from his guilt and pollution because he pities the creatures of his hand, immersed in sin, with an intensity which is born of the vehemence of his holy abhorrence of sin and his righteous determination to visit it with intolerable retribution, and by a mode which brings as complete satisfaction to his infinite justice and holiness as to his unbounded love itself. The biblical presentation of the God of grace includes thus the richest development of all his moral attributes, and the God of the Bible is consequently set forth, in the completeness of that idea, as above everything else the ethical God. And that is as much as to say that there is ascribed to him a moral sense so sensitive and true that it estimates with un-failing accuracy the exact moral character of every person or deed presented for its contemplation, and responds to it with the precisely appropriate degree of satisfaction or reprobation. The infinitude of his love is exhibited to us precisely in that while we were yet sinners he loved us, though with all the force of his infinite nature he reacted against our sin with illimitable abhorrence and indignation. The mystery of grace resides just in the impulse of a sin-hating God to show mercy to such guilty wretches, and the supreme revelation of God as the God of holy love is made in the disclosure of the mode of his procedure in redemption, by which alone he might remain just while justifying the ungodly. For in this procedure there was involved the mighty paradox of the infinitely just Judge himself becoming the sinner's substitute before his own law and the infinitely blessed God receiving in his own person the penalty of sin.

3 God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost — The elements of the plan of salvation are rooted in the mysterious nature of the Godhead, in which there coexists a trinal distinction of persons with absolute unity of essence; and the revelation of the Trinity was accordingly incidental to the execution of this plan of salvation, in which the Father sent the Son to be the propitiation for sin, and the Son, when he returned to the glory which he had with the Father before the world was, sent the Spirit to apply his redemption to men. The disclosure of this fundamental fact of the divine nature, therefore, lagged until the time had arrived for the actual working out of the long-promised redemption; and it was accomplished first of all in fact rather than in word, by the actual appearance of God the Son on earth and the subsequent manifestations of the Spirit, who was sent forth to act as his representative in his absence. At the very beginning of Christ's ministry the three persons are dramatically exhibited to our sight in the act of his baptism. And though there is no single passage in Scripture in which all the details of this great mystery are gathered up and expounded, there do not lack passages in which the three persons are brought together in a manner which exhibits at once their unity and distinctness. The most prominent of these are perhaps the formula of baptism in the trine name, put into the mouths of his followers by the resurrected Lord (Mat. xxviii 19), and the apostolic benediction in which a divine blessing is invoked from each person in turn (2 Cor. xiii. 14). The essential elements which enter into and together make up this great revelation of the Trine God are, however, most commonly separately insisted upon. The chief of these are the three constitutive facts: (1) that there is but one God (Deut. vi 4; Is. xlv 6; 1 Cor. viii. 4; James ii 19); (2) that the Father is God (Mat. xi 25; John vi. 27; viii. 41; Rom. xv 6; 1 Cor. viii. 6; Gal. i 1, 3, 4, Eph. iv. 6; vi 23; 1 Thes. i. 1; Jas. i. 27; iii 9; 1 Pet. i. 2; Jude 1); the Son is God (John i 1, 18; xx. 28; Acts xx. 28; Rom. ix. 5; Heb. i. 8; Col. ii. 9; Phil. ii 6; 2 Pet. i. 1); and the Spirit is God (Acts v 3, 4; 1 Cor. ii. 10, 11; Eph. ii. 22), and (3) that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are personally distinct from one another, distinguished by personal pronouns, able to send and be sent by one another, to love and honor each the other, and the like (John xv. 26; xvi 13, 14; xvii. 8, 18, 23; xvi. 14, xvii. 1). The doctrine of the Trinity is but the synthesis of these facts, and, adding nothing to them, simply recognizes in the unity of the Godhead such a Trinity of persons as is involved in the working out of the plan of redemption. In the prosecution of this work there is implicated a certain relative subordination in the modes of operation of the several persons, by which it is the Father that sends the Son and the Son who sends the Spirit; but the three persons are uniformly represented in Scripture as in their essential nature each alike God over all, blessed forever (Rom. ix 5); and we are therefore to conceive the subordination as rather economical, i. e. relative to the function of each in the work of redemption, than essential, i. e. involving a difference in nature.

B. B. W.

Gog.

1 A Reubenite (1 Chron. v 4).

2 The prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal (Ezek. xxxviii 2, R. V.), who is prophetically described as invading the land of Israel in the last times, and being defeated on the mountains with immense slaughter (Ezek. xxxviii, xxxix). He and his people and his allies serve the prophet as a type of heathenism contending against the kingdom of God. The name was probably borrowed from Gyges, the chief of a Lydian princely family called the Mermnadæ. He belonged to the royal body-guard, and was the confidant of the king. About 700 B. C. he murdered his sovereign, of the rival house of the Heraclidæ, and took possession of the throne of Lydia. He had great wealth, and made notable gifts to the temple of Apollo at Delphi. But he warred against the Greek cities in Asia Minor (Herod. i 7-14). In his old age his country was invaded by the Cimmerians. He defeated them in battle and captured several of their chiefs. But fearing renewed invasion, he sent presents to Ashurbanipal, the Assyrian king. For a long time no one could be found among the Assyrians who understood the Lydian language spoken by the ambassadors. At length a man was obtained who comprehended what they said, and the friendship of Gyges was accepted. In a short time, however, Gyges aided Egypt in its revolt against Assyria. In retaliation the Assyrian king stirred up the Cimmerians to a fresh invasion of Lydia, in which, about 682 B. C., Gyges was killed, leaving his son Ardys to ascend the throne. See GOMER, MAGOG.

3 A mystic personage, akin in character to the Gog of Ezekiel, to appear immediately before the close of the present dispensation (Rev. xx. 8-15).

Go'im. See TIDAL.

Go'lan [exile, emigration].

A city of Bashan, within the territory of the half-tribe of Manasseh east of the Jordan. It was assigned, with its suburbs, to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxi. 27; 1 Chron. vi 71), and was one of the cities of refuge (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8; xxi. 27). Alexander Jannæus sustained a severe defeat near this place, and on a later campaign demolished the town (War. i. 4, 4 and 8). The town gave name to the small province of Gaulanitis, or Gaulonitis, as the name was also pronounced (Antiq. viii 2, 3, various Greek texts). This region was situated between Hermon and the Yarmuk, and extended from the neighborhood of the Jordan eastward. The eastern border has not been determined. The district is divisible into a southern and more arable, and a northern and more rocky half. It was surveyed by Schumacher, who with other authorities considers that the site of the town was at Sahem ej-Jaulân, about 17 miles east of the sea of Galilee, where there are extensive ruins. Gaulonitis is now known as Jaulân. It is a table-land watered by streams from Hermon and by numerous springs, and with pastures which are among the richest in Syria; yet it lies desolate.

Gold.

A precious metal anciently obtained in Havilah (Gen. ii. 11, 12); Sheba (1 Kin. x. 2; Ps. lxxii. 15), and Ophir (1 Kin. xxi. 48; 2 Chron. viii. 18; Job xxii. 24, Ps. xlv. 9). It was lavishly used for overlaying the furniture of the tabernacle and the temple, and ornamenting the latter edifice itself (Ex. xxv. 18; 1 Kin. vi. 22, 28). It was made into idols (Ex. xx. 23; xxxii. 31; Ps. cxv. 4; Is. xl. 19; Acts xvii. 29), crowns (Ps. xxi. 3), chains (Gen. xli. 42), rings (Song v. 14), earrings (Judg. viii. 26). It was used for coinage at a comparatively early date (Ezra ii. 69, R. V.; cp. Acts iii. 6; xx. 33). It serves as a symbol for a thing of genuine worth and great value (Lam. iv. 2; Rev. iii. 18).

Gol'-go'-tha [Greek from Aramaic qulqalta', Hebrew qulgoleth, a skull]. See CALVARY.

Go-li'ath [exile, or an exile]

The giant from the Philistine city of Gath who was slain by David (1 Sam. xvii. 1-58; xxi. 9, 10; xxii. 10; cp. Josh. xi. 22; Num. xiii. 33); probably one of the Anakim. Perhaps another giant of Gath, besides the one slain by David, bore the name of Goliath (2 Sam. xxi. 19), just as two heroes of the time were called Elhanan; but see ELHANAN.

Go'mer, I [perfection].

Daughter of Diblaimi, and wife of Hosea the prophet (Hos. i. 3).

Go'mer, II.

A people descended from Japheth, and inhabiting the north (Gen. x. 2, 3; 1 Chron. i. 5, 6; Ezek. xxxviii. 6). They were probably the Cimmerians of classical history. They are mentioned by Homer as people of the far north (Odys. xi. 14). They came into Asia from the regions beyond the Caucasus (Herod. iv. 11, 12), settled in Cappadocia, and threatened the Assyrian empire, but were defeated by Esarhaddon. Turning westward, they overran part of Asia Minor, fighting more than one battle with Gyges, king of Lydia, whose name is probably preserved in the Scripture Gog. Him they killed. They were afterwards driven out of Asia (Lydia) by Alyattes (Herod. i. 16). They are generally considered to have been identical with the Cimbr of Roman times, and the Cymry of Wales. Cambria and even Cumberland still preserve the memory of their name.

Go-mor'-rah, in A. V. of N. T. Gomorrha [accumulation or, perhaps, submersion]

One of the cities of the plain (Gen. x. 19; xii. 10). Its king was defeated by Chedorlaomer (xiv. 2, 8, 10, 11). It was one of the cities destroyed on account of their wickedness by fire from heaven (Gen. xvi. 20; xix. 24-28; Deut. xxix. 23; Is. i. 9; xiii. 19; Jer. xxiii. 14; xlix. 18, Amos iv. 11; Zeph. ii. 9; Mat. x. 15). Conder points out that there is a great bluff called Tubk 'Amriyeh, and near it a wady called Wady 'Amriyeh, whose stream falls into the northwestern part of the Dead Sea, about 9 miles in a direct line from the entrance of the Jordan. The consonants are the same as in Gomorrah and the modern name may perhaps echo the ancient name.

For the vine of the fields of Gomorrah (Deut. xxxiii. 32), see VINE.

Go'pher Wood.

The wood of which the ark was made (Gen. vi. 14). Gesenius suggested that the Hebrew gopher is an altered form of kopher, pitch, and refers to trees of the pine family, and specially, perhaps, to the cypress, the three first consonants of the Greek kuparissos being nearly those of the word gopher.

Gor'-gi-as.

A Syrian general under Antiochus IV. In 166 B. C. he led a detachment of troops from Emmaus, in the Philistine plain, where the main army was encamped, to make a night attack on Judas Maccabæus, but Judas, having learned of the plan, withdrew his forces and led them to a successful attack on Gorgias' own camp. When Gorgias returned, his followers saw their camp in flames and fled (1 Mac. iii. 38-iv. 25). A little more than a year later Gorgias was commanding at Jamnia, and he met and defeated Joseph and Azarias, who in the absence of Judas had charge of the troops in Judæa, and were advancing to attack the town (v. 55-62).

Gor-ty'na.

An important city in the southern part of Crete (1 Mac. xv. 23).

Go'shen.

1 A district of Egypt, adapted for flocks and herds, situated in the delta, a few miles to the northeast of On. It belonged to the nome called Arabia (Gen. xli. 34, Septuagint), and formed part of the land of Ramses (xli. 28; xlvii. 11, 27, Septuagint). Thither

Joseph went up in his chariot to meet his father who was coming from Canaan (xlvii 28, 29). The Hebrews were allowed to settle there (xlvii 6), and the mass of the people were still there at the time of their oppression (Ex vii 22; ix. 6).

2 A region in the south of Judah. (Josh. x 41, xi 16). Exact situation unknown

3 A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh xv 51) Exact site unknown.

Gos'pel.

The English word gospel is derived from the Anglo-Saxon gōdspel, which meant good tidings. This etymology is found in the Ormulum, Introduction, line 157. Later it became gōdspel, which meant God-story, i. e. the story about God, i. e. Christ. The word, as now used, describes both the message which Christianity announces and the books in which the story of Christ's life and teaching is contained. A similar transition in meaning was experienced by the Greek word euangelion (whence the Latin evangelium and our evangel) which gospel was and is used to translate. In the N. T. it never means a book, but the message which Christ and his apostles announced. It is called the gospel of God (Rom i 1; 1 Thes ii. 2, 9; 1 Tim. i 11); the gospel of Christ (Mark i. 1; Rom i. 16, xv 19, 1 Cor. ix. 12, 18; Gal i 7); the gospel of the grace of God (Acts xx. 24); the gospel of peace (Eph. vi 15); the gospel of your salvation (Eph. i 13); and the glorious gospel (2 Cor iv 4). It was preached by our Lord (Mat iv 23, xi 5, Mark i 14; Luke iv 18; vii. 22), by the apostles (Acts xvi. 10; Rom i 15; ii 16; 1 Cor. ix 16, etc.), and by evangelists (Acts vii 25). But in the post-apostolic age the term was also applied to the writings in which the apostolic testimony to Jesus was contained. Each one of them was called a gospel and the four together were called the gospel. Our present English usage, therefore, exactly corresponds with that of the early Christians of the age immediately succeeding the apostolic.

The Four Gospels.—Historical evidence shows that our four gospels have been attributed from the earliest times to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, respectively, and that from the very beginning of the post-apostolic age they were received by the church as authoritative documents and as containing the apostolic testimony to the life and teachings of Christ. In the second century they were quoted, commented upon, and described; so that there need be no doubt of their authenticity. An examination of the N. T. epistles also shows that our gospels describe Jesus as the same kind of person, doing the same kind of works, and having the same history to which the epistles allude. They may, therefore, be confidently accepted as trustworthy reports. The first three have much in common and, in general, present the life of the Lord from the same point of view. They are called the synoptic gospels (from the Greek synopsis, a seeing together), and in particular are quite different from John's. The synoptics take for their chief theme Christ's ministry in Galilee; the Fourth Gospel gives prominence to his labors in Judea; though his betrayal, arrest, trial, crucifixion, and resurrection are so important that they are narrated by all. The only prior incident recorded by all the evangelists is the feeding of the five thousand. The synoptics also say comparatively little of the divinity of Christ, while John especially records the Lord's self-testimony to it. They present mainly Christ's teaching about the kingdom of God, his parables, his instruction of the common people; while John records his teaching about himself and thus usually in the form of extended discourses. At the same time the Fourth Gospel assumes and implies the other three, and they in turn are often made intelligible only by the facts which John records. Thus John i 15 implies the fact recorded in Mat iii 11, etc.; John iii 24 the fact given in Mat iv 12; John vi 2, 15, the whole synoptic story of the Galilean ministry, etc. So in turn Christ's reception in Galilee and the willingness of Peter, Andrew, James, and John to leave all and follow him are only explicable by such events as are recorded in John i and ii; and the sudden rise of the Sabbath controversy in the synoptics (see Mark ii 23, etc.) is likewise to be explained by the events of John v. Moreover, while the synoptics have the same general point of view, each of them has its individual characteristics, determined by the writer's purpose and the readers whom he had in mind. Matthew, writing from the Jewish point of view, sets Jesus forth as the royal Messiah. He constantly cites in proof O. T. prophecies, and is interested to give Christ's teaching concerning the true kingdom of God in contrast to the false views of current Judaism. Mark, writing evidently for gentiles, and possibly for the Romans in particular, represents mainly Christ's power to save as shown in his miracles. Luke, long the companion of Paul, sets the Lord forth as the gracious Saviour, and is fond of exhibiting his favor to the fallen, the outcast, and the poor. So John has his special purpose, which is to represent Jesus as the incarnate, divine Word, revealing the Father to those who would receive him. None of the gospels, however, aims at being a complete biography of our Lord. They are collections of his acts and words, made for the purpose of practical and doctrinal instruction. The student must construct his conception of the history of Jesus out of the materials furnished by the gospels. They themselves were prepared with other objects in view.

The question has often been asked from what sources the four evangelists derived their information. Matthew and John were apostles and therefore possessed personal knowledge of the events they record or were in a position to obtain it from those who had it. But Mark also was a companion of Paul and Peter, and is said, by very early tradition, to have embodied in his Gospel the preaching of Peter about Jesus. Luke himself assures us (i. 1-4) that his knowledge was obtained from "eyewitnesses . . . of the word" and that he had made himself well acquainted with the facts. Thus the gospels give us the testimony of the apostles. The many coincidences of language in the synoptics confirm this. If any itinerant speaker or preacher, such as a foreign missionary home on furlough, relates at different places incidents of his experience abroad, he gradually settles into a fixed narrative through his very desire to be accurate, repeating the same stories in the same form, though now and then adding particulars which he had omitted elsewhere. It is probable that the apostles and early evangelists acted in much the same way, so that their recital became largely stereotyped. After a while parts of this narrative were put into writing for use in the newly founded churches. Thus a gospel narrative became current which, while doubtless differing in extent in different places, had much of its matter, even to the very words in common. The verbal coincidences, therefore, of our synoptic gospels attest that they give us the common apostolic testimony to Jesus. The Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, contains material which at first was not so widely called for, but which John finally wrote, out of his own knowledge, when the needs of the church seemed to demand it. The coincidences between the synoptics have raised, however, the further question whether any of them have directly copied from the others. This question is often called the synoptic problem. The facts which enter into its solution are very many and complex. While the three have much in common, Matthew and Luke have much that is not in Mark, and each of them has much that is not in the others. Even Mark has some material peculiar to himself. Moreover, even in the sections which are in common the language of one evangelist often differs as remarkably as in other points it agrees with that of his colleagues. In the ancient church it was thought that Mark abbreviated Matthew and Luke. Many modern writers think, on the other hand, that Matthew and Luke drew from Mark his historical narrative [making its language fundamental to their own account, arranging its material to conform to their own purposes in writing, and adding matter from other sources oral and written. And it is quite customary to combine with this explanation the theory that a collection of the sayings of Jesus, written possibly by the apostle Matthew, early existed, from which also the two evangelists Matthew and Luke drew. (J. D. D.)] But it seems to be more probable that all three were independent, but used largely the language of the gospel narrative which had become current; while at the same time they felt free also to use their own words because they were conscious of being fully acquainted with the facts. In attempting to trace the literary history of the synoptics we should not forget also the promise made by Christ to the apostles, and meant doubtless for others who might be employed in the proclamation of the gospel, "But the Comforter, even the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you" (John xiv 26, R. V.).

To obtain a clear idea of the life of Christ it is necessary to construct a harmony of the gospels. This, of course, should be done with fidelity to the chronological indications, few though they are, which the gospels contain. But it should also be remembered that the indications of time and relation are not only few, but also often doubtful, and that, therefore, a harmony must be regarded in many points as merely approximate. Matthew's method is mainly topical, and, therefore, he seldom provides a basis for a harmony. Mark appears to be much more chronological, and his order may generally be followed; but there is much that he does not give at all. Luke follows in the first half of his work nearly the order of Mark, though with important differences, and he, too, is often topical in his method. But John's Gospel by noting successive feasts which Jesus attended provides the general framework into which the other material should be fitted. It is on this basis that the following outline and harmony have been prepared. We believe that the feast of John v. 1 was a passover, that therefore Christ's ministry included four passovers (John ii 13, v 1, vi 4; xiii 1), at the last of which he died. The ministry was thus about three years and a quarter in length, since John i shows that Christ was baptized a few months before his first passover. Others however, denying that John v. 1 was a passover, make the ministry two and a quarter years in length. On this, as on many similar points, absolute demonstration is impossible. In the following table, moreover, the dates assigned to some of the events must likewise be regarded as open to question. It appears clear to most students that Herod the Great died about April 1, 4 B. C. If so, Christ was probably born in December, 5 B. C., or January, 4 B. C. We assume the date to be December 25, 5 B. C., without, however, meaning to affirm that there is any evidence for the exact day of the month. If then, when he was baptized, he was about thirty (Luke iii. 23), his baptism is probably to be assigned to the latter part of A. D. 26 or the beginning of A. D. 27. We assume for it January A. D. 27. If his ministry included four passovers, he died at the passover of A. D. 30. Many complex calculations tend to confirm these dates, though they are not capable of perfect demonstration. Our view assumes that "the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar" (Luke iii 1) is to be dated from the time when Tiberius became co-regent with Augustus in the empire (A D. 11-12). At that time he became in the provinces the practical ruler. It is well known that our common Christian calendar dates the birth of Christ too late. The following harmony nearly agrees with Robinson's, but some changes in his arrangement have been introduced.

Gourd.

The rendering of the Hebrew Kikayon in Jonah iv 6, 7, 9, 10, the margin of the R V. substituting Palma Christi. The plant so designated grew up in a night, sheltering the prophet Jonah from the fierce heat of the Ninevite sun; but its decay was as rapid as its growth. The Septuagint translates the Hebrew word by the Greek kolokunthē, meaning the pumpkin (Cucurbita pepo), which may be considered the type of the gourd family (Cucurbitaceæ). A native of Astrakhan, along the northwestern coast of the Caspian Sea, it may well have been introduced into the Ninevite region before the time of Jonah. It is in favor of the identification that it is a plant of rapid growth. But the Hebrew kikayon is very like the Græco-Egyptian kiki, which means the castor-oil plant (Ricinus communis). This is sometimes called Palma Christi (Christ's palm). It is not, however, a palm, but a euphorbiaceous plant, like the little milky weeds called spuries. It is a native of India, but was cultivated in southern Asia and Egypt (Herod. ii. 94). It attains a height of from 8 to 10 feet, growing to a considerable height in a few days. The stem is purplish-red and covered with a pearl-like bloom, the leaves are peltate and palmate, the flowers are in racemes, the seed vessel has three two-valved cells, each one-seeded. If this was the plant which shaded Jonah, its rapid growth was miraculous.

Gourd, Wild.

The rendering of the Hebrew word Pakku'oth, splitters, bursters (2 Kin. iv. 39). It is the fruit of a wild vine growing in Palestine, which flourishes when other vegetation is dead or dying through excessive drought. A son of the prophets gathered a lapful of the fruit near Jericho, and put them into a pot to be cooked, but the moment the pottage of which they constituted the chief ingredient was put to the mouth the taste betrayed that there was death in the pot, in other words, that the fruits gathered were poisonous (38-41). The plant was pretty clearly one or other of two species of the gourd order, the colocynth, or the squirting cucumber, probably the former. The colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis) is a prostrate gourd-like plant with tendrils, growing in southern Spain, in northern, eastern, and southern Africa, in Arabia, India, etc. In Palestine it is wild on the maritime plain and in the Jordan valley, in the latter of which places the prophet found his wild gourd or wild vine. It may be seen of a lovely emerald green when all vegetation near has withered under the fiery hot wind of summer. If the traveler pluck the smooth gourd-like fruits and cut them across with his penknife, he will find that they both look and smell like the cucumber. If then he put them to his lips, he will feel as if he had touched fire. The colocynth is a valuable but dangerous medicine. The other claimant, the squirting cucumber (Ecballium agreste, formerly Momordica elaterum), also a gourd-like plant with tendrils, has prickly fruits, which, when it is ripe and the stalk is loosened, burst and squirt forth their poisonous pulp, a phenomenon which would quite agree with the etymology of the word. The squirting cucumber grows in waste places and by the roadside throughout Palestine, and its unfitness for food would probably be known to the young companion of Elisha.

Governor.

One who governs a land by authority of a supreme ruler to whom he is subordinate. Joseph when prime minister of Egypt was called its governor (Gen. xlii. 6; xlv. 26). When Nebuchadnezzar, after capturing Jerusalem, departed, he left a governor, Gedaliah, behind, to rule the conquered people (Jer. xl. 5; xli. 2, etc.). After the captivity, the Israelites were ruled by Persian governors; Zerubbabel, Nehemiah, and others, though Jews by birth, being Persian officials (Neh. v. 14, 18; Hag. i. 14). Pontius Pilate was governor of Judæa when our Lord was crucified, and is so called (Mat. xxvii. 14), though his specific Roman title was procurator (q. v.).

Go'zan.

A town and district in Mesopotamia on the river Habor (2 Kin. xvii. 6; xviii. 11; xix. 12; 1 Chron. v. 26; Is. xxxvii. 12). In an Assyrian inscription the town Gozan is associated with Nisibis. Gozan is probably the Gauzantis of Ptolemy and the Mygdonia of Strabo. It was a province of Mesopotamia, situated on the upper part of the Khabour river, and along the southern slopes of mount Masius. It is unnecessary to follow Ewald, who, governed by 1 Chron. v. 26, thought that the river of Gozan was distinguished from the Habor, and found it in the Ozan, which empties into the Caspian Sea, and is supposed to have formed the northern boundary of Media. Ptolemy mentions a town of Media called Gauzania in its vicinity.

Grape. See VINE

Grass.

A plant belonging to the endogenous order Gramineæ, of which the ordinary grasses growing in fields, or the cultivated cereals, may be considered as typical representatives. Popularly, the term grass is extended to many other endogenous plants, and even to various exogens, especially those possessing linear leaves. This does not materially differ from the meaning of the word grass in the book of Genesis. In chap. i. 11, 12 the vegetable kingdom is divided into three great classes, grass, herbs, and trees. The word grass is used in a more limited sense when man's brief life on earth is compared to grass, which in the morning flourishes and in the evening is cut down and withers (Ps. ciii. 15; cp. also xxxvii. 2, xc. 5; xcii. 7, cii. 11; Is. xl. 6, 7. Mat. vi. 30; Luke xii. 28).

Grass'hop-per.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew 'Arbeh, the numerous or gregarious, in A. V. of Judg. vi. 5; vii. 12; Job xxxix. 20; Jer. xli. 23. It is undoubtedly the migratory locust, as the R. V. makes it, and as even the A. V. has it in Ex. x. 4; Joel i. 4. See LOCUST.

2 The rendering of the Hebrew Haqab in Lev. xi. 22; Num. xiii. 33; Ecc. xii. 5; Is. xl. 22. It is very small (Num. xiii. 33) and voracious (2 Chron. vii. 13, where it is rendered locust). It perhaps derived its name from its covering the ground or hiding the sun. On the margin of Lev. xi. 22, R. V., it is admitted that it is unknown whether the animal was a grasshopper or a locust. The grasshopper family, now called Aceridæ, consists of leaping orthopterous insects, with four-jointed tarsi, wing cases in repose placed like the two sloping sides of a roof, and long, tapering antennæ. The type is the great English grasshopper (Locusta viridissima).

3 The rendering of the Hebrew Gob and Gobay, creeper from the earth (Nah. iii. 17) It devours the grass (Amos vii. 1, where L. V. renders locust). It was probably an insect of the locust family; but of which species is unknown.

Grave.

The cavity in the ground in which a body is interred. The Jews were sometimes buried in graves dug in the earth (Tobit viii. 9, 18), but more commonly in caves scooped out in rocks or naturally existing (Gen. xxiii. 9; Mat. xxvii. 60, John xi. 38). See SEPULCHER.

Grav-en Im'age.

An image of wood, stone, or metal fashioned by means of a sharp cutting instrument as distinguished from one cast in a mould (Is. xxx. 22; xlv. 16, 17; xlv. 20, cp. Hab. ii. 18, 19). Sometimes, however, the image was first cast and then finished by the graver (Is. xl. 19, xlv. 10). Graven images were in use among the Canaanites before the Israelites entered the country (Deut. vii. 5, xii. 3). They were also used in Babylon and elsewhere (Jer. l. 38, li. 47, 52). The second commandment expressly forbade the people of God to make them (Ex. xx. 4; Deut. v. 8, cp. also Lev. xxvi. 1; Deut. xxvii. 15; Is. xlv. 9; Jer. x. 14; li. 17).

Greaves. See ARMOR

Gre'cians.

1 The people of Greece (Joel iii. 6).
2 Jews who spoke Greek as distinguished from those who used Aramaic, which in N. T. times was popularly called by the Jews Hebrew (Acts vi. 1 and ix. 29, in R. V. Grecian Jews, and xi. 20, A. V. and margin of R. V.). See HELLENIST.

Greece, in A. V. of Daniel Gre'ci-a [from Graikos, an old name of a tribe in Epirus, and of the Greeks generally. It fell into disuse, Hellenes taking its place, but it was revived by Sophocles].

A small but highly celebrated country in the southeast of Europe. Its northern limit was never perfectly defined; it may, however, be placed at the Olympian chain of mountains. On the south it was bounded by the Mediterranean; on the east by the Ægean Sea, now the Archipelago, and on the west by the Ionian Sea, now regarded as part of the Mediterranean, and the Adriatic Sea, now the gulf of Venice. Its position during the time when the Mediterranean was the highway of civilization gave it unequalled advantages, which it was not slow to seize.

The authentic history of Greece with its first written records dates from the first Olympiad, 776 B. C. Previous to that time, and including the period known as the heroic age, history is so mingled with legend that it is difficult to separate truth from myth. It seems certain, however, that the Greeks were descended from four tribes, which in turn claimed descent from a common ancestor, Hellen. Of these tribes, the Æolians and the Achæans played a prominent part during the heroic age, Homer sometimes speaking of the whole Greek people as Achæans. The other two tribes, the Dorians and the Ionians, became more important in historic times, the Athenians and the Spartans being descended from them respectively. The early historic period, from 776 B C to 500 B C, may be regarded as a period of individual growth by the different states comprising the nation. These states were theoretically independent of each other, but were united by a common language and literature, by national games, and a general national development. There were also frequent though changing political alliances. During this period the foundations of Grecian architecture, art, literature, and philosophy were laid. Greece was early within the geographical knowledge of the Hebrews, who called it Javan, that is Ionia (Gen. x 4) but it was known merely as a country at the ends of the earth (Is. lxvi 19, Ezek. xxvii 13, Joel iii 6). About the year 500 B C Greece came into prominent notice on account of her struggle with Persia, at that time the great world-power. As early as 546 Cyrus captured Sardis, the capital of Lydia. The fall of this city was followed by the subjection of the Greek cities of Asia to the Persian yoke. The Hellespont was crossed by the Persians in the reign of Darius, and Macedonia submitted in 510. But the Greek cities of Asia rose and maintained determined revolt against their conquerors during the years 500 to 495, and the Greeks of Europe defeated the Persians at Marathon in 490, and, after suffering reverses at Thermopylæ, inflicted crushing defeats upon them at Salamis in 480, and at Plataea and Mycale in 479. The struggle with Persia resulted in drawing the entire nation together under the leadership of one state. The first state to attain this supremacy was Athens. She held the leadership for 70 years, but during the last 28 years of that time the energies of the nation were used in carrying on the Peloponnesian war. This war, which began in a quarrel between Corinth and her colonies, finally drew into the struggle the whole naval and military strength of the nation, led on one side by Sparta and on the other by Athens. The war resulted in the downfall of the Athenian power. Then followed the period of the Spartan supremacy, followed in turn by the Theban supremacy, which lasted until 338 B C., when all Greece fell under the power of Philip of Macedon, and became thenceforth a part of the Macedonian empire. It is under the rule of Alexander the Great that Greece comes into direct contact for the first time with Judea. On his march to Persia Alexander passed through Judea, which fell into his hands without a struggle. See ALEXANDER. From this time Grecian influence spread rapidly and took firm hold in the countries situated around the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea. Even after the Roman conquest the influence of the Greek language, culture, and philosophy remained paramount, and even influenced the Jewish religion itself. In the time of Christ the Greek language was spoken throughout the civilized world. After the death of Alexander, his empire fell into the hands of his generals, who parceled it out among themselves. At first Greece proper was held in the name of his infant son, but soon he, as well as all members of Alexander's family, were put to death, and the country became the prey of anyone strong enough to take it, until it finally fell under the dominion of Rome. The last struggle against Rome resulted in the battle of Leucopatra, 146 B C, and shortly after Greece was declared a Roman province. The division of the Roman power into the Eastern and Western empires revived Greek influence for a time. The Eastern empire survived long after the Western empire fell, but finally it came to an end in the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453.

Some of the apostle Paul's most earnest labors took place in Greece, notably in Athens and Corinth, besides his general travels through Achaia, the name at that time for ancient Greece.

Greek.

1. A native of Greece, or one of the Greek race (Acts xvi 1, xvii 4). When Jew and Greek are contrasted in the N T, the term Greek is used for a foreigner in general, the Greek being looked on as the highest type of gentile (Rom i 14, 16 x 12).

2. After the Macedonian conquest of the East and the establishment of the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, the name Greek was applied, especially by Orientals, to all who spoke the Greek language in ordinary life and enjoyed the privileges of Greek settlers in the kingdoms ruled by Alexander's successors. The Greeks who wished to see Jesus (John xii. 20) were foreigners, but it is not certain that they were of Greek race.

3. The language spoken by the ancient Greeks, and of which that of their modern successors is only a development (John xix. 20, Acts xxi 37, Rev ix 11). It belongs to the Aryan family of tongues, having affinities with the Sanscrit, with Latin, and nearly all the languages of western Europe. It excels in power of full and precise expression. The O T was translated into it before the advent of Christ (see SEPTUAGINT); the N T (Matthew possibly excepted) was composed in Greek from the first.

Greyhound

The rendering of the Hebrew Zu'zur, well knit or well knit in the loins, in Prov. xxx 31. The greyhound is figured on the Assyrian monuments. The word may, however, denote the war horse (R V. margin) as ornamented with girths and buckles about the loins; or the starling, as the corresponding word in Arabic, Syriac, and post-biblical Hebrew, denotes.

Grind'ing. See MILL.

Grove.

A group or clump of trees. In the A. V. it is uniformly a mistranslation of:—

1. The Hebrew word 'Eshel (Gen. xxi. 33; cp. 1 Sam. xxii. 6). The R. V. renders this a tamarisk tree. See TAMARISK.

2. The Hebrew word 'sherah, with its two plurals 'sherim and 'sheroth (Ex. xxxiv. 13, and elsewhere except Gen. xxi. 33). See ASHERAH.

Guard.

In Oriental countries, where the king, as a rule, is despotic, measures which give offense excite hostility against him personally. This necessitates that he should be continually defended by a bodyguard; and such a military organization is more than useless unless complete dependence can be placed on its fidelity. Hence, service in the bodyguard is considered specially honorable, and its captain is a high officer. Such an appointment was filled by Potiphar (Gen. xxxvii. 36; xli. 12), by Benaiah (2 Sam. xxiii. 22, 23; 1 Chron. xviii. 17), by Nebuzaradan (2 Kin. xxv. 8; Jer. xxxix. 9, 10), by Arioeh (Dan. ii. 14), and others. The captain of the guard and his men were often employed to inflict capital punishment on political or other offenders. In Mark vi. 27, the Greek word is spekoulator, spy. Such spies constituted a division in each Roman legion, and under the empire acted as the bodyguard of a general and were employed as messengers and to seek out persons proscribed or sentenced to death.

Gud'go-dah. See HOR-HAGGIDGAD.

Guest.

One temporarily entertained in the house of another, even though it be for a few hours only at a feast (1 Kin. i. 41; Zeph. i. 7; Mat. xxii. 10, 11). Complete strangers were received as guests and shown great consideration (Gen. xviii. 1-8; xix. 3; Ex. ii. 20; Judg. xiii. 15; xix. 20-24; Job xxxi. 32). Important houses had a guest-chamber (Mark xiv. 14; Luke xxii. 11; cp. also 2 Kin. iv. 10), and at Jerusalem these rooms were freely placed at the disposal of Jews visiting the city at the annual festivals (Aboth, 34). Hospitality is enjoined in the N. T. (Heb. xiii. 2; cp. Mat. xxv. 43). Ordinary morality dictates that one should not be guest in the house of a notorious sinner; but prominent Pharisees went so far as to apply this principle indiscriminately to the acceptance of hospitality from people of the publican class (Luke v. 27-32; xix. 7).

Guilt' Offer-ing. See OFFERINGS.

Gu'ni [painted with colors].

1. A son of Naphtali, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii. 24; Num. xxvi. 48; 1 Chron. vii. 13).

2. A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 15).

Gur [lion's whelp or other young animal].

An ascent near Ibleam, where Ahaziah, king of Judah, was smitten by order of Jehu and mortally wounded (2 Kin. ix. 27). Exact situation unknown.

Gur-ba'al [sojourn of Baal]

A place inhabited by Arabs (2 Chron. xxvi. 7); probably in the desert to the southeast of Judah.

Gym-na'si-um, in A. V. Place of Exercise.

A public place in Jerusalem for athletic exercise and exhibitions, below the western cloister of the temple (War iv. 9, 12; vi. 3, 2; 6, 2), below the palace of the Asmonæans (Antiq. xx. 8, 11; War ii. 16, 3), below the citadel or acropolis (2 Mac. iv. 12, 27, not the Syrian fortress called the Acra, which was erected later, 1 Mac. i. 33). It was situated near the council house, by the first or innermost wall, and at the end of the bridge which led from the temple across the Tyropæon valley (War v. 4, 2; cp. vi. 6, 2). It was erected by hellenizing Jews, under the leadership of Jason, by permission of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac. i. 10, 14; 2 Mac. iv. 7 seq.). The essential features of a gymnasium were: 1. An open court for boxing, wrestling, pitching quoits, and throwing the javelin (2 Mac. iv. 14, palæstra, discus); 2. A stadium or course for the foot race, 3. A colonnade for a place of recreation and for athletic exercises in winter (Antiq. and War, passim xystos); 4. A bathroom. The gymnasium at Jerusalem was condemned by strict Jews because it introduced heathen customs; led Jewish youth to wear the hat of Hermes, to exercise stark naked in public, and to be ashamed of the mark of their religion; and infected even the priests and caused them to neglect their official duties (1 Mac. i. 14, 15, 2 Mac. iv. 13-17). It existed until the overthrow of the city by Titus, and was not only resorted to for athletic sports, but was also occasionally used for popular assemblies (War ii. 16, 3).

H.

Ha-a-hash'ta-ri [the Ahashtarite].

A Hezronite, son of Ashhur (1 Chron. iv. 6; cp. ii. 24).

Ha-ba'lah, and Hobalah [Jehovah hath hidden]. The difference between the two forms of the name is merely one of traditional pronunciation.

Father of certain Jews claiming sacerdotal descent. Their names not being found in the register, they were put out of the priesthood (Ezra ii. 61; Neh. vii. 63; cp. R. V.).

Ha-bak'kuk [embrace, or perhaps the name of a garden plant].

A prophet of Judah. It is inferred from his psalm (chap. iii) and from the directions to the chief musician (19) that he was of the tribe of Levi and one of the temple singers; but the evidence proves nothing (cp. the titles of Pss. iii. and li.).

The book of Habakkuk is the eighth of the minor prophets. It consists of 1. A first complaint his cry to God against violence and wickedness is unheeded (i. 2-4); inquiry is triumphant. The Lord's response. God is raising up the Chaldeans (5-10), but as guilty the Chaldeans shall be punished (11). 2 A second complaint. God's kingdom indeed shall not perish, and the Chaldeans shall be visited with judgment (12); but yet a moral problem remains. God allows the Chaldeans to waste and destroy those who are more righteous than they. Shall this go on (13-17)? The Lord's response: the Chaldeans are puffed up and unrighteous [that fact to the eye of faith, is sufficient, it dooms them (cp. i. 11; Is. x. 12-16), and dooms all like them]; but the just shall live by his faith (Hab. ii. 1-4). That truth, rightly understood, solves the problem. Moreover, faith in the certainty that God will punish wickedness enables the prophet to pronounce five woes against the great world-power for five forms of wickedness (5-20). 3 A prayer of praise (iii. 1-19), in which after an invocation and a petition that God in wrath remember mercy (2), the prophet describes God's appearance in majesty and the ensuing consternation of his enemies (3-15), and expresses the quiet confidence of faith in God (16-19).

The book is not dated, but was evidently a production of the Chaldean period. 1. The temple is still standing (ii. 20), and musical service is conducted (iii. 19). 2 The rise of the Chaldeans to a formidable power among the nations occurs during that generation (i. 5, 6), and the slaying of the nations by the Chaldeans had already begun (6, 17).

The Chaldeans had been long known to the Hebrews. They attracted renewed attention by their successful revolt from the Assyrians in 625 B. C.; and they began their great career of subjugation and attained to the leading place among the powers of the world on the overthrow of Nineveh in 607 B. C., and by their victory over the Egyptians at Carchemish in 605. Most critics accordingly date the prophecy in the early part of Jehoiakim's reign, about the time of the battle of Carchemish. It may, however, antedate the fall of Nineveh by some years; for not only had the Chaldeans bestirred themselves in 625 B. C., but events before the fall of Nineveh in 607 B. C. indicated the Chaldeans as the coming world-power; their subjugation of Judah had long been predicted by the Hebrew prophets (Mic. iv. 10; Is. xi. 11; xxxix. 6, 7); and their fierce, warlike character, their habitual cruelty and rapacity in war, and their method of battle, were known to all nations. There was thus, even before their victory at Carchemish, full justification for the declarations made in i. 5-10.

If the prophecy was uttered before the Chaldean success at Carchemish, Habakkuk in i. 2-4 is lamenting the carnival of wickedness which he witnessed in Israel or in the world at large.

Hab-az-zî-nî'ah, in A V Habaziniah.

A Rechabite who lived long before Jeremiah (Jer. xxxv. 3).

Ha-ber'ge-on [a small hauberk].

A coat of mail to defend the breast and neck (2 Chron. xxvi. 14; Neh. iv. 16; in R. V. coat of mail). In Job xli. 26, R. V. on good grounds substitutes pointed shaft in the text, and places coat of mail in the margin. Habergeon, or coat of mail, is also used to translate a different Hebrew word of uncertain meaning in Ex. xxviii. 32; xxxix. 23.

Ha'bor [joining to]

A river of Mesopotamia to which captives from the ten tribes were carried (2 Kin. xvii. 6; xviii. 11; 1 Chron. v. 26). It has been identified as the Khabou, which, flowing southward through Mesopotamia, after a course of 190 miles, falls into the eastern side of the Euphrates at Kerkisseyeh, the ancient Circesium. Those who regard Gozan as a river identify the Habor with that eastern branch of the Tigris above Nineveh which bears the same name.

Hac-a-li'ah, in A V Hachaliah [Jehovah is dark (from displeasure)].

The father of Nehemiah (Neh. i. 1).

Hach'î-lah [dark, gloomy].

A hill in the wilderness of Ziph (1 Sam. xxvi. 1-3), southeast of Hebron, and on the south of the desert, not far from Maon (xxiii. 19, 24-26). David concealed himself there whilst fleeing from Saul, and there Saul afterwards encamped when engaged in his pursuit.

Hach'mo-ni [wise].

The founder of the Hachmonite family, the members of which are called sons of Hachmoni (1 Chron. xi. 11. xxvii. 32), or simply Hachmonites (cp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 8).

Ha'dad, I. [sharpness, fierceness].

A son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15, in A. V., following present Hebrew text, Hadar; 1 Chron. i. 30).

Ha'dad, II.

1. A deity worshiped by the Aramæans. It occurs in proper names, as in Benhadad, Hadadezer. The Assyrian scribes identified Hadad with their own weather-god Ramman, i. e., Rimmon.

2. A king of Edom, son of Bedad, and of the city of Avith. He smote Midian in the field of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 35, 36; 1 Chron. i. 46, 47).

3. A king of Edom, whose city was Pau or Pai (1 Chron. i. 50). In Gen. xxxvi. 39 he is called Hadar. See DALETH.

4. An Edomite prince, who escaped from his country when Joab, at the head of the Israelite army, was engaged for six months in the cruel task of cutting off every male in Edom. Hadad was then a little child, and was taken by his guardians to Egypt. The king of Egypt received him with much kindness, assigned him a house and land, provided him with food, and gave him an Egyptian princess, sister of the queen, to wife. But after the death of David and Joab, the great foes of his race, he returned to Edom and became an adversary to Solomon (1 Kin xi 14-22).

Ha-dad-e'zer [Hadad is a help]

Son of Rehob and king of Zobah, in Syria (2 Sam. viii 3). He is frequently called Hadadezer, the latter form being doubtless an early misreading of daleth; see DALETH. When going to recover his border at the river Euphrates, he was met and defeated by king David. The Syrians of Damascus, who afterwards arrived to assist him, shared his fate. From Betah and Berothai, cities of Hadadezer, David took much brass or copper. Toi, king of Hamath, probably a Hittite by race, had formerly been at war with Hadadezer, and he congratulated David on his victory (2 Sam. viii 3-13; 1 Chron. xviii 3-10). Hadadezer renewed the war with David, became confederate with the Ammonites, and sent his army, led by his general, Shobach, to try another engagement with their common foe. David was victorious, and Shobach was among the slain. The dependent kings who had served Hadadezer now made peace with David, and Hadadezer is heard of no more (2 Sam. x 6-19, 1 Chron. xix 16-19).

Ha-dad-rim'mon [Hadad and Rimmon, two Syrian divinities]. Rimmon means also a pomegranate.

A city in the plain of Jezreel, near Megiddo (Zech. xii 11). Jerome says that it was the place in his day called Maximianopolis. This is now called Rummâneh, and is about a mile northwest by west of Taanach.

Ha'dar. See HADAD, I. and II.

Ha-dar-e'zer. See HADADEZER.

Had'a-shah [new]

A village in or near the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv 37). It has not been identified.

Ha-das'sah [a myrtle].

The original Jewish name of queen Esther (Esth. ii 7). The name has a certain similarity in sound to that of Atossa, who was the mother of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 2). But the women were different. Esther was his queen.

Ha-dat'tah. See HAZOR-HADATTAH.

Ha'des. See HELL, 1.

Ha'did [sharp, pointed; a point].

A town of Benjamin, mentioned in connection with Lod, i. e. Lydda (Ezra ii 33; Neh. xi 34); perhaps Huditi, referred to by Thothmes III. (Karnak list). It is commonly identified with Adida, a town built upon a hill of the Shephelah and overlooking the plain (1 Mac. xii. 38; xiii. 13; Antiq. xii.

6, 5). Its site is located at Haditheh, 3 miles east of Lydda.

Had'tai [frail].

A man of Ephraim (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

Ha-do'ram.

1 An Arabian tribe descended from Joktan (Gen. x 27; 1 Chron. i 21).

2 A son of the king of Hamath (1 Chron. xviii 10). See JORAM 1.

3 An officer over Rehoboam's levy (2 Chron. x 18). See ADONIRAM.

Ha'drach.

A country mentioned in connection with Damascus and Hamath (Zech. ix 1), and, in Assyrian inscriptions, with Zobah also. Its exact situation is unknown.

Ha'gab [a locust].

Founder of a family of Nethinim (Ezra ii 46).

Hag'a-bah or Hagaba [a locust]

Founder of a family of Nethinim, distinct from that of Hagar (Ezra ii 45, Neh. vii. 48).

Ha'gar, in A. V. of N. T. both times Agar, in imitation of the Greek [if Hebrew, flight].

An Egyptian bondswoman of Sarah, probably obtained during Abraham's sojourn in Egypt (Gen. xvi 1; cp. xii. 10). After Abraham had been ten years in Canaan, and the promised son had not been born to him, Sarah, now 76 years old, despaired of sharing in the promise, and proposed earthly means to secure a son to Abraham and obtain the name of mother. In accordance with a custom of the times, she gave her maid to Abraham. When Hagar perceived herself to be with child she despised her mistress, and, being treated by her harshly, fled into the wilderness. There the angel of the Lord found her at a fountain between Shur and Bered, revealed to her the future of the child she was to bear, and bade her return to her mistress. Hagar called the name of the place "the well of the living one who seeth me" (Gen. xvi. 1-16). She then returned to her mistress, and in due time gave birth to Ishmael. Some fifteen years later the youth Ishmael mocked at the child Isaac. For this offense Hagar, with a skin of water on her shoulder, and Ishmael (for form of expression cp. xliii. 15) were expelled with God's approval from the family of Abraham. They wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba until the water was spent. The exhausted boy whom she had been supporting she cast, as one would a sick person (Mat. xv. 30), under the shade of a bush, and sat down a bow-shot off that she might not see him die. Again the angel of the Lord intervened, directing her to a well in the vicinity, and reminding her of the promise concerning the boy. The last we hear of Hagar is her taking a wife for her son out of the land of Egypt, whence she herself had originally come (xxi. 1-21). For Gal. iv. 21-31, see ISHMAEL.

Ha-gar-ene', Ha'gar-ite, and Ha'ger-ite.
See HAGRITE.

Hag'ga-i [festal, perhaps as born on a festival day].

A prophet, contemporary with Zechariah (Hag. i 1 with Zech. i 1). He prophesied after the return from Babylon. The work on the temple had ceased for 15 years, and Haggai was largely instrumental in arousing the people to proceed with the building (Ezra v. 1, 2; vi 14).

The book of Haggai is the tenth of the minor prophets. It consists of four prophecies delivered within the space of four months in the second year of Darius Hystaspis, 520 B. C.

1 On the first day of the 6th month the prophet reproaches those who left the temple in ruins, and built ceiled houses for themselves, and he points out that God's blessing is withholden from their ordinary labor. In consequence of this exhortation, work on the temple was resumed on the twenty-fourth day of the same month (i.).

2. In the 7th month, 21st day, he encourages those who mourn over the humble character of the new building as compared with the splendor of the old edifice. He predicts that the latter glory of the house shall be greater than the former glory, for God will shake the nations and the desirable things of all nations, their silver and gold, shall come and fill the house with glory, and God will give peace in that place (ii 1-9; Heb. xii 20-28).

3 In the 9th month, 24th day, he adds a sequel to the first prophecy. As the touch of the unclean pollutes the clean, so their former neglect of God polluted their labor and God did not bestow his blessing. But their revived zeal for God will be accompanied by fruitful seasons from the Lord (ii. 10-19).

4 On the same day he adds a sequel to the second prophecy. When the Lord shakes the nations, he will establish Zerubbabel, who represents the royal line of David (ii. 20-23).

Hag'ge-ri. See HAGRI.

Hag'gi [festal or festival of (Jehovah)].

A son of Gad, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlv. 16; Num. xxvi. 15).

Hag-gi'ah [a festival of Jehovah].

A Levite, a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. vi 30).

Hag'gith [festal].

One of David's wives, the mother of Adonijah (2 Sam. iii 4; 1 Kin. i. 5).

Ha'gri, in A. V. Haggeri.

Rather an adjective than a proper name (1 Chron. xi. 38); see MIBHAR.

Ha'grite; in A. V. Hagarite, and once Hagerite, and once, in Ps. lxxxiii. 6, Hagarenes, in which passage R. V. in its text follows A. V.

A nomad people who dwelt throughout all the land east of Gilead, and were rich in camels, sheep, and asses. During the reign of Saul they were vanquished, and in a large measure destroyed, by the Israelite tribes east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 10, 18-22). A Hagrite had charge of David's flocks (1 Chron. xxvii 31). They are the Agraui of the Greek geographers. It is questionable whether their name is at all connected with the town Hejer or Hejera, in the Arabian desert near the Persian Gulf.

Ha'i. See A1.

Hail.

Small globules of ice formed of raindrops which have been carried into a cold stratum of the atmosphere. Hail falls not merely in cold and temperate climates, but in hot nay, even in tropical latitudes, where snow and ice are not to be found, except at great elevations. When it falls in the warmer regions, it tends to be larger than in temperate countries, as raindrops also are larger. In all places two or more hailstones can unite so as to make an irregularly shaped mass of ice, which, when large, becomes formidable by the momentum with which it descends. Hail occasionally falls in Egypt (Ex. ix 22-25) between December and April. It is more frequent in Palestine (Josh. x 11; Hag. i 17). The area affected by a hailstorm is generally a long, narrow line, so that of two places near each other, one may be in and the other out of the storm. Thus Goshen might escape it, whilst the adjacent district of Egypt to the westward might be in its track and suffer severely (Ex. ix. 26); and a pursuing army might be untouched by the storm, and yet see their fleeing foes beaten down by the falling stones (Josh. x 11).

Hair.

The natural covering and ornament of the head. In Egypt men ordinarily shaved the head but when mourning let the hair grow (Herod. ii 36, iii 12). The Assyrians wore it long (i. 195), falling to the shoulders. The Israelites also wore it tolerably long, but cut it to prevent its reaching an extreme length (cp. Num. vi 5, 2 Sam. xiv. 26; Antiq. xiv. 9, 4), and the services of the barber were sometimes employed (Ezek. v 1); but they were forbidden to cut off the edge of the hair from about the temples, so as to round it (Lev. xix 27), for that was a significant heathen custom (Herod. iii 8). Hebrew women wore the hair long (Song vii 5, Rev. ix 8, cp. 1 Cor. xi 15), binding it up or braiding it (Judith x 3, xvi 8; 1 Tim. ii 9, 1 Pet. iii 3). Oil was used for the hair by both men and women (Ps. xxii. 5; Mat. vi. 17). Herod the Great, in order to conceal his age, dyed his hair black (Antiq. xvi. 8, 1). The priests were forbidden to make any baldness upon the head (Lev. xxi. 5), and none of the Israelites was allowed to make a baldness between the eyes for the dead (Deut. xiv 1); for it was a disfigurement of the body which God had created. The captive woman who was chosen by a Hebrew for his wife, and the leper in the day of his cleansing were required to shave the head for purposes of purification (Lev. xiv. 8, 9; Deut. xxi. 12). The Nazirite also, when the time of his service was ended, shaved his head as a sign of the fulfillment of his vow (Num. vi. 18). See BEARD.

Hak'ka-tan [the small or the younger].

Father of a certain Johanan (Ezra vii. 12).

Hak'koz, in A. V. sometimes Koz, once Coz, the first syllable being omitted since it is the definite article [the thorn].

1 A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and was made the seventh of the twenty-four courses into which David distributed the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 6, 10). Perhaps it was members of this family who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, but, failing to find their register and establish their genealogy, were put from the priesthood (Ezra ii. 61, 62; Neh. vii. 63, 64). They appear to have eventually succeeded, however, in establishing their right to the office (Neh. iii. 21; cp. Ezra vii. 33).

2 A man of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 8).

Ha-ku'pha [bent, bowed, curved].

Founder of a family of Nethinim (Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

Ha'lah.

A district of the Assyrian empire, to which captives from the ten tribes were carried (2 Kin. xvii. 6, xviii. 11; 1 Chron. v. 26). Probably the district known later as Chalkitis, in Mesopotamia, near Gozan, in the basin of the Habor and the Saokoras (Ptolem. v. 18, 4). Those who identify the Habor with the eastern tributary of the Tigris bearing that name are apt, however, to identify Halah with the province of Kalachene (Strabo xi. 8, 4; Ptolem. vi. 1), on the eastern side of the Tigris near Adiabene, north of Nineveh on the borders of Armenia.

Ha'lak [smooth, bare].

A mountain in the south of Palestine on the way to mount Seir (Josh. xi. 17; xii. 7). Its identity has not been established.

Hal'shek-el. See MONEY, TRIBUTE.

Hal'hul [perhaps, opening].

A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 58). The Arabs still call the village Hulhul or Halhul. It is 3½ miles north of Hebron. It is a place of pilgrimage, being regarded as the birthplace of the prophet Gad.

Ha'li [necklace, collar].

A village on the boundary line of Asher (Josh. xix. 25). Guérin suggests Khurbet 'Alia, 13 miles northeast of Acre.

Hal-i-car-nas'sus.

A city of Caria, renowned as being the birthplace of Herodotus and as containing the mausoleum erected by Artemisia, which was reckoned one of the seven wonders of the world. Alexander captured and ultimately destroyed the city in 334 B. C. continued to exist, but did not thrive. contained a colony of Jews (1 Mac. xv. Antiq. xiv. 10, 23).

Hall.

A building, or large room in a building, voted to public use. In A. V. it denotes

1. The court of the high priest's pal (Luke xxii. 55; in the R. V. court).

2. The official residence of the provincial governor, with its court where he sat judgment. It was called the prætorium (Mark xv. 16; also Mat. xxvii. 27; Jc. xviii. 28, 33; xix. 9; Acts xxii. 35, wh R. V. has palace or prætorium). See PRÆTORIUM.

Hal-le-lu'jah, in A. V. of N. T. Allelu in imitation of the Greek modification [praise ye Jehovah].

A compound word used by the writers various psalms to invite all to join them praising Jehovah (R. V. margin of Ps. civ. cv. 45, cvi. 1, 48, cxl. 1; cxii. 1, cxiii. 1, 9, c. 18; cxvi. 19; cxvii. 2; cxxxv. 1, 21; first; last vers. of cxlvi.-cl. cp. A. V. margin al. From these psalms John borrowed the te Alleluia (Rev. xix. 1, 3, 4, 6).

Hal-lo'hesh, in A. V. once Halo'hesh [enchanter, the wizard].

Father of a certain Shallum (Neh. iii. With Nehemiah he or the representative his family sealed the covenant to wors Jehovah (x. 24).

Ham, I [meaning uncertain; if Semitic, possibly dark-skinned, or, perhaps better, he

The youngest son of Noah, born after latter's five hundredth year (Gen. v. vi. 10, xi. 24); cp. CHRONOLOGY I. 3. the time of the deluge he was married, apparently had no children (Gen. vii. 7 Pet. iii. 20). On occasion of his faith drunkenness he behaved undutifully, incurred a curse to descend upon such of posterity as exhibited like degraded character (Gen. ix. 22-27). The peoples southern Arabia, Ethiopia, Egypt, and naan were largely descended from Ham, in part were made his sons by conquest annexation (Gen. x. 6-14).

Ham, II. [Egyptian kam, black, so called from the color of the alluvial mud of the Nile]

Used in the Bible only in pot (Ps. lxxviii. 51; cv. 23, 27; cvi. 22).

Ham, III. [meaning unknown. The Hebrew letter is different from that in and II].

A place between Ashteroth-karnaim Bashan and the Moabite country, which Chedorlaomer defeated the Zuzim (Gen. 5, cp. Deut. ii. 10). The order of enumeration makes it probable that Ham was not of Kiriathaim and the Arnon; but Schwarz followed by Tristram, would identify it with the ruin called Hammat, 'Animah or Hai tât, on the east side of the Roman road, 3 miles north of Rabbath Moab.

Ha'man [old Persian umana, well-disposed; or name of the deity Humba, Humnian (see ESTHER)]

Son of Hammedatha (Esth. iii. 1) His father bore a Persian name, but Haman was none the less an Agagite (iii. 1; ix. 24), which, if it is not a local or obscure family name, may mean that he was of Amalekite descent and of the royal family of that Arabian tribe Exalted by the Persian king to the highest official position, he received ostentatious reverence from time-servers. But on account of his unprincipled character, perhaps also for other reasons, the Jew Mordecai deliberately withheld from him the customary signs of respect. Haman planned revenge; in his hate plotting the destruction, not of Mordecai only, but of all Jews in the empire. His plan was frustrated by Esther, prompted by Mordecai; and Haman and his sons perished (vii. 10; ix. 7-10) See ESTHER.

Ha'math, in A. V. once Hemath (Amos vi. 14) and once Amathis (1 Mac. xii. 25), [fortification, citadel]

1 A city on the Orontes, north of Hermon (Josh. xiii. 5), about 120 miles north of Damascus. It was an early settlement of the Canaanites (Gen. x. 18). Toi, its king, congratulated David on his victory over Hadadezer, their common enemy (2 Sam. viii. 9, 10; 1 Chron. xviii. 3, 9, 10). Solomon took Hamath, with the district subject to it, building within the latter store cities (2 Chron. viii. 3, 4). It soon, however, reverted to its old inhabitants. Jeroboam II., king of Israel, captured Damascus and Hamath, which stood in close relations to Judah, and kept them for the ten tribes (2 Kin. xiv. 28). About this time Amos (vi. 2) called the city Hamath the great. It was again for a short time free, and relying upon Judah for aid; but it was conquered by the Assyrians (2 Kin. xviii. 34; xix. 13). After the capture of Samaria by the Assyrians, it joined with the remnant of the inhabitants of that city in revolt, 720 B. C. But the uprising was quickly suppressed by Sargon. Colonists from Hamath, who brought with them Ashima, their god, were placed by the Assyrians in Samaria (2 Kin. xvii. 24, 30), while some of the exiles of Israel seem to have been located in Hamath (Is. xi. 11). Afterwards its history becomes merged in that of Syria, and it seems to have become subordinate to Damascus (Jer. xlix. 23). Ezekiel prophesied that the restored land of Israel should still extend northward to Hamath (Ezek. xlvii. 16, 17, 20; xlvi. 1). Hamath was known as Epiphania during the period of Grecian supremacy (Antiq. i. 6, 2), but is now called Hama or Hamah.

2 The district ruled by the city (1 Mac. xii. 25). One of its towns was Riblah (2 Kin. xxiii. 33).

The entering in of Hamath, that is, to judge from the similar phrase elsewhere (Gen. xifi. 10), the neighborhood of Hamath, was regarded as the northern border of Israel (Num. xiii. 21; xxxiv. 8; 1 Kin. viii. 65). To people on the south the term may have had special meaning, and denoted the long valley of Coele Syria, between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, through which the road to Hamath lay. Porter considers that it was the pass between Lebanon and the Nusairiyeh mountains, about 60 miles north of Beirut, connecting the inland region of Syria with the coast of the Mediterranean.

Ha'math-ites.

The people of Hamath (Gen. x. 18).

Ha-math-zo'bah.

The neighbor kingdoms of Hamath and Zobah, or some small place called Hamath, belonging to the Syrian kingdom Zobah. It was captured by Solomon (2 Chron. viii. 3).

Ham'math, in A. V. once Hemath (1 Chron. ii. 55) [warmth, hot springs]

1 A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). Probably one with Hammoth-dor and Hammon, which was assigned to the Levites (xxi. 32, 1 Chron. vi. 76), and to be identified with Emmaus, a village with warm baths at a little distance from Tiberias (Antiq. xviii. 2, 3; War. iv. 1, 3). It is now called Hummâm Ibrahim Basha, and is on the western shore of the sea of Galilee, about 1½ miles south of Tiberias. The water is sulphurous and medicinal.

2 The founder of the house of Rechab, a family of the Kenites (1 Chron. ii. 55). The A. V. has here Hemath.

Ham-med'a-tha.

An Agagite, father of Haman (Esth. iii. 1).

Ham'me-lech [the king].

Father of Jerahmeel (Jer. xxxvi. 26, A. V. and margin of R. V.). The word suggests, however, that Jerahmeel was of royal blood, son of the king (R. V.).

Ham'mer.

A tool, called in Hebrew Pattish, and used for smoothing metals and for breaking rocks (Is. xli. 7; Jer. xxiii. 29). It serves as a figure for any crushing power. Babylon was the hammer of the whole earth (Jer. i. 23). God's word is like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces (xxiii. 29). Other names for an implement of the same class are mak-kabah and makkebeth, used for driving the tent pin (Judg. iv. 21), in building operations (1 Kin. vi. 7), and in the manufacture of idols (Is. xlvi. 12; Jer. x. 4).

Ham-miph'kad. See MIPHKAD.

Ham-mol'e-cheth, in A. V. Hammoleketh [the queen].

A sister of Gilead (1 Chron. vii. 18). Several tribal families of Manasseh sprang from her.

Ham'mon [warm, sunny].

1 A frontier village of Asher (Josh. xix.

28). Perhaps 10 miles south of Tyre and about a mile from the beach, at 'Ain Hamûl, $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile from Umm el-'Amûd, where, as Renan has shown, Baal Hammon was worshipped.

2. A town of Naphtali. See HAMMATH.

Ham'moth-dor [warm springs of Dor] See HAMMATH

Ham-mu'el, in A. V. Hamuel [warmth of God].

A Simeonite, son of Mishma, probably of the family of Shaul (1 Chron. iv. 26).

Ham-o'nah [abundance, multitude]

Symbolical name of the city near which Gog is to be defeated (Ezek. xxxix. 16).

Ha'mon-gog [multitude of Gog].

A name to be given to a certain valley where the hosts which Gog brings with him shall be slain and buried (Ezek. xxxix. 11, 15). Situation unknown.

Ha'mor, in A. V. of N. T. Emmor, an imitation of the Greek [an ass].

The prince of Shechem (Gen. xxxiv. 20; Josh. xxiv. 32; Judg. ix. 28). A Hivite, a branch of the Amorites, and a prince of that tribe, at least, in central Palestine (Gen. xxxiv. 2, xlviii. 22). His son Shechem ruined Dinah, and both father and son fell victims to the vindictiveness of her brothers Simeon and Levi (xxxiv. 1-31).

Ham'ran. See HEMDAN.

Ha-mu'el. See HAMMUEL.

Ha'mul [pitied, spared]

Younger son of Perez, and founder of a tribal family of Judah (Gen. xlv. 12; Num. xxvi. 21; 1 Chron. ii. 5).

Ha-mu'tal [skin to dew, refreshing like dew]

Daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, wife of king Josiah, and mother of the kings Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (2 Kin. xxiii. 31; xxiv. 18; Jer. li. 1).

Han'a-mel, in A. V. Ha-nam'e-el [perhaps, God hath pitied].

Son of Shallum, and cousin of the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xxxii. 7-15).

Ha'nan [gracious, merciful].

1. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 43).

2. A Benjamite, son of Shashak (1 Chron. viii. 23).

3. A son of Azel, a descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 38; ix. 44).

4. A prophet, son of Igdaliah. His sons had a chamber in the temple (Jer. xxxv. 4).

5. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 46; Neh. vii. 49).

6. A man, probably a Levite, whom Ezra employed with others to make the people understand the law (Neh. viii. 7). He seems to have sealed the covenant (x. 10).

7 and 8. Two chiefs of the people, who also sealed the covenant (22, 26).

9. A son of Zaccur, appointed assistant treasurer by Nehemiah (Neh. xiii. 13).

Han'a-nel, in A. V. Ha-nan'e-el [God hath been gracious]

A tower at Jerusalem (Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. xiv. 10), near the sheep-gate and the tower of Meah (Neh. iii. 1; xii. 39); see JERUSALEM, II. 3.

Ha-na'ni [gracious]

1. A son of Heman and head of the eighteenth of the twenty-four courses of musicians appointed by David for the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 25).

2. Father of the prophet Jehu (1 Kin. xvi. 1) and himself a seer. He rebuked king Asa, and was by his orders committed to prison (2 Chron. xvi. 7).

3. A brother of Nehemiah who brought him news regarding Jerusalem (Neh. i. 2). He and the governor of the castle were afterwards given charge of the city (vii. 2).

4. A priest, son of Immer, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 20).

5. A Levite who played an instrument at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 36).

Han-a-ni'ah [Jehovah hath been gracious]

1. A Benjamite son of Shashak (1 Chron. viii. 24).

2. A son of Heman and head of the sixteenth of the twenty-four courses of musicians formed by David for the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 23).

3. One of king Uzziah's captains (2 Chron. xxvi. 11).

4. Father of Jeremiah's contemporary, the prince Zedekiah (Jer. xxxvi. 12).

5. Son of Azzur of Gibeon. In the fourth year of Zedekiah's reign he prophesied a return of the captives after two years' captivity. Jeremiah had given forth a different prediction. As a penalty, the false prophet was doomed to death, his decease occurring two months later (Jer. xxviii. 1-17).

6. Grandfather, or remoter ancestor, of Irijah, the captain of the watch who arrested Jeremiah on the charge of intending to desert to the Chaldeans (Jer. xxxvii. 13-15).

7. The Hebrew name of the captive called by the Chaldeans Shadrach (Dan. i. 6, 7; 1 Mac. ii. 59).

8. A son of Zerubbabel, and father of Pelataiah and Jeshaiah (1 Chron. iii. 19, 21); perhaps the ancestor of Christ called, by transposition of the constituent parts of the name, Joanan (Luke ii. 27, R. V.).

9. A son of Bebai, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 28).

10. An apothecary who helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 8).

11. A priest who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the wall (Neh. xii. 41).

12. A chief of the people, who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 23).

13. The governor of the castle and joint ruler with Hanani, Nehemiah's brother, over Jerusalem (Neh vii 2).

14. A priest, head of the father's house of Jeremiah, in the days of the high priest Joiakim, a generation after the exile (Neh. xii 12).

Hand'breadth.

The breadth of the hand, a palm (Ex xxv. 25); see CUBIT. It is used by the psalmist figuratively of human life, especially when life closes prematurely (Ps xxxix. 5).

Hand'bread.

Measuring a handbreadth (Ezek. xl 43; in R V handbreadth).

Hand'ker-chief.

A small cloth used by the Romans for wiping the hands and face. The Jews adopted it in the Roman period. They bound it about the head of their dead (John xi 44; xx 7; in English version, napkin). Once in Ephesus handkerchiefs were carried from the body of the apostle Paul unto the sick, and their diseases departed (Acts xix 12). The man who received one pound from his lord hid it in such a cloth (Luke xix. 20, in English version, napkin).

Ha'nes [hieroglyphic, Su-Chenen or Chenen-su, Coptic, Hnes].

A city of Egypt (Is xxx 4) about 50 miles south of Memphis, and still known as Ahnas. In the Græco-Roman period it was known as Heracleopolis magna. It must not be confounded with Tahpanhes.

Hang'ing.

A form of punishment in which, after the criminal was put to death, his body was suspended from a tree or post. It was in vogue in Egypt (Gen xl 19, 22), among the Israelites (Deut. xxi 22; Josh x 26, 2 Sam iv. 12), and the Persians (Herod. iii 125, ix 78). The hanging intensified the disgrace. Among the Israelites, the elevation of the body on the tree was a call to God to witness that the guilty one had paid just and sufficient penalty, and was a testimony of God's abhorrence of sin. But while it remained exposed, it proclaimed that sin had been committed in Israel. The body was therefore burned out of sight at nightfall (Deut. xxi. 23; Josh. viii. 29; cp. Gal iii 13). Suicide was sometimes committed by hanging which caused strangulation (2 Sam xvii. 23; Mat. xxvii. 5). See GALLOWs.

Han'i-el. See HANNIEL.

Han'nah [grace, compassion].

One of the two wives of Elkanah. She was her husband's favorite, and was in consequence subjected to petty annoyances by the rival wife. She vowed that if she gave birth to a man-child, she would devote him to the service of Jehovah. Her wish was gratified; she became the mother of the prophet Samuel, and carried out her vow (1 Sam. i. 1-28). Her song of triumph is highly poetic, and was probably in the mind of the Virgin Mary when she expressed her gratitude in similar poetic strains on learning that she was to give birth to the Son of God (ii. 1-10, Luke i 26-55).

Han'na-thon [regarded with favor].

A frontier town of Zebulun (Josh xix. 14). Conder identifies it with Kefr Anân, 11 miles N E by N of the ruins Rummaneh, that is, Rummon (13). The place seems too remote.

Han'ni-el, in A V Haniel in 1 Chron. vii 39 [favor or grace of God].

1 Prince of the Manassites who, when the Israelites were about to enter Canaan, was appointed on the committee to divide the land (Num xxxiv 23).

2 An Asherite, son of Ulla (1 Chron. vii 39).

Ha'noch, in A. V once Henoah (1 Chron i 33) [initiated, dedicated]. Exactly the same Hebrew word as that rendered Enoch.

1 A son of Midian, and a descendant of Abraham by Keturah (Gen xxv 4; 1 Chron i 33). The name is perhaps preserved in Hanákuya, a place three days' journey to the north of Medina.

2 A son of Reuben, and founder of a tribal family (Gen xlvii 9, Ex. vi 14; Num xxvi 5, 1 Chron v. 3).

Ha'nun [enjoying favor].

1 A king of the Ammonites, son and successor of David's friend Nahash. The Hebrew king therefore sent to condole with him on his father's death, and congratulate him on his own accession. Evil counselors suggested that the real object of the embassy was to spy out the Ammonite capital, with the view of afterwards attempting its capture. Hanun, therefore, grossly ill-treated the ambassadors, shaving off half their beards and cutting off their garments in the middle. Knowing that the outrage would be resented, he prepared for war. He obtained the Syrians as his allies, but was defeated (2 Sam. x. 1-xi 1; 1 Chron. xix 1-xx 3).

2 and 3 Two Jews who repaired portions of the wall of Jerusalem under Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 13, 30).

Haph-a-ra'im, in A. V Haph'ra-im, an error from which the original edition of A. V was free [two pits].

A frontier town of Issachar (Josh xix. 19). Jerome identified it with Afarea, 6 Roman miles to the north of Legio. At this distance northwest of Lejjun is the ruined site of Far-riyeh; while about 7 Roman miles east northeast of Lejjun lies the village el-Afulé.

Hap-pliz'zez, in A. V Aphses [the dispersion].

A descendant of Aaron. His family became the eighteenth of the twenty-four courses into which David divided the priests (1 Chron xxiv. 15).

Ha'ra [mountainous region].

A place in Assyria to which captives from the ten tribes were carried (1 Chron. v. 26).

Situation unknown. Some believe it to be a designation of Media, namely the mountain, or a corruption of "mountains" of Media.

Har'a-dah [terror].

An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness, after being turned back from Rithmah (Num. xxxiii. 24). Palmer and Drake identified it with the present Jebel 'Aradeh, in the peninsula of Sinai, about 40 miles southwest of Elath. Both etymology and situation are against the identification.

Ha'ran, I. [meaning unknown].

1. A son of Terah, and brother of Abraham. He died early, in his native place, Ur of the Chaldees; but left a son, Lot, and two daughters, Milcah and Iscah (Gen. xi. 29).

2. A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei (1 Chron. xxiii. 9).

Ha'ran, II., in A. V. of N. T., Charran [road, business].

1. A city of Mesopotamia, about 240 miles west by north from Nineveh and 280 north-northeast of Damascus. It was a commercial center; and, like Ur of the Chaldees, had the moon-god for its patron deity Terah and Abraham sojourned in it for a time, and Terah died there (Gen. xi. 31, 32; xii. 4, 5). The family of Nahor settled there, and Jacob for a time resided there (xxiv. 24, xxviii. 10; xxix. 5). The Assyrians hunted in its vicinity as early as 1100 B. C., and they long held sway over it. A capture of the city by them is mentioned (2 Kin. xix. 12). The Greeks called it Karrhai, and the Romans Carræ. In 53 B. C. the Roman triumvir Crassus, the colleague of Pompey and of Julius Caesar, allowed himself to be outmaneuvered and defeated near Haran by the Parthian general Surena, by whose representatives he was soon afterwards barbarously slain. It is now a small Arab village, still retaining the name of Harrân, situated in upper Mesopotamia, on the Belik, a tributary of the Euphrates, about 240 miles west by north from Nineveh and 82 east from the gulf of Scanderoon.

2. Son of Caleb and Ephah, of the family of Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 46).

Ha'ra-rite [inhabitant of a mountain].

Possibly it means a mountaineer, one from the hill country of Judah or Ephraim (Simoni, Gesenius, Siegfried-Stade). But this designation seems too general. Probably, to judge from the context of 2 Sam. xxiii. 33, it means an inhabitant of a hamlet called Harar, mountain, from its location on some peak, like Gibeah, hill, and its inhabitants Gibeathites (2 Sam. xxiii. 11; 1 Chron. xi. 34, 35).

Har-bo'na and Harbonah [Persian, perhaps ass-driver].

A chamberlain of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10; vii. 9).

Hare.

An animal. In Hebrew 'Arnebeth, said to chew the cud, but not to part the hoof, and therefore unclean (Lev. xi. 6; Deut. xiv. 7). The opinion of the Hebrews that the animal chewed the cud was founded on a peculiar movement of its mouth. Physiologically, however, it is not a ruminating animal, but a rodent, and is so arranged by modern naturalists. The common hare of Palestine (Lepus syriacus) is two inches shorter than the European hare (L. europæus), and has slightly shorter ears. It frequents wooded and cultivated places. The common hare of southern Judæa and the Jordan valley (L. judææ of Gray) has very long ears and light tawny fur. Tristram enumerates three other species of the southern frontier: L. ægyptiacus, the Egyptian hare, in the southeastern part of Judæa; L. isabellinus, in the sandy deserts of southeastern Palestine, and L. smathicus, with fur of a reddish hue.

Ha'rael [the mount of God].

A portion of the altar described by Ezekiel (xlii. 15). In the text of the A. V. it is rendered altar, and in that of the R. V. upper altar.

Ha'reph [picking, plucking off].

A son of Caleb, and ancestor of the inhabitants of Beth-gader (1 Chron. ii. 51).

Ha'reth. See HERETH.

Har-ha'iah.

Father of the goldsmith Uzziel (Neh. iii. 8).

Har'has.

An ancestor of Shallum, husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 Kin. xxii. 14). Called Hasrah in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22. The two names differ in Hebrew in the second H, and not merely in transposition of letters.

Har'hur [inflammation, fever].

The founder of a family of Nethinim, some of whom returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53).

Ha'rim [flat-nosed, snub-nosed, or consecrated].

1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and constituted the third course when David distributed the priests into divisions (1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 6, 8). Probably they were members of this family who returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 39; Neh. vii. 42). A father's house among the priests in the next generation after the exile bore this name (Neh. xii. 15); see REHUM. At a later period some of this family were among those who had married foreign wives (Ezra x. 21). And later still a priest of this name, doubtless head of a father's house, signed the covenant to observe the law of God and to endeavor to prevent intermarriages with foreigners (Neh. x. 5).

2. Founder of a non-priestly family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 32; x. 31; Neh. iii. 11; vii. 35).

Ha'riph [autumnal rain].

Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. vii. 24). A prince of this name sealed the covenant, doubtless as representative of the family (x 19). The same as Jorah (Ezra ii. 18), which also means autumnal rain.

Har'lot.

A prostitute (Gen xxxviii. 15; Lev xxi. 7, Deut xxiii 18, Josh. ii 1; Judg. xvi. 1). To play the harlot or to go a whoring after, often means, in scriptural usage, to go with or after a paramour; in a figurative sense, to depart from Jehovah and give the affections and worship to other gods (Jer. ii 20; iii 1; Ezek xvi 15, 16, xxiii 5).

Har-Mag'e-don. See ARMAGEDDON.

Har'ne-pher [perhaps, panting]

An Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Chron vii. 36)

Ha'rod [fear, terror]

A well near which Gideon pitched while his adversaries, the Midianites, were by the hill of Moreh, in the valley (Judg vii 1). It is commonly, but without certainty, identified with the fountain of Jalûd, on the northwestern side of mount Gilboa, about a mile east by south of Jezreel. A village appears to have stood in the vicinity (2 Sam. xxiii 25)

Ha'rod-ite.

An inhabitant of the town of Harod (2 Sam xxiii 25).

Har'o-eh See REAIAH

Har'ro-rite.

Rather Harodite (q. v.), as there is reason to read this word (1 Chron xi 27, cp 2 Sam xxiii 25)

Ha-ro'sheth [carving, artificers' work in wood or stone]

A town more fully called Harosheth of the gentiles or nations. Sisera had his residence there (Judg iv. 2, 13, 16). Formerly the site was sought somewhere west of the waters of Merom, and not far from the northern Hazer. Now it is more commonly located at el-Harathiyyeh, a small village on the northern bank of the Kishon, at the point where the stream, hidden among oleander bushes, passes through a narrow gorge to enter the plain of Acre.

Harp.

Rendering of the Hebrew word Kinnor, emitter of a tremulous sound; and in the N. T. of the Greek word Kithara, lyre, lute. It was a stringed musical instrument of the harp kind, small enough to be carried about (Is. xxiii. 16), and was played with the fingers (1 Sam. xvi. 23) or with a plectrum (Antiq. vii. 12, 3). It was played by Jubal, an antediluvian, of the race of Cain (Gen. iv. 21), was known to Laban (xxxi. 27), was the instrument with which David soothed Saul during his fits of melancholy madness (1 Sam xvi. 16) The prophets and others used it for sacred purposes (1 Sam x 5; Ps xliii 4; xlix 4), and it was played in the temple orchestra (1 Chron. xxv 1, 3); see MUSIC. It was employed also in festive entertainments (Job xxi 12). Even harlots sometimes carried it about with them (Is xxiii. 15, 16). It was the instrument which the captive Jews hung on the Babylonian willows (Ps cxxxvii. 2). Two kinds were in use in Egypt, a larger, of the height of a man, and a smaller, which was easily carried. The Hebrews were acquainted with the harp, but it is not certain that the word kinnor really means harp. The Seventy regarded it rather as a lyre or lute, than a harp, for they render the Hebrew word by kithara.

Har'row.

An implement of agriculture, consisting of a wooden frame armed with teeth of wood or iron (2 Sam xii 31). It is drawn over plowed land to level it and break the clods preparatory to sowing the seed, and to cover the seed when sown. It cannot be shown, however, that the Hebrew word in 2 Sam xii 31 denotes such an instrument. The Israelites broke the clods in some manner (Job xxxix 10, Is xxviii 24, Hos x 11), but it is doubtful whether they used a harrow. The modern inhabitants of Palestine sometimes turn in the cattle for this purpose.

Har'sha [artificer's work, enchantment].

Founder of a family of Nethinim, some of whom returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 52; Neh. vii. 54).

Hart.

A stag, or male deer, five years old, and which has developed its sur-royal or crown antler. It is the rendering of the Hebrew 'Ayyal, deer, a wild, clean animal (Deut. xii. 15. xiv. 5; 1 Kin. iv. 23; Ps. xlii. 1; Song viii 14). See DEER.

Ha'rum [exalted, high].

A man of Judah, father of Aharhel (1 Chron. iv 8).

Ha-ru'maph [flat of nose]

Father of a certain Jedaiah (Neh iii 10)

Har'u-phite.

The designation of Shephatiah, a Benjamite, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron xii. 5). The Hebrew traditional reading is Hariphite, a member of the family of Hariph (cp. Neh. vii 24-32, where Hariph is enumerated with Benjamites).

Ha'ruz [sedulous, industrious]

Father-in-law of king Manasseh (2 Kin. xxi. 19).

Har'vest.

The period of harvest in ancient Palestine may be divided into two portions: that of barley and that of wheat harvest, the former preceding the latter by about a fortnight (Ruth ii. 23). Its beginning was consecrated by the bringing of the sheaf of firstfruits (Lev. xxiii. 10). It began in the lowlands before the crops were ripe on the hills. In the hot Jordan valley barley harvest commenced in April, when the Jordan was full (Josh. iii 15; cp. v 10), at the close of the rainy season (1 Sam. xii 17, 18, Prov. xxvi 1). Wheat harvest lingered in the uplands to the month of June. It was a hot time of the year (Prov. xxv. 13; Is xviii. 4). When the harvest was completed, and the produce gathered in, there were great rejoicings (Is ix. 3).

Hebron, and inspector for the country west of Jordan (1 Chron xxvi 30; cp. xxiii 12)

4. A Levite, son of Kemuel, prince of the tribe of Levi in David's reign (1 Chron xxvii 17)

5. A chief of the Levites during the reign of Josiah (2 Chron xxxv 9)

6. A Merarite Levite, who joined Ezra at the river of Ahava, and was apparently one of the twelve who were entrusted with the treasure which was being conveyed to Jerusalem (Ezra viii 19, 24). Probably it was he who sealed the covenant (Neh x 11), and who was a chief Levite and one of the temple musicians (Neh xii 24)

7. The ruler, in Nehemiah's time, of half Keilah. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh iii 17).

8. A Levite, descended from Asaph (Neh. xi 22).

9. A priest, head of the father's house of Hilkiah, in the time of Joiakim the high priest (Neh. xii. 21).

Ha-shab'nah.

One of those who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh x 25)

Hash-ab-ne'iah, in A V Hash-ab-ni'ah

1. Father of a certain Hattush (Neh iii 10)

2. One of those Levites who by their exhortations prepared the returned exiles for

Harvest in Ancient Egypt

The feasts of unleavened bread, of weeks or harvest, and of ingathering, had all a relation to the season of reaping. See YEAS

Has-a-di'ah [Jehovah hath shown kindness].

A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron iii 20)

Has-e-nu'ah. See HASSENUAH.

Hash-a-bi'ah [Jehovah hath imputed or devised].

1. A Merarite Levite, descended through Amaziah, and an ancestor of Jeduthun (1 Chron. vi 45). Perhaps he is the descendant of Bunni mentioned as ancestor of Shemaiah (ix. 14; Neh. xi 15).

2. A Merarite Levite, son of Jeduthun and head of the twelfth company of musicians appointed by David for the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxv. 3, 19).

3. A Kohathite Levite of the family of sealing the covenant with Jehovah (Neh. ix 5).

Hash-bad'da-na, in A V Hash-bad'a-na.

One of those who stood beside Ezra when he addressed the returned exiles (Neh. viii. 4).

Ha'shem [make astonished! lay waste!]

A Gizonite, mentioned in the catalogue of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 34). See JASHEN

Hash-mo'nah [place of fertility].

A camping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 29, 30). Exact situation unknown.

Ha'shub. See HASSHUB.

Ha-shu'bah [esteemed, purposed].

A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 20).

Ha'shum [rich, wealthy].

Founder of a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 19; x 33; Neh. vii 22). The representative of the family, or a person of this name, supported Ezra while the latter addressed the people (Neh. viii 4), and then sealed the covenant (x 18).

Ha-shu'pha. See HASUPHA

Ha-si-ds'ans, in A V Asideans and Assideans [Greek 'Asidaiot, from Hebrew ḥasidim, the pious]

A party among the Jews who held strenuously to the old faith (1 Mac ii 42). They joined Mattathias, and later cooperated with Judas Maccabæus in most of his plans (ii. 42; 2 Mac. xiv 6), although contrary to his judgment they sought peace from the Syrians (1 Mac vii 13).

Has-mo-næ'an. See ASMONEAN

Has'rah [perhaps, want] See HARHAS

Has-se-na'ah, and without the definite article Senaah [perhaps, thorny]

The sons of Hassenaah rebuilt the fish-gate of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 3). Of the children of Senaah, some three thousand returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 35, Neh. vii 38). Whether Senaah is a man or a town is uncertain.

Has-se-nu'ah, in A V. Hasenuah, and, without the article, Senuah [perhaps, thorny]

1 A Benjamite, father of Hodaviah (1 Chron ix 7).

2. Parent of a certain Judah (Neh. xi 9).

Has'shub, in A V. of Nehemiah Hashub [thoughtful]

1 A son of Pahath-moab. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii 11).

2. A Jew who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem opposite to his house (Neh. iii 23). It was probably either he or No 1 who signed the covenant (x 23).

3 A Merarite Levite, father of Shemaiah (1 Chron ix 14, Neh. xi 15).

Has-soph'e-reth. See SOPHREITH

Ha-su'pha, in A V. once Hashupha [made bare]

Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 43, Neh. vii 46).

Hat.

The rendering of the Aramaic word Karbel, binding, wrap (Dan. iii 21, in R V. mantle). See CLOTHING

Ha'thach, in A V. Hatach.

A chamberlain of king Ahasuerus, who was appointed to attend Esther (Esth. iv 5, 10).

Ha'thath [terror].

A son of Othniel (1 Chron iv 13).

Hat'i-pha [captive].

One who founded a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 54; Neh. vii. 56).

Hat'i-ta [engraving, exploration].

A porter who founded a family, members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45).

Hat'til [tottering, vacillating]

One of Solomon's servants, who founded a family, the members of which returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 57; Neh. vii 59).

Hat'tush [congregated, gathered together]

1. A man of Judah, son of Shemaiah, and family of Shecaniah (1 Chron. iii 22).

2 A chief of the priests, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. xii 2, 7).

3 Head of a father's house, of the sons of David, who returned with Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 2).

4 A son of Hashabneiah. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 10).

5 A priest who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. x 4).

Hau'ran [hollow land, so called because a depression or because of the multitude of its caverns]

A region south of Damascus and bordering on Gilead (Ezek. xlvii 16, 18). In the Greco-Roman period it designated a smaller district. It was then known as Auranitis and was one of four provinces, having Trachonitis on the north and Gaulonitis and apparently Batanea toward the northwest (Antiq. xvii 11, 4, xviii. 4, 6, War i 20, 4; ii 6, 3; 17. 4, iii 3, 5). It thus probably consisted of the plain lying between Gaulonitis and the present Jebel Hauran, and perhaps included the latter. About the year 23 B. C. Auranitis with Trachonitis and Batanea was bestowed on Herod the Great by Augustus. When Herod's kingdom was divided, these districts constituted the major part of Philip's tetrarchy (Luke iii 1, Antiq. xvii 11, 4). The surface is flat, broken only by a few volcanic mounds. The soil is so fertile that the Hauran is the granary for the whole region round. Many towns and villages, mostly deserted, exist within its limits, some of them "the giant cities of Bashan," as they have been called, built of basalt, with doors of the same material.

Hav'i-lah [perhaps, sandy].

A district of Arabia, peopled in part by a body of Cushites and in part by a body of Joktanites, a Semitic people (Gen. x 7, 29; 1 Chron. i 9, 23). The association of Havilah with Hazarmaveth and other places points to a locality in central or southern Arabia. To Havilah belonged the river Pishon; and the region was rich in gold, aromatic gum, and precious stones (Gen. ii 11, 12). These productions strongly indicate the mountainous district to the north of Yemama; and in this neighborhood Havilah is best sought. How far beyond these mountains the boundaries of Havilah extended is not clear. From the record of Saul's warfare with the Amalekites it may be inferred that the Arabian desert for several hundred miles north of the mountains bore the name Havilah (1 Sam. xv. 7; cp. Gen xxv 18) Migrations of the people would also carry the name to distant localities, as perhaps to the coast of Africa near the straits of Bab el-Mandeb, where a gulf, Anahites, and a people, Abalитай, are traceable.

Hav-voth-ja'ir, in A V Havoth-jair [Jair's encampment of villages or of nomad encampments]

Unwalled towns in the northwestern part of Bashan, in the region of the Argob, where this tract approaches the country of the Geshurites and Maacathites, and where the boundaries between the rugged land, Gilead, and the open, sandy land, Bashan, insensibly merge into each other (Deut in 4, 14). They were captured by Jair, a Manassite. Their number was liable to fluctuation, because they lay in a debatable land, and for other reasons (1 Chron ii 23). They are to be carefully distinguished from the sixty walled cities in the heart of Bashan, and likewise in the Argob (Deut in 4, 5, 1 Kin iv 13). Since the boundary between Gilead and Bashan was not clearly defined by nature, it never was conventionally, and places on this undefined border are referred to as in Gilead or in Bashan, according to the momentary point of view of the narrator. The conquest of Bashan by the Israelites included the capture of the unwalled towns in the Argob on this invisible border, and when their capture by Jair is related in connection with the conquest of Og's kingdom, which was carried on from Edrei in Bashan as the center, the Havvoth-jair are described as in Bashan (Deut in 14, Josh xiii 30). When, however, the eastern country is before the mind of a sojourner in the valley of the Jordan or in Canaan west of the river, he naturally speaks first of Gilead, and sometimes even uses that designation broadly for the entire highland east of the river, or he may speak of a conquest of Gilead which was not narrowly confined to the distinctively rugged land. From this point of view, he is apt to refer to the towns on the undefined border of Gilead and Bashan as in Gilead (1 Chron. ii. 21-23; indefinitely, Num xxxii 40 seq; 1 Kin iv. 13). The Havvoth-jair were scattered over this indefinite tract in the Argob; and hence, according to the shifting point of view, even of one and the same narrator, are mentioned as in Gilead or in Bashan. Some of them were doubtless more evidently in the open land, while others were more clearly in the rugged land.

Hawk.

The rendering of the Hebrew Neş, flyer (Job xxxix. 26). It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi. 16; Deut. xiv. 15), and included more than one species of the smaller predatory birds (ibid.). It comprehended the sparrow hawk (Accipiter naxus) and the kestrel (Falco tinnunculus). The former abounds in Lebanon and the hilly parts of Galilee in summer, and in Judæa and the Arabah in winter; the latter, which is properly a falcon instead of a genuine hawk, is abundant in every part of Palestine throughout the year.

Haz'a-el [God hath seen].

A Syrian courtier whom Elijah was directed by Jehovah to anoint king over Syria (1 Kin xix 15, 17). Some years later, between 845 and 843 B C., Benhadad II, who then reigned over that country, with Damascus for his capital, hearing that Elisha was in the city, sent Hazael to ask the prophet whether he should recover of a serious illness from which he then suffered. Elisha told Hazael that his master would not recover, and that he himself would be king of Syria, and would perpetrate great cruelties on the people of Israel. He replied, "But what is thy servant, who is but a dog, that he should do this great thing?" Then, returning to his master, he falsely told him that the prophet foretold his recovery, and next day assassinated him and reigned in his stead (2 Kin viii 7-15, R V). In 842 the Assyrian king Shalmaneser warred against Hazael and exacted tribute. In 839 Shalmaneser again warred with him. Toward the close of Jehu's reign over Israel, about 820, Hazael smote the country of the Hebrews east of the Jordan (x 32), and in the succeeding reign, crossing the river, he mightily oppressed the Israelites (xiii 4-7), invaded the country of the Philistines, took Gath, and was only deterred from attacking Jerusalem by a rich present consisting of the dedicated treasures of the temple (xii 17, 18). He died shortly after. The house of Hazael (Amos i 4) is Damascus.

Ha-za'iah [Jehovah hath seen]

A man of Judah, family of Shelah (Neh xi 5).

Ha-zar-ad'dar. See ADDAR.

Ha-zar-e-nan and Hazar-enon [village of fountains].

A village on the northern boundary of Palestine, near Damascus (Num. xxxiv 9, Ezek xlvii. 17, xlviii 1). Exact site unknown.

Ha-zar-gad'dah [village of good fortune]

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv 27). Exact site unknown.

Ha-zar-hat'ti-con. See HAZER-HATTICON.

Ha-zar-ma'veth [village of death]

A body of Joktanites who peopled a district in Arabia (Gen. x 26; 1 Chron. i 20). A region in Arabia Felix, in the south of the peninsula, is still called by the Arabs Hadramaut, which corresponds etymologically to Hazarmaveth. The place is mentioned in the inscriptions of the ancient Sabæans, the people of Sheba.

Ha-zar-shu'al [fox village].

A town in the extreme south of Judah, assigned to the Simeonites (Josh xv. 28; xix. 3; 1 Chron. iv. 28). It was occupied after the captivity (Neh. xi. 27). Perhaps the ruin eth-Tha'li, a word equivalent to Shual.

Ha-zar-su'sah, in plural Hazar-susim [village of a mare or mares].

A village belonging to the Simeonites (Josh. xix 5; 1 Chron. iv. 31). Tristram places it at the ruin Susin, 10 miles south of Gaza, on the caravan route to Egypt. Perhaps it is Sāsīyeh, 2 miles east by north of Semua.

Haz-a-zon-ta'mar, in A. V. once Hazezon-tamar (Gen. xiv. 7). See EN-GEDI.

Ha'zel.

The rendering in Gen. xxx. 37, A. V. of the Hebrew Luz, which is almost certainly, as the R. V. makes it, the almond tree.

Haz-e-lel-po'ni. See HAZZELELPONT.

Ha-zer-hat'ti-con, in A. V. Hazar-hatticon [the middle Hazer or village].

A town on the border of the Hauran (Ezek. xlvii 16). Exact site unknown.

Ha-ze'rim [villages].

Habitations of the Avvim (Deut. ii. 23); in the R. V. properly translated by villages.

Ha-ze'roth [encampments].

An encamping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness beyond Kibroth-hattaavah (Num. xi 35) and on this side of Paran (xii 16 xxxiii 17 Deut. i 1). It was there that Miriam and Aaron murmured against Moses (Num. xi 35-xiii 16). 'Am el-Hudera, about 36 miles northeast of Mount Sinai, was suggested by Burckhardt, and adopted by Robinson and others, as the site. The identification rests, however, solely on the similarity of the name, and is uncertain. Palmer found at the spot many stone circles, which evidently marked the site of an encampment founded by a pastoral people.

Haz-e-zon-ta'mar. See HAZAZON-TAMAR.

Ha'zi-el [vision of God].

A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei (1 Chron. xxiii 9).

Ha'zo [perhaps, vision].

A son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. xxii 22). The name is probably preserved in the hilly region Hazû, which Esahaddon traversed, not remote from the Hauran.

Ha'zor [an enclosure].

1. The capital of the Canaanite kingdom in the north of Palestine, ruled over in Joshua's time by Jabin. According to Josephus, it was situated above the waters of Merom (Antiq. v 5, 1). The town was taken by Joshua and burnt (Josh. xi 1-13; xii 19). It was rebuilt, and was assigned to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xix 36). In the days of Deborah and Barak it was ruled by another king Jabin. On the defeat of his general, Sisera, he attempted to continue the war against the Israelites, but was ultimately overcome and slain (Judg. iv. 1-24; 1 Sam. xii. 9). It is doubtful whether this or some other Hazor was the town fortified by Solomon (1 Kin. ix. 15), but it was certainly the place so named whose inhabitants were carried into captivity to Assyria by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kin. xv. 29). In the neighboring plain Jonathan defeated Demetrius (1 Mac. xi 67; in A. V. Nabor; Antiq. xiii. 5, 7). Robinson's identification of Hazor with Tell Khureibeh, 3½ miles west of the waters of Merom, is the most probable yet proposed. Conder locates it at Jebel Hadîreh, about 2 miles farther west.

2. A town in the extreme south of Judah, called also Kerieth-hezron (Josh. xv. 25, R. V.). Exact site unknown. Robinson located it at Kureiten, 12 miles south of Hebron. Hazor, a town of Judah near Kedesh, is mentioned in ver. 23; see HEZRON.

3. A village of Benjamin (Neh. xi 33). Conder identifies it with the ruin Hazzur, 4 miles north-northwest of Jerusalem, and directly west of Beit Hanina, perhaps Ananiah of ver. 32.

4. A region in the Arabian desert eastward of Palestine. Jeremiah prophesied its plundering by Nebuchadnezzar (xlix 28-33). Berossus states that Nebuchadnezzar conquered Arabia (con. Apion i 19). The name is probably a collective and refers to the settled village life of the community in contrast to the nomads. Exact situation unknown.

Ha-zor-ha-dat'tah, in A. V. punctuated as two places, Hazor, Hadattah [if the second word is Aramaic, the name means new village].

A town in the extreme south of Judah, apparently near Hazor 2. Exact site unknown (Josh. xv 25).

Haz'ze-lel-po'ni, in A. V. Hazeleponi [give shade, thou who turnest toward me].

A woman of Judah, daughter of the ancestor of the men of Etam (1 Chron. iv 3).

He.

The fifth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The English letter E has the same origin, but is a vowel. Where he preserves its power as a consonant in Hebrew names, and properly at other times, it is represented by h in the English form, as in Abraham.

It stands at the head of the fifth section of Ps. cxix, since each verse in the section begins with this letter in the original.

Through some similarity of form combined with careless writing and slight emacement of the text, it was sometimes misread as aleph on the one hand and tau on the other.

Head'band.

The rendering of the Hebrew Kishshur, encircle, band (Is. iii. 20, in R. V. a sash; Jer. ii 32, in E. V. attire). It is an article of female attire.

Heath.

The rendering of the Hebrew words 'Ar'ar (Jer. xxv. 6, but R. V. margin, following the Septuagint, has tamarisk), in Arabic, juniper, J. oxycedrus (Post), and 'ar'ar (Jer. xlviii. 6); both of which involve the idea of nakedness. Heath is a shrub, with minute, narrow, rigid leaves. The species Erica verticillata, a low shrub with racemed, pink, sweet-scented flowers, grows on the western slopes of Lebanon (Post). Most interpreters, however, regard the word, at least in Jer. xlviii. 6, as meaning a destitute person, since "aro'er" has that sense in Ps. cii. 17.

Hea'then [dweller in the heath] The word suggests the fact that the gospel first rooted itself in towns, the inhabitants of which became Christians, while the dwellers on heaths remained worshippers of false divinities. The word Pagan, from Latin Paganus, belonging to a village, rustic, has a somewhat similar reference.

One of a people who do not worship the God of the Bible, especially if they are addicted to idolatry. It is a frequent rendering of the Hebrew Goy and Greek Ethnos, each of which means nation or people. R V employs the word heathen only in O T, and then only when the character of the gentile nations is clearly referred to; as in speaking of the abominations of the heathen (2 Kin. xvi. 3; Ezek. xxiii. 30), their filthiness (Ezra vi. 21), their ignorance of the truth, opposition to the true religion, barbarous trampling upon it and upon the people of God, and consequent exposure to the righteous indignation of Jehovah (Ps. lxxix. 1, 6, 10, but not cxv. 2; also in Jer. x. 25; Lam. i. 3, 10, Ezek. xxxiv. 28, 29, xxxvi. 6, 7, 15).

Heav'en, often The Heavens [probably originally, covering].

1. The sky, the expanse around the earth. It embraces all that is apart from the earth (Gen. ii. 1); hence heaven and earth comprehend the universe (Gen. i. 1, xiv. 19; xiv. 3; Jer. xxii. 24; Mat. v. 18). Beyond the visible firmament was the primeval watery mass (Gen. i. 7; Ps. cxlviii. 4); which is not further referred to in the account of creation, but out of which it is reasonable to believe the heavenly bodies were formed. These upper waters remained in Hebrew thought along with other conceptions. In the visible heavens are the stars and planets (Gen. i. 14, 15, 17; Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8). In the part of it next the earth is the atmosphere, in which clouds float, through which birds fly, and from which rain descends (Gen. i. 20; vii. 11; viii. 2; xxvii. 28, 2 Sam. xxi. 10; Ps. cxlviii. 8; Lam. iv. 19), see FIRMAMENT. The Hebrews, by a familiar idiom, spoke of the heaven of heavens (Deut. x. 14; 1 Kin. viii. 27; Ps. cxv. 16), meaning the heavens in their widest extent. The later Jews were fond of dividing the heavens into seven different strata. No fixed, definite conception of these several regions prevailed; but fancy was allowed fullest freedom. The highest was regarded as God's dwelling place. Paul describes Christ as ascending far above all the heavens (Eph. iv. 10); and he relates in experience, whether in vision or reality he knew not, in which he was caught up into the third heaven and into Paradise (2 Cor. xii. 1-4).

2. The place where God's immediate presence is manifested (Gen. xxviii. 17; Ps. lxxx. 14; Is. lxvi. 1; Mat. v. 12, 16, 45, 48; xviii. 9), where the angels are (Mat. xxiv. 36; xxviii. 2; Mark xiii. 32; Luke xxii. 43), and where the redeemed shall ultimately be (Mat. v. 12, vi. 20; xviii. 10, Eph. iii. 15; 1 Pet. i. 4. Rev. xix. 1, 4). Christ descended from heaven (John iii. 13), and ascended thither again (Acts i. 11), where he maketh intercession for the saints and whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead (Rom. viii. 33, 34; Heb. vi. 20; ix. 24; Mat. xxiv. 30; 1 Thes. iv. 16).

3. The inhabitants of heaven (Luke xv. 18; Rev. xviii. 20).

Heave Offer-ing.

Every hallowed thing which the Israelites heaved, i. e. levied, took up, took away, from a larger mass and set apart for Jehovah (Lev. xxii. 12; Num. v. 9; xviii. 8, xxxi. 28, 29). In general it comprehended 1. From the most holy things, the portions of the meal offerings, sin offerings, and guilt offerings which were not required to be burned on the altar. These parts were perquisites of the priests, and were eaten by them in the precincts of the sanctuary (Num. xviii. 9, 10; cp. Lev. vi. 16). 2. From the holy gifts, Num. xviii. 11-19, (a) The heave offering of all wave offerings. It was assigned to the priest's family, for use as food by all the members, male and female, provided they were ceremonially clean (11). (b) The first fruits of the oil, wine, and grain (Num. xviii. 12; cp. 24, 30; Deut. xviii. 4; Neh. x. 39). A basketful of these first fruits was presented to Jehovah by the offerer and then spread as a feast for the offerer and his family as the guests of the Lord (Deut. xxvi. 2, 10, 11; cp. xii. 6, 7, 11, 12). Except this basketful the whole of the first fruits belonged to the priestly families, but could be eaten by those members only of the household who were ceremonially clean (Num. xviii. 13; Deut. xviii. 4). (c) Every devoted thing (Num. xviii. 14). (d) The flesh of every unredeemed firstling (15-18). 3. The tithe (21-24), which was assigned as a perquisite to the Levites.

Particular heave offerings were 1. From peace offerings the right thigh and three cakes, one out of each oblation (Lev. vii. 14, 32-34). 2. From the ram of consecration, used at the induction of the priests into office, the right thigh (Ex. xxix. 27). It belonged to a peace offering, and accordingly was given to the priests (28); but at the induction of Aaron, the first of the priestly line, it was burnt (22-25; Lev. viii. 25-28). 3. From the first dough, made from the new meal of the year, a cake (Num. xv. 20, 21).

He'ber [union, society, fellowship].

1 A son of Beriah, grandson of Asher, and founder of a tribal family (Gen xlii. 17; Num. xxvi. 45).

2 A Kenite, descendant of Moses' brother-in-law or father-in-law Hobab, and the husband of Jael, who slew Sisera (Judg. iv. 11-24).

3 A man registered with Judah, descended from Ezra, and ancestor of the men of Socoh (1 Chron. iv. 18).

4 A Benjamite, descended from Shalah through Elpaal (1 Chron. vii. 17).

For two others bearing this name in A. V., see EBER.

He'brew [pertaining to the other side or to Eber]

1. According to biblical history, the Hebrews were men from the other side of the Euphrates (Gen. xiv. 13 with xii. 5; Josh. xxiv. 2, 3; and see EUPHRATES). The name may have denoted this, or it may have been originally a patronymic formed from Eber, and have designated all his descendants, including the Israelites (Gen. x. 21), until the increasing prominence of the Israelites led to restricting its use to them: see EBER. Hebrews in the plural was applied to the Israelites (Gen. xl. 15; 1 Sam. iv. 6; xiii. 3, 2 Cor. xi. 22). In N. T. times it was used specially of those Jews who spoke Hebrew or rather Aramaic in distinction from the Hellenists, their fellow-countrymen who spoke Greek (Acts vi. 1). An Hebrew of the Hebrews was a thorough Hebrew, as, for example, a person of Hebrew parentage both on the father's and the mother's side (Phil. iii. 5).

2 The language spoken by the Hebrews (2 Kin. xviii. 26, 28, Is. xxxvi. 11, 13), and called, poetically, the language of Canaan (Is. xix. 18). There is reason to believe that Abraham found it in Canaan, instead of bringing it with him from Chaldea, and the tablets from Tell el-Amarna and the Moabite stone have shown that at least the Canaanites and the Moabites, if not even the adjacent tribes, spoke a language not very different from Hebrew. It belongs to the Semitic group of languages. Like the most of them, it is read from right to left, not, like English, from left to right. Its alphabet consists of twenty-two consonants. Their names are found in Ps. cxix., which is divided into groups of eight verses. In each of these groups a several letter of the alphabet dominates, beginning each verse. Originally the language was written without vowel-points, these not being introduced earlier than the sixth century A. D., or perhaps even a little later. They were the work of certain Jewish doctors called Masorites, whose headquarters were at Tiberias. With the exception of portions of the books of Daniel and Ezra and a few verses elsewhere in Aramaic, the whole of the O. T. was written originally in Hebrew.

Languages have their periods of growth, comparative perfection, and then decay. Two stages are traceable in Hebrew; these are generally called its golden and its silver age. The first extended from the commencement of the Hebrew nation to the Babylonian captivity, the second from the captivity till the language ceased to be spoken. During the golden age, while the Jews were generally independent, their language remained comparatively pure. During the silver age it was corrupted by a continually increasing influx of Aramaic, till the latter tongue superseded it altogether. The Aramaic in the time of our Lord had taken the place of the genuine Hebrew as the colloquial language (Mark v. 41), and had usurped its name, and Aramaic is intended by the Hebrew language, or the Hebrew tongue, or the Hebrew, or simply Hebrew, in John v. 2, xix. 13, 17, 20, Acts xxi. 40, xxii. 2, xxvi. 14; Rev. ix. 11.

He'brews, E-pis'tle to the.

The fourteenth of the N. T. epistles as they are arranged in the English Bible. That it was addressed to Jewish Christians is clearly shown by its contents. To no others would its arguments be so appropriate. They were in danger of returning to Judaism through the pressure of outward trial and opposition (ii. 1, iii. 12, iv. 1, 11, v. 12; vi. 6; x. 23-25, 29). They had been early converts (v. 12) and had received the gospel from its first preachers (iii. 3). They had long ago been persecuted (x. 32-34) and had often ministered to the saints (vi. 10 x. 34). There is no reference to gentile members in their churches, and their danger lay in a return not so much to the law as to the ritual. These allusions best suit the Hebrew Christians of Palestine, and to them doubtless, with perhaps other Jewish believers of the East the epistle was addressed.

Its authorship has always been disputed. Even in the ancient church opinion was divided, though the canonicity and authority of the book were recognized. The early eastern church received it as Pauline, though it was felt to be unlike the rest of Paul's epistles, and theories were advanced to explain the difference. Clement of Alexandria, e. g., thought that perhaps Luke translated it from a Hebrew original. In the early western churches its Pauline authorship was doubted and denied, and Tertullian attributed it to Barnabas. For a while indeed in the western churches its history becomes obscure, so far as our information goes; but finally the eastern opinion became the universally accepted one. The book is anonymous. Chap. ii. 3, however, seems to imply that the author was not an apostle. It certainly implies that he was not one of the original apostles, and it is unlike Paul to represent himself as receiving the gospel from others (cp. Gal. i. 11-24). From xiii. 18, 19 we learn that the writer was well known to his readers and was unhappily separated from them. In xiii 23 the reference to Timothy is not sufficient to indicate the author, nor does the expression "they of Italy" (xiii. 24) prove his locality, though the natural inference is that he was in Italy. The evidence of the contents and style also impresses different minds in different ways. It certainly is not a translation of a Hebrew original. Its doctrine has much in common with Paul, though the truth is put in a slightly different way. Its language has a large classic element in it, and its style has seemed to most critics unlike the apostle's, being smoother, often more elegant, and less impetuous. The omission of any address also is unlike Paul's usage elsewhere; and the author seems to have used exclusively the Greek translation of the O T., while Paul constantly shows his familiarity with the Hebrew as well. There is still room, therefore, for difference of opinion as to the author. Various suggestions have been made by those who deny that Paul wrote it. Luther guessed Apollos. The most plausible view, if Paul be not the author, is that which attributes it to Barnabas, who has at least some ancient testimony in his favor, and who in The Acts appears as the mediator between the Jewish Christians and Paul, much as this epistle seeks to establish its Hebrew readers in a doctrine which is thoroughly Pauline. The following analysis will exhibit the thought of the epistle.

(1) The author begins by stating the superiority of Christianity to all previous and possible revelation because of the superior dignity of Christ to all previous and possible organs of revelation (i), a fact which should warn us not to forsake the gospel (ii. 1-4). Nor should the humiliation of Christ appear a difficulty, since just by it he becomes our Saviour and high priest (ii). Christ, therefore, is of superior dignity even to Moses (iii 1-6), and the warnings against unbelief in the older revelation which were addressed to Israel, are doubly applicable against unbelief in the final revelation of the gospel (iii. 7-iv 13).

(2) The epistle then unfolds the value of Christ's high-priestly office (iv 14-16); explaining its nature and showing that Christ did, and that it was predicted he would, exercise it (v); and, after gently, yet vigorously, rebuking them for their failure to grasp the full truth of the gospel (vi), unfolding the superiority of Christ's priesthood, as typified in Melchizedek, to the levitical, the consequent abrogation of the latter with its ritual, and the all-sufficiency of Christ's (vii.).

(3) Then the epistle shows that Christ's priesthood must now be necessarily exercised in heaven, so that his invisibility should be no difficulty to them. In this heavenly ministry Christ fulfills the types, realizes the promises and remedies the imperfections of the earthly ritual (viii. 1-x. 18).

(4) The fourth section (x 19-xii. 29) urges them to live up to these truths by an enduring faith. The writer exhorts to renewed confidence in Christ and to the maintenance of their Christian associations (x 19-25); depicts the hopelessness which would follow apostasy (x 26-31); incites them by recalling their former zeal (x. 32-39), the examples of the Hebrew heroes of faith (xi) and of Christ himself (xii 1-3); and bids them consider their trials as but the chastening of the Lord preparatory to a glorious salvation (xii. 4-29).

(5) In ch. xiii, are added some specific exhortations.

This epistle is the only one in which the title of priest is applied to Christ, though of course the substance of the doctrine is elsewhere taught: it represents Christianity as the completion and goal of the old dispensation, the clear announcement of that way of salvation previously taught by type and ritual. It gives the argument, therefore, most likely to establish Hebrews in the faith, and without it the N T teaching would be obviously incomplete.

The epistle was apparently written in Italy outside of Rome, such being a plausible inference from xiii 21, was known to Clement of Rome, A. D. 96, and was probably written A. D. 65-68, while the temple was still standing (xiii. 10-14) G T P He'bron [union].

1 A Levite, son of Kohath and founder of a tribal family (Ex vi. 18; 1 Chron vi 2), see HEBRONITES.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 48, 54), called originally Kirjath-arba, meaning either city of four, because consisting of four separate hamlets, or city of the croucher (Gen xxiii. 2; Josh xx. 7), see ARBA. It was built seven years before Zoan, in Egypt (Num xiii 22), and existed at least as early as the days of Abraham, who for a time resided in its vicinity, under the oaks or terebinths of Mamre (Gen xiii 18; xxxv. 27). Sarah died there, and Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah for a sepulcher. He purchased it from the Hittites who then occupied the town (xxiii 2-20). Isaac and Jacob for a time sojourned at Hebron (Gen xxxv. 27, xxxvii 14). It was visited by the spies, who found Anakim among its inhabitants (Num xxi. 22). Its king, Hoham, was one of the four kings who allied themselves with Adoni-zedek against Joshua, but who were defeated, captured, and slain (Josh. x 1-27). Hebron itself was afterwards taken, and its inhabitants destroyed (36-39). This account is supplemented by xi 21, 22, where it is recorded that at that time Joshua cut off the Anakim from Hebron, Debir, Anab, and all the hill country, and utterly destroyed their cities. After this first general campaign, however, the survivors of the old population gradually returned from their hiding places and retreats, and in the course of a few years rebuilt many of the ruined towns. Among those who thus returned were remnants of the three families of Anakim who had dwelt at Hebron. Here they were found reestablished after the conquest of Canaan (xiv. 10, 12). Caleb claimed that district as his own; and when the tribe of Judah took possession of its allotted territory after the death of Joshua, Caleb retook Hebron (Judg. i. 10-15; and, apparently by anticipation, Josh. xv. 13-19). Hebron had the Edomites occupied the south of Judah, Hebron, among other places, fell into their hands. It was recaptured from them by Judas Maccabæus, having then a fortress with towers and being the head of other towns (1 Mac. v. 65). It is not mentioned in the N. T. Hebron is now called el-Khulil er-Rahman. It is one of the oldest towns in the world which is still inhabited, instead of being simply a ruin. Hebron is situated in a valley and on an adjacent slope, 3040 feet above the level of the ocean. It is 19 miles south-southwest of Jerusalem, and 13½ south-southwest of Bethlehem. It has no walls at dependent villages (Josh. xv. 54). was assigned to the priests, and was one of the cities of refuge (Josh. xx. 7, xxi. 10-13; 1 Chron. vi. 54-57). David sent thither part of the recaptured spoil of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 31), and afterwards reigned in it for seven and a half years (2 Sam. ii. 1-3, 11, 32; v. 1-5, 13; 1 Kin. ii. 11; 1 Chron. xxix. 27), several of his sons being born there (2 Sam. iii. 2-5; 1 Chron. iii. 1-4; xi. 1-3; xii. 23-38). Abner was buried there (2 Sam. iii. 32), and the head of Ish-bosheth was placed in the same grave (iv. 1-12). It was at Hebron that Absalom raised the standard of rebellion (xv. 7-10). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 10). When, during the captivity, present, but possesses gates. The houses, which are of stone, are well built, with flat roofs, domed in the middle. It was formerly divided into three quarters, but has so increased since 1875 as to have required six more. The population is believed to be about 10,000, most of them Mussulmans, the remainder chiefly Jews. In the center and lowest part of the town are two large pools, which collect the rain water from the adjacent hills (2 Sam. iv. 12). There is a famous mosque, the precincts of which are called el-Haram (the enclosure). Within the enclosure is a cave, believed to be that of Machpelah (see MACHPELAH). The oak or terebinth of Abraham has been shown at two places; that which now exists is a genuine oak (Quercus pseudococcifera) (see MAMRE) There are twenty-five springs of water and ten large wells near Hebron, with vineyards and olive-groves.

Hebron and Sacred Enclosure over the Cave of Machpelah viewed from the North

3 A town of Asher (Josh xix 28, A. V.), but its Hebrew name is different from that of Hebron in Judah, see EBRON He'bron-ites.

The descendants of Hebron the Kohathite (Num. iii. 27; 1 Chron xxvi. 30, 31).

He'gal and He'ge.

One of the chamberlains of king Ahasuerus He was the keeper of the women (Esth. i. 3, 8, 15).

Heifer.

A young cow (Gen. xv 9; Deut. xxi 3; 1 Sam. xvi 2), see COW and PURIFICATION.

Heir.

Inheritance early became a custom. Abraham was acquainted with it (Gen. xv 3, 4) Only sons of a legal wife, not those of a concubine, had the right of inheritance. Ishmael, son of the bondwoman, might not inherit with the son of the free woman (xxi. 10); and Abraham dismissed with presents the sons whom he had begotten by concubines (xxv 5, 6). Still all of Jacob's sons were accorded equal rights. Daughters sometimes inherited like sons (Job xlii 15) By the Mosaic law a man's property was divided on his death among his sons, the eldest obtaining double the portion assigned to his younger brothers (Deut. xxi 15-17) When there were no sons, the property went to the daughters (Num. xxvii. 1-8), who, however, were required to abstain from marrying out of their own tribal family (Num. xxxvi. 1-12; Tob. vi 10-12). If circumstances demanded that a man of other family marry a sole heiress, the children of such a marriage appear to have taken the name of the mother's father (1 Chron. ii 34-41; Ezra ii 61) Failing both sons and daughters, the inheritance went to the father's brother, and after him to the nearest of kin (Num. xxvii 9-11). Greek and Roman rule introduced new customs, and made testaments and testators familiar to the Jews (Heb. ix 16, 17). In a figurative sense, believers are heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ (Rom. viii. 17).

He'lah [scum, rust, verdigris]

One of the two wives of Ashhur, the ancestor of the men of Tekoa (1 Chron. iv. 5, 7).

He'lam.

A place east of Jordan, where David defeated Hadarezer, king of Syria (2 Sam. x. 16-19) Ewald and others doubtfully identify it with Alamatha, a town mentioned by Ptolemy as west of the Euphrates, near Nicephorium.

Hel'bah [fatness, a fertile region]

A city within the territory of Asher, from which the Canaanites were not driven out (Judg. i. 31). Site unknown.

Hel'bon [fat, fertile]

A city of Syria, celebrated for its wines (Ezek. xxvii. 18) It is commonly identified with Helbun, 13 miles north of Damascus. The village is situated in a narrow valley shut in by steep, bare cliffs and long, shelving banks 2000 to 3000 feet high. The bottom of the glen is occupied by orchards, and far up the mountain slopes are terraced vineyards. Along the terraces and in the valley below are extensive ruins. The wine was celebrated in Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia (Strabo xv. 735; Nebuchadnezzar 1 R. 65, 32).

Hel'dai [durable, transitoriness]

1. A Netophathite, descended from Othniel. He was David's captain for the twelfth month (1 Chron. xxvii 15) Doubtless the person called Heled in xi 30

2 An exile who returned from Babylon (Zech. vi 10), called also Helem (ver 14).

He'leb [fatness]

The name given to Heled in 2 Sam. xxiii 29 It may possibly be the original name, but probably arose from the mistake of an early copyist, which is quite intelligible and common.

He'led [endurance, transitory life]

The son of Baanah, a Netophathite, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi 30) See HELEB and HELDAI

He'lek [smoothness, portion, lot].

A son of Gilead, and founder of a tribal family of Manasseh (Num. xxvi 30; Josh. xvii 2)

He'lem, I. [blow, stroke].

An Asherite, brother of Shamer (1 Chron. vii. 35), and probably the person called Hotham in ver 32

He'lem, II. [dream, or, perhaps, manly vigor]

The same as Heldaï 2 (Zech. vi 10 with 14).

He'leph [permutation, change, exchange].

A frontier town of Naphtali (Josh. xix 33). Van de Velde identified it with Beit Liff, in the mountains of Galilee, midway between Kadesh and Ras el-Abad.

He'lez [perhaps, alertness]

1. A Palatite or Pelonite, David's captain for the seventh month (1 Chron. xxvii 10).

2. A man of Judah, descended from Hebron (1 Chron. ii 39)

He'li [Greek form of Eli, probably elevation].

The father of Mary, the mother of Jesus. This belief is founded on the Greek text, which represents Jesus as "being son (as was supposed of Joseph) of Heli" (Luke in. 23).

Hel'kai [smooth].

A priest, head of the father's house Meraioth (Neh. xii. 15).

Hel'kath [smoothness, a part (of a field), a field].

A town on the boundary line of Asher

(Josh xix. 25), assigned, with its suburbs, to the Gershonite Levites (xxi 31). Called in 1 Chron vi 75 Hukok, which is probably a corruption of the text. Van de Velde and Robinson doubtfully identify it with Yerka. 8½ miles east by north of Acre.

Hel-kath-haz'zu-rim [field of the sharp knives].

A name given to the scene of the combat, at the pool of Gibeon, between twelve Ben-jamites of Ish-bosheth's party and the same number of David's men (2 Sam. ii. 16).

Hell.

1 The place of the dead. It is one rendering of the Hebrew word She'ol and the Greek Aïdēs (Ps xvi 10 with Acts ii. 27). R. V. of O T places Sheol either in the text or on the margin, in the prophetic books, on the margin with hell generally in the text, and in Deut xxxii 22, Ps lv 15; lxxxvi 13, on the margin, with pit in the text. In N T it puts Hades in the text. The two words are also rendered grave (Gen xxxvii 35; Is. xxxviii 10, 18, Hos xii 14, and A. V. of 1 Cor xv 55, in R V death). The etymology of the words is in doubt. Sheol may mean the insatiable (cp Prov xxvii 20, R V; xxx 15, 16). Hades, when pronounced without the aspiration, means the unseen. Both words denote the place of the dead. The evidence is not all in, but it may be safely affirmed that for centuries the Hebrews shared the common Semitic conception of Sheol. This conception was vague and undefined. There was consequently room for the imagination to play, and fancy was fond of supplying all manner of details; and care must be taken not to confound fancies with faith. The ancient Hebrews, like other Semites, thought of Sheol as beneath the earth (Num xvi 30, 33, Ezek xxxi. 17; Amos ix 2). They pictured it as entered through gates (Is xxxviii 10), a dark, gloomy region, where the inhabitants pass a conscious, but dull, inactive existence (2 Sam xxii 6; Ps vi 5; Ecc ix. 10). They regarded it as the place whither the souls of all men without distinction go (Gen xxxvii 35, Ps xxxi. 17, Is xxxviii. 10), where punishments may be suffered and rewards enjoyed, and from which a return to earth was not an impossibility (1 Sam. xxviii 8-19, Heb xi. 19). It is important to note, however, that in authoritative Hebrew doctrine Sheol was open and naked to God (Job xxvi. 6; Prov. xv 11), that God was even there (Ps cxxxix. 8), and that the spirits of his people, and their condition in that abode, were ever under his watchful eye. This doctrine of God's knowledge of his people after death, presence with them, and unceasing love for them, involved the blessedness of the righteous and the woe of the wicked after death, and two places of abode for them, the righteous being with the Lord and the wicked being banished from his presence. This doctrine lay also at the basis of the related teaching of the eventual resurrection of the body, and the life everlasting. The doctrine of future glory, and even of the resurrection of the body, was cherished in O T times (Job xix 25-27, Ps xvi. 8-11; xvii 15, xlix. 14, 15; lxxiii 24; Dan xii 2, 3). A foundation for it was early afforded by the translation of Enoch and Elijah, and it was fostered by centuries of intimate association with the Egyptians, who had congruous teaching regarding the future life and the relation of morality in the present life to happiness beyond the grave. But it remained for Christ to bring immortality to full light, and, by revealing the bliss of the saved soul even out of the body in his presence, to dispel all gloom from the future abode of his saints (Luke xxiii. 43, John xiv 1-3, 2 Cor v 6-8, Phil. i. 23). See PARADISE.

2 The place of woe. In this sense it is the rendering of the Greek Gehenna in Mat. v 22, 29, 30, x 28, xviii 9; xxiii. 15, 33; Mark ix 47, Luke xii 5, and Jas iii 6. This word is the Greek form of the Hebrew Gehinnom, valley of Hinnom, where children were burnt to Molech. From the horrible sins practiced in it, its pollution by Josiah, and perhaps also because of a funeral burnt in it, the valley of Hinnom became a type of sin and woe, and the name passed into use as a designation for the place of eternal punishment (Mat xxiii 8, 9; Mark ix 43). From the scenes witnessed in the valley imagery was borrowed to describe the Gehenna of the lost (Mat v 22; cp xiii 42; Mark ix 48). In 2 Pet ii 4, "to cast down to hell" is the rendering of the verb tartaroō, meaning "to cast down to Tartarus." The Tartarus of the Romans, the Tartaros of the Greeks, was their place of woe, situated as far below Hades as Hades was below heaven. Though the etymologies are different, Gehenna and Tartarus are essentially the same in meaning. Each is the place of punishment for the lost.

Hel'len-ist.

One, not of the Greek nation, who spoke Greek. The term is used specially of Jews, in whatever part of the world they lived, who had adopted the Greek tongue, and with it often Greek practices and opinions (R V., margin of Acts vi 1 and ix 29). The text calls them Grecian Jews; the A. V. simply Grecians.

Hel'met.

See ARMOR.

He'lon

[perhaps, strong]
Father of Eliab, prince of Zebulun (Num. i 9, ii 7, vii 24, 29; x 16).

Hem.

The edge, border, or margin of a garment (Ex xxviii. 33, 34; xxxix 24, 25, 26, in the R. V. skirts; and Mat ix. 20; xiv 36, in the R V borders). The Jews attached a certain sacredness to the hem, fringe, or border of their garments.

He'mam.

See HOMAM.

He'man [faithful].

1. A sage whose reputation for wisdom was high in Solomon's reign (1 Kin. iv. 31). He belonged to the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 6). He composed a meditative psalm (Ps. lxxxviii., according to its second and doubtless original title).

2. A singer in David's reign, a son of Joel, a grandson of the prophet Samuel, of the Levite family of Korah (1 Chron. vi. 33; xv. 17). In addition to singing, he was appointed to sound a brazen cymbal (19). He rose to a prominent place among David's musicians (xvi. 41, 42).

He'math. See HAMATH for Amos vi. 14, A. V., and HAMMATH for 1 Chron. ii. 55, A. V.

Hem'dan [pleasant, desirable]

A Horite, the eldest son of Dishon (Gen. xxxvi. 26). In the parallel passage, 1 Chron. i. 41, the Hebrew text and R. V. have Hamran, which A. V. erroneously represents by Amram. The two Hebrew words differ only in the third consonant. The difference is undoubtedly due to a scribe who confounded resh and dalet (q v). Whether Hemdan or Hamran was the original form cannot be determined at present.

Hem'lock. See GALL 2 and WORMWOOD.

Hen, I. See COCK

Hen, II. [grace, favor, kindness]

A son of Zephaniah (Zech. vi. 14). But on the margin of R. V. Hen is translated, the passage reading thus, "for the kindness of the son of Zephaniah," in which case that son's name disappears.

He'na.

A city captured by the Assyrians (2 Kin. xviii. 34, xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 13). It is mentioned in connection with Sepharvaim, and is accordingly sought for in the neighborhood of Babylonia. Hena is commonly identified with the ancient town of Ana, at a ford over the Euphrates, about 160 miles northwest of Bagdad. Extensive ruins still exist at the spot. The two names, however, are radically different. Another conjecture places it on an island in the Euphrates, where the Assyrian inscriptions locate a certain Anat.

Hen'a-dad [probably, favor of Hadad].

Founder of a Levitical family, whose sons supported Zerubbabel at the time the foundations of the temple were being laid (Ezra iii. 9), and assisted in rebuilding the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 18).

Hen'na [Persian henna, Arabic hanna].

The rendering of the Hebrew Kopher, covering, in the Septuagint and in R. V. of Song i. 14 and iv. 13. It is translated in the A. V. camphire. Henna is a plant of the Lythraceæ or loosestrife order (Lawsonia alba or vermisa), with opposite entire leaves, and fragrant, yellow and white flowers in corymbs or clusters (Song i. 14). The Greeks called it kupros, from the island of Cyprus, where it grew. In Palestine its special seat was the virtually tropical region of En-gedi (Song i. 14) and Jericho (War iv. 8, 3). The leaves and young twigs are made into a fine powder, converted into paste with hot water, and used by oriental women and wealthy men to dye the finger and toe nails and the soles of the feet a reddish orange color. Some Egyptian mummies are found with these parts dyed in the same manner.

He'noch. See ENOCH for 1 Chron. i. 3, A. V., and HANOCH for 1 Chron. i. 33, A. V.

He'pher [pit, well]

1. A town west of the Jordan (Josh. xii. 17). The name belonged to a district also, probably near Socoh (1 Kin. iv. 10).

2. A son of Gilead, founder of a tribal family of Manasseh (Num. xxvi. 32, xxvii. 1; Josh. xvii. 2).

3. A man of Judah, son of Ashhur of Tekoa (1 Chron. iv. 6).

4. A Mecherathite, and one of David's worthies (1 Chron. xi. 36). See, however, remarks under UR, II.

Heph'zi-bah [my delight is in her]

1. Mother of king Manasseh (2 Kin. xxi. 1).

2. A symbolical name to be given to Zion (Is. lxii. 4).

He'res [sun]

1. An eminence in the district of Ajalon (Judg. i. 35). The meaning and a comparison with Josh. xix. 41, 42 render the opinion probable that mount Heres is essentially identical with the town Ir-shemesh, that is Beth-shemesh.

2. A pass east of the Jordan (Judg. viii. 13, R. V.).

3. An Egyptian city. See ON.

He'resh [artificial work, artifice, silence]

A Levite (1 Chron. ix. 15).

Her'e-sy [Greek hairesis, taking (especially of a town), a sect (Acts v. 17, xv. 5)].

1. A party, sect, or faction, strong party spirit, even when this is not produced on one side or the other by departure from sound doctrine (1 Cor. xi. 19, on margin of R. V. sects, factions, Gal. v. 20, on margin of R. V. parties).

2. A doctrine or a sect consequent upon departure from sound doctrine (2 Pet. ii. 1, margin of R. V. sects of perdition).

He'reth, in A. V. Hareth, the Hebrew pausal form.

A forest in Judah, in which David for a time lurked while his life was being sought by Saul (1 Sam. xxii. 5).

Her'mas.

A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutations (Rom. xvi. 14).

Her'mes.

1. The Greek god corresponding to the Roman Mercury (Acts xiv. 12, R. V. margin). See MERCURY.

2. A Christian (not the same as Hermas) at Rome, to whom Paul sent his salutations (Rom. xvi. 14).

Her-mog'e-nes [sprung from Hermes].

An inhabitant of the Roman province of Asia, who finally, with many others, turned away from the apostle Paul (2 Tim 1 15).

Her'mon [mountain peak or sacred mountain]

A mountain called by the Sidonians Sirion, a coat of mail, and by the Amorites Senir or Shenir (Deut iii 8, 9). The last name belonged especially to a part of the mountain. Another name for it was Sion, elevated (iv. 48). It constituted the northeastern limit of the Israelite conquests under Moses and Joshua (Deut iii 8, 9; Josh xi 3, 17, xii. 1, 5, xiii 5, 11; 1 Chron v 23). It figures in Hebrew poetry, being coupled with Tabor

R V), or perhaps the word in this passage is a common noun and means peaks of Palestine. The summit of the mountain is covered with snow all the year round, wavy white furrows descending from the crest in the lines of the several valleys. The proper source of the Jordan is in Hermon. Some one of its solitary recesses rather than the summit of Tabor was probably the scene of our Lord's transfiguration. Hermon is now called Jebel esh-Sheik.

Her'mon-ites.

Natives or inhabitants of mount Hermon (Ps. xlii 6, A V, in R V, the Hermons).

Her'od.

The name of several rulers over Palestine

Mount Hermon.

(Ps lxxxix 12), Zion (cxxxiii. 3), and Lebanon (Song iv. 8), really, however, overtopping them all. It constitutes the southern end of the Anti-Lebanon chain, and rises to the elevation of 9166 feet above the sea. It may be seen from many parts of Palestine. From the plain of Tyre, the north peak seems higher than the southern one, and the center more depressed than either. Having these peaks it is described as the Hermons (Ps xlii 6, and the adjacent regions or portions of them. Three are mentioned in the N. T. by the name of Herod and one by the name of Agrippa.

1. HEROD THE GREAT.—He was the second son of the Idumæan Antipas, or Antipater, by his wife Cyprus, who was of the same race (Antiq. xiv. 1, 3; 7, 3). Thus, neither by the father's nor by the mother's side was Herod a real Jew, though the Idumæans, who had been conquered 125 B. C. by John Hyrcanus, and compelled to be circumcised and adopt Judaism, had now become nominally Jews.

Antipater was made procurator of Judæa by Cæsar in 47 B. C. (Antiq. xiv. 8, 3 and 5). He had five children, Phasaëlus, Herod, Joseph, Pheroras, and a daughter Salome (7, 3).¹ Phasaëlus, the eldest son, was made governor of Jerusalem and vicinity by his father, and Galilee was committed to Herod, who was then 25 years old (9, 2). After the murder of Antipater, 43 B. C., Marc Antony visited Syria and appointed the two brothers tetrarchs, committing the public affairs of the Jews to them (13, 1). They were afterwards sorely pressed by Antigonus, last king of the Maccabæan family, and the Parthians. Phasaëlus fell into their hands and committed suicide to avoid being put to death by them (13, 10). The Romans were now induced by Antony to espouse the cause of Herod; and war ensued with Antigonus and the Parthians, in the course of which Herod's brother Joseph was slain in battle (15, 10). Jerusalem was captured and Herod became king of Judæa in 37 B. C.

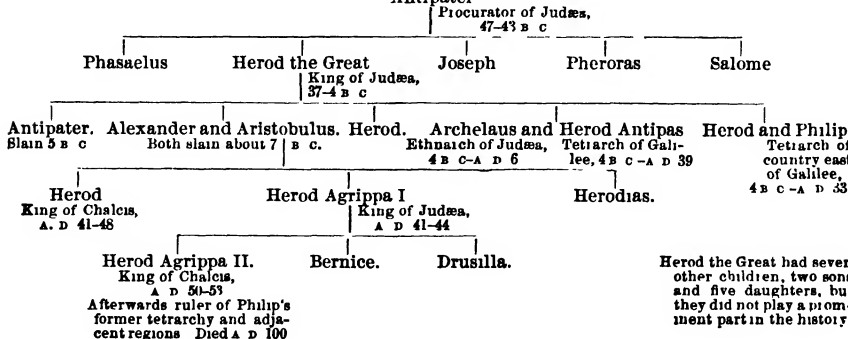

The surviving children of Antipater were now Herod, Pheroras, and Salome. Salome married her uncle Joseph (Antiq. xv. 3, 5; War i. 22, 4). After he had been put to death for adultery, 34 B. C., she married Costobarus, an Idumæan of good family whom Herod made governor of Idumæa and Gaza (Antiq. xv. 7, 9. War i. 24, 6). She divorced him (Antiq. xv. 7, 10), and against her will was married to Alexas, a friend of Herod's (War i. 28, 6). During the whole of Herod's reign, she engaged in intrigues against members of his family; but she was faithful to him, and he bequeathed to her Jamnia, Ashdod, and Phasaëlis near Jericho (Antiq. xvii. 6, 1; 8, 1; 11, 5). She accompanied Herod's son Archelaus to Rome, when he went thither to obtain imperial sanction to ascend the throne. Her ostensible purpose was to assist him in prosecuting his claim, but her real object was to thwart him (War ii. 2, 1-4). She died about A. D. 10, when Marcus Ambivius was procurator (Antiq. xviii. 2, 2). Pheroras, the youngest of the four sons of Antipater (Antiq. xiv. 15, 4), lived nearly as long as Herod. He was partner in the kingdom, had the title of tetrarch, and enjoyed the revenue accruing from the country east of the Jordan (War i. 24, 5). He was more than once accused of plotting the death of Herod, and matters came to a crisis shortly before the latter's death; but Pheroras died without being brought to trial (Antiq. xvii. 3, 3).

Herod the Great had ten wives from first to last (Antiq. xvii. 1, 3; War i. xxviii. 4). His first wife was Doris, a woman of an obscure family in Jerusalem. She bore him one son, Antipater, who took an active part in the events of Herod's reign, plotting against his younger half-brothers to secure the kingdom for himself. Herod, just before the capture of Jerusalem, by which he became king, married his second wife, the beautiful and chaste Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus. She bore him three sons, Alexander, Aristobulus, and the youngest son who died childless, and two daughters, Cyprus and Salampsio. Mariamne was put to death in 29 B. C. (Antiq. xv. 7, 4). About 24 B. C. he married Mariamne, daughter of Simon, whom he raised to the high-priesthood (xv. 9, 3; xvii. 5, 4). Herod also took to wife his two nieces, whose names are not given and who died childless, Malthace a Samaritan, Cleopatra of Jerusalem, Pallas, Phædra, and Elpis. With the two unnamed nieces and last three of known name history is not specially concerned. The descendants of the others are more important. Of Mariamne, Simon's daughter, Herod was born; Malthace became mother of Archelaus, Herod Antipas, and a daughter Olympias; and Cleopatra bore Herod and Philip.

The domestic troubles of Herod began early in his reign in the hatred which he incited in the beloved Mariamne toward himself; and they culminated in the last decade of his reign, when his sons had reached manhood. The domestic history eventually revolves about the eight young men, Antipater, son of Doris; Alexander and Aristobulus, sons of Mariamne; Herod, son of Mariamne, Simon's daughter; Archelaus and Antipas, sons of Malthace; and Herod and Philip, sons of Cleopatra. Alexander married Glyphyra, daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. Two sons were born to them whose history is not important (Antiq. xvi. 1, 2; War i 24, 2). Aristobulus married his first cousin, Bernice, daughter of Herod's sister, Salome, and became the father of five children, several of whom played an important part later in the history. Of these two young men, sons of the beloved Mariamne, Antipater, the firstborn of Herod, was jealous. His jealousy was aroused against his half-brothers by the evident intention of his father to overlook his right as firstborn in their favor (War i 22, 1), and he and his clique at court poisoned the mind of Herod against them. At length, about 7 or 6 B. C., Herod had them put to death, named Antipater his heir and appointed Herod, son of Mariamne, Simon's daughter, next in succession (Antiq. xvi 11, 7; xvii 3, 2, War i 29, 2). This order conformed to birth, his sons Archelaus and Antipas, Herod and Philip, being doubtless younger than Herod, son of Mariamne. Antipater next accused Herod's sister, Salome, and his sons, Archelaus and Philip, who were in Rome being educated, of plotting the murder of Herod; but the crime charged against Salome was brought home to himself. He and his uncle Pheroras, Herod's brother, were accused of seeking the king's life. Pheroras died, but Antipater was cast into prison. Herod's suspicions were thereby aroused that Antipater had falsely accused Alexander and Aristobulus, who had already been executed, and he altered his will, appointing Antipas to be his successor, and passed over Archelaus, the elder brother, and Philip, as he still held them in suspicion (War i 32, 7). Soon afterwards he ordered Antipater to be slain and altered his will again, giving the kingdom to Archelaus, making Antipas tetrarch of Galilee and Peraea, and Philip tetrarch of Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis, and bestowing several cities on his sister Salome (Antiq. xvii 8, 1; War i, 33, 7). Herod's disposition of his affairs was observed at his death, except that Archelaus was finally confirmed by the emperor Augustus not as king but as ethnarch of Judæa (Antiq. xvii. 11, 4 and 5).

* Antipater

Herod, son of Simon's daughter, Mariamne, married, or had married, Herodias, daughter of his half-brother, the dead Aristobulus. She, however, left him and married another half-brother of his, Herod the tetrarch, and her former husband disappears from history. So does Herod, son of Cleopatra and brother of Philip, the tetrarch. See HERODIAS and PHILIP. Aristobulus, as already mentioned, had married his cousin, Bernice, daughter of Salome, and had begotten five children (War i 28, 1). They were Herod, Agrippa, Aristobulus, Herodias, and Mariamne. Herod married Mariamne, daughter of Olympias, daughter of Herod the Great and the Samaritan Malthace. Agrippa married Cyprus, daughter of Salampsis and Phasaelus the younger, son of Herod the Great's brother, Phasaelus. Aristobulus married Jotape, daughter of a king of Emesa; Herodias married two uncles in succession, as already noted, and Mariamne married Antipater, son of Doris (Antiq. xviii. 5, 4; War i 28, 5; cp. 4). Three of these children of Aristobulus are persons of note—namely, Herod, Agrippa, and Herodias. Herodias was the woman who crowned her infamies by telling her daughter to demand the head of John the Baptist in a charger. Herod was made king of Chalcis, and after his wife's death took his niece, Bernice, Agrippa's daughter, to wife. Agrippa became king Agrippa I. He married, had one son and three daughters. Three of these children are mentioned in Scripture, Agrippa II, and the two notorious women, Bernice and Drusilla.

Besides this domestic history of the rise of the family to power and the intrigues among its members, there is the political history of Herod's reign. Soon after he had been made ruler in Galilee, which was in 47 or 46 B. C., he came in contact with the sanhedrin through his summary execution of some robbers without the sanhedrin's formal permission. He was summoned for trial and appeared with an armed body guard, intimidating the council. He was acquitted for lack of evidence. Herod sought to be, for his own interest, on good terms with the successive representatives of the warring factions into which the Roman people were then divided. He obtained a generalship from Sextus Caesar, president of Syria, a relative of the great Julius Caesar; and then, after a time, gained the favor of Cassius, the most malignant of the great dictator's assassins. Then he cast in his lot with Marc Antony, one of the murdered man's chief avengers, nor was even this his last change of sides. About 41 B. C. Herod was made tetrarch of Galilee by Antony, and having, after fresh vicissitudes, gone to Rome in 40 B. C., as a fugitive rather than a visitor, his patron induced the Roman senate to appoint him king of the Jews. It was not, however, till 37 B. C. that, with the assistance of Sosius, a general of Antony's, he succeeded in taking Jerusalem, and commencing his actual reign. By his marriage at this time with Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus and daughter of Alexander, son of Aristobulus, he became allied with the royal Asmonean family. He now endeavored to further strengthen his position by the removal of possible rivals. The principal members of the party of Antigonus, forty-five in number, were sought out and put to death. Soon afterwards Mariamme's brother, Aristobulus, a boy of seventeen, whom Herod had just raised to the high-priesthood, was drowned in a bath by Herod's orders, within a year after his elevation to the pontificate; and about 31 B C her grandfather, although eighty years old, was put to death (Antiq xv 1, 2; 3, 3; 6, 2). Herod's attention was called from these atrocities by the new crisis which had arisen. His patron Antony was totally defeated by Octavius in the sea fight at Actium on September 2, 31 B C. The position of Herod was now critical, but he made a manly and judicious speech to the victorious Octavius, and was forgiven for his partisanship toward Antony. He was given the friendship of the man he had offended, and retained it through most of his life, besides having his dominions increased (xv 6, 5-7; 10, 3). The murder of a wife's brother and her grandfather did not tend to increase her attachment to her husband, and by and by variance arose between Herod and Mariamme. It increased, till it culminated at length in the queen's being falsely accused and executed. Remorse followed in due course, and almost, if not altogether, deprived the king of reason (Antiq xv 7, 7; xvii 6, 5; War i 22, 5; 33, 5). Partly to divert his mind from gloomy remembrances, partly to please Octavius, now the emperor Augustus, he built theaters and exhibited games, both of these acts being inconsistent with Judaism. He also rebuilt, enlarged, and beautified a place named Strato's Tower, calling it, after his imperial patron Cæsarea. It ultimately became the Roman capital of Palestine (Antiq xv 8, 5, 9, 6; cp. Acts xxiii 23, 24). Then, to conciliate the Jews, he, between 19 and 11 or 9 B C, rebuilt and beautified the temple. The birth of Jesus Christ took place at the close of Herod's life, after he had removed his rivals from other families by violent deaths, and when his domestic troubles were at their height. He had slain his sons Alexander and Aristobulus, and more recently Antipater, for plotting against his life; and now he was told that a child of David's line had just been born to be king of the Jews. The slaughter of the infants who came into the world about the same time and place was such a method of meeting the difficulty as would suggest itself to one with Herod's propensity to bloodshed (Mat. ii 1-19). It was one of the last acts of his life. Seized at length with loathsomeness and mortal disease, he repaired to Callirhoe, the hot sulphur springs of the Zarka, the water from which runs into the eastern part of the Dead Sea. They came to be called, in consequence, by many, the baths of Herod; but they did not do the king much good (Antiq. xvii 6, 5). He felt that he was dying, and that there would be rejoicing when he passed away. He therefore told his sister Salome and her husband Alexas to shut up the principal Jews in the circus at Jericho, and put them to death whenever he expired, that there might be mourning at, though, of course, not for, his death. Then, about 4 B C, he passed away, in the seventieth year of his age and the thirty-fourth of his reign, counting from the time when he actually obtained the kingdom. When news of his demise arrived, the circus prisoners were set free, and the death of the tyrant was welcomed as a relief instead of being attended by mourning, lamentation, and woe (Antiq xvii. 6, 5; 8, 2).

2 HEROD THE TETRARCH.—A son of Herod the Great by his Samaritan wife called Malthace. He was, therefore, half Idumean and half Samaritan, perhaps without a single drop of Jewish blood in his veins. He was called indifferently Antipas and Herod (Antiq. xvii 1, 3; xviii. 5, 1; 6, 2; War ii 9, 1), and it is customary to distinguish him from the other Herods of the family as Herod Antipas. He was the full brother of Archelaus, and was younger than Archelaus (Antiq xvii 6, 1; War i 32, 7; 33, 7). He was educated with him and his half-brother Philip at Rome (Antiq xvii 1, 3). By the second testament of his father, the kingdom was bequeathed to him (6, 1); but by his father's final will he was appointed tetrarch of Galilee and the kingdom was given to Archelaus (8, 1). On his father's death he competed with his brother for the kingdom, but received only the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peræa (Antiq xvii 11, 4; Luke iii 1). He erected a wall around Sepphoris, and made it his metropolis. Betharamphtha in Peræa he walled, and built a palace there. It was named Livias and Julias, after Augustus' daughter (Antiq xviii 2, 1), see BETU-HARAN. He also built Tiberias (3). He married a daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabathæan Arabs, whose capital was Petra, but afterwards, while lodging at Rome with Herod Philip, his half-brother, he indulged a guilty passion for his entertainer's wife, Herodias, and arranged to divorce his lawful consort and take Herodias instead. This immoral transaction was carried into effect. Herodias was a masculine woman, Herod a weak man, she was his evil genius, and made a tool of him, as Jezebel had done of Ahab. Aretas resented the injury inflicted upon his daughter, and he commenced a war against Herod and waged it successfully (5, 1). Herodias was the prime mover in the murder of John the Baptist (Mat. xiv. 1-13; Antiq. xviii. 5, 2). Because of his cunning, the tetrarch was described by our Lord as that fox (Luke xiii. 31, 32). But the tetrarch had a following, for mention is made of the leaven of Herod (Mark viii. 15); see HERODIANS. When the fame of Jesus began to spread abroad, the uneasy conscience of Herod made him fear that John had risen from the dead (Mat. xiv. 1, 2). He was present at Jerusalem at the time of the crucifixion, and Jesus was sent to him by Pilate. He thought that now he would have the opportunity of seeing a miracle performed, but he was disappointed, and with his men of war set Jesus at naught. The same day he was reconciled to Pilate, whereas they had before been at variance (Luke xxiii. 7-12, 15; Acts i. 27). The advancement of Herodias' brother Agrippa to be king, while her husband remained only tetrarch, aroused the envy of this proud woman, and she prevailed upon Herod to go with her to Rome and ask for a crown Agrippa, however, sent letters after them to the emperor Caligula, accusing Herod of being secretly in league with the Parthians, and Herod was in consequence banished to Lyons in Gaul, A. D. 39, where he died (Antiq. xviii. 7, 1, 2, War ii. 9, 6, Greek text).

3 HEROD THE KING.—Josephus calls him simply Agrippa. Both names are generally combined, and he is designated Herod Agrippa I., to distinguish him from Herod Agrippa II., before whom Paul was tried. Agrippa I. was the son of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus. He was educated in Rome with Drusus, son of the emperor Tiberius, and Claudius (Antiq. xviii. 6, 1 and 1); but the death of Drusus and lack of funds led to his return to Judæa (2). In A. D. 37 he made another journey to Rome to bring accusations against Herod the tetrarch (Antiq. xviii. 5, 3, War ii. 9, 5). He did not return when his business was transacted, but remained in the metropolis, cultivating the acquaintance of people who might be of use to him in the future. Among others, he ingratiated himself with Caius, son of Germanicus, who shortly became the emperor Caligula (Antiq. xviii. 6, 4; War ii. 9, 5). For rash words spoken in favor of Caius, Tiberius cast him into chains, but six months later Caius became emperor, and appointed Agrippa to be king of the tetrarchy which his late uncle Philip had governed, and also of the tetrarchy of Lysanias (Antiq. xviii. 6, 10). In A. D. 39 the emperor banished Herod the tetrarch, and added his tetrarchy, which was Galilee, to the kingdom of Agrippa (7, 2). Agrippa left his kingdom for a time, and resided at Rome (8, 7). During this sojourn at the capital he prevailed upon the emperor to desist from his determination to erect his statue in the temple at Jerusalem (8, 7 and 8). When Caligula was assassinated, and Claudius, against his own will, chosen in his room, Agrippa, who was then at Rome, acted as negotiator between the senate and the new emperor, whom he persuaded to take office. As a reward, Agrippa had Judæa and Samaria added to his dominions, which now equaled those of Herod the Great (Antiq. xix. 3-5; War ii. 11, 1-5). He commenced to build a wall about the northern suburb of Jerusalem, so as to include it in the city, but was ordered to abandon the work (Antiq. xix. 7, 2). He slew James, the brother of John, with the sword (Acts xii. 1, 2), imprisoned

Peter (3-19), and at Cæsarea, immediately after he had accepted divine honor, was miserably eaten up of worms (20-23; Antiq. xix. 8, 2). He died A. D. 44, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, leaving four children, of whom three are mentioned in Scripture, Agrippa, Bernice, and Drusilla (War ii. 11, 6).

4 AGRIPPA, commonly known as Herod Agrippa II. He was son of Herod Agrippa I., and consequently great-grandson of Herod the Great, and was the brother of the notorious women Bernice and Drusilla (War ii. 11, 6). At the time of his father's death, A. D. 44, he was 17 years old, and residing at Rome, where he was being brought up in the imperial household (Antiq. xix. 9, 1 and 2). The emperor Claudius was dissuaded from appointing him to the throne of his father on account of his youth, and Judæa was placed under a procurator. Agrippa remained in Rome. He successfully seconded the efforts of the Jewish ambassadors to obtain the imperial permission to retain the official robes of the high priest under their own control (xx. 1, 1). When his uncle Herod, king of Chalcis, died about A. D. 48, Claudius presently bestowed his small realm on the western slope of Anti-Lebanon on Agrippa (5, 2; War ii. 12, 1; 14, 4, cp. i. 9, 2), so that he became king Agrippa. He espoused the cause of the Jewish commissioners who had come to Rome to appear against the procurator Cumanus and the Samaritans, and he prevailed upon the emperor to grant them an audience (Antiq. xx. 6, 3; War ii. 12, 7). In A. D. 52 Claudius transferred him from the kingdom of Chalcis to a larger realm formed of the tetrarchy of Philip, which contained Batanea, Trachonitis, and Gaulonitis, the tetrarchy of Lysanias, and the province of Abilene (Antiq. xx. 7, 1, War ii. 12, 8). His constant companionship with his sister Bernice about this time began to create scandal (Antiq. xx. 7, 3). In A. D. 54 or 55 Nero added the cities of Tiberias and Taricheæ in Galilee and Julias in Peræa with its dependent towns to his dominion (8, 4). When Felix had been succeeded by Festus as procurator of Judæa, Agrippa went to Cæsarea to salute him, accompanied by Bernice. Paul was then in confinement. Festus laid his case before the king, and on the morrow the apostle was permitted to plead his cause before the procurator, the king, and Bernice. He was entirely successful in clearing himself (Acts xxv. 13-xxvi. 32). Soon afterwards Agrippa built an addition to the palace of the Asmonæans at Jerusalem (Antiq. xx. 8, 11). Later still he enlarged and beautified Cæsarea Philippi, and established theatrical exhibitions at Berytus (9, 4). When the troubles which culminated in the Jewish war began, Agrippa endeavored to dissuade the Jews from making armed resistance to Fadus the procurator and the Romans (War ii. 16, 2-5; 17, 4; 18, 9; 19, 3). When the war broke in its fury, he fought by the side of Vespasian, and was wounded at the siege of Gamala (iii. 9, 7 and 8; 10, 10; iv. 1, 3). After the capture of Jerusalem he removed with Bernice to Rome, where he was invested with the dignity of prætor. He died A D 100.

Her'od, Pal'ace of.

A palace-fortress erected by Herod the Great about the year 24 or 23 B. C. (Antiq. xv. 9, 1 and 3). It stood at the northwest corner of the upper city, adjoined the towers of Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne on their south, and formed with them a stronghold which excited the admiration of even the Romans (War v. 4, 4; 5, 8; vi. 8, 1; 9, 1). Its site is the modern citadel by the Jaffa gate. The three towers were built of white stone. Hippicus was square, with sides 25 cubits in length. To the height of 30 cubits it consisted of solid masonry; over this was a reservoir, 20 cubits deep; and over this again a two-story house, 25 cubits in height, surmounted by battlements 2 cubits high with turrets 3 cubits higher. The entire altitude of the tower was 80 cubits. Phasaelus was larger. Its stock was a cube of solid masonry measuring 40 cubits in each direction, surmounted by a cloister, and that in turn by a palatial tower. Its entire height was about 90 cubits. It was completed about the year 10 B. C. (Antiq. xvi. 5, 2). Mariamne had half the dimensions of Phasaelus, save that it was 50 cubits high. It was magnificently adorned by Herod as befitted a tower named in honor of his wife. The palace proper on the south of these towers was entirely walled about to the height of 30 cubits, and was further protected by turrets which surmounted the wall and stood at equal distances from each other. Within were open courts with groves of trees, and numerous apartments, among which two were conspicuous for size and beauty, and were called Cæsareum and Agrippium, after Herod's friends (Antiq. xv. 9, 3, 10, 3; War i. 21, 1; v. 4, 4). The palace was occupied by Sabinus, the procurator of Syria (Antiq. xvii. 10, 2 and 3; War ii. 3, 2 and 3). In it Pilate erected golden shields in honor of the emperor Tiberius; and it is expressly called the house of the procurators (Philo, de legat. ad Caum, xxxviii. and xxxix.). The procurator Florus took up his quarters in this building erected his tribunal before it, and sentenced men to scourging and crucifixion (War ii. 14, 8 and 9). It was burned by the seditious Jews at the beginning of the war with the Romans. The three mighty towers, however, withstood the flames, and were allowed by the conqueror to stand as a witness to the kind of city the Romans had overthrown (War ii. 17, 8; vii. 1, 1).

He-ro'di-ans.

A Jewish party in the time of our Lord, who were evidently partisans of the Herod family. The Herods were not of proper Jewish descent, and they had supplanted a royal family not merely Jewish, but of priestly blood and rank. They also supported their authority by trying to please their Roman patrons. If the Herodians took the part of the Herods in these two respects, then they were in direct antagonism to the Pharisees, with whom, however, they combined at Jerusalem to entangle our Lord by the ensnaring question about paying tribute to Cæsar (Mat. xxii. 16; Mark xii. 13); and earlier in Galilee had joined in plotting against his life (Mark iii. 6; cp. Mark viii. 15). Another view is that, condoning the Herods' Idumæan descent, the Herodians supported them merely as the representatives of national against foreign rule, in which case their union with the Pharisees would be quite natural.

He-ro'di-as.

Daughter of Aristobulus, and half-sister of Herod Agrippa I. She was married to Herod, the son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, the high priest Simon's daughter. This husband is called Philip in the N. T., but is not entitled a tetrarch (Mat. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 17). He was a different person from Philip the tetrarch. It is customary to speak of him as Herod Philip, which was probably his full name. See PHILIP 4. His half-brother, Herod the tetrarch, indulged a guilty passion for her, and divorcing his wife, a daughter of king Aretas of Arabia, married Herodias while her first husband was still alive (Antiq. xviii. 5, 1, 4; 6, 2; 7, 2, War ii. 9, 6). John the Baptist reproved the guilty pair, on which Herodias plotted his death, and when her daughter Salome had gained Herod's favor by dancing before him at a gathering of the dignitaries of his tetrarchy, extorted from him a promise to give her the head of John the Baptist. The king was sorry, but, for his oath's sake, complied with her wishes (Mat. xiv. 3-12; Mark vi. 17-29; Luke iii. 19, 20; cp. Prov. vi. 26). On the banishment of the tetrarch, Herodias went with him into exile (Antiq. xviii. 7, 2, War. ii. 9, 6).

Herodias' daughter Salome married Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod the Great. After his death she married her first cousin, Aristobulus, son of king Agrippa's brother Herod and great-great-grandson of Herod the Great (Antiq. xviii. 5, 4).

He-ro'di-on.

A Christian at Rome whom Paul called his kinsman, and to whom he sent a salutation (Rom. xvi. 11).

Her'on.

The rendering of the Hebrew "naphah (Lev. xi. 19, on margin of R. V. ibis; Deut. xiv. 18). The bird so designated was held to be typical of a family, for it is followed by the words "after its kind." The heron family (Ardeide), is placed under the Grallatores or Waders. The birds which it includes are generally of large size. They have a long bill, long bare legs adapted for wading, a large hind toe, and large wings, their flight, however, being comparatively slow. Their food is principally fish and reptiles. The family contains the herons, the egrets, etc. The buff-backed heron (Ardea bubuleus), often called the white ibis, is the most abundant. These birds live and breed in vast numbers in the swamps of lake Huleh, and they associate with cattle in the pastures, where several purple ibises may usually be seen with them. The common heron (Ardea cinerea) occurs on the Jordan and its lakes, on the Kishon, and on the seacoast of Palestine. With it are found also the purple heron (Ardea purpurea) and several egrets.

Father of one of Solomon's purveyors (1 Kin iv. 10)

Hesh'bon [reason, intelligence].

The city of Sihon, the Amorite king, but apparently taken originally from the Moabites (Num xxi 25-30, 34). It was assigned by Moses to the Reubenites, and after the conquest was rebuilt by the men of that tribe (xxxii 37; Josh xiii 17). But it stood on the boundary line between Reuben and Gad (Josh xiii 26), came to be possessed by the latter, and was assigned as a town of Gad to the Levites (Josh xxi 39, 1 Chron vi 81). The Moabites held it in Isaiah's and Jeremiah's times (Is xv. 4; xvi 8, 9, Jer xlviii 2, 33, 34). Later still it was in the possession of Alexander Jannæus and Herod the Great (Antiq xiii 15, 4, xv 8, 5). It is still known as Heshbān, a ruined city standing on an isolated hill with the remains of a wall, an archway, and a temple. The sides of the valley which commences just west of the hill are honeycombed with caves and sepulchres. A great reservoir, a little eastward from the ruins of Heshbān, is probably one of the pools which were outside the town walls (Song vii 4).

Hesh'mon [fatness, fertile soil].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 27)

1. Son of Ahaz, king of Judah. He was associated with his father in the government in 728 B. C. From the fact that Ahaz was not buried in the royal sepulcher, Neteler has argued that he had been smitten with some disease which was regarded as a divine judgment on his sin. Being incapacitated for active participation in the affairs of state, Hezekiah was made active ruler. Hezekiah is said to have begun to reign at the age of 25, but the number seems to be corrupt. He was a devoted servant of Jehovah, and commenced his reign by repairing and cleansing the temple, reorganizing its religious services and its officers, and celebrating a great passover, to which he invited not merely the two tribes, but the ten (2 Chron xxix. 1-xxx. 13). He removed the high places, cast down the images, and broke in pieces the brazen serpent which Moses had made, but which had become an object of idolatrous worship. He gained a victory over the Philistines, and in other ways became great and prosperous. In his fourth regnal year, 724 B. C., Shalmaneser commenced, and in 722 B. C. Sargon completed, the siege of Samaria, carrying the ten tribes into captivity (2 Kin xviii 9, 10). In 714 B. C., according to the method of reckoning already employed by the Hebrew annalist, began the series of Assyrian invasions which formed a marked feature of Hezekiah's reign and terminated disastrously for Assyria. The biblical account of these events is presented as a connected narrative. It falls into three sections: the beginning of the invasions about 714 (2 Kin xviii 13; Is xxxvi 1, probably 2 Chron xxxiii 1-8, cp invasion of Philistia in 711, Is xx 1), the main campaign of 701, in its first stage (2 Kin xviii 14-16), and in its final stage (17-xix 35, 2 Chron xxxiii 9-21; Is xxxvi 2-xxxvii 36); and the end of the trouble in 681 (2 Kin xix 36, 37; Is xxxvii. 37, 38). Sargon was still on the throne of Assyria in 714; but he had placed his son Sennacherib in high military position before that date, and Sennacherib may have led the troops of his father which in 720 or 715 and the beginning of 714, probably at the latter date, "subjugated Judah" according to the Assyrian account, when the main army of Assyria was waging war to the north and east of Assyria. Apparently immediately after the beginning of these invasions, in 714, Hezekiah was sick, probably from a carbuncle, and nigh unto death; but was granted a new lease of life for fifteen years (2 Kin. xx 1-11, Is. xxxviii). To inquire into the sign which Hezekiah received at this time was the ostensible object of an embassy from Merodach-baladan, king of Babylon. The real object was to persuade Judah's king to join the great confederacy which was being secretly formed against the Assyrian power. Hezekiah was quite elated by the coming of the Babylonian ambassadors, and displayed to them his financial resources; but the prophet Isaiah warned him that the people of Judah would be carried captive to that same place from which the ambassadors had come (2 Kin. xx. 12-19; 2 Chron. xxxii. 31; Is. xxxix 1-8). Hezekiah joined the confederacy. Sargon, who was an able general, broke in upon the allies before their plans were matured. His expedition against Ashdod, conducted by his tartan (Is xx 1), took place in 711, and was occasioned by the refusal of Philistia, Judah, Edom, and Moab to pay tribute. In 710 he dethroned Mero-dach-baladan and made himself king of Babylonia. In 705 Sargon was murdered, and his son Sennacherib ascended the Assyrian throne. This change of rulers was the signal for new uprisings. To quell revolt in the west, Sennacherib advanced as far as the country of the Philistines in 701, conquering Phœnicia on the way and receiving envoys from Ashdod, Ammon, Moab, and Edom suing for peace. Many towns still held out, and Sennacherib proceeded against Joppa, Beth-dagon, Ashkelon, and other places. Turning eastward, he captured Lachish, pitching his camp there and receiving tribute from the terrified Hezekiah. This tribute consisted of thirty talents of gold, three hundred, or, according to the Assyrian scribe who perhaps computes by a lighter standard, eight hundred talents of silver. Besides this, according to the Assyrian report, were precious stones, costly woods, articles of ivory, daughters of Hezekiah, women of the palace, and others. To obtain the precious metals, Hezekiah stripped the doors and pillars of the temple of their plating. News, however, reached Sennacherib while still at Lachish of an alliance between the Philistine towns and Egypt and Ethiopia (2 Kin. xviii 21, 24), and, unwilling to have so strong a fortress as Jerusalem in his rear, he sent a detachment from his army to garrison the city. Hezekiah had heard of the advance of the southern army, and of the sturdy resistance of Ekron to the Assyrians. His faith in Jehovah also revived under the exhortations of Isaiah, and he refused to admit the Assyrian troops into the city. In the meantime the Assyrian king had broken camp at Lachish and fallen back on Libnah (2 Kin. xix. 8). Hearing of Hezekiah's new attitude of defiance, he dispatched messengers with threatening letters to him, vowing future vengeance; and, not daring to meet the Egyptians and Ethiopians while Ekron and Jerusalem were in his rear, he retreated to Eltekeh. There the battle took place. The Egyptians were repulsed, but the spoils of victory were inconsiderable. Sennacherib now turned his attention to the hostile towns in the vicinity. His devastation and his advance toward Jerusalem were only terminated by the sudden plague which smote his army, whereby in one night 185,000 of his warriors perished (2 Kin. xix. 35, 36). See SENNACHERIB. Besides Isaiah, Hosea and Micah were contemporaries of Hezekiah (Hos i. 1; Mic. i. 1). The king died about 698, leaving his son Manasseh to ascend the throne (2 Kin. xx. 21; 2 Chron. xxxii. 33).

2. An ancestor of the prophet Zephaniah (Zeph. i. 1; in A. V. Hizkiah).

3. A son of Neariah, akin to the royal family of Judah (1 Chron. iii. 23).

4. A man of whose descendants through Ater some returned with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 16, Neh. vii. 21). Probably it was the representative of his family who signed the covenant under Nehemiah's rule (Neh. x. 17; in A. V. Hizkiah).

He'zi-on [vision].

Father of Tabrimmon and grandfather of Benhadad, king of Syria (1 Kin. xv. 18).

He'zir [a swine, a pig].

1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and became the seventeenth course of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 15).

2. A chief of the people who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 20).

A man from the brooks of Gaash. He was one of David's heroes (2 Sam. xxiii. 30). Called in 1 Chron. xi. 32. Hurai.

Hid'de-kel [Hebrew; in Assyrian idāḫlat, Old Persian tigra, Greek tigris].

The river Tigris, which goeth in front of Assyria (Gen. ii. 14, R. V.; Dan. x. 4). It is still called Hiddekel by a large portion of the people living near its banks. Its principal sources in central Armenia spring from the southern slope of Anti-Taurus. The western flows by Diarbekr, winding for above 150 miles. The two eastern, known as Bitlis Chai and Boh-tan Chai, rise south of lake Van, and are about 100 miles long. After the junction of these streams the river proceeds nearly east-south-east, through the Kurdistan mountains, gradually increased by various affluents, especially the greater and lesser Zab and the Diyala from the eastern, with smaller feeders from the western side, finally joining the Euphrates. In antiquity, it emptied through its own mouth into the Persian Gulf. In its course it passes the ruins of Nineveh, which lie on the left or eastern bank, nearly opposite Mosul on its right side. Lower down it separates Bagdad into two portions, and afterwards passes the ruins, first of Ctesiphon, the Parthian capital, and then those of Seleucia, which, under the Greek dynasty, became the rival of Babylon. The whole course of the Tigris to the junction with the Euphrates is 1146 miles, only a little more than half the length of the sister stream.

Hi'el [probably, God liveth].

A native of Bethel, who, in Ahab's reign, fortified Jericho, bringing down on himself the fulfillment of Joshua's imprecation. His eldest son died, perhaps was sacrificed, when the foundation of the city was laid, and his youngest son when the gates were set up (1 Kin. xvi. 34 with Josh. vi. 26).

Hi-e-rap'o-lis [sacred city].

A city in Asia Minor, in the valley of the Lycos near the confluence with the Meander. Not far distant were Colossæ and Laodicea (Col. iv. 13). It was a seat of worship of the Syrian goddess Atargatis, and was celebrated for its warm baths. It is now called Pambûk-Kalah-ni.

Hig-ga'lon [a deep sound; meditation].

A musical term occurring in Ps. ix. 16. The word is used elsewhere in the sense of solemn sound, meditation (Ps. xix. 14; xcii. 3; Lam. iii. 63).

High' Pla-ces.

Localities selected as shrines for the worship of God or of false divinities, or the shrines themselves. They were established on lofty heights (Num. xxi. 41; 1 Kin. xi. 7; xiv. 23), within or near towns (2 Kin. xvii. 9; xxiii. 5, 8), and even in valleys (Jer. vii. 31; cp. Ezek. vi. 3). The Canaanites possessed them, and the Israelites were strictly enjoined to destroy them when they entered Canaan (Num. xxxiii. 52; Deut. xxxiii. 29; cp. ancient high places excavated at Gezer, Tell es-Sâfiyeh, Taanach). The Moabites also had high places (Num. xxi. 28; xxii. 41; Josh. xiii. 17, see the name Bamoth-baal; Is. xv. 2; Jer. xlviii. 35). Immorality was common on the way to those shrines (Jer. iii. 2; cp. 2 Chron. xxi. 11).

A suitable area, of a size determined by circumstances, was prepared by leveling the ground. On it stood an altar (1 Kin. xii. 32), which, as at Petra, might be a part of the living rock left standing, with steps to approach it, when the spot was leveled. Near the altar was a wooden Asherah; and not far off was a pillar or a row of pillars, consisting of unhewn stones, six feet or more in length, set on end, as at Gezer and Petra (1 Kin. xiv. 23; Jer. xvii. 2; see ASHERAH and PILLAR). Houses were often connected with these sanctuaries (1 Kin. xii. 31; 2 Kin. xxiii. 19), for sheltering the idol (2 Kin. xvii. 29, 32), and presumably for other purposes also. Benches around the sides of the area or a chamber afforded a place for the worshipers to sit and partake of the sacrificial feast (1 Sam. ix. 12, 13, 22). Priests were attached to the high place (1 Kin. xii. 32; 2 Kin. xvii. 32), who burnt incense and offered sacrifice (1 Kin. xiii. 2; cp. iii. 3, xi. 8).

At times the worship of Jehovah was conducted by the Israelites on high places; but this was forbidden by law, which insisted upon one altar for all Israel. The purpose of this law was to foster the national spirit and guard against schism, to prevent the people from worshipping at idolatrous shrines, and losing or corrupting the religion of Jehovah, and to secure the support of a national sanctuary which would enable the worship of Jehovah to be conducted on a scale of magnificence commensurate with his glory, and equal, if not superior, to the pomp displayed at the heathen temples. The worship of Jehovah at other altars was legitimate only during the time that the national sanctuary had temporarily ceased, during the period when Jehovah had forsaken Shiloh and the temple was not yet erected (Ps. lxxviii. 60, 61, 67-69, 1 Kin. iii. 2, 4; 2 Chron. i. 3). Altars and sacrifices elsewhere than at Jerusalem were also legitimate in the northern kingdom when the pious were precluded from attendance at Jerusalem, and could not worship Jehovah at all, unless according to the primitive law (1 Kin. xviii. 30-32); see ALTAR. Solomon, sinfully complying with the wishes of his heathen wives, erected high places in the mount of Corruption for Ashtoreth, Chemosh, and Milcom or Molech (2 Kin. xxiii. 13). Jeroboam, to counteract the influence of the national sanctuary at Jerusalem, made a house of high places at Bethel and ordained priests (1 Kin. xii. 31, 32; xiii. 33), purposing the adoration of Jehovah, but by idolatrous symbols (xii. 28-33; xiii. 2). These places were denounced by the prophets (xiii. 1, 2; Hos. x. 8). Not merely at Bethel, but at other cities in Samaria, did schismatic high places exist (1 Kin. xii. 32; 2 Kin. xvii. 32; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3). The action of Asa and Jehoshaphat in the kingdom of Judah with regard to high places was ineffective (1 Kin. xv. 14 with 2 Chron. xiv. 3; xv. 17; 1 Kin. xxii. 43 with 2 Chron. xvii. 6). Jehoram, Jehoshaphat's son, made high places in the mountains of Judah (2 Chron. xxi. 11). So did Ahaz, and that too for the worship of false divinities, where he sacrificed and burnt incense (xxviii. 4, 25). Hezekiah broke them down (2 Kin. xviii. 4, 22), but they were re-erected by Manasseh (xxi. 3; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3), and again removed by Josiah (2 Kin. xxiii. 5, 8, 13). The high places were denounced by the prophets (Ezek. vi. 3), and emphasis was laid on the fact that Zion was Jehovah's dwelling-place, his sanctuary and holy mountain (Is. ii. 2, 3; viii. 18; xviii. 7; xxxiii. 20; Joel ii. 1; iii. 17, 21; Amos i. 2; Mic. iv. 1, 2).

High Priest.

The supreme pontiff and the representative of the nation before Jehovah. Aaron was appointed to this office after the establishment of the covenant at Sinai and after the erection of the tabernacle had been authorized (Ex. xxvii. 21; xxviii.). The reference in Ex. xvi. 33, 34, where Moses bids Aaron lay up a pot of manna before the Lord, is not an anticipation of this call, for the command was probably issued by Moses at a later time, at least it was obeyed by Aaron at a later time, and is recorded here because the entire story of the manna is related here (31-35). The first hint that it was important for the sons of Aaron to be admitted to the privilege enjoyed by the elders of Israel was given after the covenant had been proclaimed (Ex. xxiv. 1, 9). The distinction accorded them, however, did not suggest the national priesthood to them. Aaron was not the priest of the nation at this time. He was the prophet of Moses. The addition of his sons to the commission appointed to witness a manifestation of God's glory might suggest that Aaron's present office was to be inherited by his sons. At any rate it foreshadowed their call to future work. The legal head of the house of Aaron held the office of high priest; and the succession was probably determined by primogeniture, unless legal disabilities interfered (Lev. xxi. 16-23). Political considerations also, not infrequently played a part in his selection (1 Kin. ii. 26, 27, 35). His age when he might assume office was twenty, according to tradition. Aristobulus, however, officiated when he was seventeen (Antiq. xv. 3, 3). He must govern his conduct by special laws (Lev. xxi. 1-15). His duties were the oversight of the sanctuary, its service, and its treasure (2 Kin. xii. 7 seq.; xxii. 4); the performance of the service on the day of atonement, when he was obliged to enter the holy of holies, and the consultation of God by Urim and Thummim. Besides these distinguishing duties, he was qualified to discharge any priestly function; and it was customary for him to offer the sacrifices on Sabbaths, new moons, and annual festivals (War v. 5, 7). He presided also over the sanhedrin when religious questions were before that body (Mat. xxvi. 57; Acts v. 21). His official garments, besides the raiment of white linen which he wore in common with other priests (q. v.) were—1. Breastplate: square, made of gold, and blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twisted linen, set with four rows of precious stones, three in a row, each inscribed with the name of a tribe. Within the breastplate were the Urim and Thummim (q. v.). 2. Ephod: an embroidered vestment of the same rich materials as the breastplate. It was intended for the front and back of the body, and was made in two parts clasped together at the shoulder by onyx stones. Each stone bore the names of six tribes. The ephod carried on its front the breastplate, and was bound about the waist by a girdle of gold, blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twisted linen. 3. Robe of the ephod: which was longer than the ephod, and worn underneath it, entirely blue, sleeveless, and adorned below with a fringe of alternate pomegranates and golden bells, see BELL 4. Miter: a cap or turban, made of linen and surmounted, in later times at least, by another of blue, and this in turn by a triple crown of gold. A gold plate, bearing the inscription Holiness to Jehovah, was fastened to the front by a blue ribbon (Ex. xxviii.; Ecclesi. xlv. 8-13, Antiq. iii. 7, 1-6; cp 1 Mac. x. 20). The high priest wore this official garb when discharging his peculiar duties, except that on the day of atonement he laid it aside while he entered the holy of holies to make atonement for the priesthood and the sanctuary. The mode of consecration is described in Ex. xxix. Among other ceremonies the sacred oil was poured upon his head (7; Lev. viii. 12, Ps. cxxxiii. 2), and hence by way of distinction he is designated the anointed priest (Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16; xxi. 10; Num. xxxv. 25). The common priests seem to have been consecrated by having the oil sprinkled on their garments only (Ex. xxix. 21; Lev. viii. 30), but rabbinical tradition makes the difference consist in the quantity of oil used. It was poured abundantly on the head of the high priest and sparingly upon the heads of the ordinary priests. At first the high-priesthood was for life, but Herod, and afterwards the Romans, jealous of the power which a life tenure of the office gave to the high priest, made and unmade the pontiffs at will. Jesus is the High Priest of our profession, of whom the Jewish dignitary of the same designation was only the type (Heb. iii. 1-3; viii. 1-6; ix. 24-28). For the chief priests of the N. T., see PRIESTS, end of the article.

THE LINE OF THE HIGH PRIESTS.

I. From the Establishment of the Aaronic Priesthood to the Exile—The biblical catalogues are two (1 Chron vi. 1-15, Ezra vii. 1-5), each of which omits links of the genealogy, as is quite usual in Hebrew genealogical tables.

Ark removed from Kirjath jearim and deposited in the house of Obed-edom (2 Sam. vi 1-11, 1 Chron xiii 13, 14) Transferred to the city of David (2 Sam vi 12 seq) Zadok and Abiathar the priests assist (1 Chron xv 11, 12) Ark placed in a tent and an altar erected (2 Sam vi 12 17; cp. vii 2). Zadok and Ahimelech, son of Abiathar, are named as the priests during a certain period of David's reign (2 Sam viii 17; 1 Chron xviii 16) The date is uncertain; it is not improbably after Absalom's revolt.

Zadok, and the Levites bearing the ark, in his flight (2 Sam xv 24 seq) Zadok and Abiathar are called the priests (2 Sam xv. 35, xvii 15, xix 11, xv 25) Their sons who serve as messengers are Ahimaaz and Jonathan respectively (2 Sam xv 27, 36) In the attempt to debar Solomon from the succession and advance Adonijah, and Abiathar follow David

Zadok is loyal to David (1 Kin i 8)

Abiathar favors Adonijah (1 Kin. i 7

Zadok and Ahimelech, son of Abiathar, superintend the division of the priests into courses (1 Chron xxiv 3, 6, 31) They do this as the active heads of their respective fathers' houses. In consequence of a second conspiracy in favor of Adonijah, made after Solomon had ascended the throne, Zadok is put into the room of Abiathar (1 Kin ii 26, 35).

By the deposition of Abiathar, the house of Eli falls (1 Kin. ii. 27), and Zadok is sole high priest.

Ahimaaz.

Azariah.

Amariah, chief priest in the reign of Jehoshaphat, about 853 B. C. (2 Chron. xix. 11).

Jehoiada, in the reigns of Athaliah and Joash, dying in the reign of Joash at the age of 130 years (2 Kin. xi. 4-14; xii. 2, 2 Chron. xxii. 10 seq., xxiv. 15).

Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, perhaps high priest, slain by Joash between 819 and 805 B. C. (2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 22).

Johanan.

Azariah, who officiated in the temple at Jerusalem about 750 B. C., in the reign of Uzziah (1 Chron. vi. 10; 2 Chron. xxvi. 17).

Urijah, about 732 B. C., in the reign of Ahaz (2 Kin. xvi. 10).

Azariah, about 727 B. C., in the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 10, 13).

Amariah.

Ahitub.

Meraioth (1 Chron. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11).

Zadok.

Shallum or Meshullam (1 Chron. vi. 12, ix. 11).

Hilkiah, in the eighteenth year of the reign of Josiah, 622 B. C. (1 Chron. ix. 11; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8, 9).

Azariah.

Seraiah.

Jehozadak, who was carried captive to Babylonia by Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B. C. (1 Chron. vi. 15) interval of fifty years during the exile.

II. From the Exile to the Maccabæan Priests.

Jeshua, son of Jehozadak, who returned from captivity with Zerubbabel, and was high priest from at least 538 to 520 B. C. (Ezra ii. 2, iii. 2, Neh. xii. 10, Zech. i. 7, iii. 1, vi. 11).

Joiakim (Neh. xii. 10, 12), in the days of [Artaxerxes (Antiq. xi. 5, 1).

Eliashib, in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes, 446 B. C., and still in office after 433 B. C. (Neh. iii. 20; xii. 10, xiii. 4, 6).

Joiada.

Jonathan (Neh. xii. 11), or rather Johanan (22, 23) in Greek John, high priest, as early as 411 B. C. (Elephantine papyri) and in the reign of Artaxerxes [Mnemon] (Antiq. xi. 7, 1, cp. 5, 4), who occupied the throne from 405 to 362 B. C.

Jaddua, high priest when Alexander the Great visited Jerusalem, 332 B. C., and died about the same time as Alexander, 323 B. C. (Neh. xii. 11, Antiq. xi. 8, 4 and 5 and 7).

Onias, in Hebrew perhaps Comah, contemporary of Arius, who was king of Sparta from about 309 to 265 B. C. (1 Mac. xii. 7, 20, Antiq. xi. 8, 7).

Simon the Just, son of Onias.

Eleazar, son of Onias and brother of Simon, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, who reigned from 285 to 247 (Antiq. xii. 2, 5).

Manasseh, uncle of Eleazar (Antiq. xii. 4, 1).

Onias II., son of Simon the Just, in the time of Ptolemy Euergetes, who reigned from 247 to 222 (Antiq. xii. 4, 1).

Simon II., son of Onias II. (Antiq. xii. 4, 10).

Onias III., son of Simon II., in the time of Seleucus IV., called Philopator, who reigned from 187 to 175 B. C. (2 Mac. iii., Antiq. xii. 4, 10).

Joshua, in Greek Jesus, son of Simon II., who assumed the name Jason, induced Antiochus Epiphanes who reigned from 175 to 164 B. C., to depose Onias (2 Mac. iv. 7, 26-45). After holding office about three years, Jason was supplanted, about 171 B. C., by Menelaus, called also Onias, son of Simon II. (Antiq. xii. 5, 1, xv. 3, 1). According to 2 Mac. iv. 23, he was the brother of Simon the Benjamite. Menelaus held office ten years (Antiq. xii. 9, 7), and was put to death in the time of Judas Maccabæus (2 Mac. xiii. 3-8).

Jakim, with the Greek name of Alcimus, who was not of the high-priestly line, although of the stock of Aaron, put in office by Demetrius, 161 B. C., and retained office three years (1 Mac. vii. 5-9, 12-25; ix. 1, 54-56, Antiq. xii. 9, 7, xx. 10, 1).

Vacancy of seven years (Antiq. xx. 10, 1).

III. The Maccabæan Priest-kings

Jonathan, of the priestly family of Joarib (1 Mac. iii. 1; 1 Chron. xxiv. 7), made high priest in 152 B. C. by Alexander Balas, who was contending for the Syrian throne (1 Mac. x. 18-21), and held office for seven years in round numbers (Antiq. xx. 10, 1).

Simon, his brother, for eight years.

John Hyrcanus, son of Simon, for thirty years.

Aristobulus, son of Hyrcanus, for one year.

Alexander Jannæus, son of Hyrcanus, for twenty-seven years.

Hyrcanus, son of Alexander, for nine years.

Aristobulus, son of Alexander, for three years three months.

Hyrcanus, a second time, for twenty-four years, from 63 B. C.

Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, for three years, three months, until Herod the Great took possession of Jerusalem in 37 B. C. (Antiq. xiv. 16, 4; xx. 10, 1).

IV. From the Accession of Herod the Great until Jerusalem was taken by Titus—During this period there were twenty-eight high priests (Antiq. xx. 10, 1), one being generally removed to make way for his successor.

Appointed by Herod the Great, king from 37 to 4 B. C.:

Hananel, in Latinized Greek Ananelus (Antiq. xv. 2, 4).

Aristobulus, grandson of Hyrcanus, for one year, about 35 B. C. (Antiq. xv. 3, 1 and 3).

Haranel, a second time (Antiq. xv. 3, 3).

Jesus, son of Phabes (Antiq. xv. 9, 3).

- Simon, son of Boethus (Antiq xv. 9, 3), from about 24 to 5 b c Matthias, son of Theophilus and son-in-law of Boethus (Antiq xvii 4, 2).
Joazar, son of Boethus (Antiq xvii 6, 4, 13, 1)
 Appointed by Archelaus, who ruled from 4 b c to a d 6
Eleazar, son of Boethus, who did not abide long in office (Antiq xvii 13, 1).
Jesus, son of Sie (Antiq xvii 13, 1)
 Appointed by Quirinius, president of Syria
Annas, or Ananias, son of Seth, who obtained the office in a d 6 or 7, Joazar, whom the multitude had made high priest, being put down (Antiq xviii 2, 1, cp 1, 1).
 Appointed by Valerius Gratus, procurator of Judea a d 14-25
Ismael, son of Phabi, who held office but a short time (Antiq xviii 2, 2)
Eleazar, son of Annas, for one year (Antiq xviii 2, 2)
Simon, son of Camithus, for one year (Antiq xviii 2, 2)
Joseph Calaphas, son-in-law to Annas, from about a d 18 to 36 (John xviii 13, Antiq xviii 4, 3).
 Appointed by Vitellius, president of Syria
Jonathan, son of Annas, in a d 36 (Antiq xviii 4, 2 and 3, cp xix 6, 4, xx 8, 5)
Theophilus, son of Annas, in a d 37 (Antiq xviii 5, 3).
 Appointed by king Herod Agrippa I, who reigned from a. d 41 to 44:
Simon Cantheras, son of Boethus (Antiq xix 6, 2).
Matthias, son of Annas (Antiq xix 6, 4)
Elionæus, son of Cantheras (Antiq xix 8, 1)
 Appointed by Herod, king of Chalcis, who died in a d 48.
Joseph, son of Camidus (Antiq xx 1, 3)
Ananias, son of Nedebeus (Antiq xx, 5, 2), sent in bonds to Rome during the procuratorship of Cumanus, but acquitted and still in office in a d 57, two years before Felix was succeeded by Festus (Acts xxiii 2, xxiv 1, 27)
 Appointed by king Agrippa II
Ismael, son of Phabi (Antiq xx 8, 8), about a d 59, who went to Rome and was detained there as hostage (xx 8, 11)
Joseph, called Cabi, son of the former high priest Simon (Antiq xx 8, 11)
Annas, son of Annas, for three months in a d 62 (Antiq xx 9, 1)
Jesus, son of Dammæus (Antiq xx 9, 1).
Jesus, son of Gamaliel (Antiq xx 9, 4, cp War iv 5, 2)
Matthias, son of Theophilus, appointed about a d 64 (Antiq xx 9, 7).
 Made high priest by the people during the war
Phanas, or Phannias, son of Samuel (Antiq xx 10, War iv 3, 8)

Hil'en. See HOLON 1

Hil-ki'ah [portion of Jehovah (cp Job xxxi. 2), or Jehovah is the portion (cp. Ps. xvi. 5)]

1. A Levite, son of Amzi, descended from Merari (1 Chron vi 45, 46)

2 Another Merarite Levite, son of Hosah (1 Chron xxvi 11)

3. Father of Eliakim, who was over the household in Hezekiah's reign (2 Kin xviii. 18, 26; Is xxii. 20; xxxvi 3)

4 A priest, father of Jeremiah (Jer i 1)

5 Father of Jeremiah's contemporary Gemariah (Jer xxix 3).

6 The high priest contemporary with Josiah, who aided the king in his reformation of religion, and found the book of the law (2 Kin xxii 4-14; xxiii 4; 1 Chron. vi. 13; 2 Chron. xxxiv 9-22). See JOSIAH.

7 A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii 7) In the next generation a father's house bore this name (ver. 21).

8 One of those who stood by Ezra when he read the law to the people (Neh. viii. 4).

Hill.

A conspicuous natural elevation of land. The name is generally applied to a natural eminence smaller than a mountain and larger than a mound; but the terms are relative, the same height being sometimes known by both names (Is. xxxi. 4), or called a mountain in one locality and a hill in another (Rev. xvii. 9). Hill is chiefly the rendering of the Hebrew Gib'ah and the Greek Bounos. Not infrequently it is also employed in the

A V, and much less frequently in the R V (Ps ii 6. iii 4; xv 1; xxiv 3; xlii. 6; Mat. v 14; Luke iv 29), to translate Hebrew Har and Greek ὄρος, which are usually rendered mountain

A Hebrew liquid measure, containing about one gallon and three pints, U S. wine measure (Ex. xxix. 40; Antiq. iii. 8, 3). See MEASURE.

Hind.

A female stag, in Hebrew 'Ayyalah (Gen. xlix. 21; Job xxxix. 1; Ps xviii 33, Prov. v. 19; Song ii. 7; Jer. xiv 5) See HART.

Hinge.

In ancient times in the East heavy doors turned on pivots, which were constructed on the upper and lower corners of one side and inserted in sockets. The socket is probably more especially referred to in 1 Kin. vii. 50. See also Prov. xxvi. 14

Hin'nom, Val'ley of; known also as the valley of the son of Hinnom or of the children of Hinnom.

A valley at Jerusalem, near the gate of pottsherds (Jer. xix 2; not east gate as in A. V.). The boundary between Judah and Benjamin passed from En-rogel by the valley of the son of Hinnom to the southern side of Jerusalem, and thence to the top of the mountain which faces the valley of Hinnom from the west, and is at the outermost part of the vale of Rephaim (Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16). If the term "shoulder of the Jebusite (the same is Jerusalem)" includes the hill on the west of the Tyropœon valley, and not merely the temple hill; in other words, if the term denotes the plateau which juts out southward between the great encircling wadies, and which was not only crowned by the citadel of the Jebusites, but also occupied by their dwellings without the walls and by their fields, then the description in the Book of Joshua identifies the valley of Hinnom with at least the lower part of the valley which bounds Jerusalem on the south, and is now known as the wady er-Rababeh, near its junction with the ravine of the Kidron. At the high place of Tophet, in the valley of Hinnom, parents made their children pass through the fire to Molech. Ahaz and Manasseh were guilty of this abomination (2 Chron xxviii 3; xxxiii 6). Jeremiah foretold that God would visit this awful wickedness with sore judgment, and would cause such a destruction of the people that the valley would become known as the valley of slaughter (vii 31-34; xix 2, 6; xxxii 35). Josiah defiled the high place to render it unfit for even idolatrous rites, and thus to stop the sacrifices (2 Kin xxiii. 10). From the horrors of its fires, and from its pollution by Josiah, perhaps also because of it was burnt there, the valley became a type of sin and woe, and the name Ge-hinnom, corrupted into Gehenna, passed into use as a designation for the place of eternal punishment.

Hip-po-pot'a-mus [Greek 'hippopotamos, river horse]. See BEHEMOTH.

Hi'rah [nobility].

An Adullamite, a friend of Judah (Gen. xxxviii. 1, 12).

Hi'ram; in Chronicles Hu'ram, except in the Hebrew text of 2 (Chron. ii 11^b; ix. 10 [probably consecration]). In Hebrew the name is also written Hirom (1 Kin. v. 10, 18; vii 40, R. V. margin).

1. A king of Tyre. According to the citation which Josephus makes from the Phœnician historian Dios, and from the Tyrian annals which Menander translated, Hiram succeeded his father Abibaal, reigned thirty-four years, and died at the age of 53 (Antiq. viii. 5, 3; con Apion i 17, 18). He enlarged the city of Tyre by constructing an embankment on the eastern side, built a causeway to connect the city with the island on which the temple of Jupiter or Baal-sameh stood, dedicated a golden pillar in this temple, rebuilt old sanctuaries, roofing them with cedars cut on Lebanon, and erected temples to Hercules and Astarte. He was a friend of both David and Solomon (1 Kin. v 1; 2 Chron. ii. 3). Some time after David had captured the stronghold of Zion, Hiram sent an embassy to him; and, when David desired a palace, Hiram furnished the cedar timber and the masons and carpenters (2 Sam. v. 11). This was evidently before the birth of Solomon (2 Sam. vii. 2, 12; xi 2). When Solomon ascended the throne, Hiram sent congratulations. For a consideration he furnished cedar and fir for building the temple, and skilled workmen to assist in preparing the timber and stone (1 Kin. v 1-12; 2 Chron. ii 3-16). He also advanced 120 talents of gold (1 Kin. ix. 14), and joined Solomon in sending to Ophir for the precious metal (1 Kin. ix 26-28; 2 Chron. ix. 21). In partial payment for his contributions, he was offered twenty towns in Galilee, which however he refused (1 Kin. ix. 10-12; 2 Chron. viii 1, 2); see CABUL. The chronological statements of Josephus and the Bible have never been reconciled. Josephus' statement that the temple was begun in Hiram's eleventh year (Antiq. viii 3, 1) or twelfth (con Apion i 18) need not receive serious consideration: for it is probably a calculation of his own, and not a citation from the archives. Either the thirty-four years assigned as the duration of Hiram's reign or the text of 1 Kin. ix 9-12 may be corrupt. The passage in Kings is parallel to 2 Chron. viii 1, and this latter passage does not require the assumption that Hiram lived to the end of the twenty years wherein the temple and the royal palace were built.

2. An artificer, whose father was a Tyrian and his mother a widow of Naphtali (1 Kin. vii 13, 14), but by birth a woman of Dan (2 Chron. ii 14). He executed the bronze or copper work in connection with Solomon's temple, as the pillars, the laver, the basins, the shovels (1 Kin. vii 13-46; 2 Chron. ii 13, 14). The title father (2 Chron. ii 13; iv. 16) probably denotes a master workman or a counselor.

History.

Biblical history is the record of that series of events which form the basis for the religion of the Bible (cp. Mark x 2-9; Rom. xv 4; 1 Cor. x 11). It may be divided into four periods. 1. An account of the creation of the universe, showing God's relation to the world, and introducing human history. 2. A sketch of human history, showing God's relation to the human race, and introducing the history of the chosen people. 3. The history of the chosen people, showing God's dealing with them and the preparation for the advent of Christ. 4. The history of the establishment of the Christian church, which is to reach all nations. Inter-biblical history falls between sections 3 and 4.

1. AN ACCOUNT OF THE CREATION OF THE UNIVERSE, showing God's relation to the world, and introducing human history (Gen. i. 1-ii. 3). See CREATION and SABBATH. The great doctrine is that God is the creator and lord of all things. It denies materialism and atheism. In implying that God is personal and omnipotent, it makes reasonable his supernatural manifestation in human history.

2. A SKETCH OF HUMAN HISTORY, showing God's relation to the human race and introducing the history of the chosen people (Gen. ii. 4-xi. 26). The events of this period fell almost entirely under human observation, and were capable of transmission by human testimony. The period is divided into two parts by the flood. The narrative is symmetrical; ten generations before the flood, from Adam to Noah inclusive, and ten generations after the flood, from Shem to Abraham inclusive (v. x, xi 10-26). The post-diluvian period is divided into two parts at Peleg, in whose days the earth was divided. From Shem to Peleg inclusive are five generations, and from Ken to Abraham inclusive are five. In the antediluvian period are detailed the covenant with Adam, its failure through man's disobedience, the downward course of man in sin, his punishment by a flood, and the deliverance of Noah. In the post-diluvian period are related the new and unconditioned covenant with Noah, the new command laid upon man, the increasing population, the growing independence of men from God, their punishment by confusion of speech and dispersion. The genealogy of the Semitic-Semitic line to Abraham is recorded, and at the same time its common origin with the other families of the earth is made plain. The locality where the recorded events occurred was the basin of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers; at least, every definite geographical reference is to this region (ii 14; vii 4, x 10, xi 2, 28). From this center the people spread on all sides, especially toward the west and southwest, where the course of migration was not blocked by great mountains (x). By the close of the period the inhabited world, so far as it was within the sphere of history, extended from the Caspian Sea, the mountains of Elam and the Persian Gulf on the east, westward to the isles of Greece and the opposite shore of Africa, and from the neighborhood of the Black Sea on the north to the Arabian Sea on the south. The length of the period from Adam to Abraham was at the lowest calculation 146 years, but it may have been much longer, see CHRONOLOGY. This period, longer than the time that has elapsed since the birth of Christ, was remarkably barren in miracles, in the scriptural meaning of that word, see MIRACLE. With the personal history of man began those theophanies, rare indeed though they were (Gen. iii 8 seq.), which are important in the history of revelation. During this period man made progress in civilization. He had been created with capacity, and was commanded to subdue nature. He advanced from the unclothed state, passing beyond rude garments of leaves and afterwards of skins (ii 25; iii 7, 21) to woven clothing; from a food of fruits that grew of itself to food obtained by agriculture and herding (i. 29; iv 2); from uncertain abodes to movable tents, settled habitations (iv 17, 20), and large cities built of brick (xi. 3, 4); from the family to the tribe and the kingdom (x 10); from no implements to tools of metal and instruments of music (iv. 21, 22). In this period also simple speech became diversified dialects and languages (x 5; xi. 1, 6, 9). Man recognized the duty of walking before God in holiness of life (iii. 2, 3, 10; iv. 7, v. 22, vi 9), distinguished between clean and unclean animals (vii 2; viii 20), erected altars and worshiped God by bloody and bloodless offerings (iv 3, 4, viii 20); and prayed to God in his character of Jehovah (iv 26). Religion, however, suffered decadence (vi 2, 5), and idolatry became widespread (Josh. xxiv 2). See especially GENESIS, EDEN, ADAM, SATAN, SERPENT, ABEL, CAIN, ENOCH, FLOOD, NOAH, BABEL.

3 THE HISTORY OF THE CHOSEN PEOPLE, showing God's dealing with them, and the preparation for the advent of Christ. This period differs from the preceding in the shifting of the central locality from the valley of the Tigris and Euphrates to Palestine (Canaan becomes the center of the history). The duration of the period, regarded as having begun with Abraham's birth, was reckoned by Usher at 1996 years, and so stands on the margin of many editions of the English version. There are certainly errors in this calculation, but whether they equalize themselves, or whether the total length should be several centuries more or less, cannot be determined as yet from the biblical and other data. At the beginning of this period, and on several occasions later, besides the ordinary ways in which God reveals himself to man and to the prophets, he appeared in theophanies. This period also embraces three of the four great miracle epochs; namely, at the deliverance of the people from Egypt and their establishment in Canaan under Moses and Joshua, during the mortal struggle between the worship of Jehovah and Baal worship in the time of Elijah and Elisha, and during the Babylonian captivity. These miracle epochs were separated from each other by centuries during which there were, with extremely rare exceptions, no miracles. This period may conveniently be divided into sections according to the progressive stages in the outward development of the people of God.

I. An independent tribe in Canaan under Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The patriarch was the priest and responsible ruler of the tribe. The history is reviewed in the articles on ABRAHAM, DREAMS, VISIONS, THEOPHANY, MELCHIZEDEK, ISAAC, JACOB.

II. A folk of twelve tribes for a long time in Egyptian bondage. See EGYPT, JOSEPH, PHARAOH, MIRACLE, EXODUS, MARAH, MANNA, QUAIL, REPHIDIM.

III. A nation, constituted at Sinai, and independent. Led to Sinai the people became a nation by accepting the covenant which God proposed, and which was contained in ten commandments, and formed the constitution of the nation. Jehovah is king, who henceforth dwells in the tabernacle in the midst of his people, reveals his will to prophet and priest, and exercises the legislative, judicial, and executive offices through laws which he reveals, judgments which he pronounces, and officials whom he raises up. The nation was

III. 1. A brotherhood of twelve tribes under a religious constitution, and with a common sanctuary (Ex. xix.-1 Sam. vii.). The high priest was the chief representative, and was aided by prophets and occasional leaders, like Moses. See SINAI, THEOCRACY, TENT OF MEETING, TABERNACLE, LEVITICUS, CAMP

Leaving Sinai the Israelites journeyed to Kadesh. On account of their lack of faith, they were turned back into the wilderness, where they sojourned thirty-eight years; see NUMBERS, WILDERNESS OF THE WANDERING, KORAH. At length they encompassed the land of Edom, and found a crossing at the head of the Arnon valley. The conquest of the country east of the Jordan followed; see SIHON, OG. The camp was then pitched in the Jordan valley; see SHITTIM, BALAAM, BAAL-PEOR, MIDIAN, DEUTERONOMY. On the death of Moses, the Jordan was crossed and Canaan conquered and possessed; see JOSHUA, CANAAN, SHILOH. After the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan, Joshua died, and was succeeded at intervals by other persons of ability and influence, fifteen in number, who led the people against their enemies and exercised governmental functions; see JUDGES, SAMUEL. Unifying forces were at work during the times of the judges, and a national feeling existed and sometimes manifested its strength; but still the people too often allowed natural barriers and petty jealousies and local interests to separate them. There are bright examples of godliness and filial piety, but along with these is the spectacle of a people easily seduced to idolatry; see JUDGES. During this entire period the weaknesses and defects of the human parties to the covenant were disclosed. At the very beginning of the period lack of faith in God was shown at Kadesh, the existence of tribal jealousy was manifested in the rebellion of Korah and his company against the high-priesthood of Aaron and the political supremacy of Moses, and the readiness of the people to lapse into idolatry became apparent in the affair of the golden calf, and in their enslavement by the seductions of Baal-peor. The great political blunders of the period were the league made by Joshua with the Gibeonites, and the failure of Israel to occupy Jerusalem. These defects and blunders were of far-reaching consequence in the history of Israel.

III. 2. A monarchy of twelve tribes. The people had failed to foster the centralizing influences which their religion designedly provided, allowed senseless tribal jealousies to sunder them, and accustomed themselves to turn from God to idols. The threatening attitude of neighboring nations made them realize the need of organization, a strong government, and a military leader. Samuel was old. They turned away from the good provision which God had made, but which they had neglected, and demanded an earthly king. By the side of the high priest and the prophet there was now a permanent earthly ruler, with supreme political power, instead of the judges whom God was wont to raise up. Saul was the first king, but on account of his overestimate of his position, his failure to recognize the superior functions of the high priest and prophet, he was denied the privilege of founding a dynasty; and finally his willful transgression of God's explicit command led to the rejection of him from being king, to the withdrawal of God and God's prophet from him, and the choice of David, see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF, SAUL, DAVID. Under David the twelve tribes were reunited after seven years of civil war, Jerusalem was taken from the Jebusites and made the political and religious capital, the borders of the kingdom were extended by conquest far to the northeast of Damascus, and the acquired country was laid under tribute. Deputies were placed in Edom also. See JERUSALEM. David was succeeded by Solomon, under whom the temple was erected, Jerusalem greatly embellished and its fortifications extended, and the fame of Israel enhanced. But his exactions made the people discontented, and on his death the failure of his son to discern the gravity of the situation incited ten tribes to revolt from the house of David. See SOLOMON, REHOBAM, ISRAEL.

III 3. A monarchy consisting chiefly of the tribe of Judah, ten tribes having revolted and formed a rival schismatic apostate kingdom. The causes which led to this revolt were long standing and many, see ISRAEL. The kingdom of Judah possessed the greater strength. It had material strength, the stronger natural position, the capital, the organized government, and the worship to which the people were accustomed. It had moral strength; the consciousness of adhering to the legitimate line of kings, which has ever been a mighty force in history, the true religion with its elevating influence, the sense of loyalty to Jehovah, and a line of godly kings. It had the providential care of God, who was preserving the knowledge and worship of himself among men, and was preparing the way for his Messiah. The religious history of Judah during this period was marked by a decline in the days of Rehoboam (1 Kin. xiv. 22), and again in the days of his son Abijah (xv. 3), and yet again in the days of Jehoram and Ahaziah (2 Kin. viii 27). The cause of this religious declension was the corruption introduced by Solomon and intermarriage with idolaters. Rehoboam's mother was an Ammonitess, for whom Solomon had built a high place to Milcom, and who had sacrificed to this abomination of her people. Jehoram was son-in-law of Ahab and Jezebel. Each of these periods of religious decay was followed by reformation, the first under king Asa and the second under Jehoshaphat, but Jehoshaphat himself afterwards turned away from the Lord, and another religious revival became necessary, only to be followed by the dominance of idolatry later under the pernicious influence of Ahaz. The encroachments of the Assyrians on the Hebrew people began in this period. The divided nation, largely degenerate in religion, was not in condition to offer effective resistance; and by slow but steady advance, which began in the days of Ahab, the Assyrians pushed their conquest until they had overthrown the northern kingdom. See ISRAEL, SAMARIA, SARGON.

III 4 The monarchy of Judah sole survivor. The southern kingdom was now exposed to the attacks of the Assyrians, and later of their successors, the Babylonians; see HEZEKIAH, SENNACHERIB, MANASSEH, NEBUCHADNEZZAR. The religious condition also of the people was not good, although great prophets, like Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Micah were laboring to advance the truth. Its kings, with the exception of Hezekiah and Josiah, did not render true and steadfast allegiance to Jehovah, and the people were like-minded. There was an idolatrous party in the state which had been triumphant in the reign of Ahaz. Idolatry was deep-rooted among the people, and the reforms of any king affected the nation only superficially. Foreign idolaters were also in the land. The nation drifted to destruction. The army of Nebuchadnezzar visited Jerusalem at brief intervals during the course of two decades, several deportations of Jews to Babylonia took place, and the city was taken and burned in 587 B C. The Hebrew people had failed to conserve the elements of national strength, and to abide under the shadow of the Almighty, and they fell. See JUDAH.

IV A subject people — 1 Judah in the Babylonian exile. See CAPTIVITY.

IV 2 Judah in Palestine. In the first year of his reign over Babylon, 538 B C, Cyrus issued an edict which permitted the Jews to return to Palestine and rebuild the temple. Forty-three thousand embraced the opportunity and returned under Zerubbabel. This colony was

(a) A province of the Persian empire, subordinated to the province Beyond-the-river. It remained such for two hundred years. Twice it enjoyed local governors of its own, appointed by the Persian monarch; see ZERUBABEL and NEHEMIAH. But for the greater part of the time its civil affairs were subject to the jurisdiction of the Persian satrap beyond the river. He had authority to appoint a deputy for Judah, and to call on the Jews for men or money. But the local administration was left to the high priest, and he gradually came to be regarded as the political as well as the religious head of the nation. Immediately on the return of the exiles from Babylon the foundations of the temple were laid. The work was pushed on under the exhortations of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah despite interruptions and opposition, and the building was completed in 515 B C. The walls were erected under the supervision of Nehemiah by authority of Artaxerxes in 445 B C; see JERUSALEM. At this time also Ezra the priest was in the city, zealous for the law of God, and successfully laboring for the purity of religion; see EZRA and CANON. About 365 B C. there was a dispute between two brothers about the high-priesthood, which ended by one killing the other within the precincts of the temple. In connection with this affair Bagoses, general of the army of Artaxerxes Mnemon, entered the temple (Antiq xi. 7, 1). In March or April, 334 B C Alexander of Macedon crossed the Hellespont, defeated the Persian satraps, then marched on, and the next year gained a victory over the Persian monarch Darius Codomannus at Issus, a defile near the north-eastern angle of the Mediterranean Sea, laid Syria at his feet, and entered Jerusalem. After an almost uninterrupted career of conquest, extending eastward as far as the Punjab, Alexander died at Babylon in June, 323 B C. See ALEXANDER.

(b) Judaea subject to Egypt. Ptolemy Soter wrested Palestine from Syria, to which it had fallen after Alexander's death, in 320 B C, and the Ptolemies retained it, except for occasional brief periods, until 198 B C., when the cruelty of Ptolemy Philopator drove the Jews to seek the protection of Antiochus the Great. see PROLEMY. During these 122 years the Jews were governed by their high priest subject to the king of Egypt. At this time the Hebrew Scriptures were translated into Greek at Alexandria in Egypt. See VERSIONS.

(c) Judaea subject to Syria. Antiochus the Great wrested Palestine from Egypt in 198 B C by his victory over Ptolemy Philopator at Paneas. The Syrians not only supported the Grecian party among the Jews which attempted to hellenize the nation, but they also endeavored by force to impose idolatry upon the Jews. The sacrilegious tyranny of the Syrians became intolerable to the pious portion of the nation, and led to the Maccabean revolt in 166 B C. See GYMNASIUM, JASON, ANTIOCHUS.

A period of independence under the Maccabean priest-kings followed; see MACCABEES. It lasted from 166 B C until Pompey took Jerusalem in 63 B C; but the Maccabees were allowed to hold the throne until 40 B C., when Herod the Great was appointed king of Judaea by the Roman senate. He began his actual reign by the capture of Jerusalem in 37 B C. During this period the Pharisees and Sadducees became recognized parties, exerting great political and religious influence. See PHARISEES, SADDUCEES, COUNCIL.

(d) Under the Romans. During this period the affairs of Judæa were administered by appointees of the Romans; first by Herod the Great, then by Archelaus, and afterwards by procurators, except from A. D. 41-44, when Herod Agrippa I reigned as king; see JUDÆA, HEROD, PROCURATOR. The maladministration of these officials exasperated the people and drove them to revolt. Obstinate war raged from A. D. 66 until the fall of Jerusalem in A. D. 70. The remnant of the Jewish people who remained in Palestine were denied access to their capital, and had no longer national existence. While the Jews still constituted a nation under the Romans, in the days of Herod the king, Jesus of Nazareth was born and a new period of biblical history began.

4 THE HISTORY OF THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH, which is to reach all nations—I Christ's preparation for the establishment of his Church, by example, teaching, and redemption. See JESUS, GOSPEL, APOSTLES

11. The Church among the Jews The church was founded by the risen Christ. Ten days later, at Pentecost, the promised Spirit was given, and the church's work was initiated by Peter's sermon, increase of believers, and baptism; see PENTECOST. HOLY SPIRIT, TONGUES, BAPTISM, CHURCH During the next few years, six perhaps, the church experienced the difficulties incident to the imperfections of believers and to persecution; but it grew steadily in purity and numbers. See ANANIAS, DEACONS, STEPHEN. The persecution which arose on the death of Stephen scattered the brethren abroad, and the evangelization of the Jews in Palestine and Syria began. The gospel was carried to Samaria and to the cities on the seacoast from Gaza to Caesarea. See PHILIP For the purpose of persecuting the believers who were now found in the Jewish colony in Damascus, Saul went thither, and was converted, and was told that he was to be a teacher of the gentiles. The vision of Peter at Joppa, and its complement in the conversion of Cornelius and his baptism with the Holy Spirit, opened the eyes of the church to the truth, already theoretically known, that the Holy Spirit is for all believers, Jew and gentile. See CORNELIUS. At Antioch Jewish believers from the West, who had been driven from Jerusalem by the persecution which had arisen on the death of Stephen, began to preach Jesus to the Greeks also (Acts xi. 20, R V), and now the followers of Jesus began to be called Christians, no longer being identified with the Jews. The church was now ready to undertake the evangelization of the gentiles; the truth of the equality of all believers was known, a man had been raised up to work among the gentiles, and the first beginnings had been made.

III. The Church among Jews and gentiles Paul and Barnabas, called by the Holy Ghost, began the evangelization of Jews and gentiles in Asia Minor. The question about the obligations of gentile converts arose. The council at Jerusalem took a firm stand for Christian liberty, refused to impose circumcision and the observance of the Mosaic law upon gentile converts, and only insisted upon certain moral duties and certain matters of expediency which it was necessary to emphasize on account of the state of public opinion. The rights of gentile Christians were now secure. On a second missionary journey, Paul, under the direction of the Spirit, came to Troas, and was called by a vision to extend his labors to Europe, and the evangelization of Europe from Philippi to Rome ensued. See PAUL, JOHN, PETER Hit'tites.

A people, known also as children of Heth, and connected by blood or conquest with Canaan (Gen x. 15; xxiii 3). For centuries they occupied the region extending from northern Palestine to the Euphrates, and numbered Kadesh on the Orontes, Hamath and Carchemish among their important cities (Josh. i. 4; 1 Kin x 29). As early as the time of Abraham, bodies of them had taken up their abode in Canaan proper, and apparently had adopted the language of Canaan. Abraham met with them at Hebron, and it was from a Hittite that he purchased the cave of Machpelah (Gen xxiii. 1-20, xxv 9). Esau married two Hittite wives (xxvi 34, 35, xxxvi 2). The spies sent out by Moses found the Hittites occupying the mountains (Num xiii 29). They took part in the war against the invading Hebrews under Joshua (Josh ix 1, 2). They were also among the tribes which aided Jabin, king of Hazor, in the great battle in which he was so signally defeated by Joshua at the waters of Merom (xi 3). The man who betrayed Luz, or Bethel, built a second Luz in the land of the Hittites (Judg 1 26). After the conquest of Canaan by Joshua, Hittites still remained in the country, intermarriages taking place between them and the Israelites (iii 5, 6). One of David's followers was Abimelech the Hittite (1 Sam. xxvi 6). Uriah, against whom David sinned so deeply, was of the same race (2 Sam xi 3, 17, 21). In the reign of Solomon the Hittites and other tribes who remained in the land had levied on them a tribute of bond-service (1 Kin ix 20, 21, 2 Chron viii. 7, 8). Hittite women were in Solomon's harem (1 Kin xi 1). The Hittites were the Kheta, or Khita, of the Egyptian monuments, the Hatti of the Assyrian inscriptions, and the Keteioi of Homer (Odyssey xi. 521). From Egyptian and Assyrian sources and Hittite remains we learn that when the power of the Hittites was at its height, their sway or their influence was paramount from the Archipelago to the Euphrates, their northern or northeastern capital being Carchemish, on that river, and their southern or southwestern one Kadesh, on the Orontes. For five hundred years they carried on a struggle, with intervals of peace, with the Egyptians, fighting great battles with Thothmes III., in the sixteenth century B. C., and with Seti I and Ramses II. The siege of Kadesh by the latter Egyptian monarch was celebrated in an epic by the poet Pentaur. For four hundred years, beginning 1100 B. C., they carried on a contest with the Assyrians, generally holding their own against that great power, till, in 717 B. C., Sargon, the Assyrian king, captured Carchemish, and terminated their empire. Sculptures, doubtless Hittite, with hieroglyphics not yet satisfactorily read, have been found at Carchemish, at Hamath, and throughout a great part of Asia Minor. The Hittites were a sturdy race of men. They are generally represented as beardless. They wore pointed hats and loose tunics. Their shoes were tilted up at the tips, and fastened by a large bandage round the foot and ankle. They are like the shoes still worn by the peasantry of Asia Minor, and are the best preservative for the feet when the country is covered with snow. The Hittites also wore long gloves, covering the forearm, with one compartment for the thumb and another for the four fingers. These are believed to be a survival of the time when the Hittites lived among the snowclad range of Taurus and the Armenian mountains.

Hi'vites.

One of the races of Canaan before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews (Gen x. 17; Ex iii. 17; Josh ix. 1). They scattered into several communities. A body of them dwelt at Shechem in the time of Jacob (Gen. xxxiii. 18 with xxxiv. 2), and their descendants still had influence in the city several generations after the conquest (Judg. ix. 28). A body of them also dwelt in Gibeon and its vicinity. They obtained a treaty of peace from Joshua by stratagem, but on their deceit being discovered, they were made hewers of wood and drawers of water (Josh ix.). They had also an extensive settlement, probably their principal one, at the foot of Lebanon, from mount Hermon to the entering in of Hamath (Josh xi. 3; Judg. iii. 3). In these northern mountain regions they had villages of their own as late as the time of David (2 Sam. xxiv. 7). Those of Palestine proper were, with the other Canaanites who remained in the land, required to render bond-service to Solomon in connection with his extensive building operations (1 Kin. ix. 20-22).

Hiz'ki, in A. V. Hezeki [my strength, or a strong support is (God)].

A Benjaminite, son of Elpaal (1 Chron. viii. 17).

Hiz-ki'ah. See HEZEKIAH 2.

Hiz-ki'jah. See HEZEKIAH 4.

Ho'bab [lover].

The father-in-law of Moses, according to the traditional vowel points of the Hebrew text (Judg. iv. 11). But the father-in-law of Moses was Reuel, or, to call him by what appears to have been his honorary title, Jethro, his excellency. Hobab is definitely stated to have been the son of Reuel (Num. x. 29), and if the traditional vocalization is ignored, and regard paid to the Hebrew text only, the Hebrew words may equally well be translated "Hobab the brother-in-law of Moses" (Judg. i. 16, iv. 11, R. V.). Moses' father-in-law Reuel, or Jethro, visited Moses in the camp at Rephidim and returned to his own land (Ex. xviii. 1, 5, 27). A year later, when the Israelites were about to advance from Sinai, Moses urged Hobab, the son of Reuel, to accompany them and aid them with his knowledge of the desert. Hobab finally consented (Num. x. 29; Judg. i. 16, iv. 11). After the conquest of Canaan, his family settled in Judah, south of Arad, and were still there in the time of Saul and David (Judg. i. 16; 1 Sam. xv. 6, xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). Hobab belonged to the Kenites (Judg. i. 16; iv. 11), a family of the Midianites.

Ho'bah.

A town on the left, that is to the north, of Damascus. Hobah was the extreme limit to which Abraham pursued the defeated eastern kings (Gen. xiv. 15). Wetzstein mentions a place of this name between Tadmor and Homs.

Hod [majesty].

An Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Chron. vii. 37).

Hod-a-vi'ah, in A. V. once Ho-da'iah (1 Chron. iii. 24) [Jehovah is his praise, or he hath praised Jehovah].

1 A son of Ehoenai, descended through Shecaniah from David (1 Chron. iii. 24).

2 One of the heads of the half-tribe of Manasseh east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24).

3 A Benjaminite (1 Chron. ix. 7).

4 A Levite, founder of a family, some members of which returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 40). He is called Judah (iii. 9), virtually a synonymous name, and through a slight corruption of the Hebrew text, Hodevah, or, as traditionally read, Hodeiah (Neh. vii. 43 and R. V. margin).

Ho-de'iah. See HODAVIAH 4.

Ho'desh [new moon].

A wife of Shahaiaim (1 Chron. viii. 9).

Ho-de'vah. See HODAVIAH 4.

Ho-di'ah, in A. V. of Nehemiah Ho-di'jah [splendor of Jehovah].

1 A man who was reckoned as belonging to the tribe of Judah, perhaps because of his marriage with the sister of Naham (1 Chron. iv. 19, R. V.). A. V. does not give a correct rendering of the Hebrew text.

2 One of the Levites employed by Ezra to explain the law to the people (Neh. viii. 7), and to assist on the day of penitence and prayer (ix. 5). He was probably one of the two Levite Hodiahs who sealed the covenant (x. 10 or 13).

Hog'lah [a partridge]

A daughter of Zelophehad (Num. xxvi. 33).

Ho'hām.

A king of Hebron, who entered into a league against Joshua, and was defeated, captured, and executed (Josh. x 1-27).

Holm Tree.

The evergreen oak (Quercus ilex), the rendering of the Hebrew Thrzah, hard tree, in the only passage where it occurs (Is. xlv 14; in A. V. cypress). The two Greek translators, Aquila and Theodotion, render it by wild oak, and the Vulgate by ilex.

Ho'lon [probably sandy].

1. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 51), given, with its suburbs, to the priests (xxi. 15). Called also Hilen (1 Chron. vi 58). Not identified.

2. A Moabite town (Jer. xlviii 21), perhaps Horon.

Ho'ly.

The ordinary Hebrew word for holy is Kadosh, separated. It is represented in the N. T. by the Greek word Agios. It is used for what is set apart from a common to a sacred use, as the utensils and ministers of the sanctuary, and certain days (Ex xx 8, xxx. 31, xxxi 10, Lev. xxi. 7; Num. v. 17; Neh. viii 9; Zech. xiv 21); for what is separated from ceremonial defilement (Ex xxii 31; Lev. xx 26) or immorality (2 Cor vii 1; 1 Thes. iv. 7), including false worship and heathen practices (Lev. xx 6, 7; xxi 6). In a larger sense God is holy, for he is separated from all other beings by his infinite perfections, by his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth, the glory of which fills the earth (Is. vi 3). Even holy angels ascribe holiness to him (Is. vi 3; Rev. iv 8; xvi 5).

Ho-ly Ghost'.

The Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit. The word spirit now more correctly expresses the idea than does the term ghost, which has narrowed its meaning, and commonly denotes a disembodied spirit wandering on earth. The name Holy Spirit is used three times only in the O. T. (Ps. li 11; Is. lxiii. 10, 11), but there are numerous references to his work. The Spirit of God is the divine principle of activity everywhere at work in the world, executing the will of God. The Spirit is sent forth by God (Ps. civ 29, 30) and given by God (Num. xi 29; Is. xlii 1, 5). The Spirit brooded over chaotic matter in the beginning and is everywhere present (Gen. i 2; Ps. cxxxix. 7), and is thus immanent and the energy in cosmical processes (Job xxvi 13; Is. lix 19); is the source of physical, intellectual, and moral life (Gen. vi 3; Job xxxii. 8; xxxiii. 4; xxxiv 14; Ps. xxvii 3; civ 30; cp. Is. xlii. 5); is able to produce supernatural effects (1 Kin. xviii. 12; 2 Kin. ii 16). He abides with the people of God (Is. lxiii. 11; Hag. ii. 5), and bestows varied powers for the work of the kingdom, strength (Judg. iii. 10;

vi. 34; xi. 29; xiii 25; xiv 6, 19; xv 14; 1 Sam. xi 6; xvi 13; 1 Chron. xii. 18), skill (Ex xxxi 3), wisdom (Num. xi. 17, 25; xxvii 18), in short, everything needful for the work of the kingdom (Is. xi. 2; Zech. iv 6). He instructed the people of God (Neh. ix. 20) by inspiring the prophets (Num. xxiv. 2, 1 Sam. x 6, Hos. ix. 7; Mic. iii. 8; Zech. vii 12). He works upon the heart of the individual child of God. It was foretold that this work would be especially powerful and widespread in the Messianic period, when the Spirit shall be poured out on the people of God (Is. xlv. 3), will give to them a new heart and a new spirit (Ezek. xxxvi 26), produce sorrow for sin (Zech. xii. 10), yea, be poured out on all flesh (Joel ii 28). The Spirit is grieved when men resist his holy work (Is. lxiii 10, cp. Ps. cvi 33). Jesus promised that on his departure the Spirit should come and dwell with every believer, clothe with power, guide and teach the church, bear witness of Christ and glorify him, convict the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment (Luke xxiv 49, John vii 37-39; xiv 25, 26; xv 26, xvi 7-14; Acts i 8).

The N. T. treats of Messianic times and the dispensation of the Spirit, and consequently the Spirit is mentioned much oftener in the N. T. than in the O. T. All the attributes of the Spirit revealed in the O. T. are disclosed in the N. T. in exercise. The doctrine of the Spirit advances beyond the teaching of the O. T. chiefly in becoming more definite in respect to his personality. Though the word spirit is neuter in Greek and feminine in Hebrew, yet the Spirit is sometimes called who, not which, the masculine form of the pronoun being used (Eph. i 13, 14, cp. cautiously John xvi 13). The Spirit further speaks in the first person, using the pronouns I and me (Acts x 19, 20, xiii 2), is associated with the Father and the Son in the baptismal formula and the apostolic benediction (Mat. xxviii 19, 2 Cor. xiii 14); can be grieved (Eph. iv 30; cp. Rom. viii. 26).

Memorable acts of the Spirit at the beginning of the Christian dispensation are the miraculous conception of Jesus by the Holy Ghost (Mat. i 18-20), the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus at his baptism, in the form of a dove visible to him and to John the Baptist (Mat. iii 16, Mark i 10; John i 32), and the effusion of the Holy Ghost in the likeness of tongues of fire on the day of Pentecost, and the accompanying gift of languages (Acts ii. 4). See GOD, INSPIRATION, PENTECOST.

Ho'ly Place. See TABERNACLE, TEMPLE.

Ho-ly Spir'it. See HOLY GHOST.

Ho'mām [possibly destroyer].

Son of Lotan, and grandson of Seir (1 Chron. i. 39). The name appears in Gen. xxxvi. 22 as Hemam. The difference in Hebrew is trifling, and is doubtless due to a misreading. The latter name has jod where the former has vau (q. v.).

Ho'mer [a heap].

A measure for dry substances and liquids. It contained ten baths or ephahs (Ezek. xlv. 11, 14) and one hundred omers (Ex. xvi. 36). It held about thirty-six pecks, U.S. measure. See EPHAH, MEASURE.

Hon'ey.

A sweet, thick fluid collected by bees from flowers and fruit and deposited in the cells of a comb (Judg. xiv. 8; Ps. xiv. 10); much esteemed as an article of food (Gen. xliii. 11; 2 Sam. xvii. 29), and eaten as found in the comb or as prepared in various ways (Ex. xvi. 31, 1 Sam. xiv. 26). Wild honey was deposited by bees in rocks, trees, and other places (Deut. xxxii. 13, Judg. xiv. 8, 1 Sam. xiv. 25, Mat. iii. 4). Because it acts like a leaven, producing fermentation, honey might not be used in offerings made by fire unto the Lord (Lev. ii. 11). An artificial honey or syrup was prepared from dates (Wai. iv. 8, 3).

Canaan was described as flowing with milk and honey (Ex. iii. 8, 17).

Hook.

The Hebrews and contemporary peoples used hooks of various kinds:

1. Curtains were hung by means of hooks, those employed about the tabernacle being made of gold and silver (Ex. xxvi. 32, 37, xxvii. 10).

2. By means of flesh hooks meat was lifted from the pot (Ex. xxvii. 3, 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14), in fishing (Job xli. 1; Hab. i. 15). See FISHING.

4. A large hook was thrust through the mouth of a fish or other aquatic animal, and attached by a cord to a stake, when it was desired to keep it alive (Job xli. 2; Ezek. xxix. 4). A similar hook was used for leading about lions and other beasts (2 Kin. xix. 28; Ezek. xix. 4, in A. V. chains; cp. xxxviii. 4), and for a like purpose were inserted in the lips of captives (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11, R. V. margin). See illustration under BLINDNESS.

5. Pruning hooks were used by vinedressers (Is. ii. 4; xviii. 5).

Hoph'ni [pertaining to the fist]

A son of Eli. He and his brother Phinehas discharged the priest's office in the old age of Eli, but showed themselves unworthy of the sacred office by scandalous behavior. Eli mildly remonstrated when summary proceedings were required, and, in consequence, the divine judgment was pronounced against him and his house. When it was resolved that the ark of God should be taken to the battlefield, Hophni and Phinehas, who as officiating priests were its custodians, accompanied it, and were both slain in the disastrous battle which followed (1 Sam. ii. 22-iv. 22).

Hor [mountain].

1. A mountain on the border of the Edomite country, where Aaron died and was buried (Num. xx. 22-29, xxxiii. 37-39, 41, Deut. xxxii. 50). Josephus says that it was one of

Mount Hor of Tradition

and on firmly fixed hooks slain animals were hung up (Ezek. xl. 43, but the meaning of the word rendered hook in this passage is disputed).

3. Hooks resembling thorns, and sometimes called so in Hebrew (Amos iv. 2), were used the mountains surrounding Petra (Antiq. iv. 4, 7). Tradition has settled on Jebel Hâi'ûn, meaning Aaron's mountain, a great two-topped eminence of sandstone, about 4800 feet high, on the eastern side of the Arabah, nearly midway between the southern extremity of the Dead Sea and the northern end of the gulf of Akaba. It is the highest and wildest of the whole Edomite range. Petra is close by, to the west; but the ruined city is not visible from the summit. On its summit stands a tomb, nominally that of Aaron; but the upper part of it, at least, is only a modern Mohammedan mosque. The tradition, however, is open to serious question. It appears to rest on the false identification of Kadesh with Petra. Jebel Hârûn is in the midst of Edom, and not on its border, as was Hor. If Edom extended to the gulf of Akaba (Deut. ii 8), the Israelites could not reach the traditional mountain without crossing Edom, which they were forbidden to do. Jebel Madara, about 15 miles northeast of Kadesh, has been suggested, and satisfies the conditions. Still, if Madara is really written in Arabic with the letter dal (Seetzen), it is doubtful whether the name echoes Moserah (Num. xxxiii 37 with Deut. x. 6).

2. A mountain on the northern boundary of Palestine, between the Mediterranean Sea and the entering in of Hamath (Num. xxxiv 7, 8). It was probably a prominent peak of Lebanon.

Ho'ram [elevation].

A king of Gezer, defeated and slain by Joshua (Josh. x. 33).

Ho'reb [dry, desert].

The mount of God in the peninsula of Sinai (Ex. iii 1, xviii 5), where the law was given to Israel (Deut. iv 10-15, v 2, 1 Kin. viii 9; xix. 8). The names Horeb and Sinai are used almost interchangeably (for example, Horeb in Ex. xvii 6, Deut. i. 6; 1 Kin. viii. 9; xix 8, 2 Chron. v 10; but Sinai in Ex. xix 11; xxiv. 16, xxxi 18; Lev. vii 38; xxv. 1; Deut. xxxiii. 2; Judg. v. 5). This phenomenon has been variously explained. It has been held that the two terms did not denote exactly the same thing. Horeb has been regarded as the name of the range, and Sinai as a prominent peak (Hengstenberg, Robinson); or Horeb is thought of as a lower part or peak of mount Sinai (Gesenius); or Horeb was the northern and lower portion of the range, while Sinai was the southern portion, especially its highest point. On the other hand, the two terms have been held to denote the same object; and Ewald believed Sinai to be the older name of the mountain afterwards called Horeb (cp. Judg. v. 5). On this theory the choice between the names would depend on individual preference, on the date of the records used, or upon the writer's mood (study Ex. xix 1, 2^a in the context xviii. 13-xix. 6; and xix. 11^b in the context 9-13).

Ho'rem [enclosed, sacred].

A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. xix 38). Not identified. There is no reason to think of Hura or Kurah, 3½ miles west by north of Yarus, nor of Harah, 6½ miles north by east of Yarus.

Ho'resh [a dense wood or thicket].

A locality, probably at the time overgrown with bush, where David lurked (1 Sam. xxiii 16, R. V. margin). In the text the word is rendered wood.

Hor-hag-gid'gad, in A. V. Hor-hagidgad [mountain or cavern of Gidgad, i. e. perhaps, thunder].

An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii 32). The same as Gidgodah (Deut. x 6, 7; cp. Num. xxxiii. 31-33). Site unknown. It must not be identified with wady Ghudaghid, for the names are entirely different in etymology.

Ho'ri [cave-dweller].

1. A Horite tribe descended from Lotan, and called by the general name of the stock to which it belonged (Gen. xxxvi 22).

2. Father of Shaphat the spy (Num. xiii. 5).

Ho'rite, in A. V. of Deut. Ho'rims.

Cave-dwellers, the aborigines of mount Seir, and hence called the children of Seir (Gen. xxxvi 20). They were defeated by Chedorlaomer and his allies (Gen. xiv. 6). They were governed by chieftains (xxxvi. 29, 30). They were subsequently destroyed by the posterity of Esau (Deut. ii 12, 22).

Hor'mah [a devoted place, destruction].

1. A region to the south of Canaan, in Seir, north of both Kadesh and mount Hor. When the Israelites after their loss of faith presumed to advance from Kadesh toward Canaan, the Amalekites and Canaanites came down, smote them, and drove them as far as "the desolation," as the district was called from its devastation some thirty-eight years later (Num. xiv. 45; Deut. i 44). On the second departure of the Israelites from Kadesh, after the lapse of these thirty-eight years, while they were encamped at mount Hor, the Canaanites under the king of Arad again attacked them and made some captives. Israel vowed their destruction if Jehovah would aid, devastated their cities, and called the wasted region Hormah, desolation (Num. xxi 1-3).

2. The town Zephath, called Hormah after its devotion. It was situated in the south country, toward the border of Edom, near Ziklag, and was allotted to Judah, but was afterwards transferred to Simeon (Josh. xv. 30; xix 4). After the death of Joshua, Judah assisted Simeon to take the town. It was inhabited by Canaanites; and had either escaped destruction when the region was first devastated in fulfillment of the vow (Num. xxi. 2), or it had been rebuilt by fugitives who returned. At any rate, it was still included in the old vow; and it was now devoted to destruction, man and beast were slain, and the town was henceforth called Hormah (Judg. i. 17). Joshua had already defeated its king (called proleptically king of Hormah), who, it may be judged, was absent from his city, assisting men of his own race at Hebron at the time of his defeat, as the king of Jerusalem and the king of Gezer were away from their cities when Joshua smote them (Josh xii 14; cp. x 10, 33). After the town had been devoted, it was inhabited by Simeonites (1 Chron iv 30). It was hospitable to David when he lived as an outcast, and to his friends there David sent of the spoils of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 30).

Horn.

Part of Palestine, especially its southern portion, being a pastoral country, the Israelites were exceedingly familiar with the horns of animals. In early times they converted them into trumpets (Josh. vi 13), or into flasks for such substances as oil (1 Sam. xvi. 1, 13, 1 Kin i. 39). When God exalts the horn of an individual, the meaning is that he confers great power and prosperity (1 Sam i 10. Ps lxxxix 24), but when one exalts or lifts up the horn, it means that he indulges in arrogance and insolence (Ps lxxv 4, 5). Horn denotes political power, the image being drawn from bulls which push with their horns (Ps cxxiii. 17, Jer. xlviii. 25), and in prophetic language signifies a kingdom (Dan vii 8, 11, 21; Zech i. 18, 19) or kings (Rev. xvii. 12, 16).

Horns of the altar were projections resembling horns placed at the corners of the altar of burnt offering (War v. 5, 6). They were smeared with the blood of the sacrifice (Ex xxix 12; Lev iv 7), and the bodies of the victims offered in sacrifice appear to have been bound to them (Ps cxviii 27), and offenders clung to them for safety from punishment (1 Kin ii. 28).

Horn was also used to denote a peak (Is v. 1, R V margin). The horns of Hattin are the traditional mount of Beatitudes.

Hor'net.

The rendering of the Hebrew word Str'ah, according to the ancient versions. The hornet (Vespa crabro) is of the same genus as the wasp, but larger and more formidable. Either the common hornet or a closely allied species is common in Palestine. Hornets were to be sent to drive out the Canaanite nations before the Israelites (Ex xxiii 28, Deut. vii 20, Josh xxiv. 12, Wisd xii. 8). It is doubtful whether hornet is here used in a literal or a figurative sense. In favor of the former it may be alleged that Elihu relates that the Phasaelites were driven from their territory by hornets, and in favor of the latter that we have no detailed account of the Canaanites being thus expelled. If used figuratively, the sting of the hornet would stand for the terror produced in Canaanite minds by the approach of the irresistible Israelite armies.

Hor-o-na'im [two caverns or ravines]

A Moabite city at the foot of a declivity, and apparently not far from Zoar (Is. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii 3, 5, 34; Moabite Stone 31). Doubtless the town Oronē which Alexander Jannæus took from the Arabians, and his son Hyrcanus restored to Aretas (Antiq. xiii. 15, 4; xiv. 1, 4). Situation unknown.

Hor'o-nite.

A native or inhabitant of Horonaim or, more probably, of Beth-horon (Neh. ii. 10, 19).

Horse.

The horse was early subdued by man. Mention is made of its rider in the time of Jacob (Gen. xlix 17). Mountainous Palestine was not well adapted for its use, and in early times it was principally employed in the maritime plain and in the valley of Jezreel. There were many horses in Egypt (xlvii. 17; Ex ix 3; Egyptian records from 18th dynasty onward). When the exodus took place Pharaoh's pursuing army was equipped with chariots and horses (xiv. 9; xv 19). They existed also in the force of the northern Canaanites led by Sisera, Jabin's commander-in-chief (Judg iv. 15; v 22). In Deut xvii. 16, the king who was to be elected when monarchy was established among the Israelites was forbidden to multiply horses, notwithstanding which prohibition Solomon imported them in great numbers from Egypt, paying for each animal 150 shekels of silver (a little more than $97). He afterwards exported them to the kings of the Hittites and those of the Syrians (1 Kin x 28, 29; 2 Chron i 16, 17, ix. 28). Horses afterwards became common in Israel and Judah (2 Kin. ix 18, Is ii 7), and were used in battle (1 Kin xxii 4, 2 Kin iii 7; ix. 33). Foreign kings rode on horseback (Esth vi 8), while it was considered lowly in a sovereign to sit upon an ass (Zech. ix 9), and accorded with the simple manners of the early Hebrew patriarchs, judges, and kings (Gen xxii 3; Judg x. 4; xii 14, 1 Kin i 33). Horses were sometimes dedicated to the sun (2 Kin. xxiii. 11). They are frequently mentioned in the prophecies of Zechariah (Zech i 8; vi 2, 3; x 5, xiv 20), and in the book of Revelation (Rev. vi 2, 4, 5, 8; xix. 11, etc.).

Horse'leech.

A large leech (Hæmopsis sanguisuga), common in Palestine. The leech was known to the Hebrews by the name 'alukah, to the Aramæans 'ulka, to the Arabs 'alakat, from its adhering to the flesh (Prov. xxx 15). It is noted for its insatiable appetite for blood. In the proverb it is used figuratively. Its two insatiable daughters are perhaps named in the first line of ver. 16. The margin of the R. V. substitutes vampire. The blood-sucking vampires (Desmodulæ), which are confined to the warmer parts of South America, are not meant; but certain female specters, which are superstitiously believed to haunt graves and suck human blood. The ground for this interpretation is that in Arabic 'aulak is the name of a demon, and 'aluk is equivalent to ghoul.

Ho'sah [fleeing for refuge].

1 A porter in the time of David (1 Chron. xvi. 38; xxvi. 10).

2. A frontier village of Asher, not far from Tyre, and apparently south of that city (Josh.

xix. 29). Not identified. Conder suggests the ruin 'Ezzyat el-Fôka, about 7 miles south by east of Tyre, and 2½ inland from the Mediterranean. The names, however, are quite dissimilar.

Ho-san'na [save, we pray].

A short prayer to Jehovah for deliverance, taken from Ps cxviii. 25. It was an acclamation of the people when they marched around the altar at the feast of tabernacles, and most of the prayers used at that festival began with it. It was taken up by the multitude of the disciples at the triumphal entry of Jesus into Jerusalem, when they hailed him as the son of David (cp. Mat. xxi. 9, 15 with Ps cxviii. 25, 26).

Ho-se'a, in A. V. of N T Osee, in mutation of the Greek form [save]. Identically the same word as Oshea or Hoshea (Num. xiii. 8, 16), the first name of Joshua, and as Hoshea, king of Israel (2 Kin. xv. 30).

A prophet, son of Beeri, whose predictions were uttered in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and Jeroboam II., king of Israel (Hos. i. 1). Assuming that Hosea prophesied during as many as twelve or thirteen years of Jeroboam's reign, and that he lived to see the overthrow of Samaria in 722 B. C., his ministry extended over a period of forty years. Hosea was doubtless a citizen of the northern kingdom, for he speaks of "our king" and "the land," meaning northern Israel, without feeling the need of a restrictive adjective (i. 2; vii. 5); and he prophesied to the people of that kingdom. He was a contemporary of Isaiah, who labored in Judah (i. 1 with Is. i. 1); he began his prophetic activity in the reign of the second Jeroboam, when Jeroboam and Uzziah were contemporaries, that is, before 749 B. C., doubtless some years before Isaiah appeared, and he ceased much earlier than did Isaiah. Hosea was also a contemporary of Amos in the northern kingdom, and of Micah who prophesied in Judah.

The book of Hosea is the first of the minor prophets, not only in the order of their arrangement, but probably also in the order of time. It consists of two portions, chapters i.-iii. and iv.-xiv. The first part belongs to the earlier period of the prophet's ministry; for the first chapter at least dates from the reign of the second Jeroboam, or within six months after its close, before the destruction of the house of Jehu (i. 2-4). These first three chapters furnish the key to the whole book, in which the unfaithfulness of Israel to Jehovah during the entire national history is pressed home on the conscience (iv. 1-v. 7; vi. 4-vii. 16; viii.-xi.), the necessity of chastisement is shown, and the unquenchable love of Jehovah for his erring people is earnestly taught (vi. 1-3; xii.-xiv.). In chapters i.-iii. the unfaithfulness of Israel and the Lord's patience and forbearance are set forth under the analogy of an adulterous wife. Regarding the account of the prophet's marriage interpreters have been divided in opinion from ancient times. Is the story of the unfaithful wife an allegory or a fact? It is argued that it was allegorical and not real, because—1. It is impossible that God would have commanded a prophet to enter such a revolting alliance, and one which was apt to lessen his influence with the better part of the people, as a marriage with a woman of impure life would do. 2. The law of Moses forbade a priest to marry an unchaste woman (Lev. xxi. 7); and as the prophets were also a sacred class, although not bound by the strict priestly laws, God would scarcely direct them to enter into wedlock with the unclean. 3. The action of the first chapter, if real, would require years for its performance, involving not only the prophet's marriage, but also the birth of several children; and the symbolic lesson would be lost. On the other hand, the narrative is held to be the story of domestic tragedy in real life and the command which is recorded in chap. i. 2, directing the prophet to take "a wife of whoredom," is regarded as meaning not a woman already steeped in sin, but one who was as yet innocent in act. After her marriage with Hosea, she revealed a deeply seated propensity to impurity, proved unfaithful to her marriage vows, and was divorced (ii. 2). The "children of whoredom" are understood to be either the prophet's own sons and daughters who inherited the mother's evil tendencies, or else the offspring of an adulterous union whom the prophet acknowledged for his own. Eventually by God's direction the prophet took the woman back from her life of shame and restored her to her former position of wife (iii. 1), and thus typified God's readiness to restore apostate, idolatrous, sinful Israel to favor. Several objections lie against this theory. 1. The words she "bare him a son" (i. 3) are incompatible with the interpretation that the prophet acknowledged a bastard child. 2. The words of chap. ii. 2 are spoken by Jehovah to the Israelites, as appears further on; and not spoken by the prophet to his children. 3. Not the woman, but a woman, is alluded to in chap. iii. 1, whereas the expression should properly be definite, if it referred to a woman who had already been mentioned in chap. i. All difficulties, exegetical or moral, disappear on the theory that the account is an allegory. Such allegorical recitals or acted stories were common in prophetic teaching (Jer. xxv. 15-29; Zech. xi. 4-17). But whether allegorical or actual, the adulterous woman and her equally adulterous children symbolize Israel and its tribes in their unfaithfulness to Jehovah, attachment to other gods, and alliances with the nations (cp. Is. xlvii. 8, 9; Luke xix. 44). The second part of the book of Hosea, consisting of chapters iv.-xiv., is not a series of discourses, nor even one continuous sermon, but is a summary of his prophetic teaching, prepared by him towards the close of his ministry. The prophecy thus contains the gist of his public addresses. He may have used notes, but they were scarcely needed. His memory sufficed. The sharp, pithy sayings with which he had barbed his arrows, and the striking similes by which he showed up the true character of the sins of his day, were not apt to be forgotten by him; and frequent speech upon the same themes gave a stereotyped form to the material as it lay in the prophet's mind, and preserved the rhythm and fervor of impassioned public address to living men. At the end of his life he set down in writing bits from his sermons, such descriptions and warnings and exhortations as were universal and eternal in their application.

The prophecies of chapters iv-xiv. were for the most part uttered originally when Assyria was filling the heart of Israel with a great dread. Not a few striking and significant public events occurred during the years of Hosea's prophetic activity to which he makes no reference at all in the written summary of his teaching, or only the vaguest and most general allusions, such as the glory of Jehoahaz's reign and the extension of Israel's borders (2 Kin. xiv. 25, 28), the murder of Zechariah by Shallum and the latter's assassination by Menahem (xv. 10, 14), the invasions of Galilee by Tiglath-pileser (xv. 19, 29). Still there are occasional indications of date for particular passages. If, for instance, Tiglath-pileser completely denuded the country of its inhabitants, when he deported the two tribes and a half from the region east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 26), then the words of the prophet concerning Gilead, as a city of them that work iniquity, were first spoken before the year 733 B. C. (Hos. vi. 8, and xii. 11, but this latter passage may refer to the past). The butchery of the inhabitants of Beth-arbel (x. 14) has been often, and quite appropriately, regarded as an event of Shalmaneser's reign, 727-722 B. C. If it does belong to the history of Shalmaneser the words of the prophet were uttered about 725 B. C. The frequent references of the prophet to the dallying of the government, now with Assyria and now with Egypt, comport best with the course that marked Israel's politics at the time of Pekah and Hoshea (v. 13; vii. 11; viii. 9; xiv. 3, particularly xii. 1 with 2 Kin. xvii. 3, 4); and accordingly it is probable that the rebuke of Israel for its foreign policy was uttered during the reigns of its last two kings.

The paragraphs into which chapters iv-xiv. are divided in the R. V. form units of thought complete in themselves. They are grouped together in suitable, though often subtle, logical connection with each other; but they do not flow in smooth, continuous discourse.

1 Chapter iv. 1-vi. 3. The thought that binds the various utterances together is sin and the need of repentance. The people are arraigned for gross iniquity (iv. 1-19), and the princes and priests as being the leaders in sin (v. 1-15). The arraignment is followed by a beautiful exhortation to repentance and the promise of God's return in favor (vi. 1-3).

2 Chapter vi. 4-x. 15. The unifying thought is the grievous punishment that must come for heinous sin. Fitful repentance does not satisfy God (vi. 4-11). The immoral life and shameless excess of the mighty is manifest to God (vii. 1-7). Israel's stupidity and folly in seeking aid from the powers of the world. For its foolishness it shall be chastised (8-16). The invader is near because of Israel's idolatry and schism (viii. 1-7). Israel has drawn judgment upon itself by dallying with Assyria, by religious abuses, and by trusting in human means (8-14). Israel's infidelity (ix. 1-9), and consequent punishment (10-17). Israel, flourishing like a vigorous vine, only increases its idolatry, but judgment shall spring up as abundant and as destructive as the noxious weed (x. 1-8). Israel's sin compared to that of Gibeah (9-11). As one sows, so shall one reap (12-15).

3 Chapter xi. 1-xiii. 16, a passage characterized by yearning and expostulation. Jehovah's love for Israel is the unquenchable love of a father for his child, even for a wayward child (xi. 1-11). Jacob relied upon his own strength and shrewdness at first, but finally importuned God and prevailed; therefore turn from earthly alliances to thy God (xi. 12-xii. 6 [Heb. xii. 1-7]). Ephraim, a dishonest tradesman, and, having become rich, excuses himself of sin, but Jehovah will cast him out of his home, he who saved Israel from Egypt will now punish (xiii. 7-14). Ephraim's idolatry condemned (xiii. 1-8), and its consequence declared (9-16).

4. Chapter xiv. 1-9. Exhortation to repentance, confession, and humble supplication, and the promise of Jehovah's gracious acceptance of the penitent and bestowal of richest blessings.

Genuineness has been denied to the references in the book of Hosea to Judah (particularly i. 7; iv. 15, v. 10-14; vi. 11, xi. 12 [Heb. xii. 1]), to the restoration of Israel to God's favor and their return to their native land (e. g., i. 10-11 [Heb. ii. 1-3]), and to the sole legitimacy of the Davidic monarchy (i. 4, iii. 5; viii. 4; xiii. 10, 11). The genuineness of these passages is, in general, denied on the ground of a lack of sequence with the preceding context or a variation of the meter. It must not be forgotten, however, that sudden transitions characterize the style of Hosea, that rhythm, not meter, is, as a rule, the mark of exalted prophetic utterance, and that an author may choose variation of literary form rather than monotony.

Then, too, the book of Hosea is a mosaic made up of bits from many discourses. Concerning the three classes of passages to which exception has been taken, 1. The references to Judah. "An occasional side glance at Judah, a people so intimately connected with his own, must not be denied to the prophet" (Harper, on chap. v. 5); especially since he saw the moral conditions in Judah becoming assimilated to those of Ephraim (Oman, Presb. and Refd. Rev. x 468-470). 2. The references to a restoration of Israel to God's favor and their return to their own country (1) A reference to restoration to God's favor is demanded by the symmetry, since each section of chaps. i-iii. (i 10-11 1; ii 14-23; iii. 5), and greater sections of the book as a whole, end with promises. (2) It is the custom of prophecy not to close with the threatening of doom and leave the people to despair, but to let the light of hope break through the dark clouds and irradiate the great future (3). (Continuing the picture of the destruction of Israel in battle for its sins, the verses of hope (i. 10-11. 1) represent the victory of united Israel and Judah over their foes (4). Thought was turned to the possibility of a return both by the prospect of imminent exile for the nation, and also presently by the knowledge that many Israelitish captives were in Assyria (2 Kin. xv 29; 1 Chron v. 26; Is ix 1). 3. The references to the legitimacy of the Davidic monarchy and the illegitimacy of northern Israel's kings. (1) It is necessary to reject the genuineness not only of these prophecies in Hosea, but also of the prediction of the universal dominion of the Davidic king which was uttered in northern Israel by a contemporary prophet of Judean birth (Amos ix 11) (2) To the believer in the moral government of the universe the failure and fall of one dynasty after another in the north, during the preceding two centuries, was conclusive evidence of their rejection by God; and the continuance of the Davidic monarchy confirmed the prophetic words, spoken in the southern kingdom concerning that line, and was itself independent proof that God had chosen the house of David.

Ho-sha'iah [Jehovah hath saved].

1 Father of Jezeaniah and Azariah (Jer. xlii 1; xliii. 2).

2 A man, doubtless a prince of Judah, who walked immediately behind the chorus of those who gave thanks in the procession at the dedication of the second temple (Neh. xii 32).

Hosh'a-ma [probably, Jehovah hath heard]

One of the family or descendants of king Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii. 18).

Ho-she'a, in A. V. of Num. xiii. 8, 16 Oshea. [save].

1. The earlier name of Joshua, the son of Nun, which was changed by Moses into Joshua (Num xiii. 8, 16).

2. Son of Azaziah and prince of Ephraim in David's reign (1 Chron xxvii 20)

3. A son of Elah. With the connivance of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, he conspired against Pekah, king of Israel, slew him, and ascended the throne (2 Kin. xv. 30). His reign lasted about nine years, from about 730 to 722 B. C. He did evil in the sight of Jehovah, but still was better than the average of the preceding kings. Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, made an expedition against him. Not being able to repel the invader, Hoshea paid tribute (xvii. 3); but knowing that the powerful kingdom of Egypt looked with jealousy on the approach of the Assyrians to its frontiers, he soon sought assistance from Egypt. Trusting that aid would be forthcoming, he withheld the annual tribute from Assyria (4) Shalmaneser again invaded the Israelite territory, took Hoshea captive, and laid siege to Samaria. See SHALMANESER. The city was reduced to great straits, but it held out three years. At the end of the three years Shalmaneser was killed or died, and was succeeded by Sargon, who claims the honor of capturing the city. He carried the leading inhabitants into captivity, and placed them in Halah and in Habor, by the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes (5, 6). This event is known as the captivity of the ten tribes. It was not any special wickedness on the part of Hoshea that brought it on. The cup of Israel's iniquity had been filling for centuries, and Hoshea's iniquities only added the last drop which made the cup full to overflowing (7-23) See SAMARIA, SARGON, ISRAEL.

4 One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh x 23)

5. The Hebrew name of the prophet Hosea. See HOSEA.

Host.

A multitude, especially when organized; an army (Gen. xxi. 22; Judg iv. 2) or the division of an army (Ex vii 4, in A. V. armies; xii. 41; Num. ii. 3, in A. V. armies; 1 Kin. ii. 5); the angels, constituting a heavenly host (1 Kin xxii 19; Ps. cxlviii 2; Luke ii 13); and the stars (Deut. iv 19; 2 Kin. xxiii. 5). The Semites comprehended heaven and all its forces and beings, heaven and all that is therein, in the phrase host of heaven; and in the phrase host of the earth, they included the earth and all that is therein, the forces of nature like wind, lightning, heat and cold, and things animate and inanimate (Gen. ii. 1; Ps. xxxiii. 6; and see Anshar and Kishar in CREATION).

The title Lord of hosts has sometimes been explained as meaning that Jehovah is the God of the armies of Israel. In proof David's words to Goliath are cited. "Thou comest to me with a sword and with a spear, but I come to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel" (1 Sam. xvii 45). The prophet Isaiah is also quoted, who says: "The Lord of hosts shall come down to fight upon mount Zion" (Is xxxi. 4).

But this is too narrow a generalization. Jehovah did fight for his people; he was indeed "the Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in battle." But the Lord of hosts was more than the war God of Israel. The Greek translators grasped the true meaning of the title, and rendered it Pantokrator, the Almighty. The word hosts which is used in the title refers to the armies of the universe. The designation pictures the universe, in its spiritual and material aspects, as forming a vast army, in numerous divisions, of various kinds of troops, in orderly array under the command of Jehovah. One division consists of the angels. It was the Lord, the God of hosts, who appeared to Jacob at Bethel when he beheld the ladder and the angels of God ascending and descending (Gen. xxviii. 12, 13; Hos. xii. 4, 5). "Who in the skies can be compared unto the Lord? Who among the sons of the mighty is like unto the Lord, a God very terrible in the council of the holy ones, and to be feared above all them that are round about him? O Lord God of hosts, who is a mighty one like unto thee, O Jehovah?" (Is. lxxxix. 6-8; cp. R. V.) Another host consists of the stars, in their beautiful order and wonderful array. Jehovah is their commander. Isaiah bids those who would know God to go forth, and lift up their eyes on high and see "Who hath created these?" he asks. He who bringeth out [into the field like a general] their host by number, he who calleth them all by name, and upon them layeth commands (Is. xl. 26; xlv. 12). Yet another host consists of all the forces of nature; they stand at the bidding of Jehovah, worshipping and serving him (Neh. ix. 6; Ps. ciii. 21). The Lord of hosts sendeth sword, famine, and pestilence (Jer. xxix. 17). "The Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night, which stirreth up the sea that the waves thereof roar, the Lord of hosts is his name" (Jer. xxxi. 35, R. V.). The Greeks, looking at the heavens above them, and at the earth around them, called what they saw cosmos, the beauty of harmony. The Romans, discovering the same harmonious relations and movements, named the entirety of creation a universe, combined as one. To the poetic imagination of the Hebrews, with their knowledge of the omnipotent reigning God, the regularity and order everywhere apparent suggested an army in vast, numerous, and varied divisions, acting under the command of one will. The Lord of hosts, he is the king who alone commands.

Ho'tham [seal, signet ring].

1. An Asherite son of Heber, family of Beniah (1 Chron. vii. 32).

2. An Aroelite, two of whose sons were among David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 44). The misprint of Hothan for Hotham in A. V. has been corrected in R. V.

Ho'than. See HOTHAM 2.

Ho'thir.

A son of Heman, David's seer and singer (1 Chron. xxv. 4).

Hour. See DAY and NIGHT.

House.

In Palestine and other parts of the East the houses of the common people, constituting more than three-fourths of the whole, have only one story and sometimes only one room. The interior is frequently divided into two portions, one several feet higher than the other. The door from the outside leads into the lower portion, which is occupied by the cattle. Troughs for their feed are arranged along the side of the platform where the family dwell. This higher floor is reached by a short flight of steps. Sometimes there is a loft above the stable for guests. These several apartments are not walled off from each other. The walls of the house are often of mud or sun-dried brick, even when, as in Palestine, stone is procurable (cp. Job xxiv. 16; Ezek. xiii. 10-16). The roofs are made of branches of trees, canes, palm leaves, etc., covered with a thick stratum of earth. Materials so flimsy cannot long resist the heavy rains which at certain seasons fall in warm countries. There would be no difficulty in temporarily creating an aperture in the flimsy roof, and letting down a man on a bed, as was done at Capernaum in the case of the paralytic healed by our Lord (Mark ii. 1-12; Luke v. 18-26); only a shower of dust would descend.

Eastern House, showing Outer Staircase

The houses of the better class are generally built, as of old, in a quadrangle, around a central courtyard, which in certain cases may contain a fountain, or even a well (2 Sam. xvii. 18). The upper chamber is an important room in the second story, sometimes constituting all there is of a second story, being built above the general level of the roof (Judg. iii. 20, R V. margin; 1 Kin. xvii. 19; 2 Kin. iv. 10; Mark xiv. 15; Acts i. 13; ix. 37). The roofs of all houses are flat. They are generally, and should always be, surrounded by battlements (Deut. xxii. 8). They are well adapted for storing and drying agricultural produce (Josh. ii. 6), for walking to and fro (2 Sam. xi. 2), for conversation (1 Sam. ix. 25, 26), for idolatrous worship (2 Kin. xxiii. 12), or for religious meditation and prayer (Acts x. 9). There is a staircase outside the house, by which the roof can be reached without entering the building (cp. Mat. xxiv.

Hu'kok. See HELKATH.

Hul [circle, circuit].

The second son of Aram (Gen. x. 23; 1 Chron. i. 17). Huleh, the region immediately north of the waters of Merom, may possibly preserve the name.

Hul'dah [weasel]

A prophetess, who lived in the second quarter of Jerusalem (2 Kin. xxii. 14, R V.). She was the wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe, and was held in the highest esteem. She lived during the reign of Josiah,

Court of a House in Damascus

17; Mark xiii. 15). The windows are generally narrow, and mostly open into the courtyard instead of facing the street.

The Arabs call the lower story the winter house or simply the house, and the upper one the summer house. Or if both are on the same floor, the summer house is the outer and the winter house the inner room or rooms (Jer. xxxvi. 22; Amos iii. 15).

Ho'zai [perhaps, (Jehovah) is seeing].

Writer of a history which treated of king Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxiii. 19, R V.). In A V., following the Septuagint, the Hebrew word Hozay has been translated as though it were a common noun, and the book cited appears as a collection of sayings by the seers (cp. 18). This translation involves the assumption that the Hebrew word has lost both its initial and its final letter, or at least the final one.

Huk'kok [hewn in, decreed].

A town on the boundary line of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 34). Yakûk, about 6 miles west by north of Tell Hum, has in its name the corresponding Arabic root.

and prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem, but added that on account of his piety toward Jehovah, the king should die before the coming of the catastrophe (2 Kin. xxii. 12-20, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20-28).

Hum'tah [place of lizards or, perhaps, fortress].

A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 54). Site unknown

Hunt'er and Hunt'ing.

Hunting was a favorite pastime of ancient kings (Gen. x. 9). The Babylonian and Assyrian monarchs delighted in it, and were proud of their achievements, recording their success in inscriptions, and depicting their deeds in sculpture to adorn the walls of their palaces. In Palestine game existed during the entire biblical period in certain localities, as in the wilderness of Judah, the thickets of the Jordan, the more notable forests, and the south country (Gen. xxv. 27; Antiq. xvi. 10, 3). Many of the animals recognized as clean and fit for food were wild, and could only be obtained by hunting. When the animal was slain, its blood was poured out upon the earth and not eaten (Deut. xii. 15, 16, 22). Hunting was practiced in order to exterminate noxious beasts (Ex. xxiii. 29; 1 Kin. xiii. 24), to secure food (Gen. xxvii. 3; Eccles. xxxvi. 19), and as sport (War i. 21, 13). People hunted alone or in companies (Jer. xvi. 16), on foot or on horseback (War i. 21, 13), and on the great plains in chariots. The hunter used bow and arrows (Is. vii. 24) and the spear (Antiq. xvi. 10, 3). Decoys were employed (Jer. v. 26, 27), and nets and traps (Job xviii. 10; Eccles. xxvii. 20) and pits (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; Ezek. xix. 4, 8). Babylonians, Assyrians, and Persians kept dogs trained for the chase.

Hu'p'ham.

A son or remoter descendant of Benjamin, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 39). Called Huppim (Gen. xli. 21, cp. 1 Chron. vii. 12, 15), and perhaps Huram (1 Chron. vii. 5). Hiram would seem to be descended from Bela or Gera. Huppim is not registered with either Bela, Becher, or Jedaiel in 1 Chron. vii. 12, unless he is descended from Bela through Ir or Iri (ver. 7).

Hup'pab [a covering].

A descendant of Aaron. His family became the thirteenth course of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 13).

Hup'pim. See HUPHAM.

Hur [whiteness, splendor].

1 A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 18, 19). He was the grandfather of Bezaleel (20. Ex. xxxi. 1, 2). With Aaron, he supported the arms of Moses during the fight with the Amalekites (Ex. xvii. 10-12). He was associated with Aaron in the government of the Israelites while Moses was absent in mount Sinai (xxiv. 14). Josephus, writing many centuries after the event, calls Hur the husband of Miriam, Moses' sister (Antiq. iii. 2, 4). The O. T. is silent on the subject.

2 One of five kings of Midian slain by Moses (Num. xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21).

3 Father of Solomon's purveyor in mount Ephraim (1 Kin. iv. 8).

4. Father of a certain Rephaiah (Neh. iii. 9).

Hu'ral [perhaps, a linen weaver].

One of David's mighty men from the brooks of Gaaah (1 Chron. xi. 32). Called Hiddai in 2 Sam. xxiii. 30.

Hu'ram [noble, ingenuous].

1. A king of Tyre (2 Chron. ii. 3). See HIRAM.

2. A Tyrian artificer (2 Chron. iv. 11, 16). See HIRAM.

3. A Benjamite, perhaps a son of Bela (1 Chron. viii. 5). See HUPHAM.

Hu'ri [perhaps, a linen weaver].

A Gadite (1 Chron. v. 14).

Hu'shah [haste, emotion].

A town of Judah, to judge from 1 Chron. iv. 4, and xxvii. 11.

Hu'shai [hasty, hastening].

An Archite, one of David's two leading counselors. He remained faithful to his sovereign during Absalom's rebellion, and effectually defeated the counsel of Ahithophel (2 Sam. xv. 32-37; xvii. 5-16). See AHITHOPHEL and BAANA 2.

Hu'sham [haste, passion].

A man of the land of the Temanites, who succeeded Jobah as king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 34, 35, 1 Chron. i. 45, 46).

Hu'shath-ite.

An inhabitant of Hushah (2 Sam. xxi. 18; xxiii. 27).

Hu'shim [not impossibly, opulent, rich in children]

1 The son of Dan (Gen. xli. 23). Called in Num. xxvi. 42 Shuham. The difference is due to a transposition of the consonants.

2 A Benjamite family, sons of Aher (1 Chron. vii. 12).

3 One of the three wives of the Benjamite Shabaraïm (1 Chron. viii. 8, 11).

Husk.

A kind of food eaten by swine, and which the prodigal son, when in poverty and de-

Pod and Branch of Carob Tree

serted by his fair-weather friends, was glad to share (Luke xv. 16). It is the pod of the carob tree (Ceratonia siliqua), and is also called locust bean and St. John's bread. The tree is a handsome evergreen, attaining a height of 30 feet, thornless, and with leaves like the ash. The legumes are borne in great profusion, and are often a foot long. When green they are used for cattle and swine and in times of great famine are eaten by people. A syrup is made of the pulp of the pods.

Huz. See Uz.

Huz'zab.

Apparently a poetic term for Nineveh (Nah. ii. 7). The Targum understands it to mean the queen. But in the margin of the A. V it is rendered "that which was established" or "there was a stand made," and in that of the R. V. "and it is decreed" Both of these renderings make Huzzab simply a part of the Hebrew verb yazab, to place or establish.

Hy'a-cinth, or in modified form Ja'cinth.

1. The name of a color (Rev ix. 17).

2. A precious stone, constituting the eleven foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20; R V margin, sapphire) and one of the twelve jewels in the high priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 19, R. V.; on the margin, amber). In modern usage the name is given to the mineral zircon.

Hy-e'na.

An animal which feeds on offal, but is often driven from it by the dogs (Ecclus. xiii 18). The striped hyena (Hyæna striata) is common in every part of Palestine, living in caves and tombs, coming forth after dark to rifle graves or otherwise seek after prey. The valley of Zeboim in 1 Sam. xiii. 18 means the valley of hyenas.

Hy-me-næ'us [pertaining to Hymen, the god of marriage].

* One who made shipwreck of his faith, blasphemed, and was excommunicated by Paul (1 Tim i. 20) He declared that the resurrection was already past. Philetus was associated with him in this error (2 Tim ii. 17, 18).

Hymn.

A spiritual meditation designed, or at least suitable, for singing or chanting in the worship of God. The Book of Psalms is the earliest hymn book in existence. Other magnificent Hebrew religious odes are the songs of Moses (Ex xv 1-19, Deut xxxii. 1-43), Deborah (Judg v), Hannah (1 Sam ii 1-10), Mary (Luke 1 46-55), and Zacharias (68-79). The last two are known as the Magnificat and the Benedictus respectively, from the first word of the Latin translation. The Hebrew psalms were often sung to the accompaniment of music (2 Chron xxix 27, 28; cp. R V. of 1 Chron xvi 42) In the N T. three terms are used for Christian songs psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs or odes (Eph v. 19, Col iii 16). Josephus uses two of these words namely hymns and odes, in reference to the psalms of David (Antiq. vii. 12, 3). The hymn which Christ and his disciples sang after supper on the night of the betrayal (Mat. xxvi. 30) was doubtless part of Ps. cxv.-cxviii, which were sung by the Jews on the night of the passover after supper. The early Christians sang hymns in public worship and privately as a means of worshipping God and of edification and comfort (Acts xvi. 25; 1 Cor. xiv. 26; Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16). Fragments of early Christian hymns, known as such from the meter in the Greek text, are preserved in 1 Tim. iii. 16; Eph. v. 14; cp. Rev. xv. 3, 4. At the beginning of the second century, in the reign of Trajan, the Christians of Isthynia were reported by Phny as singing songs to Christ as God (Epis. x 96).

Hys'sop.

A plant of Egypt and Palestine (Ex. xii. 22), in Hebrew 'Ezob. in Greek 'Usōpos, which springs out of walls, and was of so small a size that it stood at one end of the scale of magnitude which had the cedar of Lebanon at the other (1 Kin. iv. 33) It was aromatic, and was largely used, under the law, often in bunches, with cedar wood and wool, for ceremonial purification (Lev xiv 4, 6, 49, 51, 52, Num xix 6, 18; Ps li 7; Heb ix. 19) A sponge filled with vinegar was put upon hyssop and raised to the lips of Jesus when he was on the cross (John xix. 29) The common hyssop (Hyssopus officinalis) is a sweet-smelling plant, belonging to the order Labiate, or Mints. It is a small bushy herb which grows to a height of 12 or 18 inches, and has small, hairy, lanceolate leaves. But Tristram states that its area is the south of Europe, the Danubian province, and Siberia. Moreover, the statement of two of the evangelists (Mat xxvii 48, Mark xv. 36) that the sponge of vinegar offered to Jesus was put upon kalamos, a reed which the common hyssop does not produce, has led some interpreters to think that a different plant from the common hyssop is intended, perhaps the caper plant (Capparis spinosa), sometimes called by the Arabs 'asuf. It is common in Palestine and the adjacent regions, grows out of walls, and could furnish a reedy stem three or four feet long, to which a sponge might be affixed. Rabbinical tradition identifies the Hebrew 'ezob with the Arabic ṣa'zar, commonly held to be Organum, marjory This plant is common in Palestine, growing on walls and rocks. Its thick, hairy leaves and hairy branches can be made into a bunch, and would hold liquids for sprinkling. It is a small herb, however, and could not furnish a rod; but the bunch of hyssop used in sprinkling was attached, it is argued, to a rod of cedar, and such a sprinkler was seized as the most available means at hand of reaching the sponge to the lips of the crucified Jesus

Common Hyssop.

I.

Ib'har [(God) doth choose]

One of king David's sons born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15, 1 Chron. xiv. 5).

I'bis.

A bird (Lev. xi. 19, R. V. margin), allied to the herons and storks. It was formerly venerated by the Egyptians. See HERON.

Ib'le-am [the people faitheth]

One of the cities within the territory of Issachar which belonged to the tribe of Manasseh. The Manassites, however, did not drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (Josh. xvii. 11, 12, Judg. i. 27). It was near Ibleam that Ahaziah, king of Judah, was mortally wounded by the followers of Jehu (2 Kin. ix. 27). It is generally identified with the town Bileam, which belonged to Manasseh, but was assigned to the Levites (1 Chron. vi. 70), perhaps Bel'ameh, a ruin and well one mile south of Jenni (cp. Judith iv. 1, vii. 3).

Ib-ne'iah [Jehovah doth build]

A Benjamite, son of Jeroham and head of a father's house (1 Chron. ix. 8).

Ib-ni'jah [Jehovah doth build]

A Benjamite, father of Reuel (1 Chron. ix. 8).

Ib'ri [a Hebrew].

A son of Jaaziah (1 Chron. xxiv. 27).

Ib'sam, in A. V. Jibsam [fragrant]

A man of Issachar, family of Tola (1 Chron. vii. 2).

Ib'zan [active].

A judge who ruled over Israel, or part of it, for seven years. He was a native of Bethlehem, apparently that in Zebulun, was buried in his native place, and was succeeded by a Zebulunite. He had thirty sons and thirty daughters, doubtless by a plurality of wives (Judg. xii. 8-10).

Ich'a-bod [the glory is not].

Son of Phinehas and grandson of Eli. The name commemorated the fact that the glory had departed from Israel, for the ark of God was taken (1 Sam. iv. 19-22).

I-co'ni-um.

A city of Asia Minor, which is described by Xenophon as the last city in Phrygia to one traveling eastward (Anabasis i. 2, 19). Under the Roman and the Greek empires Iconium was considered the capital of Lycaonia. It was situated in a fertile spot in the high, waterless plain of Lycaonia. Barnabas and Paul visited it on the first missionary journey both going and returning (Acts xiii. 51, 52; xiv. 1-6, 19-22; cp. xvi. 2; 2 Tim. iii. 11). It has had an unbroken history and the same name until the present time, being now known as Koniah. It is the capital of the pashalic of Karaman; and is a large city surrounded by a wall built of the materials derived from older structures.

Id'a-lah.

A border town of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15). Site unknown.

Id'bash [perhaps honey-sweet].

A man of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 3).

Id'ao, I. [hap. happy].

The chief at Casiphia through whom Ezra, when conducting a company of exiles from Babylon to Jerusalem, obtained the contingent, which was lacking, of Levites and Nethinim for the service of the temple (Ezra vii. 17-20).

Id'ao, II. [loving affectionate]

1 Son of Zechariah, and a chief in David's reign of the half-tribe of Manasseh east of the Jordan (1 Chron. xxvii. 21).

2 A man induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 43). In A. V. the name is written Jadai, a mongrel word arising from the translators' pronouncing the consonants of the text with the vowels of the margin. The real alternative to Iddo is Jaddai, as in the margin of R. V.

Id'ao, III. [decked, adorned]

1 A Levite, a descendant of Ger-hom (1 Chron. vi. 21). Apparently called Adaiiah synonymously (41).

2 Father of Ahimadab, Solomon's purveyor at Mahanaim (1 Kin. iv. 14).

3 A seer who wrote a book of visions concerning Jeroboam and in which events of Solomon's reign were related (2 Chron. ix. 29), a book on genealogies, in which deeds of Rehoboam were recorded (xii. 15), and a history which treated of king Abijah's acts (xiii. 22).

4. Grandfather of the prophet Zechariah (Zech. i. 1, 7; cp. Ezra v. 1; vi. 14). He is not unreasonably believed to be identical with Iddo, a chief of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem and whose name is that of a father's house in the next generation. The head of this house at the time mentioned is a priest named Zechariah (Neh. xii. 4, 16). The difference in spelling the name Iddo in these two verses of Nehemiah in the Hebrew is merely the difference between jod and vau (q. v.).

I'dol [a mental or material image].

An image, a sculpture, or other representation of any person or being, intended as an object of worship, or as the embodiment and efficient presence of a deity (Ex. xx. 4, 5, 23; Judg. xvii. 3; 1 Sam. v. 3, 4; Rom. i.

23). They were made of silver, of gold (Ps. cxv. 4 : cxxxv. 15), of wood, or other material (Is. xlv. 13-17). When metallic, they were fashioned by running melted metal into a mold, in which case they were called molten images; or they consisted of plates of metal over a wooden frame or over a molten body, and were termed graven images. When of wood or stone, they were made by graving tools or other instruments, and were also called graven images. The process of manufacture is described in Isaiah and Jeremiah (Is. xl. 19, 20; xlv. 9-20; Jer. x. 9). Some were small, especially those designed as household gods or teraphim (Gen. xxxi. 34; xxxv. 1-4); some were as large as a human being (1 Sam. xix. 16); some, such as that erected by Nebuchadnezzar in the plain of Dura, were colossal (Dan. ii. 1). Various epithets are applied to idols, which express the commingled loathing and contempt with which they were regarded by the enlightened servant of Jehovah. One of the most notable is vanity.

I-dol'a-try.

Idolatry was practiced at a comparatively early period of man's history. The immediate ancestors of Abraham worshiped other gods (Josh. xxiv. 2), in addition to Jehovah, it may be believed, and doubtless by means of idols. Laban had images, which Rachel was too justly accused of stealing (Gen. xxxi. 30, 32-35). The Egyptians made figures of the gods to serve as objects of worship, and in the innermost sanctuary of their temples lay the symbol of a god and a sacred animal (Herod. i. 63, 138). The Canaanite nations had idols, which the Israelites, on succeeding to the land, were ordered to destroy (Ex. xxiii. 24; xxxiv. 13; Lev. xix. 4; Num. xxxiii. 52; Deut. vii. 5; xxix. 17). The second commandment was directed against idolatry (Ex. xx. 4, 5; Deut. v. 8, 9), forbidding man to bow down to images, sculptures, statues, and pictures. And the teachers of Israel followed up this injunction by pointing out and ridiculing the impotency of idols (Ps. cxv; Is. ii. 8, 18, 20, 21; xl. 19, 20; xlv. 9-20; Jer. x. 3-5). Their helplessness was discovered when the ark of the Lord was in the temple of Dagon (1 Sam. v. 3-5). The apocryphal book of Bel and the Dragon treats of the deceitful practices of the priests in the idol temples. Of the nations with whom the Israelites were brought into contact during Scripture times, all but the Persians were idolaters; and the divinities whom their images represented were other gods than Jehovah. When the Israelites borrowed idolatrous practices from the neighboring nations, two well-marked stages were traceable in the progress of error. At first they attempted to worship Jehovah by means of images; see JEROBOAM. Then they entirely departed from Jehovah, and the idols they made were designed to represent other divinities; see BAAL. In N. T. times church members who lived in heathen communities were required to take precautions to avoid compromising themselves with idolatry. The council of Jerusalem enjoined that they should abstain from the flesh of animals that had been sacrificed to idols (Acts xv. 29). Paul gave the same injunction, but explained that in the case of those who had no faith in idols, abstinence was designed to avoid casting a stumbling-block in the path of the weaker brethren (1 Cor. viii. 4-13). If receiving hospitality at any house, and meat which might possibly have been offered to an idol was set on the table, the Christian guest was not required to ask any questions for conscience' sake; but if he was expressly told that the food had been offered to an idol, then he was to abstain. The same rule was to be carried out with regard to food purchased for the household in the ordinary market (x. 18-33). About A. D. 300 images were introduced into some Christian churches for instruction and ornament only. In 736 the eastern emperor Leo issued edicts against them. In 780 the empress Irene introduced image worship into the eastern church, and in 787 the second council of Nice gave them ecclesiastical sanction.

Id-u-mæ'a, in A. V. of O. T. and Apocrypha Idumea [pertaining to Edom].

The name used by Greeks and Romans in slightly different spelling, for the country of Edom (Mark iii. 8, and in A. V. only, Is. xxxiv. 5, 6; Ezek. xxxv. 15, xxxvi. 5). After the fall of Jerusalem, in 587 B. C., the Edomites began to press northward (Ezek. xxxvi. 5). They themselves were driven from Petra westward by the Nabatheans about 300 B. C., and before the middle of the second century B. C. they were occupying, not only southern Judah, but also Hebron and the country to its north as far as Bethzur (1 Mac. iv. 29; v. 65). Judas Maccabeus waged against them successfully; and John Hyrcanus, about 126 B. C., completely subjugated them and placed them under a Jewish governor (Antiq. xiii. 9, 1).

I'gal, in A. V. once Igeal (1 Chron. iii. 22) [he will vindicate].

1. The spy sent forth by the tribe of Issachar to search out the land of Canaan (Num. xiii. 7).

2. One of David's mighty men, the son of Nathan (2 Sam. xxii. 36). He occupies the same position in the catalogue as does Joel in 1 Chron. xi. 38, and it is natural to identify the two. But the relation of the two lists at this point is difficult to determine; and as Igal and Joel are differently described, they may be different persons, nephew and uncle.

3. A son of Shemaiah, a descendant of king Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii. 22).

Ig-da-li'ah [great is Jehovah].

Father of the prophet Hanan (Jer. xxxv. 4).

I'ge-al. See IGAL.

I'on [a ruin]

A fortified city of Naphtali, one of those captured by Benhadad, king of Syria, at the instigation of Asa (1 Kin xv 20; 2 Chron. xvi 4) Its inhabitants were subsequently carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kin xv 29). Robinson located it, probably correctly, on Tell Ibbin, a hill 110 feet high, on the eastern border of Merj 'Ayn, meadow of springs, which seems to preserve a trace of the old name. The site is about 8 miles north-northwest of Banias Ik'kesh [perverse].

Father of David's captain and mighty man Ira (2 Sam xxiii. 26, 1 Chron xi 28)

I'lai [supreme]

Il-lyr'i-cum.

A country bounded on the north by Pannonia, on the south by Epirus, on the east by Macedonia, and, when it included Dalmatia, on the west by the Adriatic Sea. It is traversed from northwest to southeast by the Noric, Carnic, and Julian Alps, constituting the most easterly portion of the great Alpine chain. Along the coast are excellent harbors and numerous islands. The Illyrian race inhabiting the region were wild mountaineers, who were a thorn in the side of their neighbors, the Macedonians, and, when they descended to the seacoast, they so practiced piracy as to bring them into collision with the Romans, who, in 229 B. C., began to conquer them, and finally made Illyricum, or Illyria, a province of the empire. The apostle Paul preached the gospel from Jerusalem and round about even to Illyricum (Rom xv. 19). In the later years of the Roman empire the name Illyricum gained a much wider meaning. A great part of Illyricum in the more limited sense constitutes Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Montenegro.

Im'age. See IDOL.

Im'la or Imlah [he, i. e. God, doth fill]

Father of the prophet Micaiah (1 Kin. xxii. 8, 9, 2 Chron. xviii. 7, 8).

Im-man'u-el, in A. V. of N. T. Emmanuel, the Greek pronunciation [God with us].

A son whom "the maiden" should bear (Is. vii. 14. R. V. margin). Before the son is born, or at the time of his birth, historical events will justify naming him "God with us"; before he attains to years of moral determination, the land of northern Israel and Damascus will be forsaken, and unexampled punishment will be inflicted on Judah (ver. 16, 17); and hence during the years of his moral maturity, he shall eat the products of a land that has been wasted by the nations (ver. 15, 18 seq.). Isaiah had in mind that worthy Son of David about whom prophecy had begun to cluster: for 1 He foretells the birth of a son, not simply of a child. 2 He utters this prophecy to the house of David in view of God's rejection of the faithless successor of David who then occupied the throne. 3 On the natural interpretation of viii 8, which observes the previous use of Immanuel as the name of the son, does justice to the pronoun of the second person in the clause preceding Immanuel, and affords an easy transition to the succeeding verse, Immanuel is a person; and if so, he is a native of Judah, and sufficiently great to be singled out as a representative, for Judah is spoken of as the land of Immanuel; and he is a powerful personage, for because of him the rage of the nations is vain (ver 9 seq.). 4 The Messiah is definitely before the prophet's mind in ix 6, 7 and xi. 1, and violence is required to separate these prophecies from that of chap vii. The Messianic hope was awake at this period of history. 5 The use of the article with maiden is adequately explained. Isaiah uses it to designate the young woman, unknown by name, yet definite, who is to be the mother of Messiah (cp Mic v 3). 6 Looking back, this meaning seems to have been the mind of the Spirit (Mat i 22, 23).

The prophet is, therefore, thinking of David's son, who might appear at any time. But he is not predicting the birth of Hezekiah and expecting him to be the Messiah; for 1 Hezekiah was already born. This prophecy was delivered in 734 B. C., and Hezekiah was on the throne, a vigorous ruler in 727 B. C. 2 After the lapse of a year and when Hezekiah was a youth, the prophet still continues to look forward to the future for the going forth of the shoot out of the root of Jesse. 3 Hezekiah did not eat curds and honey; the processes which issued in the spoliation and subjection of the land had only begun in Hezekiah's time. If ver 18-25 of Is. vii are included in the prophecy, the fly of Egypt did not come upon Judah in Hezekiah's day. Even ver 17 presents a picture which belongs to the remoter future; days such as had not been were not brought upon Ahaz and his people, only the beginning of the process which resulted in the predicted calamity was seen.

Immanuel was a sign. But Ahaz did not live until any child born that year reached the age of moral self-determination, for Ahaz died before the fall of Samaria in 722. He did not live to see the land forsaken (16). Immanuel was not a sign to compel faith in Ahaz, but one that called for faith. Like many other signs of the O. T., it called for present faith and occurred only when the prophecy was fulfilled (Ex. iii 12).

The birth, infancy, and youth of Messiah are described as actually passing before the prophet's sight; but the prophet himself did not understand that the Messiah was necessarily to be born immediately, for when the Messiah did not appear within a year, Isaiah shows no signs of disappointment, loses no faith in the prophetic revelation, continues his activity, makes still greater disclosures regarding Immanuel, and enjoys the continued confidence of his fellow countrymen. Isaiah would inquire what and what manner of time the Spirit which was in him did signify.

The promise of immediate deliverance from the advancing enemy (Is. vii. 3-11) is confirmed by an appeal to an event which might occur sooner or later. But whether occurring at once or long subsequently, it is confirmatory, because it implies the deliverance promised to Ahaz. The assurance, already given by God (2 Sam. vii. 11-17), that the Messiah should be born of the royal family of David was a sign to the house of David, including Ahaz, that the purpose of Rezin and Pekah to destroy the kingdom and place a new king over the people should not stand (Is. vii. 13, 14). And the remoter sign, that is the remoter the birth of Messiah, the stronger was the guarantee of the long continuance of the royal family of Judah.

The birth and infancy of Immanuel measure the progress of the predicted events. "I see his birth, who is God's guarantee of the continued existence and deliverance of Judah, as though it is already at hand. I do not know the times and the seasons, but it is revealed to me as a sign to you, and as though about to occur. As such it contains a measure of time for the immediate future. Before the child comes to the years when one chooses between right and wrong, the northern land shall be forsaken. At the time of life when one's moral faculties have matured, he, the scion of the royal house of Judah, will dwell in a wasted land." Any child would serve for measuring the time; but the child chosen is Messiah because the prophecy of deliverance rested upon the promises which centered in the Messiah.

Now let us measure the period. 1. Before Christ attained the age when man's moral faculties are mature the northern kingdom was desolate. In fact before a child, born in the year of this meeting between Isaiah and Ahaz, could have reached moral maturity the land of the north was desolate. The meeting is known to have taken place in 734 B. C. By 722 Damascus and the district governed by it had been ravaged by the Assyrians, the two and a half tribes of Israel east of the Jordan had been carried off, Samaria had fallen and a large body of its inhabitants had been deported. Ahaz saw the beginning of this, but died before its accomplishment. The house of David saw the complete fulfillment. The process thus begun continued. In 65 years Ephraim had ceased to be a people. At Christ's appearance, this was still true. The ten tribes no longer existed as a nation, and no longer occupied the land of their fathers. 2. At a time when a child's moral faculties would be mature, Ahaz himself had gone to Damascus, had done homage to the Assyrian king, and had acknowledged that Judah was a tributary state to Assyria. The land itself was not actually devastated, but it had bowed itself down to the foreign yoke. From this time onward, with the exception of short intervals, it was in a sense subject to the dominant world-power, and it was looked upon by the great empire of each period as a dependency, and whenever Judah claimed independence it was visited sooner or later by the imperial power which claimed sovereignty and was punished and wasted. Its nationality was not blotted out and the royal family was not destroyed nor overlooked; but Judah was, generally speaking, a dependency. When Christ actually appeared, Judah was still acknowledging a foreign sovereign. In other words, all the processes foretold by Isaiah began in the lifetime of Ahaz, and their results were in full force when the Messiah actually appeared.

Im'mer [talkative].

1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had become a father's house in the time of David, and was made the sixteenth course of priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 6, 14). The ruler of the house of God in the days of Jeremiah, and an antagonist of the prophet, apparently belonged to this house (Jer. xx. 1), and doubtless they were members of this family who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 37; Neh. xi. 13). Two priests of this house were among those who about a century after the return were guilty of marrying foreign wives (Ezra x. 20). A little later another son of Immer took part in the honorable work of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 29).

2. A person or a place in Babylonia whence exiles returned. He or they failed, however, to prove their genealogy (Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61).

Im'na [he, i. e. probably God, doth restrain].

An Asherite, a son of Helem (1 Chron. vii. 35).

Im'nah, in A. V. once Jimna and once Jimnah (Gen. xlii. 17; Num. xxvi. 44) [he allotted].

1. Son of Asher and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 44; 1 Chron. vii. 30; Gen. xlii. 17).

2. A Levite, father of Kore, in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 14).

Im'rah [stubborn, refractory].

An Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Chron. vii. 36).

Im'ri [eloquent].

1. A man of Judah, son of Bani, and a descendant of Perez (1 Chron. ix. 4).

2. Father of that Zaccur who rebuilt part of the wall of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. iii. 2).

In'cense.

Fragrant substances designed to be burnt, especially in religious worship. Sweet incense was largely used as an element in the Israelite ritual (Ex xxv 6, xxxv. 8, 28; xxxvii 29). The ingredients were stacte or opobalsamum, onycha, galbanum, and pure frankincense in equal proportions, tempered with salt. It was not allowed to be made for ordinary purposes (Ex xxx. 34-38. Lev. x 1-7). An altar of incense was fashioned of acacia wood overlaid with pure gold. It belonged to the oracle (1 Kin vi 22), but was placed in the holy place, just outside the veil which concealed the holy of holies; and each morning, when the high priest dressed the lamps, he burned incense on it (Ex xxx 1-9; Luke i 10), see ALTAR. Once a year on the great day of atonement, he brought the incense within the veil, and, burning it on a fire in a censer in the most holy place, enveloped the mercy seat in a cloud of the odoriferous smoke which it sent forth (Lev. xvi 12, 13). When the altar was dedicated, each of the princes brought a gift of incense, carried in a spoon (Num vii 14, 20, etc.). Where so many animal sacrifices were offered as there were in the courts, both of the tabernacle and the temple, the smell of blood must have polluted the atmosphere, and the burning of incense exerted a good sanitary influence. But it had also a symbolic reference. It availed to make atonement (Num. xvi 46, 47), for it was typical of the intercession of the appointed high priest. The psalmist requested that his prayer might be set forth before Jehovah as incense (Ps cxli 2), the worshippers prayed outside the temple while Zacharias offered incense within its walls (Luke i 10), and in an apocalyptic vision an angel burnt incense on the golden altar, the smoke ascending with the prayers of saints (Rev viii 3-5). The worshippers of false divinities, no less than those who adored the true God, burnt incense (2 Chron xxxiv 25; Jer xlviii 35).

In'di-a [in Hebrew Hodû, through Persian Hidhu, from Hindu, the river Indus]

A district on the lower Indus, conquered by Darius the Great and incorporated with the Persian empire (Herod. iii 94; iv. 44; Persepolis inscription). It formed the eastern limit of the Persian empire (Esth. i. 1; viii. 9; cp Herod. iv. 40). Alexander the Great crossed the Indus on his career of conquest. The occurrence of the name in 1 Mac viii 8 is suspicious. Luther substituted Ionia. At any rate Judas Maccabæus was misinformed if he was told that the Romans had taken India from Antiochus.

In-her'it-ance. See HEIR.

Ink'horn.

A horn or anything similar for holding ink. It was carried at the side (Ezek. ix. 2). The inkhorn is still in use in the East. It consists of a case of wood, horn, or metal, with a head at one end for holding the ink, and a long shaft in which the reeds for writing are kept. The case is worn stuck in the girdle.

Inn.

An oriental inn bears little resemblance to an occidental hotel. The inn was not so necessary in primitive times. Travelers readily found reception in the houses of the hospitable (Ex ii 20; Judg xix 15-21; 2 Kin iv 8; Acts xxviii 7; Heb xiii 2). The public inn was a mere place of shelter for man and beast. Like the modern khans, it was probably a large, quadrangular court, with a well in the center and around the sides rooms for travelers, chambers for goods, and stalls for cattle. The rooms were destitute of furniture. The traveler spread his mat on the floor, if he had one to spread; if not, then his shawl-like mantle sufficed for mattress and covering. He also provided food for himself and fodder for his cattle. Free lodging places of this sort were erected by liberal wealthy men for the benefit of wayfarers (cp Jer xli 17). Rarely was there a host from whom food could be purchased (Luke x 34, 35).

In-spi-ra'tion.

The terms inspiration and inspired are used in English with great latitude of meaning, and this latitude is reflected to some extent in their usage in the English Bible. They occur, however, only twice in the English Bible, and in both cases in a religious sense (Job xxxiii 8, 2 Tim iii 16). In the former passage the word is used loosely to give expression to the broad fact that men are not independent of God as intellectual beings, but that for small and great, old and young alike, it is "the breath [or inspiration] of the Almighty [that] giveth them understanding." In the latter passage the word inspired is used in its more proper and specific sense as a direct predicate of the written Scriptures, affirming that quality of divinity in them by virtue of which they are "profitable" for the great ends for which they are given. The Scriptures which the apostle had particularly in mind in this passage were the sacred books of the Jews, what we call the O. T.; but the affirmation he makes will naturally hold good of all writings which rightly share the high title of Scripture with them. The quality which he thus makes the fundamental characteristic of Scripture is expressed in the original Greek, not by the simple word inspired, but by a compound word, God-inspired, possibly of his own coinage, by which the divine source of the inspiration is emphasized. He adduces this fundamental quality of Scripture as the ground on which the unique value of the Scriptures rests. "All scripture," he says, "is given by inspiration of God, and is [therefore] profitable, etc." (A. V.), or, "Every Scripture, [seeing that it is] inspired of God, is also profitable, etc." (R. V.). Inspiration, according to the apostle, is, therefore, the fundamental quality of the written Scriptures, by virtue of which they are the word of God, and are clothed with all the characteristics which properly belong to the word of God. In accordance with the teaching of this classical passage, Scripture is uniformly recognized, throughout the N. T., as the very word of God, and is treated as possessing all the qualities which would naturally flow from its divine origin. Thus it is currently cited by the exclusive titles Scripture, the Scriptures, the Oracles of God (Rom iii 2) or the Living Oracles (Acts vii. 38, R. V.), and its words are ordinarily adduced by the authoritative formula, "It is written." Its divine character is explicitly expressed in the constant ascription of the words cursorily quoted from it to God as their author (Acts xiii 34; 1 Cor vi. 16; Mat i. 22; ii. 15; Rom i. 2), or more specifically to the Holy Spirit (Heb iii 7; ix 8; x. 15; Acts i. 16; iv. 25, R. V. xxviii. 25): and that, even when they are not ascribed to God in the original passages, but are spoken of or even addressed to him, and can be thought of his only because they are part of the Scripture text (Acts iv. 24, 25; xiii 34, 35; Mat xix. 5, Heb. i. 6, 7, 8, 10, iv 4. 7; vii 21; x. 30). While on the other hand the human writers of Scripture are said to have spoken "in" the Holy Spirit (Mark xii. 36; Mat xxii 43, both R. V.), and are treated as merely the media through whom God the Holy Ghost speaks (Mat i. 22; ii. 15; Acts i. 16; iv 25; xxviii 25, Rom. i. 2). Accordingly, the very words of Scripture are accounted authoritative and "not to be broken" (Mat. xxii. 43; John x. 34, 35; Gal iii 16); its prophecies sure (2 Pet. i. 20; John xix 36, 37; xx. 9; Acts i. 16; cp Ezra i. 1; Dan. ix 2); and its whole contents, historical as well as doctrinal and ethical, not only entirely trustworthy, but designedly framed for the spiritual profit of all ages (2 Tim. iii 16; Rom xv 4; 1 Cor. x. 11; Rom. iv 23; ix 17; 1 Cor. ix. 10; Gal iii. 8, 22; iv. 30, 1 Pet ii 6; cp. 2 Chron. xvii. 9; Neh. viii. 1). That the books of the N. T. are given to the church as equally Scripture with those of the O. T., and share with them in all their divine qualities, is shown by the equal claim to authority which is made for them (1 Cor. vii. 40, xiv. 37; 2 Thes. iii. 4, 14; Gal. i. 8); the similar representation of their authors as the organs of God (1 Thes. ii. 13; iv 2; 1 Cor. ii. 13, 16; vii. 40); and the inclusion of N. T. books along with those of the O. T. under the common sacred title of Scripture (2 Pet. iii. 16; 1 Tim. v 18).

I-ri'jah [Jehovah doth see or provide]

A captain of the guard. During the temporary departure of the Chaldeans from the siege of Jerusalem, he arrested Jeremiah, who was going out at the gate of Benjamin, on the charge of attempting to fall away to the enemy (Jer. xxxvii 13)

Ir-na'hash [city of Nahash or of a serpent]

A town of which a man of Judah was the leading citizen (1 Chron. iv 12). The margin renders city of Nahash. The chronicler may intend the town of Abigail's father (2 Sam xvii. 25).

I'ron, I.

A metal, in Hebrew Barzel, in Greek Sideros. Tubal-cain, of the race of Cain, worked in brass and iron (Gen. iv. 22). As early as the Mosaic period, there were axes and other instruments of iron (Num. xxxv. 16; Deut. xix. 5, margin). If Og's couch was a bed, it was made of iron (iii 11). In the time of Joshua, vessels were made of the metal (Josh. vi. 19, 24); and chariots of iron for war purposes were in use (Josh. xvii. 16), continuing through the period of the judges, and on to later times (Judg. i. 19, iv. 3, 13). Of iron were made armor and weapons, as spearheads and breastplates (1 Sam. xvii. 7; Rev. ix. 9); agricultural implements, as harrows and threshing instruments (2 Sam. xii. 31; Amos i. 3); builder's tools and nails (1 Kin. vi. 7; 1 Chron. xxii. 3); graving tools (Job xix. 24; Jer. xvii. 1); barbed irons for fishing (Job xli. 7); gates, bars, fetters (Ps. cv. 18; cvii. 10, 16; cxlix. 8; Is. xlv. 2; Acts xii. 10); idols (Dan. v. 4). Iron was imported from Tarshish, Greece, and the north, doubtless from the vicinity of the Black Sea (Jer. xv. 12; Ezek. xxvii. 12, 19). It was obtainable in Palestine (Deut. vii. 9), being abundant on the Lebanon mountains. The ore was reduced in furnaces (Deut. iv. 20; 1 Kin. viii. 51) which, to judge from those in use in Lebanon, were built of stone, about ten feet in height and three in diameter. Charcoal was used in them, and the fire was blown by bellows (Ezek. xxi. 20; cp. Jer. vi. 29). The process was laborious and involved enormous waste. See SMITH.

Iron, II. [timidity, reverence, or rather, possessing a view, conspicuous].

A fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 38); probably the present village of Yârûn, 10 miles west from the waters of Merom.

Ir'pe-el [God healeth].

A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 27). Conder thinks it probably the village Râfât, 6½ miles north by west of Jerusalem, the ancient and modern names having the same meaning.

Ir-she'mesh [city of the sun].

A town of Dan (Josh. xix. 41), probably the same as Beth-sheme-sh.

Ir'u [pertaining to a city, or watchful].

A son of the celebrated Caleb (1 Chron. iv. 15).

Isaac [he laugheth, or laughing one].

The son of Abraham and Sarah, born in the south country, doubtless at Beer-sheba (Gen. xxi. 14, 31), when his father was 100 years old and his mother about 90 (xvii. 17; xxi. 5). When the promise was made to him that Sarah should bear him a son, he laughed questioningly (xvii. 17-19). Later when Sarah heard the promise from the mouth of the stranger stopping at the camp, she laughed incredulously (xviii. 9-15); and when the child was born she joyfully confessed that God had prepared laughter for her and her friends (xxi. 6). To commemorate these events and the faithfulness of God, Abraham called the boy's name Isaac, one laugheth. He was circumcised on the eighth day; and being the child of promise and legal heir he had from the first higher privileges than were accorded to Ishmael, Abraham's son by the handmaid (xxi. 1-12). To exhibit and develop Abraham's faith, God commanded him to offer Isaac as a burnt offering. Isaac was then a youth (xxii. 6), perhaps 25 years old, as Josephus says, but he filially acquiesced in the purpose of his father. When Abraham had laid him upon the altar, and thus shown his readiness to give all that he possessed to God, the angel of the Lord forbade the sacrifice and accepted a ram instead, thus testifying against child-sacrifices, practised by the Canaanites and many other idolatrous peoples, and teaching to all men that human sacrifices are an abomination to the Lord (xxii. 1-18).

Isaac dwelt in the south country, at Beer-lahai-roi (xxiv. 62). In disposition he was retiring and contemplative, affectionate also, and felt his mother's death deeply (63, 67). He married at the age of 40 years, but his two sons were not born until he was 60 (xxv. 20, 26). Because of a famine he moved fifty miles north, to Gerar (xxvi. 1, 6). There Jehovah appeared to him, telling him not to go to Egypt and re-affirming the Abrahamic covenant (2-5). It had been the settled policy of Abraham, whenever he was in foreign parts (xx. 13), to represent Sarah as his sister; and Isaac, in similar peril at Gerar, likewise tried to pass off Rebekah as his sister, but without success (xxvi. 6-11, same document as xii. 10-20). Leaving Gerar, he pitched his camp in the valley of Gerar (xxvi. 17), and opened again the wells that his father had dug. Thence he removed to Beer-sheba, which long remained his headquarters (23, xxviii. 10). Jehovah appeared to him during the night, and encouraged him; and he erected an altar, as his father had done (xxvi. 24, 25). Abimelech, the king of Gerar, visited him and entered into a treaty with him (26-31). This sworn agreement, sheba', gave a new occasion for linking the memory of an oath with the name of the place (33, cp. xxi. 31).

Esau, the elder of Isaac's two sons, was his favorite, although God had declared that the elder should serve the younger. Jacob was Rebekah's favorite (xxv. 28). When Isaac was much over 100 years old (xxvii. 1 with xxv. 26; xxvi. 34), Rebekah and Jacob took advantage of his age and of the blindness and the bluntness of feeling which it produced; and deceived as to the person, Isaac transferred the Abrahamic blessing to the younger son. Soon after, at the instigation of Rebekah, who wished to save Jacob from the murderous wrath of Esau, but feigned a different reason, Isaac sent Jacob to Laban in Paddan-aram to get a wife (xxvii. 46-xxviii. 5).

Some twenty years later Isaac was residing near Hebron, where he had sojourned in his father's later life (xxxv. 27; cp. xxiii. 2). There he died at the age of 180 years (xxxv. 28), and was buried by his two sons beside his parents and his wife in the cave of Machpelah (xlix. 30, 31). The N. T. alludes to Isaac as a child of promise (Gal. iv. 22, 23), and instances his tent life and his blessing

Esau and Jacob as evidences of his faith (Heb. xi. 9, 20).

I-sa'iah, in A. V. of N. T. Esaias, the Greek modification [Jehovah hath saved].

A prophet of Judah in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah (Is. i. 1; cp. vi. 1; vii. 3; xiv. 28; xx. 1, 2; xxxvi.-xxxix.). He was the son of Amoz, who must not be confounded with the prophet Amos. He lived in Jerusalem, and prophesied concerning Judah and Jerusalem; his prophecies concerning Samaria, Damascus, Philistia and other nations being subordinate to those which directly concerned Jerusalem, and being introduced because of their relation to Zion and the people of God. It is disputed whether the vision which he saw in the year that king Uzziah died (vi.) marked his call to the prophetic office, or was intended to deepen his spirituality. Other prophets experienced similar renewed quickening. Ezekiel's inaugural call was by a vision; and long afterwards, when he was a distinguished prophet, his call to the prophetic office was confirmed, and he was warned, like Isaiah, of the indifference with which the people would receive his message (Ezek. xxxiii. 21-33). Peter, after several years of service as a disciple of Christ and in the apostolic office, had his insight into Christ's teaching deepened and was introduced into a wider work by a vision (Acts x.). Paul, long after he had been called to labor among the gentiles, was summoned by a vision to work in a new field, Europe (Acts xvi. 9, 10). So God may have purposed an increase and a deepening of the spiritual life of Isaiah, in sending him this vision. By the year 734 B. C. Isaiah was a married man (Is. viii. 3), with a son named Shear-jashub, which means a remnant shall return (vii. 3). A second son was afterwards born to him, whom by divine direction he called Maher-shalal-hash-baz, which means spoil speedeth, prey hasteneth. The names of both sons enshrine prophecies. Isaiah's wife is called a prophetess (viii. 3), probably merely because she was the wife of a prophet.

Isaiah spoke much on the relations of Israel, both as a church and as a body politic, to the world. In regard to political relations he urged king and people to put trust in Jehovah and avoid entangling alliances with earthly powers (viii. 12-14; etc.). In 734 B. C., when Syria and Israel joined forces in order to capture Jerusalem, and put a creature of their own upon the throne, he declared Jehovah's purpose that the attempt should fail, and he vainly endeavored to persuade Ahaz to rely on Jehovah and not put confidence in heathen princes (vii.). Ahaz unwisely rejected this advice, called in Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, and became his vassal (2 Kin. xvi. 7, 8, 10); see TIGLATH-PILESER. Under Hezekiah the prophet's counsel was treated with more respect. The Assyrians invaded Judah in Hezekiah's fourteenth year, about 714 B. C. (2 Kin. xviii. 13; Is. xxxvi. 1). Shortly afterwards, in the same year, Hezekiah fell dangerously sick, and Isaiah foretold his recovery (2 Kin. xx. 1-11). Then followed the embassy of Merodach-baladan, 712 or 711 B. C. (Is. xxxix.), the conquest of Ashdod by Sargon's army, 711 B. C. (xx.), and the expeditions sent against Jerusalem by Sennacherib, 701 B. C. (2 Kin. xviii. 14). During the last-named crisis, Isaiah's prophecies and encouraging words nerved the government to refuse the Assyrian demands.

The time and manner of Isaiah's death are not known with certainty. Hezekiah died in 698 or 697 B. C. The murder of Sennacherib and accession of Esarhaddon, which occurred in 681 and 680, are recorded (Is. xxxvii. 38). Doubtful Jewish tradition affirms that Isaiah was martyred by Manasseh, having been sawn asunder, and some have supposed that Heb. xi. 37 alludes to the manner of his death. The date involved is not impossible, for Isaiah may have begun his ministry after 740 B. C., prophesied in the reigns of the four kings, Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, survived Hezekiah, and written his acts first and last (2 Chron. xxxii. 32), heard of the murder of Sennacherib, and have suffered martyrdom in or after the eighteenth year of Manasseh, at the age of not more than 80 years. At any rate, in writing his history of Uzziah's reign (2 Chron. xxvi. 22), Isaiah used probably records and other authoritative sources for the earlier part of the reign.

The book of the Prophet Isaiah is divisible as follows. I. Introduction (i). II. A prophecy against Jerusalem (ii-iv), with a continuation or closely related prophecy (v). The denunciation culminates in iv. with the effect of the judgment and a picture of the glory of Messianic times. This prophecy may have been delivered during the prosperous times of the joint reign of Uzziah and Jotham. III. The vision of chap. vi, which, as every one admits, stands in close relation to the Book of Immanuel (vii-xii). IV. Ten burdens on the nations (xiii.-xxxiii.), divided by chap. xx, which is of international import, into two series of five burdens each, and culminating in judgment upon the whole world (xxiv.), and followed by Judah's triumph and blessedness (xxv.-xxvii.). V. A group of prophecies dealing exclusively with Judah and Samaria and pronouncing woe and weal (xxviii.-xxxiii.), culminating as before in judgment on all nations and Zion's happy future (xxxiv., xxxv). VI. A historical section (xxxvi.-xxxix.), describing the initiatory operations of the Assyro-Babylonian power in Judah, and serving as an introduction to the Book of Consolation, which was offered in view of the sore judgment upon Judah (xl.-lxvi.). This Book of Consolation treats of the relation of the church of Israel to Jehovah (xl-xlviii), the relation of the church to the nations (xlix-lvii), the abrogation of national distinctions, and the glorious future of the church (lviii-lxvi). The prominent figure in these chapters is the servant of the Lord (see SERVANT OF JEHOVAH).

The genuineness of chapter 1 was called in question by Koppe in 1797. Soon afterwards Doderlein assigned the composition of the last twenty-seven chapters to the time of the exile. This theory, enlarged to include xiii-xiv 23, xxi 1-10; xxiv-xxvii; xxxiv-xxxv, has found numerous advocates. Still other passages have been added as the need of adjustment has appeared, such as xi 10-xii 6; but there is not the same unanimity in rejecting them among the adherents of the theory. The arguments advanced in support of the main theory are all comprehended in three: 1. The language is late and the style is peculiar. 2. The allusions to the condition of Jews and gentiles reveal the time of the exile. 3. The statements concerning the condition of the people agree with the historical facts, but those which relate to the future have fallen short of fulfillment.

To these arguments the answer, which must unfortunately be stated summarily, is rendered. 1. There has not been shown a single word of known late date, nor a single foreign element which there is any reason to believe was not current in Jerusalem in the days of Isaiah. Every word, phrase, and form is found in earlier Hebrew literature or may be explained by the history of the times. As to the style being peculiar, change of style is consistent with unity of authorship. The style of Shakspeare changed. His literary activity lasted but twenty-five years, yet four distinct periods are discernible in his plays, marked by differences of style. The literary activity of Isaiah was continued through at least forty years and perhaps sixty. And is the style so peculiar after all? Those who deny the Isaianic authorship find it incumbent upon them to explain the similarity of style. Augusti accounts for the ascription of these chapters to Isaiah in the first instance by the fact that "they were composed so entirely in the spirit and manner of Isaiah." Gesenius and De Wette ascribe the similarity of style to imitation or the work of a conforming hand. Umbreit calls the unknown author of the chapters in dispute, "Isaiah risen again" as from the dead. 2. To the argument that the allusions, which are made in these chapters to the condition of Jews and gentiles, reveal the time of the exile, it is replied: a. The prophets frequently transport themselves to the future and describe what they are predicting as already past; for instance, although Zebulun and Naphtali had been ravaged and their inhabitants carried into captivity, the acknowledged Isaiah says of them: "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light" (ix 2). b. The explicit references to Babylon, the exile, and the restoration are few. c. The acknowledged Isaiah and his contemporary prophets were already living in anticipation of the Babylonian exile. There is scarcely an event connected with the exile, to which the author refers, but was known to the Israelites in the time of Isaiah. The prophets of the time predicted the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple (Amos ii 5; Micah iii 12; Is. iii 8; vi 11), the desolation of the land of Judah (Hos. viii 14; Amos ix 11, 14; Is. iii 25, 26; vi 11, 12, xxxiii 13), the captivity of the people of Judah (Is. xi 12; Mic. i 14-16). This captivity was to be in Babylon (Is. xxxix 6, 7; cp. xi 11, Mic. iv 10). There should be a return from exile (Joel iii 1; Is. xi 11). Jerusalem and the temple should be rebuilt (Mic. iv 2; although the destruction of Jerusalem had been foretold, iii 12, cp. Joel iii 16, 17, 20), and many people would come to Jerusalem to worship (Is. ii 2-4; xi 10; xviii 7; Mic. iv 1-3). d. The spiritual condition of the people, as exhibited in these chapters, is that of the time of Isaiah; idolatry under every green tree (lvii 5 and i 29, 2 Kin. xvi 4) and among the oaks (lvii 5 and i 29; Hos. iv 13) and in gardens (lxv 3; lxvi. 17 and i 29); the slaying of children in the valleys (lvii 5 and 2 Chron. xxviii 3; xxxiii 6; 2 Kin. xxiii. 10); ascending a high mountain to offer sacrifice (lvii 7 and 2 Chron. xxviii 4; Hos. iv. 13; cp. Ezek. vi. 13); hypocrisy (lviii. 2-4 and xxix 13); Sabbath-breaking (lviii 13 and Amos viii 5, Jer. xvii 19-27); bloodshed and violence (lix. 3, 7 and i. 15; Mic. vii 2); falsehood, injustice, and oppression (lix. 3, 4, 6, 7, 9 and v. 7, 23; x. 1, 2; Mic. ii 1, 2, vii. 3); neglect of the temple worship (xliii 23, 24 and 2 Chron. xxviii 24; xxix. 27; 2 Kin. xv 4; 2 Chron. xxvii 2; 2 Kin. xv 35, 2 Chron. xxxiii 10). Burning incense upon bricks (lxv. 3) was appropriate to a worship derived from either Egypt, Assyria, or Babylonia, and was practiced in Jerusalem before the exile (2 Kin. xxiii. 12; Jer. xix 13). Swine's flesh was offered and eaten (lxv 4) by the Egyptians on the festival of Selene and Dionysus (Herod. ii 47, 48) and commonly enough by the Babylonians. 3. To the argument that the statements concerning the condition of the people agree with the historical facts, whereas those which relate to the future have fallen far short of fulfillment, it is replied that the assertion applies with equal force to the acknowledged writings of the prophet Isaiah. He foretold the destruction of the cities, the utter desolation of the land, and the removal of the inhabitants far hence (vi. 11, 12). This was fulfilled to the letter. But he prophesied also the flocking of the gentiles to the standard of Jesse's son, the return of the captive people of God from all parts of the world, the drying up of rivers which were obstacles in the course of the march, a highway from Assyria for the remnant of the people, the wolf dwelling in peace with the lamb (xi 6-8, 10-12, 15, 16; see also Amos ix 11-15; Mic v 4, vii. 12). These are the same predictions as those which in the latter portion of the book are pointed to as the extravagant utterances of an enthusiast and as having fallen short of fulfillment. Unless these numerous passages be excised, the acknowledged Isaiah, and often his contemporaries also, living two centuries before the fall of Babylon and the hopes which that event are supposed to have awakened, wrote in precisely the same manner as the author of the last section.

A special ground on which the denial of the genuineness of the last twenty-seven chapters rests is the mention of Cyrus by name (xliv. 28, xlv. 1). So also Josiah was foretold by name (1 Kin xiii. 2). If predictive prophecy is possible, if it was ever uttered by holy men taught by the Holy Spirit, then the name of Cyrus could have been penned by Isaiah. Otherwise the words, as they stand, were not uttered until nearly two hundred years after Isaiah. The church has always believed in predictive prophecy and in the inspiration of Isaiah.

Is'cah [perhaps, discerning or expectant].

A daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah (Gen. xi 29), and consequently sister of Lot (27). Iscah has been regarded as another name of Sarai (Antiq. i 6, 5; Targum Jonathan); but in that case Sarai would have been Abraham's niece and not his half-sister (Gen. xx 12).

Is-car'i-ot [probably, man of Kerioth].

A designation of Judas the traitor (Mat. x 4, Luke vi 16), which belonged to his father Simon before him (John vi. 71, R. V.). It was used to distinguish him from the other apostle called Judas (Luke vi 16, Acts i 13, 16). It seems to mean that Judas was a native of Kerioth in the south of Judah (Josh. xv 25); or perhaps of Koraë, on the northeastern border of Judæa (Antiq. xiv 3, 4, War i. 6, 5). In the codex Bezaë the word is written apo Karuōtou everywhere in the Fourth Gospel, and is so written in John vi 71 in the codex Sinaiticus. Accordingly Judas was probably a Judean; and perhaps he was the only apostle from Judæa, and the rest were Galilæans.

Is'h'bah [he praises or praising one].

A man of Judah, ancestor or head of the inhabitants of Eshtemoa (1 Chron. iv. 17).

Is'h'bak [perhaps, he leaveth or relinquishing one].

An Arab tribe descended from Abraham through Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2).

Ish-bi-be'nob [my dwelling place is on a height].

A Philistine giant who was on the point of killing David, but was himself slain by Abishai (2 Sam. xxi 16, 17).

Ish-bo'sheth [man of shame].

One of Saul's younger sons, originally called Eshbaal, the Lord's man, which was changed to Ish-bosheth, man of shame, either during his lifetime when the glory of his house departed, or in later times when the name Baal fell into disrepute through its idolatrous associations (2 Sam. ii. 8 with 1 Chron. viii 33; ix 39). He was not present at the battle of Gilboa, or, if present, he escaped the slaughter on that disastrous day. On the death of Saul, David obtained the sovereignty over Judah, but the other tribes refused him allegiance and proclaimed Ish-bosheth king as successor to his father Saul. Ish-bosheth was then aged about 40, and reigned two troubled years (2 Sam. ii 8-10). His capital was at Mahanaim, east of the Jordan (ii. 8, 12). He was unsuccessful in the war which he waged with David to secure the undisputed sway over the twelve tribes (ii. 12-iii 1). He brought a serious charge against his main supporter, Abnei, who thereupon offered his services to David, and, on David's making demand on Ish-bosheth, conducted David's wife Michal back to him (6-21). When Abnei was murdered at Hebron, Ish-bosheth lost heart (27, iv. 1). He was soon afterwards assassinated, and his head carried in triumph to David. But by David's order the severed head was honorably interred in the tomb of Abner at Hebron, and the assassins were put to death for their crime (iv. 5-12). With the death of Ish-bosheth the dynasty of Saul came to an end, although a grandson of Saul's remained (iv. 4).

Ish'hod, in A. V. Ishod [man of splendor].

A Manassite whose mother was Hammolet-keth (1 Chron. vii 18).

Ish'i, I. [my husband].

A name by which the Israelites call Jehovah, when they return to their allegiance. It supersedes the synonymous one Baal, my master, because the word Baal had come into ill repute through its association with idolatry (Hos. ii 16, 17).

Ish'i, II. [saving, salutary].

1. A man of Judah, son of Appaim, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii 31).

2. A man of Judah, father of Zoheth (1 Chron. iv. 20).

3. A Simeonite whose sons led a band which overcame the Amalekites of mount Seir, and seized on their settlements (1 Chron. iv. 42).

4. Head of a father's house of the half-tribe of Manasseh east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24).

I-shi'ah. See ISSIAH.

I-shi'jah. See ISSIJAH.

Ish'ma [desolation or, perhaps, distinction].

A man of Judah, descended from Hur (1 Chron. iv. 3, 4).

Ish'ma-el [God heareth].

1. The son of Abraham by Hagar the Egyptian maid; born when Abraham was eighty-six years old, after he had been ten full years in Canaan (Gen. xvi. 3, 15; cp. xii. 4). He was the child of worldly wisdom, not of faith; he was born of parents who, in the face of God's promise, were blinded by seeming impossibilities, and sought by earthly means to enable God to fulfill his engagements. When the rite of circumcision was instituted for the family of Abraham, Ishmael, then thirteen years of age, was circumcised (xvii. 25). The next year Isaac was born, when his mother was past age, the child of promise, a rebuke to unbelief (xxi. 5). At his weaning, the customary feast was made, when Ishmael was seen to be mocking. This was the first occasion in the family of Abraham that those born after the flesh in doubt of God's way mocked at the heirs of promise; and Paul seizes upon the allegory in the incident (Gal. iv. 22-31). This misbehavior of Ishmael led to the expulsion of him and his mother. They wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba till both were nearly perishing with thirst. The angel of the Lord directed Hagar to some water among the shrubs, and the life of herself and her son was preserved. Ishmael grew up in the wilderness of Paran, south of Canaan, where he lived by his bow. Eventually he married a wife from Egypt, his mother's ancestral home (Gen. xxi. 3-21). In fulfillment of a promise made by God to Abraham, Ishmael became the progenitor of twelve princes (xvii. 20, xxv. 12-16); see ISHMAELITES. He had also a daughter, who was married to Esau (xxviii. 9; xxxvi. 10). Ishmael took part with Isaac in burying their father Abraham (xxv. 9). He himself died at the age of 137 (xxv. 17).

2. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 38, ix. 44).

3. A man of Judah, father of the high judicial functionary Zebadiah (2 Chron. xix. 11).

4. A son of Jehohanan. He took part in the successful conspiracy against Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

5. A son of Nethaniah, who belonged to the seed royal of Judah. When Nebuchadnezzar departed from Palestine, after the capture of Jerusalem, he left behind him as governor of Judah a certain Jew called Gedaliah, who promised protection to any of the conquered people who placed themselves under his rule. Among others Ishmael came, but with hostile intent. Instigated by the king of the Ammonites, he assassinated Gedaliah, massacring at the same time the people with him. After further murders he carried off captives, including the king's daughters, and finally attempted to make his way to the Ammonite country. Johanan, son of Kareah, and others went forth to fight with him. They found him at Gibeon. His captives turned to Johanan, but he himself succeeded in escaping with eight men to the king of Ammon, who had instigated his crimes (2 Kin. xxv. 25; Jer. xl. 7-16; xli. 1-18).

6. A son of Pashhur, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 22).

Ish'ma-el-ite, in A. V. often Ishmeelite, an orthography true to the Hebrew word, but English literature has adopted the former spelling.

A descendant of Ishmael. The Ishmaelites had Egyptian blood, as well as the blood of Abraham, in their veins. Twelve princes sprang from Ishmael (Gen. xvii. 20; xxv. 12-16). He may have had more sons, and possibly some of those enumerated were grandsons. Twelve was an approved number. Twelve was carefully preserved as the number of the tribes of Israel, and twelve was the recognized number of the kings of the Hittites in their confederacy. The Ishmaelites in their twelvefold division dwelt in settlements and in movable camps in the desert of northern Arabia, in the region included between Havilah, Egypt, and the Euphrates (xxv. 18; Antiq. i. 12. 4). Occasionally one of their tribes acquired permanent residence and civilization, as the Nabatheans; but they mostly possessed the character of their ancestor and dwelt like the untamable ass of the desert (Gen. xvi. 12). Like Ishmael, too, they were celebrated for their skill with the bow (Is. xxi. 17). To Ishmaelites traveling as carriers between Gilead and Egypt, or, more definitely, to "certain Midianites, merchants," in the caravan, Joseph was sold by his brethren (Gen. xxxvii. 25-28). In Ps. lxxxiii. 6 they are mentioned with Edomites, Moabites, and Hagarenes.

In a wider sense, the nomadic tribes of northern Arabia generally; either because the Ishmaelites were the chief people of the desert, and their name came to be used as a synonym for any nomad of the region, or because an Ishmaelite confederacy had been formed which included tribes of other blood (Judg. viii. 24; cp. vii. 25; viii. 22, 26; Judith ii. 23). All the Arabs, after the example of Mohammed, claim descent from Ishmael.

Ish-ma'iah, in A. V. once Ismaliah (1 Chron. xii. 4) [Jehovah heareth].

1. A Gibeonite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4).

2. Son of Obadiah and head in David's reign of the Zebulunites (1 Chron. xxvii. 19).

Ish'me-el-ite. See ISHMAELITE.

Ish'me-rai [probably, Jehovah keepeth]. A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (1 Chron. viii. 18).

I'shod. See ISHOD.

Ish'pah, in A. V. Ispah [perhaps, bald]. A Benjamite, son of Beriah (1 Chron. viii. 16).

Ish'pan.

A Benjamite, son of Shashak (1 Chron. viii. 22).

Ish'tob [men of Tob]. See TOB.

Ish'u-ah. See ISHVAH.

Ish'u-ai and Ishui. See ISHVI.

Ish'vah, in A. V. Ishuah and Isuah [perhaps, equality].

The second son of Asher (Gen. xlv. 17; 1 Chron. vii. 30). He probably died childless; or, if he had descendants, they did not constitute a tribal family or perpetuate his name (cp. Num. xxvi. 44).

Ish'vi, in A. V. Ishuai, Ishui, Isui, and Jesui [perhaps, equal].

1. The third son of Asher, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlv. 17; Num. xxvi. 44; 1 Chron. vii. 30).

2. A son of Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 49).

Isle, Is'land.

The rendering of the Hebrew 'I, meaning
1. Habitable land, as opposed to water (Is. xlii. 15). 2. An island in the ordinary sense of the word (Jer. xlvii. 4). 3. A maritime country, even when constituting part of a continent: the coast land of Palestine and Phœnicia (Is. xx. 6, in R. V. coast land; cp. xxiii. 2, 6), and the coasts and islands of Asia Minor and Greece (Gen. x. 5). 4. The remotest regions of the earth and their inhabitants (Is. xli. 5; Zeph. ii. 11). This employment of the term may have arisen: (a) By synecdoche, the isles of the Mediterranean being remote and scarcely known. (b) From the current belief that the world was surrounded with water, so that the most distant region was the coast land of the world-ocean.

Is-ma-chi'ah [Jehovah supporteth].

An overseer connected with the temple in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

Is-ma'lah. See ISHMAIAH.

Is'pah. See ISHPAH.

Is'ra-el [he striveth with God, or God striveth].

1. The name given to Jacob when he was returning from Mesopotamia and just about to cross the brook Jabbok, where he expected to meet Esau (Gen. xxxii. 22-32); see JACOB.

2. The whole body of the descendants of Jacob at any one time. This use of the word began in his own lifetime (Gen. xxxiv. 7). It was common during the wilderness wanderings (Ex. xxxii. 4, Deut. iv. 1; xxvii. 9), though the designation children of Israel was yet more frequent both during this and the former period. Down to the death of Saul, Israel and the children of Israel, when used as a national designation, comprehended the Hebrews generally, without distinction of tribes. There were, however, geographical and other causes already at work which tended to separate Judah from the rest of Israel; and the distinction had come to be recognized before the actual division of the people into two kingdoms took place (1 Sam. xi. 8; xvii. 52; xviii. 16); see JUDAH. It was used also under the united monarchy (1 Kin. xi. 42). In the parallelism of Hebrew poetry it often corresponds in the second line of the couplet to Jacob in the first (Num. xxiii. 7, 10, 21; xxiv. 5, Ps. xiv. 7). After the exile the reference is frequently to the people of the various tribes who returned to Jerusalem (Ezra ix. 1; x. 5; Neh. ix. 2; xi. 3).

3. The tribes which acted independently of Judah. The split of the Hebrew people into two kingdoms occurred on the death of Saul. The northern and eastern tribes recognized Saul's son Ish-bosheth as king, and the tribe of Judah followed David. From this time onward Israel is frequently used to denote the ten tribes. Ish-bosheth reigned two years and was assassinated, but seven years elapsed before the breach was healed and David was anointed king of all Israel (2 Sam. i. 10, 11). The jealousies, however, remained, and on the death of Solomon the rupture became final. Ten tribes followed Jeroboam and one claved to the house of David. The ten tribes which were rent from the house of David were Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh east of the Jordan, and west of the river half Manasseh, Ephraim, Issachar, Zebulun, Naphtali, Asher, Dan, and lastly Benjamin, which belonged in part to the northern kingdom, Bethel, Gilgal, and Jericho, chief places in the tribe of Benjamin, being within the bounds of the northern kingdom.

The causes which led to the schism were

1. The isolation of Judah caused by nature and augmented by Joshua's blunder. 2. The ancient jealousy between the two powerful tribes of Ephraim and Judah. It had caused a temporary disruption of the kingdom after Saul's death; it broke out again after the defeat of Absalom because Judah was the first to welcome the king back (2 Sam. xix. 15, 40-43). It had been freshly provoked by Solomon's lavish adornment of Jerusalem on the borders of Judah, and at his death resulted in permanent separation. 3. Discontent caused by the excessive luxury of the throne. The people were groaning under oppressive burdens. Solomon's love of splendor had led to taxation to support his enormous household and maintain his display, and to enforcement of labor to carry out his great works (1 Kin. iv. 22, 23, 26; v. 13-16). The reasonable request of the people for relief was perversely refused by Rehoboam. 4. Idolatry, fostered by foreign marriages (1 Kin. xi. 1-11). A subtle corruption spread through all ranks owing to the encouragement given to false religions, attachment to the worship of Jehovah was weakened, and one great unifying force was destroyed. 5. The folly of Rehoboam in refusing the request of the people for relief intensified the disintegrating forces and precipitated the catastrophe (1 Kin. xii. 3-5, 12-16).

As compared with Judah in respect to strength the northern kingdom had ten tribes, twice the population, and nearly three times the extent of territory. But it was more exposed to war and less easy of defense than Judah. It was the apostate nation, and defection from God is weakness and inevitably undermines the stability of a state. It had an inferior religion with its lower moral tone, and many of its best spirits forsook it; the priests and Levites migrated into Judah (2 Chron. xi 13, 14).

The capital of the northern kingdom was at Shechem at first. It was soon removed to Tirzah, and then Omri founded Samaria and transferred the seat of government to the new city (1 Kin. xii 25; iv 17, xv. 21; xvi. 23, 24).

Jeroboam, the first king, was afraid that if his people visited Jerusalem for worship, they would be won over to their old allegiance, he therefore established two shrines, one at Dan in the extreme north, and the other at Bethel, in the south of the kingdom. At each of these places he erected a golden calf, which he designed as an aid to the worship of Jehovah; see CALF. Judgment was threatened against him and his race for this partial apostasy, and after his son, Nadab, had reigned two years, the dynasty was swept away. Nineteen kings in all sat upon the throne. See CHRONOLOGY. Their united reigns covered a period of about 210 years, seven of them reigned but two years or less, eight were slain or committed suicide and the throne was transferred to another family, and in only two instances was the royal power held by as many as four members of the same family in succession. None of the kings removed the calves from Bethel and Dan, indeed, under Ahab, who was influenced by his wicked heathen wife, Jezebel, the apostasy was rendered complete by the introduction of the worship of Baal instead of Jehovah. But God raised up prophets who contended steadfastly for the worship of Jehovah, at whatever risk to themselves. The most notable were Elijah and Elisha (q v). After the suppression of Baal worship, other prophets, especially Hosea and Amos, labored for the reformation of the moral life of the nation.

The northern Israelites were frequently at war with Judah. Indeed, the two kingdoms were in hearty alliance only while the house of Omri held the throne of Israel, when the royal families of Israel and Judah were united by intermarriage. When the Syrian kingdom of Damascus rose to power it necessarily affected the politics of the adjacent kingdom of Israel. Often the two were at war. They united, however, in making common cause against the Assyrians in the days of Ahab; and 120 years later they were again in alliance, their common object being the capture of Jerusalem. It was this danger that led Ahaz, king of Judah, terrified for his throne and life, and having no faith in Jehovah, to act contrary to the exhortations of Isaiah and to call in Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, at the price of independence Judah became tributary to Assyria, and its king did homage to the Assyrian monarch at Damascus (2 Kin. xvi 8-10). Tiglath-pileser relieved Judah of the invaders, ravaged northern Israel, struck a blow at the Philistines, besieged and ultimately captured Damascus and slew Rezin, deported the Israelites from the country east of the Jordan, connived at the death of Pekah or actually ordered it, and placed Hoshea on the throne about 730 B. C. Hoshea rebelled against Assyria after Tiglath-pileser's death. The Assyrian armies returned, in 722 Samaria fell and a large number of the inhabitants were carried off to Assyria. See CAPTIVITY and SARGON. The place of the deported Israelites was supplied by colonists from five districts in the Assyrian empire, who, mingling with the remaining Israelite population of central Palestine, laid the foundations of what afterwards became the Samaritan nation.

The captivity of Israel was a punishment because the people had sinned against the Lord their God and had feared other gods, walking in the statutes of the nations and of the kings of Israel (2 Kin. xvii. 7, 8). They were apostate. They had broken the covenant (15. cp. Ex. xx-xxii; Hos. vi 7. viii 1), rejecting the statutes of the Lord. Their apostasy had manifested itself in two directions: they walked in the statutes of the nations whom the Lord cast out (2 Kin. xvii 8, 15, 17; cp. Hos. ii 13. iv 2. 11. 15; Amos ii 6-9), and they walked in the statutes of the kings of Israel, especially in the matter of the calf worship and its attendant ceremonies and ordinances, and in the general idolatry that followed in its train (2 Kin. xvii 8, 16; Hos. vii 4-6; x. 5, 8, xii 2-4). They had sinned despite the fact that the Lord had testified unto them by prophets and by providences (2 Kin. xvii 13; Hos. xii 10; Amos ii 9-11; iv. 6-13). Their sin issued in separation and degradation and paved the way for punishment. They separated from Judah, and thus weakened were overthrown. Their idolatry, drunkenness, and licentiousness weakened the manhood of the nation, deprived it of sturdiness, and made its soldiery no better in character and moral purpose than the warriors of Egypt, Assyria, and Babylon.

Is'ra-el-ite.

A descendant of Israel, i. e., of Jacob (Ex. ix. 7); and consequently, by implication, the possessor of true religious knowledge, a faithful servant of Jehovah, and an heir of the promises (John i 47; Rom. ix. 4; xi 1; 2 Cor. xi. 22).

Is'sa-char [there is hire].

1 The ninth son of Jacob, the fifth by Leah (Gen. xxx. 17, 18: xxxv. 23). His sons were Tola, Phuvah or Pua, Job or Jashub, and Shimron (xli. 13; Num. xxvi. 23, 24; 1 Chron. vii. 1). With them he went down with Jacob into Egypt (Gen. xli. 13; Ex. i 3). Jacob, shortly before death, with keen and prophetic insight into character, described Issachar and his children as a strong ass, couching down between the sheep folds, who submits to the burdens imposed by foreign masters, provided they permit him to remain in his pleasant land (Gen. xlix. 14, 15).

The descendants of Issachar formed a tribe, consisting of five great tribal families, the posterity of his five sons (Num. xxvi. 23, 24). Its prince in the early period of the wanderings was Nethaneel, son of Zuar (Num. i. 8; ii. 5; vii. 18; x. 15), and at a later period Paltiel, son of Azzan (xxxiv. 26). At the first census in the wilderness it numbered 54,400 fighting men (i. 28, 29); at the second 64,300 (xxvi. 25); while in David's reign it reached 87,000 (1 Chron. vii. 5). Igal, son of Joseph, was the spy from the tribe (Num. xiii. 7). The men of Issachar were among those who stood on mount Gerizim to bless the people (Deut. xxvii. 12). Moses, in predicting the future of the tribes, foretold Issachar's joyous and quiet life (xxxiii. 18). One of the judges, Tola, belonged to the tribe of Issachar (Judg. x. 1); so did king Baasha (1 Kin. xv. 27). The princes of Issachar had the political insight to discern the fit moment for turning from Saul's family and accepting David as the king of all Israel (1 Chron. xii. 32). About that time Omri, son of Michael, was head of the tribe (xxvii. 18). Many men of Issachar, although they belonged to the northern kingdom, attended Hezekiah's passover (2 Chron. xxx. 18). In the apocalyptic vision 12,000 of the tribe of Issachar were sealed (Rev. vii. 7), this being the normal number.

When the land of Canaan was distributed by lot, the fourth lot taken after the ark was removed to Shiloh came forth for the tribe of Issachar. Its territory was bounded on the north by Zebulun and Naphtali, on the east by the Jordan, on the south and west by Manasseh and probably Asher. Jezreel and Shunem lay within its limits, while Chesuloth and mount Tabor were on its northern border, and En-gannim near the southern line (Josh. xix. 17-23), but towns within it were held by Manasseh (xvii. 10, 11) and others by the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 6, 28, 29; 1 Chron. vi. 62-72). The tribe of Issachar occupied the greater part of the plain of Jezreel, or Esdraelon, constituting the low, level, and fertile plain of the Kishon. The character of their territory combined with the tribal traits explains why the people of Issachar, in accordance with Jacob's prophecy, were so ready to submit to servitude. They had much to lose, and lived on ground well adapted for the action of the war chariots of their enemies, while the tribes located among the mountains could not so readily be attacked in this manner. That the people of Issachar were not exceptionally cowardly is plain from their conduct in the battle with Sisera, which elicited the commendation of Deborah (Judg. v. 15).

2. A Levite, appointed doorkeeper in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvi. 5).

Is-shi'ah, in A. V. once Ishiah (1 Chron. vii. 3) and twice Jesiah (1 Chron. xii. 6; xxii. 20) [Jehovah lendeth or Jehovah forgetteth (cp. Jer. xxiii. 39)].

1. A man of Issachar, family of Tola (1 Chron. vii. 3).

2. One of those who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 6).

3. A Levite, descended from Moses, and head of the house of Rehabiah (1 Chron. xxiv. 21; cp. xxiii. 14-17).

4. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (1 Chron. xxiii. 20; xxiv. 25).

Is-shi'jah, in A. V. Ishjah [Jehovah lendeth or forgetteth].

A son of Harim, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 31).

Is'sue.

A man's disease, probably blennorrhea or perhaps gonorrhea (Lev. xv. 2-15; cp. War v. 5, 6; vi. 9, 3). An issue of blood is a female complaint (Lev. xv. 25-30; Mat. ix. 20).

Is'u-ah. See ISHVAH.

Is'u-i. See ISHVI.

It'a-ly.

A geographical name which, in the fifth century B. C., meant only a small district in the extreme south of what is now called Italy; but which gradually extended its signification, till in the first century of the Christian era it began to be used in the same sense that we now attach to the word. In the days of the apostles Italy, and, indeed, the greater part of the civilized world, was ruled from Rome (q. v.). A cohort called the Italian was stationed in Syria (Acts x. 1). Aquila and Priscilla, who were of Jewish descent, resided for a time in Italy (xviii. 2). Paul's appeal to Cæsar involved his sailing into Italy (xxvii. 1, 6), and his ship coasted along Italy from Rhegium to Puteoli (xxviii. 13-16). The salutation in the Epistle to the Hebrews, "They of Italy salute you" (Heb. xiii. 24), indicates the presence of Christians, not only in Rome, but in other parts of the country (cp. Acts xxviii. 14). During the Roman imperial period, the state of the country in comparison with the capital was wretched.

I'thal. See ITTAI.

Ith'a-mar [palm-coast].

The youngest son of Aaron (Ex. vi. 23, 1 Chron. vi. 3; xxiv. 1). With his father and his three elder brothers he was consecrated to the priestly office (Ex. xxviii. 1; 1 Chron. xxiv. 2). Upon him devolved the duty of enumerating the materials gathered for the tabernacle (Ex. xxxviii. 21). The Gershonites and the Merarites acted under his superintendence (Num. iv. 21-33). He founded a priestly family (1 Chron. xxiv. 4, 5, 6), which continued after the captivity (Ezra vii. 2). To this family belonged Eli and his descendants, who held the office of high priest for several generations. See HIGH PRIEST.

Ith'-el [God is with me, or, possibly, there is a God].

1. One of the two persons to whom Agur addressed his prophecy (Prov. xxx. 1); but see R. V. margin for another possibility.

2. A Benjamite, son of Jessiah (Neh. xi 7).

Ith'lah, in A. V. Jethlah [a hanging or lofty place].

A town of Dan (Josh. xix. 42). Site unknown

Ith'mah [bereavement].

A Moabite, one of the valiant men of David's army (1 Chron. xi. 46).

Ith'nan [perhaps, perennial].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 23). Situation unknown.

Ith'ra [abundance, excellence]

An Israelite, or rather Ishmaelite, who married Abigail, David's sister, and became the father of Amasa (2 Sam. xvii. 25; 1 Kin. ii. 5, 32, 1 Chron. ii. 17). In the last three passages he is called Jether, which is the Hebrew form of the name.

Ith'ran [abundance, excellence]

1. A Horite, son of Dishon (Gen. xxxvi. 26, 1 Chron. i. 41).

2. An Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Chron. vii. 37); apparently the same as Jether (38).

Ith're-am [abundance of people]

The sixth son born to David at Hebron. His mother was Eglah (2 Sam. ii. 5, 1 Chron. iii. 3).

Ith'rite.

A family who dwelt at Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. ii. 53). Two of David's mighty men were Ithrites (2 Sam. xxiii. 38, 1 Chron. xi. 40). The word is derivable from Jether or, if the customary vocalization is neglected, from Jattir.

It-tah-ka'zin. See ETH-KAZIN

It'tai [perhaps, plowman]

1. A son of Ribai, from Gibeah of Benjamin. He was one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 29). Called in 1 Chron. xi. 31, Ithai.

2. An inhabitant of Gath, the commander of 600 men, who followed David from that Philistine city. He was faithful to the king through all vicissitudes, and led a third part of the royal army in the battle which resulted in the death of Absalom (2 Sam. xv. 18-22; xviii. 2, 5).

It-u-ræ'a [pertaining to Jetur].

A region occupied by a people called Jetur, who were descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31). The tribe of Jetur was at war with the Israelitish tribes east of the Jordan (v. 19). In Asmonean times Aristobulus conquered a portion of Ituræa, and annexing it to Judæa, compelled the vanquished inhabitants to adopt the rite of circumcision (Antiq. xiii. 11, 3). It was a mountainous country, including part of Anti-Lebanon. Its prince, Ptolemy, son of Menneüs, had territory in Coelestria, with Chalcis as stronghold, and proved a bad neighbor to Damascus (Strabo xvi. 2, 18, 20; Antiq. xiii. 16, 3). In 66 B. C. he purchased immunity from Pompey (xiv. 3, 2). His son Lysanias was put to death by Antony (xv. 4, 1), and the country was farmed to Zenodorus (xv. 10, 1; for Zenodorus' domain cp. also 2 and 3). Part of Ituræa and Trachonitis constituted the tetrarchy of Philip (Luke iii. 1). Josephus enumerates the constituent parts of Philip's tetrarchy differently, and he is not careful always to enumerate in one and the same way (Antiq. xvii. 8, 1; 11, 4, where part of the house of Zenodorus is included; xviii. 4, 6; War ii. 6, 3). The name Ituræa or Jetur is radically different from Jedur, the present designation of a district southwest of Damascus.

I'vah. See IVVAH.

I'vo-ry.

A substance derived from the tusk of the elephant, hippopotamus, walrus, and other animals. In Hebrew it is called Shen, tooth, or Shenhabbim, a compound word in which habbim probably denotes some animal. It is first mentioned in the Bible as having been brought from abroad by Solomon's ships (1 Kin. x. 22; 2 Chron. ix. 21). It seems to have come from India, and was made into a throne for the king (1 Kin. x. 18). Afterwards, when luxury had established itself to a larger extent in Jerusalem, beds (Amos vi. 4), and even houses were made or overlaid with the precious material (1 Kin. xxii. 39; Amos iii. 15; Ps. xlv. 8). The Tyrians inlaid benches for rowers with it (Ezek. xxvii. 6). Ethiopia also supplied ivory to the ancient world (Herod. in 97, 114).

Iv'vah, in A. V. Ivah.

A city which the representative of Senacherib could boast that the Assyrians had captured (2 Kin. xviii. 34; xix. 13; Is. xxxvii. 13). It is doubtless the same as Avva (q. v.).

I-ye-ab'a-rim, in A. V. Ije-abarim [ruins of the district of Abarim].

A halting place of the Israelites in the wilderness, on the border of Moab (Num. xxi. 11; xxxiii. 44). In ver. 45 the place is called simply Iyim, in A. V. Iim; because the context sufficiently defined the locality to be in Abarim.

I'ym. See preceding article.

Iz'har, I, in A. V. once Iz'e-har (Num. iii. 19) [bright, oil, especially olive oil].

A Levite, son of Kohath, and founder of a tribal family (Ex. vi. 18, 19; Num. iii. 19, 27; 1 Chron. vi. 18, 38). From him descended the rebel Korah (Num. xvi. 1).

Iz'har, II, in A. V. Jezoar [whiteness].

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, son of Ashhur (1 Chron. iv. 5-7). Another reading is Zohar.

Iz-li'ah, in A. V. Jeziah [perhaps, deliverance].

A Benjamite, son of Elpaal and descended from Shaharaim (1 Chron. viii 18).

Iz-ra-hi'ah [Jehovah doth arise (cp. Is. lx. 2)].

A man of Issachar, family of Tola, and son of Uzzi (1 Chron. vii. 3).

Iz'ra-hite.

A member of the family, or an inhabitant of the town, of Izrah (1 Chron. xxvii. 8), perhaps the same as Ezrahite.

Iz'ri [fashioning, creative]

A Levite, son of Jeduthun, and head of the fourth course for the musical service of the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxv. 11). Called in ver. 3 Zerî (q. v) Iz-zî'ah, in A. V. Jeziah [perhaps, Jehovah exulteth].

A son of Parosh. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 25).

J.

Ja'a-kan, in A. V. of 1 Chron. i. 42 Jakan. Written Akan in Gen. xxxvi 27 [Horite name of uncertain meaning].

A descendant or prominent branch of the Horites of mount Seir, who were eventually dispossessed by the Edomites (Gen xxxvi. 20, 21, 27; 1 Chron. i. 38, 42; Deut. ii. 12). At the time of the exodus sons of Jaakan constituted a tribe which occupied a district on the borders of Edom near mount Hor, where Aaron died. The Israelites encamped at certain of their wells (Deut. x. 6; Num. xx. 21-23; xxxiii 31).

Ja-a-ko'bah [supplanting]

A Simeonite prince (1 Chron. iv. 36).

Ja'a-lah, or Jaala [doe, female ibex]

The founder of a family, ranked among the children of Solomon's servants (Ezra ii. 56; Neh. vii. 58).

Ja'a-lam. See JALAM

Ja'a-nai, in R. V. Janai [perhaps, voracious or, possibly, Jehovah answers].

A Gadite chief (1 Chron. v 12).

Ja'ar [a forest]

A proper name occurring in the margin of Psalm cxxxii 6, R V It is believed to be the same as Kirjath-jearim.

Ja-a-re-or'e-gim. See JAIR II.

Ja-ar-e-shi'ah, in A. V. Jaresiah [Jehovah doth nourish or plant].

A Benjamite, son of Jeroham (1 Chron. viii. 27).

Ja'a-sai and Ja'a-sau. See JAASU.

Ja-a'si-el, in A. V. once Jasiel (1 Chron. xi. 47) [God maketh].

1. A Mesobaite, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 47).

2. A son of Abner (1 Chron. xxvii 21).

Ja'a-su, in A. V. Jaasau, in R. V. margin Jaasal [possibly, Jehovah maketh].

A son of Bani. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x 37).

Ja-az-a-ni'ah [Jehovah doth hearken].

1. Son of a Maacathite (2 Kin. xxv. 23). See JEZANIAH

2. A Rechabite, son of a certain Jeremiah, not the prophet of that name (Jer xxxv. 3).

3. A son of Shaphan. He was a leader of idolatry in Ezekiel's time (Ezek. viii. 11).

4. A son of Azzur and prince of Judah, who was seen by Ezekiel in vision (Ezek. xi. 1; cp. viii. 1, 3; xi. 24).

Ja'a-zer. See JAZER.

Ja-a-zî'ah [Jehovah consoleth].

A Levite, registered as head of a father's house with the family of Merari (1 Chron xxiv. 26, 27), and perhaps called his son or descendant (Beno) No hint is elsewhere given of Merari having a third son (an Jaaziah represent the house of the dead Eleazar (28; cp xxiii 22), or is the passage 26^b, 27 an interpolation ?

Ja-a'zi-el or Aziel [God consoleth].

A Levite of the second rank, one of the musicians who played on the psaltery at the removal of the ark from the house of Obad-edom, and afterwards as a regular duty in the tent at Jerusalem (1 Chron xv 18, 20; and probably xvi 5) In the last passage the form Jeiel is probably a copyist's error

Ja'bal [in Hebrew a stream, a river].

Son of the Camite Lamech, by his wife Adah. He was the father of such as dwell in tents and have cattle (Gen. iv 20).

Jab'bok [effusion].

An eastern tributary of the Jordan Jacob forded it on his way back from Mesopotamia (Gen. xxxii. 22). Rising near Rabbath Ammon, it flows for 12 miles from that town toward the northeast and then sweeps around toward the northwest. After holding this course for about 15 miles it turns westward, and for 17 miles flows through a valley which cleaves mount Gilead in twain. On emerging into the valley of the Jordan it bends toward the southwest and enters the Jordan at a point about 43 miles south of the sea of Galilee and 23 miles north of the Dead Sea. It is now known as the nahr ez-Zerka or blue river; and the gorge through which it flows is called the wady ez-Zerka. The Jabbok was a recognized frontier. It formed the western boundary of the Ammonites, and separated them from the Amorite kingdom of Sihon and later from the tribe of Gad. It divided mount Gilead into two parts, of which the southern was held by Sihon before the Israelite conquest, and afterwards was assigned to Gad, while the northern was possessed by

The Brook Jabbok

Og and passed from him to the half tribe of Manasseh (Num. xxi. 24; Deut. ii. 36, 37; iii. 12, 13, 16; Josh. xii. 2-6)

Ja'besb [dry]

1. A town. See JABESH-GILEAD.
2. Father of king Shallum (2 Km. xv. 10)

Ja-besh-gil'e-ad [Jabesh of Gilead]

A town of Gilead. It is believed to have stood at or near ed-Deir, 9½ miles south-east and in full view of Beth-shean on the other side of the river. Ed-Deir is in the wady el-Yabis, which seems to preserve the old name Jabesh. In the war waged against Benjamin in the days of the judges on account of the matter of the Levite and his concubine, none of the men of Jabesh-gilead took part. For this indifference to a national sin, they were condemned to utter destruction. Only 400 unmarried girls were saved alive and given for wives to 400 of the remaining men of Benjamin (Judg. xxi. 8-15). The place was soon reoccupied. Shortly after Saul had been chosen king, Nahash, king of the Ammonites, besieged Jabesh-gilead. The town was sore pressed; and the Ammonite king doomed every man to the loss of the right eye on the surrender of the town. This was intended as an insult to the whole Israelite nation. Saul raised the siege by defeating the besieging army (1 Sam. xi. 1-11). The men of the town remembered their deliverer with gratitude, and when, after the battle of Gilboa, his headless body, with those of his sons, was fastened to the wall of Beth-shean, they crossed the Jordan, carried off the corpses, burnt them and buried the bones in the vicinity of Jabesh-gilead (xxxix. 11-13; 1 Chron. x. 11, 12) from which they were ultimately removed to the sepulcher of Kish (2 Sam. xxi. 12-14). David sent the men of Jabesh his personal thanks for what they had done (ii. 4-7).

Ja'bez [he makes sorrow].

1. A man of Judah, whose mother gave him the name Jabez, because she bore him in sorrow. He was more honorable than his brethren. He prayed that God would enlarge the boundary of his possessions, besides keeping him from evil. God granted his request (1 Chron. iv. 9, 10).

2. A place, doubtless in Judah, where families of scribes dwelt (1 Chron. ii. 55).

Ja'bin [he discerneth, intelligent].

1. A Canaanite, king of Hazor in Galilee and its dependent towns and the head of the confederacy of northern and central kings whom Joshua defeated at the waters of Merom. After the battle the Israelites took and burned Hazor and slew its king (Josh. xi. 1-14).

2. Another king of Canaan who reigned at Hazor, probably a lineal descendant of the first (Judg. iv. 2). He, too, had kings fighting under him (v. 19). He oppressed the Israelites twenty years, but at length his commander-in-chief Sisera was defeated by Barak at the river Kishon and afterwards murdered. Jabin continued the war, but was ultimately destroyed (iv. 2-24).

Jab'ne-el [God doth cause to be built]

1. A town on the northern border of Judah (Josh. xv. 5, 11). It is the same place as the Philistine city of Jabneh, the wall of which was broken down by Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 6), and it was known later as Jamnia (1 Mac. iv. 15, v. 58, 2 Mac. xii. 8, 9). It is represented by the village of Yebnah, about 4 miles inland from the Mediterranean, and 9 north-east by north of Ashdod.

2. A frontier town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). Conder identifies it with the ruin Yemma, about 7 miles south by west of Tiberias. More commonly it is identified with Jamnia or Jamnith, a village of upper Galilee, built on a rocky height and fortified by Josephus (Life 37; War ii. 20, 6); and whose site is sought in the neighborhood of the plain of Huleh and Baniyas (War ii. 6, 3; but text is uncertain).

Jab'neh [he causes to be built]. See JABNEEL.

Ja'can, in A V Jachan [troubles].

A Gadite, probably head of a father's house (1 Chron. v. 13).

Ja'chin [he doth establish].

1. A son of Simeon, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii. 10; Ex. vi. 15; Num. xxvi. 12). Called Jarib in 1 Chron. iv. 24, which is doubtless due to an erroneous reading of the text by a copyist.

2. A descendant of Aaron. In the time of David, his family was made the twenty-first of the courses into which the sacerdotal body was divided (1 Chron. xxiv. 17). It dwelt at Jerusalem, according to the probable meaning of ix. 10; but it is not at all certain that the priest Jachin, who was resident at Jerusalem after the captivity, was of this family (Neh. xi. 10).

3. The right-hand pillar of two set up in the porch of Solomon's temple (1 Kin. vii 15-22), probably as a symbol of firmness. See BOAZ.

Ja'cinth. See HYACINTH and FIGURE.

Jack'al.

The rendering in the R V. of the Hebrew plurals Tamm and Tannoth, which in the A. V. are regularly translated by dragon (q. v.). The creature intended is a mammal (Lam. iv. 3, in A. V. sea monsters) and dwells in the wilderness (Is. xxxv 7; xlii 20) and in deserted places (xxxiv. 13, 14; Jer. xlix. 33; h. 37).

The jackal (Canis aureus) is, it will be seen, placed in the dog genus Canis. It differs from the dog in its long and pointed muzzle. The name aureus, golden, refers to the color of the under fur, which is brownish yellow, mottled with black, gray, and brown hairs. Its length is about thirty inches, and its height at the shoulder seventeen. It hunts in packs, and feeds chiefly on carrion, though it carries off and devours children when opportunity arises. It has been called the lion's provider, the opinion being entertained that when its voice is heard, the lion, following on, tries to claim his share of the prey. It raises the most unearthly yell of all of its compeers. It is found in Africa and southern Asia, and is diffused throughout Palestine, especially frequenting ruins. See also Fox.

Ja'cob [he supplanteth, supplanter]

A son of Isaac and Rebekah, a twin with Esau, but born a short time after him, and therefore considered the younger brother (Gen. xxv. 21-26). He was born when his father was sixty years old (26). As he grew he became a quiet, inoffensive man, dwelling in tents (27). He was his mother's favorite, while the father preferred Esau (28). As Esau came in from hunting, faint with hunger, Jacob chanced to have pottage of lentils ready boiled, but selfishly forbore to relieve his brother's necessities till he had compelled him first to surrender the privilege of his birthright (29-34). Positive fraud followed. When Isaac was about 137 years old and nearly blind, Rebekah induced Jacob to dress himself in Esau's raiment, make his neck and hands artificially hairy, and passing himself off as Esau, obtain from Isaac, who thought himself near death, the blessing belonging to the birthright. Esau recalled the first wrong when this second one was perpetrated, and resolved that when his father died, he would kill his brother (xxvii. 1-41). Rebekah heard the threat, and to give time for Esau's wrath to cool, sent Jacob away to her relatives in Haran, on the pretext of seeking a wife. While on this journey he had the night vision in which a ladder connected earth and heaven, angels ascended and descended, and God standing above assured him of the covenant blessing (xxvii. 42-46; xxviii. 1-22). Jacob sojourned in Paddan-aram at least twenty years, while he was in Laban's employ, serving him fourteen years for his two daughters, Leah and Rachel, and six for a payment in cattle. During this period in Haran there were born to him eleven sons: by Leah six, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, besides a daughter, Dinah; by Bilhah, Rachel's maid, two, Dan and Naphtali; by Zilpah, Leah's maid, two, Gad and Asher, and by Rachel one, Joseph (xxix, xxx). The last was born when Jacob was ninety or ninety-one years of age (cp xliii. 9 with xli 46, 47, 54; xlv 11). Six years later, perceiving that Laban and his sons, envying his prosperity, were turning against him, he became alarmed. While pasturing his flocks, probably three days from Haran (xxx 36, xxxi 22) on the Euphrates, he sent for his wives (xxxi 4), crossed the river, and fled with his family and possessions toward Canaan (21). Three days later Laban was informed of Jacob's flight. He was busy shearing his sheep; but he presently gathered his male relatives, started in pursuit of the fugitives, and after a week's journey by forced marches overtook them on mount Gilead, apparently between the Yarmuk and the Jabbok, scant 300 miles from the Euphrates, at least ten days after Jacob's departure and probably longer, for Laban was busy shearing sheep when he received information of the flight and was unprepared for the journey. God shielded Jacob from injury, and a reconciliation and a treaty of amity between the alienated parties took place. A heap of stones was erected and a covenant meal eaten to establish the agreement that neither party should pass that point to attack the other (xxxi). Jacob had manifestations of the divine favor at Mahanaim and on the Jabbok, where a man wrestled with him until break of day, showed his superiority to Jacob by disabling him by a touch, and before departing blessed him, saying: "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel; for thou hast striven with God and with men, and hast prevailed." And Jacob called the name of that place Peniel, face of God, for he said: "I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved" (xxxii 22-32; cp the name xxxiii. 20; Hosea xii. 4). This event proved a crisis in the life of Jacob. Heretofore he had been trusting to his own strength and shrewdness for success. He now learns that his own strength is of no avail in wrestling with God and that he must resort to prayer for the blessing which he cannot do without. Henceforth the record of his worshiping becomes frequent. Before he crossed the Jordan, he met Esau, and obtained forgiveness for the wrongs which had so long made him an exile. Then the brothers parted, Esau returning to mount Seir and Jacob going to Canaan (xxxiii 1-18). Jacob sojourned in Canaan at Shechem, where he bought a parcel of ground from the chief of Shechem, on which he pitched his camp and erected an altar (xxxiii 18-20). While here his daughter Dinah was ill-treated by the chief's son. The deed was avenged by two of Jacob's sons, Simeon and Levi, and the other sons joined in spoiling the town. Jacob feared the consequences of this act; but since his sons had captured the place, slain the males, appropriated the wealth, and made captive the women and children, he recognized the conquest of the town and the consequent ownership of it by his tribe (xlviii 22; cp xxxvii 12). From Shechem Jacob removed to Bethel. There Deborah died and was buried (xxxv 6-8); see DEBORAH. There also, at the place where God had appeared to him as he went to Paddan-aram, God appeared to him again when he came back from Paddan-aram (xxxv 9, xxviii 10-22), emphasized the change of his name to Israel (without, of course finding it necessary to tell again why the new name had been given at the Jabbok) and confirmed the blessing of the Abrahamic covenant to him. As he drew near to Bethlehem on his way to Hebron, his twelfth and last son, Benjamin, was born, and his beloved Rachel died (9-20). At length Jacob came to his father Isaac at Mamre (27) Isaac died about twenty-three years later, and was buried by Esau and Jacob (28, 29). Jacob seems to have dwelt at Mamre during the next thirty-three years: for he was at Hebron about ten years after his return (xxxvii 11, cp 2), and he was evidently still there when he was summoned to go down to Egypt (xlvii 1). Jacob was 130 years old when he went to Egypt (xlvii 9), and he lived there seventeen years. He gave a special blessing, first to Joseph's children and then to his own, after which he died at the age of 147 (xlvii 28, xlviii. xlix.). His body was embalmed, taken to Canaan with much pomp, and interred in the cave of Machpelah (I 1-14). Jacob had glaring faults of character. For his sins he suffered severely, and in his old age he was sorely chastened by the loss of Joseph. In his later life he acknowledged, at least tacitly, the sinfulness of his earlier career and his failure to walk before God, and he spoke only of God's grace (xlviii. 15, 16). He was animated also in his latter days by unwavering faith in God (21; Heb xi. 21).

The Hebrew nation, as descended from Jacob, is often called in Scripture the children of Israel (Ex xiv. 16, 29, xv. 1, etc.). The prophets often use Jacob and Israel as parallel names in their poetic couplets (Deut of Samaria, was at Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph. "Jacob," the woman of Samaria said, "drank thereof himself, and his sons, and his cattle" (John iv. 5, 6, 12; cp Gen xxxiii. 18-20; xxxvii. 12). A tradition, going back as far as the time of the Bordeaux pilgrim, A. D. 333, and accepted by Jews, Samaritans, Christians, and Mohammedans, identifies Jacob's well with the Bir Ya'kûb. It is situated at the eastern mouth of the valley between mount Ebal on the north and mount Gerizim on the south, about 2 miles east-southeast from Nablus, the modern Shechem, and half a mile south-southwest of 'Askar, believed by many to be Sychar. Maundrell, generally very accurate, made its diameter 9 feet and its depth 105. Dr. John Wilson, measuring a line with which a boy was let down into it with a light in 1843, determined it to be 75 feet deep. Conder reported its depth in 1875 as 75 feet. It is less deep now than formerly, because somewhat choked with rubbish. The water is good, but is not easy to reach (John iv 11). The shaft is lined with masonry in the upper part. The lower part is cut through soft limestone. A low subterranean vault, 20 feet long from east to west and 10 broad, the crypt of an ancient Christian church, is built over the well, the mouth of which is contracted and covered with one or more large stones. There is a fine fountain a little to the west, and many others in the valley. The well, however, was dug, perhaps, because the fountains were appropriated. It is in the vicinity of what from the fourth century has been popularly considered to be Joseph's tomb.

Ja'da [wise].

A son of Onam, a man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron ii 28, 32).

Ja'dau. See IDDO II.

Jad-du'a [known].

1 One of the chiefs of the people who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 21).

2. A high priest, son of Jonathan and the fifth in descent from the high priest Jeshua, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. xii 11, 22). He was probably a youth in the reign of Darius Nothus, and survived Darius Codomannus, the Persian sovereign defeated by Alexander the Great at Arbela in 331 B. C. See HIGH PRIEST

Ja'don [he ruleth, judgeth, or abideth]

A Meronothite, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. iii. 7).

Ja'el [wild goat, ibex].

The wife of Heber the Kenite (Judg. iv. 17). Sisera, Jahin's general, trusting to the peace subsisting between his royal master and Heber, fled to her tent after he was defeated by Barak. On his approach Jael went out, invited him to enter, and gave him milk to relieve his thirst. But as he lay sleeping in the tent, she took a hammer and drove a tent pin through his temples, fixing his head to the ground. When the victorious Barak passed, she called him in to see what she had done (Judg iv. 11-22). Deborah highly commended the deed of Jael (v 24-27), though it was cruel and treacherous. It reveals a rudeness of manners and a hardness of character which found frequent exemplification in those early times.

In v. 6 a judge named Jael may be referred to, who is not elsewhere mentioned. A simpler explanation is that Deborah means that although the heroic woman Jael was then living, yet no one ventured to undertake the deliverance of Israel until Deborah arose.

Ja'gur [a lodging, an inn].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh xv. 21). Site unknown.

Jah.

A form of Jehovah occurring in poetry (Ps lxxviii 4; R V of lxxxix. 8). In various other places Jah, or, rather, Yah in Hebrew is rendered Lord in the A. V. and R. V.

In the Hebrew sometimes Jah and Jehovah stand together, Jah first (Is. xii. 2 and xxvi 4, margin of R V.)

Ja'hath [perhaps, grasping, cp Mahath]

1 A man of Judah, family of Hezron, descended through Shobal (1 Chron iv 2; cp ii. 19, 50).

2 A son of Libni, a Levite, family of Gershon (1 Chron vi. 20, and perhaps 43). The reference in ver 43 may belong to the succeeding

3 A Levite, family of Gershon and head of a subdivision of the house of Shimei (1 Chron xxiii 10).

4. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (1 Chron xxiv 22).

5. A Merarite Levite, an overseer of the workmen engaged in repairing the temple during Josiah's reign (2 Chron xxxiv 12).

Ja'haz and Jahzah, in A V once Jahaza (Josh. xiii 18), and twice Jahazah (Josh. xxi. 36; Jer xlviii 21) [a place trodden under foot, an open space].

A place in the plain of Moab (Jer. xlviii. 21) where Sihon, king of the Amorites, was defeated by the Israelites (Num xxi 23; Deut ii 32; Judg xi 20). It was assigned to the Reubenites (Josh xiii 18), and set apart for the Merarite Levites (Josh xxi 36; 1 Chron vi 78). It was taken from Israel by Mesha, king of Moab (Moabite Stone, 18-20), and it was held by Moab in the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah (Is. xv 4; Jer. xlviii. 21, 34). Its site is unknown.

Ja-ha-zí'ah. See JAHZEIAH.

Ja-ha-zí-el [God seeth].

1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Hebron (1 Chron. xxiii 19).

2 One of the Benjamite warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron xii. 4).

3 A priest in David's reign who was employed to sound a trumpet in the sanctuary (1 Chron. xvi 6).

4. A Levite, son of Zechariah of the Asaph family, who prophesied in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 14).

5. Father of a chief of the people who returned from Babylon (Ezra viii. 5).

Jah'dai [perhaps, he directeth or directive].

A man of Judah, enrolled with Caleb's posterity (1 Chron. ii. 47).

Jah'di-el [God maketh glad].

A leading man in the half tribe of Manasse east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 24).

Jah'do [union].

A Gadite, son of Buz (1 Chron. v. 14).

Jah'le-el [God doth grievously afflict].

A son of Zebulun, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii. 14; Num. xxvi. 26).

Jah'mai [perhaps, lusty].

A prince of Issachar, of the family of Tola (1 Chron. vii. 2).

Jah'zah. See JAHAZ.

Jah'ze-el and Jahziel [God distributeth].

A son of Naphtali, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii. 24; Num. xxvi. 48; 1 Chron. vii. 13).

Jah-ze'iah, in A V Jahaziah [Jehovah seeth].

A son of Tikvah who opposed the proposition that the Jews put away their foreign wives (Ezra x. 13, R. V.), but see margin.

Jah'ze-rah [may he lead back].

A priest descended from Immer (1 Chron. ix. 12).

Jah'zi-el. See JAHZEEL.

Ja'ir, I. [he enlighteneth].

1. A son of Segub and grandson of Hezron, of the tribe of Judah, and his wife, who was of the family of Machir, of the tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22). He was reckoned with the tribe of Manasseh (v. 23; Num. xxxii. 41; Deut. iii. 14). At the time of the conquest by the Israelites under Moses of the country east of the Jordan, he took villages in the Argob, on the border of Bashan and Gilead, and called them Havvoth-jair (q. v.).

2. A Gileadite who judged Israel twenty-two years, succeeding or surviving Tola in office. Each of his thirty sons had an ass for riding purposes, which in that age was an indication of standing in the community. They also had thirty cities, called Havvoth-jair. He may have belonged to the family of the earlier Jair (cp perhaps JAIRITE), and have inherited prerogatives connected with the Havvoth-jair, or have used his influence to place his sons over these encampments (Judg. x. 3-5).

3. A Benjamite, Mordecai's father or remoter ancestor (Esth. ii. 5).

Ja'ir, II. [he arouseth].

Father of Elhanan (1 Chron. xx. 5); called in 2 Sam. xxi. 19, Jaare-oregim, where oregim has gotten into the text by error from the line below.

Ja'ir-ite.

A descendant of some Jair or other, whose name was written as is that of Jair, I. (2 Sam. xx. 26).

Ja'ir'us [Greek form of Jair].

A ruler of the synagogue (Mark v. 22; Luke viii. 41), probably at Capernaum. His young daughter lay at the point of death; and he went to Jesus, beseeching him to heal her. On the way to the house word reached them that the child was dead (Mark v. 23, 24, 35, Luke viii. 42, 49); but the father, with confidence in Jesus' power, still entreated (Mat. ix. 18), and Jesus told him to put away all fear and to trust him (Mark v. 36, Luke viii. 50). Entering the house with Peter, James, and John (Mark v. 37; Luke viii. 51, cp Mat. ix. 19) he found it full of noisy professional mourners, and rebuked them and said: "The damsel is not dead, but sleepeth" (Mat. ix. 24; Mark v. 39; Luke viii. 52). He used the word sleep as he did afterwards in the case of Lazarus (John xi. 11-14). Taking the three disciples and the parents (Mark v. 40), he went into the chamber where the dead child lay (40; Mat. ix. 25), took her by the hand, and said in the language of the people T'utha' kumi, Maid, arise (Mark v. 41, cp Mat. ix. 25; Luke viii. 54). She obeyed. He bade the parents not to tell what had taken place (Mark v. 43; Luke viii. 56). But such a miracle could not be kept from public knowledge (Mat. ix. 26).

Ja'kan. See JAAKAN.

Ja'keh [pious].

The father of that Agur whose words are recorded in Prov. xxx. In the Hebrew Bible his name is followed by the words Ham-massa', translated in the A. V. the prophecy, and in the R. V. the oracle. The margin of the R. V. translates the title Jakeh of Massa, and refers to Gen. xxv. 14, where Massa figures as a son of Ishmael.

Ja'kim [he raises up].

1. A descendant of Aaron. His family grew to a father's house and was made the twelfth of the twenty-four courses into which David divided the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 12).

2. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 19).

Ja'lam, in A. V. Jaalam [perhaps, hidden or pertaining to a wild goat].

A son of Esau by his wife Oholibamah. He became a chieftain of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 18; 1 Chron. i. 35).

Ja'lon [perhaps, obstinate].

A son of Ezra, registered with the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 17).

Jam'bres [perhaps, opposer].

One of two Egyptian magicians who attempted to counterwork Moses (2 Tim. iii. 8). See JANNES.

Jam'bri.

Founder of a family which dwelt at Medeba

(1 Mac. ix. 36, 37; Antiq. xiii. 1, 2). The orthography is uncertain. It may represent the Hebrew name Omri or Imri; and even Amorite has been conjectured.

James [a form of the name Jacob].

1. James the son of Zebedee (Mat. iv. 21; x. 2; Mark i. 19; iii. 17), and brother of the apostle John (Mat. xvii. 1; Mark iii. 17; v. 37; Acts xii. 2), one of the earliest disciples (Mat. iv. 21; Mark i. 19, 29; cp. John i. 40, 41) and most trusted apostles (Mat. xvii. 1; Mark v. 37; ix. 2, xiii. 3; xiv. 33; Luke viii. 51; ix. 28) of our Lord. Of his birth-place or early home we are told nothing. His occupation as a fisherman on the sea of Galilee, in partnership with Peter and Andrew (Luke v. 10), might seem to suggest a contiguous locality. But the fishery of the sea of Galilee was expressly kept free for every Israelite, and a social difference between the sons of Zebedee and the sons of Jonas may be implied in the facts that the former kept hired servants (Mark i. 20), and that John at least was known to the high priest (John xviii. 16) and may have had a house in Jerusalem (ix. 27). His father, Zebedee, appears only once in the pages of the gospels (Mat. iv. 21; Mark i. 19), where he raises no obstacle to his sons' following Jesus. From Mat. xxvii. 56, compared with Mark xv. 40; xvi. 1 and with John xix. 25, it seems reasonable to infer that his mother was named Salome and was sister to the mother of Jesus, in which case James would be a near kinsman of Jesus, and like him of Davidic descent. His name occurs only in the synoptic gospels and the book of The Acts, although he is alluded to twice in the Gospel of John (i. 40, 41; xxi. 2). It never occurs apart from that of John, which it ordinarily precedes (Mat. iv. 21; x. 2; xvi. 1; Mark i. 19, 29; iii. 17; v. 37; ix. 2; x. 35, 41; xiii. 3, xiv. 33; Luke v. 10; vi. 14, ix. 54), while John is designated as the brother of James (Mat. iv. 21; x. 2; xvi. 1; Mark i. 19, iii. 17, v. 37). From this it has been inferred that he was the older brother; while the occasional reverse usage in Luke (viii. 51, R. V.; ix. 28) and Acts (i. 13, R. V.; xii. 2) only is supposed to arise from John's greater prominence in the apostolic circle. Along with John, he received from Christ the surname Boanerges or son of thunder (Mark iii. 17), and along with him earned his Master's rebuke for the fierceness of his anger against the Samaritan village which would not receive Jesus (Luke ix. 55), and the indignation of his fellow apostles for his ambitious self-seeking (Mark x. 41). After the crucifixion we find him with the other apostles in Galilee (John xxi. 2), and in Jerusalem (Acts i. 13), and his record closes with his death by the sword at the hands of Herod Agrippa I., probably A. D. 44 (xii. 2). He was the first of the apostolic band to seal his testimony with his blood.

2. James the son of Alphaeus and one of the apostles of our Lord (Mat. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13). Nothing further is certainly known of him. It is natural, however, as it has been usual, to assume that the James of Mat. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40; xvi. 1. Luke xxiv. 10 is this James: in which case we may learn that he bore the surname of "the little" (E. V., "the less"), possibly with reference to his stature (Mark xv. 40); that his mother was called Mary, and was one of the women who accompanied Christ; and that he had a brother named Joses, Levi, or Matthew, who, according to Mark ii. 14, was son of Alphaeus, may be another brother, and it is possible to fill in the ellipsis of Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13 so as to make the apostle Judas another brother. It is possible further to identify the Mary of Clopas of John xix. 25 with Mary the mother of James, and it is then possible, though scarcely natural, to read John xix. 25 as declaring that Mary of Clopas was Jesus' mother's sister. By this combination, James, the son of Alphaeus, would be made out to be the cousin-german of our Lord. It is common, on this assumption, to take still another step, and, on the ground of the similarity between the names of the Lord's brethren and those of the sons of Alphaeus, so obtained, to suppose that this near relative of our Lord's is intended by "James the Lord's brother." The whole construction is, however, very insecure, and does not seem to satisfy the biblical facts.

3. James, the Lord's brother (Mat. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; Gal. i. 19), and the head of the church at Jerusalem in the apostolic age (Acts xii. 17; xv. 13; xxi. 18, Gal. i. 19; ii. 9, 12). This James is mentioned by name only twice in the gospels (Mat. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3), but the outlines of his life may be traced by means of the notices of the "brethren of the Lord," who constituted a distinct class, both during our Lord's life, when they did not believe on him (John vii. 5), and after his resurrection, when they are found among his followers (Acts i. 14). The exact relationship which these "brethren" bore to our Lord has always been a matter of dispute. Some, identifying them with the sons of Alphaeus, represent them as his cousins. Others think of them as his half-brothers, children of Joseph by a former marriage. As they always appear with Mary, living and journeying with her and holding just such relations with her as would naturally be borne by her children (Mat. xii. 46, 47; Luke xvi. 19; John ii. 12), there is no reason to question the natural implication that they were Jesus' own brothers. As James' name stands first in the lists (Mat. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3), it is probable that he was the oldest of our Lord's brothers. He doubtless shared their unbelief (John vii. 5), and doubtless also their natural anxieties in his behalf (Mark iii. 31, seq.). When or how the change was wrought in him by which he became a servant of Christ (Acts i. 14; Jas i. 1) we are not told: possibly, as in the case of Paul, his conversion was due to a special appearance of the risen Lord (1 Cor. xv 7). From the very first organization of the church in Jerusalem, James appears as its head (Acts xii 17; xv. 13, xxi 18, Gal. i 19; ii 9, 12). As early as A D 40, when Paul first visited Jerusalem after his conversion, James' position was such that Paul felt it necessary to name him along with Peter as having been seen by him (Gal i 19). The reference of Acts xii 17 (A D 44), where James is clearly the official head of "the brethren," as well as that of xxi 18 (A D 58), where he seems to stand at the head of the elders of the church (cp. xv 6), enable us to estimate wherein his preeminence consisted. As he was not an apostle (the R V margin gives the correct translation of Gal i 19), we cannot be far wrong in assuming that he was the head of the board of elders of the church at Jerusalem, that is, what we should call the "pastor" of that church. See ELDERS. As such, his name stands for the church of Jerusalem (Gal ii 12), of which he was the natural representative (Acts xii 17; xv 13, xxi 18), and visitors to the church made themselves known in the first instance to him and laid their errand before him (xii 17, xxi 18, Gal i 19, ii 9). In his position, James' life-work was naturally to smooth the passage of Jews over to Christianity. That he stood on the same platform of faith with Paul is apparent not only from Paul's assertion in Gal ii 9, but also from James' remarks recorded in Acts xv 13; xxi 20. But on both occasions he speaks also in behalf of the Jewish-Christian conscience, and it is equally apparent that, as Paul became as all men to all men because he was sent to all, James became as a Jew to Jews because he was sent to Jews. The use of his name by intense Judaizers (Gal ii 12, and the later Clementine literature) is thus explicable, as also the admiration which is said to have been conceived for him by the Jews themselves, who are reported to have given him the surname of "the just" (Eusebius, H. E. ii 23). After Acts xxi 18 (A. D. 58) we meet no further reference to James in the N. T. Secular history tells us, however, that he was martyred in a popular outbreak of the Jews in the interregnum between the death of the procurator Festus and the appointment of his successor, i. e., A D 62 (Antiq. xx. 9, 1; Eusebius, H. E. ii. 23).

4 James, the father or brother of the apostle Judas (Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13). Nothing further is known of him. B. B. W.

James, E-pis'tle of.

This letter does not announce itself as the production of an apostle, but describes its author simply as James, a bond-servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ (i. 1, R V. margin). It is most natural to think of James, the Lord's brother, as meant, and all the characteristics of the letter agree with this attribution. The letter bears a distinct flavor of primitiveness: the Christian place of worship is still spoken of as a synagogue (ii 2), Christians are not sharply discriminated from Jews (i. 1); the sins rebuked and errors corrected are such as would naturally spring up in a Jewish soil; while there is not a trace of the controversies which already in the sixth decade of the first Christian century were distracting the whole church. It is, therefore, usually dated about A D 45, and considered the earliest of the N T writings. It is addressed to the twelve tribes which are of the Dispersion (i 1, R V), that is, not to the dispersed Jews, nor yet to the whole Christian church, considered as the spiritual Israel, but, probably, to the Christians (ii 1, 5, 7, v 7) among the Jewish Dispersion, as the Jews dwelling outside the Holy Land were technically called (John vii 35, cp 2 Mac i 27). The object of its writing was to reform and correct those sins and errors to which its lately Christianized Jewish readers continued to be liable, and to encourage them in the sore trials to which they were exposed.

After the address (i 1), James first consoles his readers in their trials and exhorts them to steadfastness, pointing out at the same time the source of the temptation to apostasy (i 2-21). He proceeds then to warn them against mere word-service, explaining what is meant by true faith (i 22-27), what will be the effect of true faith on the prevalent sin of respect of persons (ii 1-13), and how a true faith evinces itself (ii 14-26). Exhortations against hasty assumption and misuse of the functions of religious teachers and exposure of their root in a jealous heart follow (iii. 1-18); and then reproofs of contentiousness (iv. 1-12) and self-sufficiency (iv 13-v. 6). The epistle closes with exhortations to patience in suffering (v. 7-12) and to prayer as the sufficient resource of the Christian in every need (13-18) along with a final declaration of the joy of Christian propaganda (19-20).

The linguistic and rhetorical character of the epistle is very high. It is written in Greek which is surpassed in purity by that of no N T writings except those of Luke, and in a strikingly elevated and picturesque style resembling that of the Hebrew prophets. It contains more imagery drawn from nature than all the epistles of Paul, in this recalling the manner of our Lord's synoptic speeches, to which it presents numerous parallels. The tone and matter of its teaching are appropriate to its early date and the recent emergence of its readers from Judaism. The section on faith and works (ii. 14-26) has often been misapprehended as a polemic against Paul's doctrine of justification by faith, or at least as a corrective of perversions of that doctrine. It is really a rebuke of a prevalent Jewish notion—that mere intellectual assent to divine teaching is all that is necessary for salvation. James as pointedly as Paul makes faith the instrument of salvation (ii. 22, 23), and Paul as firmly as James insists that the only saving faith is the faith that works (Gal. v. 6).

There is clear evidence of the use of this epistle by the church from the very earliest times. Origen, however, writing early in the third century, is the first writer to quote it explicitly by name; and there was a period during which the Latin writers seem to have used it little. Luther, not fully seeing its harmony with Paul, permitted himself to speak unguardedly about it. It is historically indicated as an integral portion of the sacred canon.

B. B. W.

Ja'min [the right hand, prosperity].

1. A son of Simeon and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xli. 10; Ex. vi. 15, Num. xxvi. 12).

2. A man of Judah, family of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 27).

3. One of the Levites who, under the direction of Ezra, read the law of God to the people and caused them to understand it (Neh. viii. 7, 8).

Jam'lech [let him constitute a king].

A Simeonite prince (1 Chron. iv. 34).

Ja'ni-a. See JABNEEL.

Ja'nai. See JAANAI.

Ja'nim, in A. V. Janum [sleep].

A village in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 53); doubtless to the west or southwest of Hebron.

Jan'nai, in A. V. Janna.

The father of Melch in the ancestry of Christ (Luke iii. 24).

Jan'nes.

One of two Egyptian magicians who attempted to counterwork Moses, Jambres being the other (2 Tim. iii. 8). The reference is to the occurrences described in Ex. vii. 11, 12, 22; viii. 7, 18, 19; and ix. 11, where, however, the names of the magicians are not given nor their number. They were known to late Jewish tradition, being found in the Targum of the pseudo-Jonathan. The Talmud mentions Johana and Mamre. Jambres is believed to be the Greek form of Jamreh, opposer. Mamre, from the same root, is used in the Talmud for one who resists the decisions of the sanhedrin. Jannes is perhaps a corruption of Johanan (cp. Janneus), but in sound suggests the Hebrew Yam', he hinderer or dissuader.

Ja-no'ah, and Ja-no'hah in A. V. of Joshua [rest, quiet].

1. A town of Naphtali, captured by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kin. xv. 29). Not identified. Yānūh, 6½ miles east by south of Tyre, is not in the district described.

2. A town on the boundary line of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 6, 7). It has been fixed at Yānūh, 7 miles S. E. of Shechem.

Ja'num. See JANIM.

Ja'pheth [beauty, or let him enlarge].

A son of Noah, and doubtless one of the two elder sons (Gen. x. 21; cp. ix. 24), born about Noah's five hundredth year (v. 32; vi. 10); see NOAH. At the time of the deluge he was married, but had no children with him in the ark (vii. 1, 1 Pet. iii. 20). On the occasion of Noah's drunkenness, Japheth acted to him in a dutiful manner, and in consequence received a blessing, the essential part of which was that he should receive large territory and enjoy free action and that he should occupy the tents of Shem, not in the sense of conquering the Semites, but of dwelling with them in peace and sharing their privileges (Gen. ix. 20-27). "The language of the N. T. is the speech of Japheth entered into the tents of Shem, the gospel is the proclamation of salvation translated out of Semitic into Japhetic, and the converted heathen are for the most part Japhetic people dwelling in the tents of Shem" (Delitzsch). Japheth was the progenitor of the people who inhabited, or perhaps in some cases conquered and annexed, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras (Gen. x. 2), extending from the high plateau south of the Caspian Sea westward through the mountain region south of the Black Sea to the islands and northern shores of the eastern Mediterranean, with settlements farther west.

Ja-phi'a [shining, gleaming].

1. A king of Lachish, defeated, captured, and executed by Joshua (Josh. x. 3-27).

2. A son of David, born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15).

3. A border town of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 12). It is by many identified with Yāfa, a little less than 2 miles southwest of Nazareth.

Japh'let [may he deliver].

An Asherite, family of Heber (1 Chron. vii. 32).

Japh'le-tite, in A. V. Japhleti.

The descendants of a certain Japhlet, apparently not the same as the Asherite of that name. Their location was on the border of Ephraim, near Beth-horon (Josh. xvi. 3).

Ja'pho. See JOPPA.

Jar.

A vessel of earthenware, but occasionally of other material (John ii. 6; cp. Odyssey xii. 105), used for either dry articles or liquids. An earthen jar, generally having one or two handles, was used for drawing water and for bearing it home from the well or fountain (Ecc. xii. 6). Ordinarily women fetched the water for the household, carrying the jar on the head or the shoulder (Gen. xxiv. 13, 15, 16; John iv. 28), but men sometimes brought it (Mark xiv. 13). Wine was stored in earthen jars (Herod. iii. 6; Anabasis vi. 1, 15; cp. Odyssey ii. 290), which were often of great size (Odyssey ii 340, pthos) Oil also was kept in them; and

(Neh. xi. 29). Eusebius identified it with a village known in his day as Jermochôs, in Latin Jermucha, 10 Roman miles from Eleutheropolis on the road to Jerusalem. The site is marked by the ruined village of Yarmûk

2 A town of Issachar, assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxi. 28, 29) It is called Ramoth (1 Chron. vi 73) and Remeth (Josh. xix. 21), synonyms of Jarmuth. Not identified. The village of er-Râmeh, 5½ miles north by west of the city of Samaria, does not lie within the bounds of Issachar. Nothing but altitude recommends el-Mezar or Wezar, on one of the highest points of mount Gilboa.

Ja-ro'ah.

A Gadite, descended through Buz (1 Chron v 14)

Ja'shar, in A. V. Jasher [righteous, upright].

The Book of Jasher is quoted in Josh x 13, 2 Sam i 18; and in Septuagint of 1 Kin vii 53 From these citations, the book was evidently a collection of poems which were apparently accompanied by introductory, and perhaps also concluding, explanatory remarks in prose. It resembled in this respect the psalms with prose introductions, such as Ps xviii and li, or the book of Job with its prose introduction (i-iii 1) and conclusion (xlii. 7-17). In 1751 there appeared a volume which professed to be an English translation of the Book of Jasher, alleged to have been found, but the production was an impudent forgery.

Ja'shen [sleeping]

A name in the catalogue of David's mighty men (2 Sam xxiii 32) occupying the place of Hashem in 1 Chron. xi 34 Perhaps the preceding letters Bni, rendered "sons of" in the English versions, form part of the name; or they may have been repeated from the preceding word, Shaalbonite, which terminates with them.

Ja'sher. See JASHAR

Ja-sho'be-am [let the people return (to God)].

1. A man of the family of Hachmoni and chief of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 11). He is reasonably identified with the son of Zabdiel, of the children of Perez, and consequently of the tribe of Judah, who was made military captain over the course for the first month (1 Chron. xxvii. 2, 3). Called in 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 Josheb-basshebeth (q. v.).

2. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag. He belonged to the family of the Korahites, probably the Levitical family of that name who kept the doors of the tabernacle (1 Chron. xii. 1, 2, 6)

Eastern Waterpots

they were used in the house for holding meal (1 Kin xvii 12, in A. V. barrel)

Ja'rah [honey].

A descendant of king Saul (1 Chron. ix 42) Called Jehoaddah in viii 36

Ja'reb [contentious or let him contend]

A king of Assyria whose name has not been identified (Hos v 13; x 6), or else Jaieb is not a proper name at all, but a descriptive term, and the Hebrew is to be rendered, as on the margin of R V, a king that should contend

Ja'red, in A. V. once Jered (1 Chron i 2) [perhaps descent]

Son of Mahalaleel and father of Enoch (Gen v 16-20; 1 Chron i 2; Luke iii 37). See CHRONOLOGY.

Jar-e-si'ah. See JAARESHIAH.

Jar'ha.

An Egyptian servant of a man of Judah called Sheshan The master gave his daughter in marriage to Jarha (1 Chron iii 34, 35)

Ja'rib [an adversary, or he doth contend]

1 A son of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 24); see JACHIN.

2. A chief man who was with Ezra the priest at the river of Ahava (Ezra viii. 16)

3. A priest who was induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 18).

Ja'ruth [a height].

1. A town in the lowland, whose king was defeated, captured, and slain by Joshua (Josh x. 3-27; xii. 11). It was assigned to Judah (xv. 35), and was inhabited after the captivity

Ja'shub [he returns]

1. A son of Issachar, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 24; 1 Chron. vii. 1). Called Job in Gen. xli. 13, probably through a copyist's omission of the Hebrew letter sh.

2. A son of Bani whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 29).

Jash-u-bi-le'hem [perhaps, bread returns].

Probably a man, and not a locality, a member of the family of Shelah, tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 22).

Ja'si-el. See JAASIELJa'son [healing]

1. One of the two envoys sent by Judas Maccabæus to Rome to invoke aid against the Syrians (1 Mac. viii. 17). It was perhaps his son who was sent to renew this alliance (xii. 16).

2. A high priest, son of Simon II, who held office from about 174-171 B. C., and used his influence to hellenize the Jews (2 Mac. iv. 7-26); see HIGH PRIEST.

3. A man of Cyrene and author of a history of the Jewish war for freedom, 175-160 B. C. (2 Mac. ii. 23); see APOCRYPHA 14.

4. A Christian, a relative of Paul (Rom. xvi. 21). He was probably the Jason who resided at Thessalonica, gave lodging to Paul and Silas in his home during their visit to the city, and was dragged by the Jews and their abettors before the rulers for this act of hospitality to objectionable men and only released on giving bail (Acts xvii. 5-9).

Jas'per.

The rendering of the Hebrew Yashepheh (cp. Arabic Yasb) and the Greek Jaspis, a precious stone (Ex. xxviii. 20. Ezek. xxviii. 13, Rev. iv. 3). Jasper is a variety of quartz, of a red, brown, yellow, green, or gray color, and opaque. Among the ancients the term was of broader meaning. It included, according to Pliny, a transparent or translucent green variety (cp. Rev. xxi. 11), and hence denoted a kind of chalcedony or agate. The Septuagint renders the Hebrew word by onyx.

Jath'ni-el [God bestoweth gifts].

A Korhite doorkeeper, son of Meshelemiah (1 Chron. xxvi. 2).

Jat'tir [excellence]

A town in the hill country of Judah assigned to the priests (Josh. xv. 48; xxi. 14; 1 Sam. xxx. 27; 1 Chron. vi. 57). Robinson identified it with the ruin of 'Attir, on a hill about 13 miles south-southwest of Hebron. The two names are, however, radically different.

Ja'van.

1. A region settled by descendants of Japheth (Gen. x. 2). The name corresponds etymologically with Ionia, and denotes the Greeks; see GREECE. Javan was synonymous with the farthest west, where Jehovah's fame had not been heard (Is. lxvi. 19). From early days the country had commercial relations with Phœnicia (Ezek. xxvii. 13. Joel ii. 6, in English version [Grecians]).

2. A town or people of Yemen in Arabia, whence cassia and calamus were exported (Ezek. xxvii. 19).

Jave'lin.

A smaller kind of spear, which was intended to be thrown (Job. xli. 29), was borne suspended between the shoulders (1 Sam. xvii. 6), and could be stretched out in the hand (Josh. viii. 18). The Hebrew name for it was kilon. The A. V. never translates this word by javelin, but renders it by spear in Josh. viii. 18, 26, Job. xli. 29; Jer. vi. 23, by lance in Jer. l. 42, and by shield or target in 1 Sam. xvii. 6, 45, Job. xxxix. 23. Wherever javelin occurs in A. V. the Revisers have properly substituted spear.

Ja'zer, in A. V. twice Jaazer [helpful]

A city east of the Jordan in Gilead (2 Sam. xxiv. 5, 1 Chron. xxvi. 31). The Israelites captured it and drove out the Amorite inhabitants (Num. xxi. 32). It stood in a region well fitted for pasturage (xxxii. 1, 3). It was assigned to the tribe of Gad (Josh. xii. 25), who rebuilt the city (Num. xxxii. 34, 35; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5), and it was appointed to the Merarite Levites for residence (Josh. xxi. 39, 1 Chron. vi. 81). It passed into Moabite hands (Is. xvi. 8, 9. Jer. xlviii. 32), was taken by Judas Maccabæus from the Ammonites (1 Mac. v. 8). According to Eusebius, Jazer was situated 10 Roman miles to the west of Rabbath Ammon, and 15 from Heshbon, and a considerable tributary of the Jordan took its rise near the town. Jerome mentions a village called Azor, 8 Roman miles to the west of Rabbath Ammon. These various places are commonly identified with wady Sir, an upper branch of wady Kefen, and the ruins Sir and Sar, on opposite sides of the valley. The distance from Rabbath Ammon approximately corresponds, but the names are radically different from Jazer and Azor. Beit Zer'ah, about 11 miles south by west of Rabbath Ammon, is preferred by Conder, but has no claims.

Ja'ziz [he moves about].

A Hagrite, the overseer of David's flocks (1 Chron. xxvii. 30).

Je'a-rim [forests]

A mountain crossed by the boundary line of Judah (Josh. xv. 10), and which, to judge from its connection with Chesalon (q. v.), was at that point about 8 miles to the northeast of Beth-shemesh.

Je-ath'e-rai, in A. V. Jeaterai. See ETHNI.

Je-ber'e-chi'ah [Jehovah doth bless].

Father of Isaiah's contemporary Zechariah (Is. viii. 2).

Je'bus [a place trodden under foot (as a threshing-floor)]

The name borne by Jerusalem while the city was in the possession of the Jebusites (Josh xv 63, Judg. xix 10, 1 Chron xi. 4). The area included within Jebus was, of course, small compared with the dimensions of Jerusalem in the time of Solomon. Its citadel was the stronghold of Zion (2 Sam. v. 7, 1 Chron, xi 5).

Jeb'u-site, in A V twice Jebusi (Josh. xviii 16, 28), the Hebrew word being transliterated instead of being translated.

A tribe of Canaan before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews (Gen x 16, xv. 21, Ex iii 8). At the date of the exodus they were one of the mountain tribes (Num. xii 29, Josh. xi. 3). They are known only as dwelling at Jebus, i. e. Jerusalem. Their king was slain by Joshua (x 23-26), their territory was assigned to Benjamin (xviii. 28), and later their city was taken by the men of Judah, on the border of which tribe it stood, and set on fire (Judg i 8; Josh xv. 8), but the Jebusites either never lost the citadel (Antiq. v. 2, 2), or recovered the city in whole or in part. They dwelt with the children of Judah and Benjamin as strangers (Josh xv 63; Judg i 21; xix 11). They still held the stronghold of Zion at the beginning of David's reign (2 Sam v 6, 7), and even after he had captured it the old inhabitants were not wholly expelled, for Araunah, who had a three-winged floor on the site afterwards occupied by Solomon's temple, was a Jebusite by birth (2 Sam xxiv 16, 18, 2 Chron iii 1). Solomon subjected the remnant of the Jebusites to bond service (1 Kin ix 20).

Jech-o-ni'ah and Jech-o-ni'as. See JECHONIAH.

Jec-o-li'ah and Jechiliah, in A V once Jecholiah (2 Kin xv 2) [Jehovah has prevailed].

The mother of king Uzziah (2 Kin xv 2; 2 Chron xxvi 3).

Jec-o-ni'ah, in R V of N T Jechoniah, in A V of N T Jechonias [Jehovah doth establish].

An unessential variant of the name of Jehoiachin, king of Judah, a cognate root being used and the constituent parts transposed (1 Chron iii 16, etc.).

Je-da'iah, I. [Jehovah has cast or shown].

1. A Simeonite (1 Chron iv. 37).

2. A son of Harumaph, who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem opposite to his house (Neh iii 10).

Je-da'iah, II. [Jehovah knoweth].

1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and was numbered the second course when David distributed the priests into divisions (1 Chron xxiv 1, 6, 7). Members of the family returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 36, Neh. vii. 39); cp. the two following.

2. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 6, 7). In the next generation a father's house bore this name (ver 19).

3. Another chief priest with the same history (Neh. xii. 7, 21).

4. One of those who came from the captivity bringing gifts for the temple in the days of the high priest Joshua (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

Je-di'a-el [known of God].

1. A son of Benjamin, and founder of a family (1 Chron vii. 6, 10, 11). The older interpreters regarded Jediahel as another name of Ashbel (Num. xxvi 38). Perhaps he was a later chief.

2. A Manassite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron xii 20).

3. One of David's mighty men, a son of Shimri (1 Chron. xi 45).

4. A Korahite doorkeeper in the reign of David (1 Chron xxvi 1, 2).

Je-di'dah [beloved].

Wife of Amnon and mother of king Josiah (2 Kin xxii 1).

Jed-i-di'ah [beloved of Jehovah].

A name which Nathan the prophet, by divine direction, gave to Solomon (2 Sam. xii 25).

Je-du'thun [praising, praise].

1. A Levite, one of the three chief singers or rather musicians appointed in the time of David, and founder of an official musical family (1 Chron xvi 41; xxv 1, 6, 2 Chron. v 12, xxv 15, Neh xi 17). He or his family is mentioned in the title of three psalms (xxxix, lxxi, lxxvii). He was evidently known earlier as Ethan; see ETHAN 3.

2. Father of Obed-edom the doorkeeper and apparently of the family of Korah, a division of the Kohathites (1 Chron. xvi. 38; cp xxvi 1, 4, and also 8, 12, 15). Some interpreters, however, hold him to be Jeduthun, the singer, of the family of Merari.

Je-e'zer. See ABIEZER.

Je-e'zer-ite. See ABIEZERITE.

Je-gar-sa-ha-du'tha [Aramaic, heap of witness].

Laban's designation of the cairn Galeed (Gen xxxi 47); see GALEED.

Je-hal'le-lel, in A V. Je-ha-le'le-el and Jehalelel [he praiseth God].

1. A man registered with the tribe of Judah and founder of a family (1 Chron. iv 16).

2. A Merarite Levite (2 Chron. xxix 12).

Je-ho-de'iah [Jehovah inspires with joy].

1. A Levite family of Kohath, house of Amram (1 Chron. xxiv. 20).

2. A Meronothite who had charge of David's asses (1 Chron. xxvii. 30).

Je-hez'kel, in A. V. Je-hez'e-keel [God doth strengthen].

A descendant of Aaron whose family was made the twentieth course of the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 16).

Je-hi'ah [Jehovah liveth].

A doorkeeper for the ark in David's reign (1 Chron. xv. 24).

Je-hi'el [God liveth].

1. A Levite of the second degree, who played a psaltery at the removal of the ark to Jerusalem and afterwards as a regular duty in its tent (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20; xvi. 5).

2. A Levite, family of Gershon and chief of the house of Laadan in David's reign (1 Chron. xxiii. 8). He gave rise to the father's house named from him Jehieli (xxvi. 21, 22).

3. A son of Hachmoni in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 32).

4. A son of Jehoshaphat, placed by his father over one of the fenced cities of Judah, but slain with others of his brothers by Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi. 2-4).

5. A Levite, family of Kohath and house of Heman the singer (2 Chron. xxix. 14, in R. V. Jehuel). He aided Hezekiah in his religious reformation, and is perhaps the assistant overseer of the temple revenues who served during the same reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

6. A ruler of the temple at the time of Josiah's religious reformation (2 Chron. xxxv. 8).

7. Father of Ezra's contemporary Obadiah (Ezra viii. 9).

8. A son of Elam and father of Ezra's contemporary Shechaniah (Ezra x. 2). He may be the person of this name whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (x. 26).

9. A priest, of the course of Harim, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (x. 21).

For others whose name is thus spelled in A. V. see JEIEL.

Je-hi'e-li. See JEHIEL 2.

Je-hiz-ki'ah [Jehovah doth strengthen].

A son of Shallum, and one of the heads of the Ephraimite tribe in the reign of Pekah. He assisted in securing the release of the captives from Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

Je-ho-ad'dah, in A. V. Je-ho'a-dah [Jehovah hath adorned].

A son of Ahaz, and a descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (1 Chron. viii. 36). Called in ix. 42 Jarah.

Je-ho-ad'dan, in R. V. of Kings Jehoaddin [perhaps. Jehovah hath made pleasant].

Mother of king Amaziah. She was from Jerusalem (2 Kin. xiv. 2; 2 Chron. xxv. 1).

Je-ho'a-haz and, contracted, Joahaz [Jehovah hath laid hold].

1. A variant form of the name of Ahaziah, youngest son of Jehoram, king of Judah (2 Chron. xxi. 17; cp. xxii. 1), the constituent parts of the name being transposed.

2. The son and successor of Jehu in the kingdom of Israel. He began to reign in 821 B. C., apparently as associate of his father, and reigned seventeen years (2 Kin. x. 35; xiii. 1). He continued the calf worship established by Jeroboam. As a penalty for this apostasy, the Syrians, first under Hazael and then under Benhadad, were permitted to carry on successful hostilities against him, capturing city after city, till at length he had no force left but 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 footmen. In distress he called on Jehovah, who gave Israel a saviour. This saviour of Israel appeared after the death of Jehoahaz, in the persons of his two successors Jehoash and Jeroboam. The former recovered the cities which the Syrians had taken from his father, and the latter restored the ancient boundaries of Israel. Probably Jehoash received unintended assistance from the king of Assyria, who, attacking the Syrians in the rear, compelled them to desist from the invasion of the Israelite kingdom, and return to defend their own country. Jehoahaz was succeeded by his son Jehoash (2 Kin. xiii. 2-9, 22-25).

3. A younger son of Josiah, who, on the death of Josiah, was placed by the people of Judah on his father's throne. He was then twenty-three, and reigned only three months, during which time his tendencies were evil rather than good. He was deposed and taken in chains to Bבל by Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, and afterwards carried down into Egypt. Necho, as victor over Josiah, decided to dispose of the throne of Judah, and gave it to Jehoakim, Jehoahaz' elder brother (2 Kin. xxiii. 30-34; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1-4). Jehoahaz was also called Shallum (1 Chron. iii. 15; Jer. xxii. 10-12), and he is the first of the lion's whelps (Ezek. xix. 1-9). Although the third of Josiah's sons in point of age and the first to occupy the throne, he is enumerated fourth in 1 Chron. iii. 15, perhaps by way of intentional degradation.

Je-ho'ash. See JOASH 1.

Je-ho-ha'nan [Jehovah is gracious].

1. A Korahite Levite, who had the sixth course of the doorkeepers in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvi. 3).

2. The second in honor of Jehoshaphat's captains. He had under him 280,000 men (2 Chron. xvii. 15).

3. Father of Jehoiada's supporter, Ishmael, in the revolt against Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

4. A priest, head of the father's house of Amariah. He lived in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 13).

5. A son of Eliashib (Ezra x. 6, R. V.). See JOHANAN 9.

6. A son of Bebai, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 28).

7. A son of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh. vi. 18, R. V.). JOHANAN 10.

8. A priest who officiated at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 42).

Je-hoi'a-chin [Jehovah doth establish].

The son and successor of Jehoiakim in the kingdom of Judah. He came to the throne in the year 598 or 597 B. C. According to 2 Kin. xxiv. 8, he was then eighteen years old; according to 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, his age was eight. The discrepancy exists in the Septuagint Greek as well as in the Hebrew text. One or other of the numbers is corrupt, which of the two is doubtful. He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his father had done. But his reign continued only three months and ten days. During this short period Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, sent his generals to besiege Jerusalem, which surrendered after the eighth year of Nebuchadnezzar had begun (cp 2 Kin xxiv 12; cp Jer li 28); see CHRONOLOGY. Jehoiachin, his wives, his mother, the palace servants, every dignitary in the city and the country, with all the skillful artisans, were carried into captivity (2 Kin xxiv. 8-16, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9, 10). For a long period he seems to have been in actual confinement; but in the thirty-seventh year of his exile, 562 B. C., Evil-merodach ascended the throne of Babylon, released him from prison, and assigned him a daily allowance of, or for, food while he lived (2 Kin. xxv. 27-30, Jer li 31-34). Jeremiah, who prophesied during, and after, the brief reign of Jehoiachin, frequently mentions him under the name Jehoniah or Coniah. On these modifications of the name, see JERONIAH.

Je-hoi'a-da [Jehovah hath known]

1 The father of that Benaiah who held high military office in the latter part of David's and in Solomon's reign (2 Sam. xxiii. 22; 1 Kin. iv. 4). Jehoiada was probably the priest (1 Chron. xxvii. 5, text, but not as in A. V. chief priest), and the leader of the Aaronites who brought 3700 men to David at Ziklag (xii. 27).

2 A son of Benaiah, second to Ahithophel in David's counsels (1 Chron. xxvii. 34). Most commentators believe that some copyist accidentally wrote Jehoiada son of Benaiah for Benaiah son of Jehoiada. There is no reason, however, why a grandson of Jehoiada, bearing the same name, should not be occupying a position of influence at this time.

3 A high priest during the usurpation of Athaliah. His wife concealed in the temple the young prince Joash, the only surviving direct representative of the royal line of David, and Jehoiada planned and successfully carried out the revolt which led to the slaughter of Athaliah and the proclamation of Joash as king. Jehoiada's wife was the daughter of king Joram and the sister of Ahaziah; the high priest was, therefore, the uncle of the young monarch whom he befriended and placed on the throne. So long as he lived he was instrumental in keeping the king true to the worship of Jehovah (2 Kin. xi. 1-11; 16, 2 Chron. xxii. 10-xxiv. 14). He died at the age of 130, and, in recognition of his eminent services to church and state, he was buried in the city of David among the kings (15, 16). After his death Joash turned from the Lord and ungratefully put Jehoiada's son to death for rebuking the sins of the people (17-22).

4 A priest who was succeeded in Jeremiah's time by Zephaniah in the office of second priest and overseer of the temple (Jer. xxxix. 26; cp. li. 24).

5 A son of Paseah, who repaired a gate of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6, in R. V. Joiada).

Je-hoi'a-kim [Jehovah doth establish].

A son of king Josiah by his wife Zebidah (2 Kin. xxiii. 34, 36). He was called originally Elakim, God doth establish. On the death of Josiah the people placed Jehoahaz, third son of Josiah in age, on the throne; but three months afterwards Pharaoh-necho put him in chains and carried him to Egypt, and made his elder brother Elakim king in his stead, changing his name to Jehoiakim. He began to reign about 608 B. C., at the age of twenty-five years. He was obliged to collect heavy tribute from the people for Pharaoh. He departed from Jehovah, whom his father had so faithfully served, and went back to idolatry. Jeremiah wrote a roll threatening the divine judgment unless repentance took place; but Jehoiakim treated the matter with contempt, and after listening to three or four leaves of the roll cut it up and committed it to the flames (Jer. xxxvi.). Babylon was now the dominant Asiatic power. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign, Nebuchadnezzar, son of the Babylonian king, defeated Pharaoh-necho at Carchemish and advanced, probably afterwards, against Jerusalem, and Jehoiakim became his servant (2 Kin. xxiv. 1, Jer. xli. 2, Dan. i. 1, 2; see CHRONOLOGY). Three years later he rashly rebelled against Nebuchadnezzar. There were other troubles afflicting the kingdom. Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites made predatory incursions into its territories, as did bands of Chaldeans, whom Nebuchadnezzar probably dispatched on learning of the revolt (2 Kin. xxiv. 2). The Babylonian king himself, or his army, eventually entered Jerusalem and bound the Jewish rebel with chains to carry him to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxvi. 6). He was carried in a cage with hooks into the presence of the king of Babylon, who was in the camp at Jerusalem or perhaps at Riblah (Ezek. xix. 5-9); but perhaps the specific reference in ver. 9 is to his son Jehoiachin. The purpose of carrying him to Babylon was, however, abandoned. He died or was murdered, and his body had the burial of an ass, being drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem (Jer. xxii. 19; xxxvi. 30; Antiq. x. 6, 3). He reigned eleven years and was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin (2 Kin. xxiii. 36; xxiv. 6).

Je-hoi'a-rib [Jehovah doth contend].

A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and was numbered the first course when David distributed the priests into divisions (1 Chron xxiv 1, 6, 7), and it dwelt at Jerusalem (ix 10).

For other persons of the name, see JOIARIB

Je-hon'a-dab. See JONADAB

Je-hon'a-than, variant form of Jonathan, with which it freely interchanges in Hebrew [Jehovah hath given].

1. Son of Uzziah, and an official appointed by king David. He was charged with the oversight of the royal treasures which were in various places outside of Jerusalem (1 Chron xxvii. 23, in R. V. Jonathan)

2. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 8)

3. A priest, head of the father's house of Shemaiah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 18)

Je-ho'ram [Jehovah is high].

1. Son of Ahab and king of Israel (2 Kin. i 1); see JORAM 3.

2. A priest, one of those sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the people (2 Chron xvii 8)

3. Son of Jehoshaphat and king of Judah (2 Kin. viii. 16); see JORAM 5

Je-ho-shab'e-ath. See JEHOSHEBA.

Je-hosh'a-phat, in A. V. of N. T. Josophat [Jehovah hath judged]

1. Son of Ahilud and recorder under David and Solomon (2 Sam. viii 16; xx. 24, 1 Kin. iv. 3)

2. One of the priests appointed to blow a trumpet before the ark when it was being brought up from the house of Obed-edom to the city of David (1 Chron. xv. 24, in R. V. Josphat)

3. Son of Paruah and Solomon's purveyor in the territory of Issachar (1 Kin. iv. 17)

4. Son and successor of king Asa on the throne of Judah. He appears to have been associated with his father in the latter's 37th regnal year, the 11th of Omri (1 Kin. xvi 28, 29, Septuagint), and to have become sole king on the death of his father five years later, about 871 B. C. (xxii 41, 42). He reigned twenty-five years, including the time that he was associated with Asa. He was thirty-five years old at his accession. His mother was Azubah, daughter of Shilhi (1 Kin. xxii 41, 42; 2 Chron. xvii 1). He was a good king. He worshiped Jehovah, and sought not unto the Baalim (1 Kin. xxii 43; 2 Chron. xvii 3), although the people still sacrificed on high places (1 Kin. xxii 43). Therefore the Lord greatly prospered him. In the third year of his reign, he took measures for instructing his people, sending princes and Levites, with the book of the law in their hands, to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 7-9). The fear of the Lord fell upon the neighboring kingdoms. Philistines and Arabians paid tribute (10, 11). He garrisoned the fenced cities of his realm (12-19). He terminated the desultory warfare which had gone on between Israel and Judah since the time of Rehoboam. He made peace with Israel and took Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, as a wife for his son (1 Kin. xxii. 44; 2 Kin. viii 18, 26). When he found that Jehovah was thus blessing him, he was encouraged to remove the high places and the Asherim out of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 5, 6). He put away also the remnant of the sodomites out of the land (1 Kin. xxii 46).

About 853 B. C. he went on a visit to king Ahab, and was persuaded to join him, with the army of Judah, in the attempt to re-take Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians. Dressed in the royal robes of Ahab, he went into battle. Ahab was mortally wounded, Jehoshaphat, notwithstanding his exposure, survived (1 Kin. xxii 1-38, 2 Chron. xviii 1-34). On his return home he was reproved by the prophet Jehu, son of Hanani, for having fraternized with such a king as Ahab (2 Chron. xix 1, 2). He resumed his work of reformation in church and state, promoting the worship of Jehovah, and appointing judges in the walled towns of Judah, with a supreme court, consisting of Levites, priests, and laymen of high position, in Jerusalem (4-11). After this reform had begun a great confederacy of Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites invaded Judah from the southeast, making their headquarters at En-gedi on the western side of the Dead Sea. Jehoshaphat claimed the promise of deliverance which Solomon had asked (2 Chron. vi 24-30 with xx 9). Jahaziel prophesied deliverance, and Jehoshaphat went forth with thanksgiving and placed singers before the army to praise the Lord. Success was achieved without fighting. Hostilities broke out in the confederate army, the Ammonites and Moabites attacked and destroyed the Edomites, and then quarreling among themselves, turned their weapons against each other (xx 1-30). After this event, perhaps in late autumn during the time of peace, Jehoshaphat, who had been building ships at Ezion-geber, asked Ahaziah, king of Israel, to take part in a mercantile voyage. The prophet Eliezer rebuked him for joining himself with Ahaziah, and the ships were wrecked. Ahaziah desired to share in a new venture, but Jehoshaphat refused (2 Chron. xx 35-37; 1 Kin. xxii 48, 49). In 852 B. C. or later, Jehoram, king of Israel, desired to render Moab again tributary to Israel, and asked aid of his brother-in-law, Jehoshaphat. Jehoram had exhibited signs of godliness by a considerable reformation (2 Kin. iii 2), and Jehoshaphat consented to join him. The expedition enjoyed partial success (2 Kin iii 4-27) Jehoshaphat died at the age of sixty, about the year 850 B. C., and was buried in the city of David, leaving his son Jehoram to ascend the throne (1 Kin xxii 50).

5 Son of Nimshi and father of Jehu, king of Israel (2 Kin. ix 2, 14).

Je-hosh'a-phat, Val'ley of.

A valley where all nations shall be gathered by Jehovah for judgment (Joel iii 2, 12). At least as early as the time of Eusebius, in the fourth century A. D., the valley of Jehoshaphat was identified with the valley of the Kidron, so that now Jews, Roman Catholics, and Mohammedans fix the scene of the last judgment here. This identification is only a conjecture, based on the cited passages and Zech. xiv. So far as evidence goes, no valley actually bore this name. Joel doubtless chose this designation, which means "Jehovah hath judged," as symbolic of the event.

Je-hosh'e-ba and Jehoshabeath, interchangeable forms in Hebrew [Jehovah is an oath].

Daughter of Jehoram and sister of Ahaziah, kings of Judah, and wife of the high priest Jehoiada. On the murder of Ahaziah and the slaughter of the seed royal, Jehoshabea rescued his infant son Joash and hid him in the temple until he could be safely proclaimed king (2 Kin. xi 2; 2 Chron. xxii 11).

Je-hosh'u-a and Jehoshuah. See JOSHT A.

Je-ho'vah.

The common European pronunciation of the Hebrew tetragram Yhwh, one of the names of God (Ex. xvii 15). The original name was occasionally used even by so late a writer as Nehemiah (i 5, v 13, viii 1), in fact a form of it constitutes the latter part of his name. But it was not the favorite name of God with him, and it had ceased to be pronounced when the Greek version was made, for the translators substituted Lord. The custom had grown up among the Hebrews in reading to pronounce the word 'adonay, Lord in its stead or, when it follows 'adonay, to pronounce 'elohim, God (Gen. xv 2), as in English we say namely instead of viz. When the vowel points were added to the Hebrew consonantal text, the vowels of 'adonay and 'elohim were given to the tetragram. This pointing gave rise to the European pronunciation, Jehovah, current since the days of Petrus Galatinus, confessor of Leo X., A. D. 1518. The substitution of the word Lord by the later Hebrews and by the translators of the Septuagint led to the like substitution in the English version (Gen. ii 4). In such instances Lord is printed in small capitals. The tetragram is generally believed to have been pronounced Jahweh, Yahweh, because the divine name Jah (Ps lxxxix 8, R. V.) and the forms Yho, Yc and Yah, Yahu, which occur constantly in proper names, as in the Hebrew of Jehoshaphat, Joshaphat, Shephatiah, can all be derived from Yahweh in accordance with the laws of philology. Yahweh is an archaic form. It probably represents the Qal imperfect of the verb hawah, later hayah, to be or become. If this is so, it means "He who in the absolute sense exists and who manifests his existence and his character" (Ex. iii 13, 15). The creator, upholder, and moral governor of the universe is 'elohim, God; the covenant God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God in whom lay their present strength and their hope for their future existence, is 'El shadday, God almighty; but the God of revelation and grace, dwelling with his people, guiding and delivering them, and receiving their worship is Jehovah.

Whether the name was known to other peoples before it attained to celebrity through the Hebrews is still a question. Men began to call upon the name of Jehovah in the days of Enosh, the third from Adam (Gen. iv 26). It must not be inferred, however, that they necessarily used the name Jehovah. They worshiped the God of revelation and grace, whatever name they may have employed to denote the idea. Its first occurrence in recorded proper names is in Jochebed, an ancestress of Moses (see also 1 Chron. ii 8, 24). It can scarcely be sought in Moriah. Evidence of its use in proper names is thus found earlier than are traces of the employment of Shadday for like purpose (Num. i 6, 12). In the generation after the exodus, it appears in Joshua (Num. xiii 16). It then becomes frequent (1 Chron. vi 6, 7, 36).

To know that God is Jehovah and to know the name of Jehovah do not denote a mere external acquaintance with the word Jehovah, but an experience of God manifesting himself to his people in grace and love (1 Kin. viii 43, Ps. ix. 10; xci 14; Is. li 6; Jer. xvi 21). In Ex. vi 2-8 God promises that the children of Israel shall be delivered from bondage and have an experience of his gracious intervention and love such as their forefathers had not known. See PENTATEUCH.

Je-ho-vah-ji'reh [Jehovah will see or provide].

The name given by Abraham to the place where God provided a ram to be offered in sacrifice, instead of Isaac (Gen. xxii 14). Exact site unknown.

Je-ho-vah-nis'si [Jehovah is my banner].

The name given by Moses to an altar built by him at Rephidim as a memorial of Israel's victory over Amalek (Ex. xvii 15, 16).

Je-ho-vah-sha'lom [Jehovah is peace].

An altar built by Gideon in Ophrah to commemorate the visit of Jehovah's angel, who summoned him to deliver Israel, and, when Gideon expected to die because he had seen the heavenly one, said to him: "Peace be unto thee, . . . thou shalt not die" (Judg. vi. 23, 24).

Je-hoz'a-bad [Jehovah hath endowed].

1 A Korahite porter, son of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xxvi 4).

2. Son of a Moabite, and a servant of Joash and one of his assassins (2 Kin. xii. 21; 2 Chron. xxiv. 26). He was put to death for the deed (2 Chron. xxv. 3).

3. A Benjamite, a high military captain under king Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 18).

Je-hoz'a-dak. See JOZADAK.

Je'hu [probably, Jehovah is He]

1. A Benjamite of Anathoth, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 3).

2. A prophet, son of Hanani. He denounced judgment against Baasha and his house for continuing in the sin of Jeroboam I (1 Kin. xvi. 1-4, 7). He reproved Jehoshaphat for helping ungodly Ahab (2 Chron. xix. 2), and wrote a book in which the acts of Jehoshaphat were narrated (xx. 34).

3. The founder of the fourth dynasty of rulers in the kingdom of Israel. He was a son of Jehoshaphat and grand-son of Nimshi. For brevity's sake he was often called the son of Nimshi (1 Kin. xix. 16; 2 Kin. ix. 2). Somewhat earlier than 854 B. C., he was a soldier in the service of Ahab (2 Kin. ix. 25). When the cup of Ahab's iniquity had been made full by the deliberate murder of Jehovah's servants and prophets and the establishment of the worship of Baal in the northern kingdom, Elijah received a command from God to anoint Jehu king over Israel (1 Kin. xix. 16, 17). The commission was executed by Elijah's successor, Elisha, who for that purpose sent a young prophet to Ramoth-gilead, which the Israelites were besieging. He found Jehu sitting with the other officers, went with him into the house to deliver the message, anointed him king over Israel, commissioned him to destroy the house of Ahab, and then fled from the camp. Jehu told his military companions what had occurred, and they resolved to support him. They went to Jezreel, where the reigning sovereign Jehoram, Ahab's son, was at the time. The watchman on the tower in Jezreel deserted the party in the distance, and presently identified Jehu by his furious driving. Ahaziah, king of Judah, was visiting Jehoram; and the two kings, each in his chariot, went out to meet the advancing company. They met at the vineyard which Ahab had wrongfully gotten through the judicial murder of Naboth. The parley was short, and Jehoram was killed by an arrow sent with great force from Jehu's bow, and his body was cast into the plot of ground which had been Naboth's. Ahaziah also, whose mother was Ahab's daughter, was smitten by Jehu's order. By his command also, Jezebel, the queen-mother, Ahab's heathen queen and evil genius, was flung from a window and killed (2 Kin. ix. 1-37). Then the guardians of Ahab's seventy sons were induced to put them to death and pile up the heads in two heaps at the gate of Jezreel. Next Ahab's great men and his kinsfolk were slain, and then Ahaziah's forty-two brothers. Finally the priests of Baal were lured into the temple of that heathen god, whose worshiper Jehu pretended to be, and then massacred. Though Jehu executed the judgment pronounced upon the house of Ahab and slaughtered the priests of Baal, he himself took no heed to walk in the law of God, and did not depart from the schismatic calf worship (2 Kin. x. 29, 31). He ascended the throne about 842 B. C. In that year, according to Assyrian records, he paid tribute to Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, who came into the neighborhood to wage war against Hazael. He reigned twenty-eight years (36). About 821 B. C., on account of advancing age and the loss of his energy and military skill, his son Jehoahaz was probably associated with him. But the change did not prevent his reign from closing in disaster. Hazael cut Israel short (2 Kin. x. 32); see CHRONOLOGY. A promise had been given that the dynasty of Jehu should continue for four generations, and it did so, the line of descent being Jehoahaz, Jehoash or Joash, Jeroboam II., and Zechariah (2 Kin. x. 30; xv. 8-12).

4. A man of Judah, family of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 38).

5. A Simeonite (1 Chron. iv. 35).

Je-hub'bah [hidden]

An Asherite, family of Beriah (1 Chron. vii. 34).

Je-hu'cal and Jucal, interchangeable Hebrew forms [he is able]

A son of Shelemiah and prince of Judah. King Zedekiah sent him and others to ask the prayers of Jeremiah, when the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem was imminent (Jer. xxxvii. 3). Afterwards he wished the prophet to be put to death on the ground that his prediction of the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians discouraged its defenders (xxxviii. 1-6).

Je'hud [praise]

A town in the original territory of Dan (Josh. xix. 45). Robinson identified it with the village of el-Yehudiyyeh, 8 miles east by south of Jaffa. His view has been generally accepted.

Je-hu'di [a man of Judah, a Jew].

A messenger sent by king Jehoakim to ask Baruch for the roll written by Jeremiah. He was afterwards employed to read it, which he did, till the king, enraged at its contents, cut it in pieces and cast it into the fire (Jer. xxxvi. 14, 21, 23).

Je-hu-di'jah [Jewess]

One of the two wives of Mered, the other being Bithiah, an Egyptian princess (1 Chron. iv. 18, A. V.). Jehudijah is, however, not a proper name, but an adjective meaning Jewess; and it has the definite article. She was called the Jewess to distinguish her from the Egyptian.

Je'hush. See JEUSH.

Je-1'el, in A. V. twice Jehiel (1 Chron. ix. 35; xi. 44) [perhaps, treasure of God].

1. Father of the inhabitants of Gibeon and an ancestor of king Saul (1 Chron. ix. 35, 36, 39); see KISH 2.

2. A son of Hotham, an Aroerite, in the reign of David (1 Chron. xi. 44). Perhaps he was the Reubenite chief (v. 7, 8).

3. A Levite musician (1 Chron. xvi. 5, first half); see JAAZIEL.

4. A Levite of the second degree, who was a doorkeeper and played the harp at the removal of the ark to Jerusalem and afterwards as a regular duty in the tent at Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv. 18, 21; xvi. 5).

5. A Levite of the sons of Asaph (2 Chron. xx. 14).

6. A scribe who recorded the number of soldiers in Uzziah's army (2 Chron. xxvi. 11).

7. A Hebrew who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 43).

For others whose name is thus spelled in A. V., see JEU'EL. Jehiel in R. V. is a different name.

Je-kab'ze-el. See KARZEEL.

Jek-a-me'am [he doth assemble the people].

A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Hebron (1 Chron. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23).

Jek-a-mi'ah, in A. V. once Jecamiah (1 Chron. iii. 18) [Jehovah doth gather].

1. A man of Judah, descended through Sheshan from Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 41).

2. A son or descendant of Jecomiah (1 Chron. iii. 18).

Je-ku'thi-el [reverence for God].

A man of Judah, father of the inhabitants of Zanoah (1 Chron. iv. 18).

Je-mi'mah, in A. V. Jemima [a pigeon, a dove].

The first of the three daughters born to Job after his great trial (Job xlii. 14).

Jem'u-el [perhaps, warmth or desire of God].

A son of Simeon (Gen. xlii. 10; Ex. vi. 15). In Num. xxvi. 12; 1 Chron. iv. 24 he is called Nemuel. He founded a tribal family.

Jeph'tah, in A. V. of N. T. Jeph'tha-e [he doth open or set free].

A Gileadite, in the twofold sense of having a certain man called Gilead for his father and the country of Gilead for his early home. He was an illegitimate child, and his brothers born in wedlock expelled him from the paternal abode. He saw injustice in the treatment which he received, and years later he charged the elders of Gilead, among whom were probably his brothers, with being party to the iniquity and animated by hatred. He fled to the land of Tob, probably in the Hauran, where life was free and where with trusty weapon abundant food was to be had. There he made a name for himself by his prowess, and attracted a band of the unemployed around him as their chief. He must not be thought of as a lawless freebooter, however, for he was a man with a conscience. He sought sufficient justification before undertaking an enterprise, he feared God and taught his daughter the fear of God, and he won her entire confidence and religious respect. About the time of Jephthah's expulsion, the Ammonites invaded the Israelitish territory east of the Jordan and held it in subjection eighteen years. In this extremity the elders of Gilead, who had driven Jephthah away, were compelled as a last resort to urge the fugitive to return and become their chief and deliverer. On assuming headship over the Gileadites, Jephthah informed the neighboring tribe of Ephraim of the distress of Gilead, but he exhorted them in vain to come to the help of their brethren. He also demanded of the king of the Ammonites the ground of his hostility, and in reply justified Israel for taking up arms. While yet the issue of the war was doubtful Jephthah had vowed that if he were permitted to achieve victory, he would offer to God as a burnt offering whatever first came to him out of his house. On his return from the defeat of the Ammonites what first came was his only daughter, and who, moreover, was his only child. He was greatly troubled when he saw her, but felt compelled to do with her according to his vow. Probably he sacrificed her (cp. 2 Kin. iii. 27), though many have thought that he may have redeemed her with money (Lev. xxvii. 1-8) and doomed her to perpetual celibacy. The Israelite women were accustomed four times a year to mourn her sad fate. Hostilities breaking out between him and the Ephraimites, who complained that he had slighted them in making arrangements for his Ammonite campaign, he answered their false accusation and defeated them in battle. Jephthah judged Israel six years (Judg. x. 6-xii. 7). Samuel cited him as one proof of Jehovah's faithfulness to his promise to raise up a deliverer for Israel in time of need (1 Sam. xii. 11), and he is cited in the Epistle to the Hebrews as a man of faith (Heb. xi. 32).

Je-phun'neh [it will be prepared].

1. Father of Caleb, the representative spy from the tribe of Judah (Num. xiii. 6).

2. An Asherite (1 Chron. vii. 38).

Je'rah [moon, month].

An Arabian tribe descended from Joktan (Gen. x. 26; 1 Chron. i. 20).

Je-rah'me-el [God hath compassion].

1. A descendant of Judah through Perez and Hezron (1 Chron. ii. 9; cp. 4, 5). Two wives are mentioned and a numerous progeny is registered (25-41).

2. Son of a Levite called Kish, not Saul's father (1 Chron. xxiv. 29).

3. One of the officers sent by king Jehoia-kim to arrest Baruch (Jer. xxxvi. 26). He was probably of royal blood (R. V.). See HAMMELECH.

Je're'd [descent].

1. Son of Mahalaleel (1 Chron. i. 2, A. V.); see JARED.

2. A man of Judah and father of the inhabitants of Gedor (1 Chron. iv. 18).

Jer'e-mai [high].

A Hebrew who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 33).

Jer-e-mi'ah, in A. V. of N. T. Jeremy and Jeremias (Mat. ii. 17; xvi. 14) [Jehovah doth establish].

1-3 A Benjamite and two Gadites who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4, 10, 13).

4. Head of a father's house in eastern Manasseh (1 Chron. v. 24).

5 A native of Libnah and the father of Hamutal, wife of king Josiah and mother of Jehoahaz (2 Kin. xxiii. 30, 31).

6 Son of Habazimiah and father of Jaazaniah, a Rechabite (Jer. xxxv. 3).

7 The great prophet, a son of Hilkiah, a priest of Anathoth, in the territory of Benjamin (Jer. i. 1). He was called to the prophetic office by a vision. He was young at the time, and felt his immaturity and inexperience and inability to speak to men; but Jehovah reached out a hand and touched Jeremiah's mouth, putting into it words, and setting him over nations and kingdoms, on the one hand to root out, overthrow, and destroy, and on the other to plant and to build. He was told, further, that he would meet with violent opposition from princes, priests and people, but that they should not prevail (i. 4-10). He began to prophesy in the thirteenth year of the reign of Josiah, and continued his work till the capture of Jerusalem, in the fifth month of the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign (2, 3). Thus his public life extended through the last eighteen years of Josiah's reign, the three months during which Jehoahaz ruled, the eleven years of Jehoiakim, the three months of Jehoiachin, and the eleven years and five months of Zedekiah, in all about forty-one years. Nor did he, even then, cease from his prophetic functions (xlii-xliv.) The men of Anathoth, his paternal home, were among the first to oppose him, and threatened to kill him if he did not desist from prophesying. He persevered in his mission despite the persecution, but he keenly felt this opposition to the work of God from his countrymen, the chosen people of God, and he cried to God for judgment (Jer. xi. 18-21; xii. 3). The hostility to the prophet, which began at Anathoth, after a time became general, and again evoked a cry for judgment upon his opponents (xviii. 18-23; cp. also xx. 12). But he remained faithful to his duty in spite of obloquy and persecution. In the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign Jeremiah dictated the prophecies which he had been uttering during the preceding twenty years, and the scribe Baruch wrote them in the roll of a book. Knowing that he himself was derided, for some reason not stated, and without doubt still be hindered for a long time from going to the house of God, the prophet told Baruch to take the roll to the sanctuary and read it before the people who would come to the temple on occasion of a festival. The roll ultimately reached the king himself, who, after reading a few leaves or columns cut it in pieces and flung it into the fire (xxxvi. 1-26). By divine direction the prophet at once prepared a second roll like the first, but with additions (27-32). As to him, the priest Pashhur, chief governor of the temple, put him in the stocks, but he released the next day (xx. 1-3). During the siege of Jerusalem the Jewish authorities looked at Jeremiah's prophecies of the fall of the Chaldeans and the subsequent captivity of Judah from the political or military, instead of from the religious, point of view; and they claimed that his unfavorable predictions discouraged the defense of Jerusalem. And when the Chaldeans temporarily raised the siege to meet the Egyptians, and Jeremiah was about to take advantage of their absence to go to Anathoth on business, the charge was made against him that he was deserting to the Chaldeans and he was thrown into prison (xxxvii. 1-3). After many days king Zedekiah released him from his cell and committed him to the care of the guard (16-21); but the princes who had him cast into the dungeon to die (xxxviii. 1-6). An Ethiopian eunuch, however, took compassion on him, and obtained the king's leave to take him from the prison and put him back in the court of the guard. The prophet was there when Jerusalem was taken (7-28). The Chaldeans took upon him as one who had suffered much from them, and Nebuchadnezzar gave him orders for his kind treatment. According to Nebuzaradan, the Chaldean official, sent to guard and brought to him with the other captives to Ramah, set him free, and gave him leave to go to Babylon or stay in his home land. On his choosing the latter, Nebuzaradan gave him victuals and a present, and sent him to the protection of Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had made governor of Judah (xxxix. 11-14; xl. 1). On the murder of Gedaliah, he strongly urged the Jews not to flee to Egypt. It was in vain; they not merely went thither themselves, but they compelled the prophet to accompany them on their journey (xli. 1-xlii. 7). He delivered his last predictions at Jericho, in Egypt (xliii. 8-xliv. 30). The time and manner of his death are unknown. Besides the prophecies to which his name is attached, and his Lamentations, he may have written some of the psalms, which resemble his compositions in style.

Beyond most prophecies the book of Jeremiah reveals the spiritual life of its author.

His was a message of doom to his native land, and a message that brought the hatred of his fellow-countrymen upon him, and the burden of it forced from him the bitter lament that he had ever been born (xv 10, xx 14-18). But he remained true to duty. He was a lone man, misunderstood, maligned, persecuted, his efforts for the moral welfare of his countrymen foredoomed to failure, without the solace of domestic life and social joys (xvi 1-9), often kept in ward, forced to turn for consolation and sympathy and companionship to God only. Being thus thrown much upon God, he came to realize the sense of individual responsibility to God (xvii 9; xxxi 29, 30). And so it comes to pass that in Jeremiah is notably exhibited the possibility and reality of communion between the individual soul and God.

Religion in the heart and in the life is a dominant note in Jeremiah's preaching. He was called to the prophetic office five years before the eventful discovery of the book of the law in the temple, during repairs to the edifice, and he was in the midst of his work when king Josiah, under the profound impression made upon him by the words of the book, led the crusade against idolatry and inaugurated a revival in the national worship. Jeremiah, too, exhorted the people to hearken to the words of the covenant entered into at Mount Sinai; and he pointed out that God had visited them with the evils threatened therein for disobedience, and that to obey is the first requirement of the covenant (Jer xi 1-8). Jeremiah would guard the people from limiting reform to things external. He would carry it into the inner life. In the spirit of the older prophets, of the familiar proverb, and of the covenant itself (1 Sam xv 22; Is i 11-17, Amos v. 21-24; Mic vi. 6-8; Prov xv. 8; Deut. x. 13), and using the rhetorical negation, frequently employed for emphatic antithesis (e.g. Deut v. 3), he denied that God commanded sacrifice, and insisted that the one requirement is obedience. God commanded sacrifice indeed (Ex xx 24; xxiii 14-19, Deut xii 6), but did not speak of sacrifice. Sacrifice was not the theme, God spoke of moral conduct (Jer vii 21-28, cp. vi. 20, xiv 12). The sacrifices of the obedient are pleasing to God (xvii. 24-26; xxvii 19-22; xxxiii 10, 11, 18; the latter verse in a section lacking in the Greek version), but the fasts and sacrifices of those who love to wander from him are not acceptable (xiv 10-12). Trust in the presence of Jehovah in the midst of Israel, in being Jehovah's temple, is also vain, and equally vain is the mere possession of the law of Jehovah. Obedience alone avails (vii 4-7; viii. 7-9). Eventually even the ark will be no more remembered (iii 16). God looks at the heart (xi 20; xvii. 10; xx. 12). To serve God man must remove carnal lust from it (iv 4; cp. Deut x. 16), wash it of wickedness (iv. 14), and return to God with the whole heart and not feignedly (iii 10, xvii. 5). In due time Jeremiah foretold the new covenant when the people shall have a new heart and God's law written in it (xxiv 7, xxxi 33; xxxii 39, 40). His vision described the true glory of the kingdom of the future. Henceforth this truth holds a chief place in the mind of God's people.

Jeremiah committed some of his prophecies to writing in the reign of Jehoiakim, but the roll was destroyed by the king (xxxvi 1, 23). They were soon rewritten, however, with large additions (32). The present book is a further enlargement, including the later prophecies; and is a rearrangement, prepared at the close of his ministry, for prophecies of different periods are placed together and those of the same period are often dispersed. The book consists of an introduction narrating the prophet's call (i.), three sections of prophecy, often recorded in connection with the event that called forth the prophetic utterance (ii.-li.), and a historical appendix, added probably by a later writer (li.; cp. li. 64). The three prophetic sections are I. Prediction of the approaching judgment of Judah and the promise of restoration from exile (ii.-xxxiii). It includes a general denunciation of Judah (ii.-xx.), denunciation of the civil and religious rulers (xxi.-xxiii.), an unfolding of the design and duration of the judgment (xxiv.-xxix.), and prophecy of the blessings which will follow the judgment (xxx.-xxxiii.). II. History of the infliction of the judgment (xxxiv.-xlv.), including denunciations of the corruption which prevailed immediately before the destruction of the city (xxxiv.-xxxviii.), an account of the destruction of the city (xxxix.), and of the wretched conditions of the remnant, and the prophecies spoken to them (xl.-xlv.). III. Predictions respecting foreign nations (xlv.-li.), introduced by an address to Baruch (xlv.).

The Messiah is spoken of in xxiii. 5-8, xxx. 4-11; xxxiii. 14-26; and Jehovah's sure covenant with Israel is dwelt upon in xxxi. 31-40, xxxiii. 36-44, xxxiii.

The text of the Septuagint differs considerably from the Hebrew: chapters xlv.-li. are not only arranged in a different order among themselves, but the entire section has been inserted after xxv. 13; chapters xxix. 16-20, and xxxiii. 14-26, and xxxix. 4-13, and li. 28-30 are wanting in the Greek; and in many other places the Greek version presents a shorter text than the Hebrew (e.g. ii. 1, 2; vii. 1-3). This shorter text is often due to the absence of unimportant words; such as the customary lack of "the prophet" when Jeremiah is named (e.g. xxviii. 5, 11, 15), "the king," when the proper name is given (xxxvi. 32; xxxvii. 17) and vice versa (e.g. xxvi. 22, 23; xxxvii. 18, 21), "of hosts" after Jehovah (e.g. vi. 6, 9), "of hosts, the God of Israel," the sufficient title Lord being used instead (e. g. vii. 21; xix. 15), and "saith the Lord," where the expression is parenthetic (e. g. ii. 9, iii. 10; vii. 13).

8. A chief of the priests, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. xii. 1, 7). A father's house bore his name in the next generation (12).

9. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house, who set his seal to the covenant to keep separate from the foreigners and observe the law of God (Neh. x. 2).

Jer'e-moth and Jerimoth [probably heights].

1. A Benjamite, family of Becher (1 Chron. vii. 8).

2. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 14), perhaps the person called Jeroham (27).

3. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mushi (1 Chron. xxiii. 23; xxiv. 30).

4. A descendant of Heman and head of the fifteenth course among the musicians in David's reign (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 22).

5. A son of Azriel and prince of Naphtali in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 19).

6-8. Two descendants of Elam (Ezra x. 26, 27) and a son of Bani (x. 29, in A, according to another reading, Ramoth), who consented to put away their foreign wives.

Jer'e-my. See JEREMIAH

Je-ri'ah, once Jerijah [probably, founded by Jehovah].

A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Hebron (1 Chron. xxiii. 19, xxiv. 23; xxvi. 31).

Jer'i-bal [contentious].

A son of Elnaam, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 46).

Jer'i-cho [place of fragrance].

An important city situated in the valley of the Jordan (Deut. xxxiv. 1, 3), west of the river, near the Dead Sea, and at the foot of the ascent to the mountainous table-land of Judah. It was known as the city of palm trees (ibid.; Judg. iii. 13). It is first mentioned in Scripture when the Israelites encamped at Shittim on the other side of the Jordan (Num. xxi. 1, xxvi. 3). As it was strongly fortified and commanded the valley of the lower Jordan and the passes into the western mountains, its conquest by the Israelites was essential to their advance. Joshua accordingly sent spies to examine it (Josh. ii. 1-24), led the Israelites across the river, and pitched camp near the city. By divine command the men of war went round the city once a day for six consecutive days, with the ark of the covenant in their midst and seven priests blowing on trumpets in front of the ark. On the seventh day they compassed the city seven times, and on the seventh circuit, when the signal was given by a long blast with the horn, the host shouted, the walls fell, and the Israelites entered. The place had been put under the ban. Except Rahab, who had protected the spies, and her father's family, all living creatures were slain. The silver and the gold, with other valuables, were put into the treasury of the house of the Lord. Finally, Joshua foretold that if any one ever fortified the town he should lose his elder son when the foundations were being laid, and the younger one when the gates were being set up (Josh. v. 13-vi. 26). The place was assigned to Benjamin and stood on the boundary between the tribes of Ephraim and Benjamin (xvi. 1, 7; xviii. 12, 21). It was occupied as a royal residence by Eglon, king of Moab, when he oppressed the Israelites (Judg. iii. 13). David's ambassadors, returning from the Ammonite king by whom they had been insulted, stopped at Jericho until their beads grew (2 Sam. x. 5; 1 Chron. xix. 5). In Ahab's reign Hiel the Bethelite fortified the city, but lost or sacrificed his two sons as predicted by Joshua (1 Kin. xvi. 34). During Elijah's lifetime there was a community of the prophets at the place (2 Kin. i. 5). Elijah, when about to be translated to heaven, passed through it with Elisha, and Elisha returned to it after finally parting with Elijah (4, 15, 18). The captives of Judah, taken by the Israelite army under Pekah, were set free at Jericho (2 Chron. xxviii. 15). In its vicinity Zedekiah was captured by his Babylonian pursuers (2 Kin xxv 5; Jer. xxxix 5; iii. 8). Three hundred and forty-five of its former inhabitants and their descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 34; Neh. vii. 36). Some of its new populace helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 2). Bacchides, the Syrian general, repaired the fortifications of Jericho during the Maccabæan period (1 Mac ix. 50). In the early years of Herod the Great the Romans plundered Jericho (Antiq. xiv. 15, 3). Subsequently Herod beautified it, established a royal palace, and on the hill behind the town built a citadel which he named Cyprus (xvi. 5, 2; xvii. 13, 1; War i. 21, 4 and 9). There was also a hippodrome there at the time of Herod's death (Antiq. xvii. 6, 5; War i. 33, 6 and 8). The road from Jerusalem to Jericho was the scene of the action in the parable of the good Samaritan (Luke x. 30). At Jericho itself Jesus restored sight to blind Bartimæus and his companion (Mat. xx. 29; Luke xviii. 35). There also he brought salvation to Zacchæus, whose home was in Jericho (xix. 1, 2).

Jericho, lying 825 feet below the level of the Mediterranean, had a tropical climate. Palms, balsams, sycamores, and henna flourished (Song i. 14; Luke xix. 2, 4; War iv. 8, 3). The rose plant of Jericho was proverbially fine (Ecclus. xxiv. 14). Ancient Jericho stood close by the copious spring 'Ain es-Sultan, apparently the fountain healed by Elisha (War iv. 8, 3). Excavation has uncovered the remains of an Amorite town, which seems to have been destroyed before Israelite influence had affected its life. The modern village of 'Eriha (the Hebrew Y'riho a little altered) is 4½ miles west of the Jordan, and 1½ southeast of the fountain. It is a small and miserable place.

Je'ri-el [probably, founded by God]

A descendant of Tola, of the tribe of Issachar (1 Chron. vii. 2).

Je-ri'jah. See JERIAH.

Jer'i-moth [probably, heights].

1. A Benjamite, family of Bela (1 Chron. vii. 7).

2. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5).

3. A son of David, and father of Mahalath, a wife of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 18).

4. A Levite, an overseer in connection with the temple in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

For others whose name sometimes appears as Jeremoth, see JEREMOTH.

Je'ri-oth [curtains]

One of Caleb's wives (1 Chron. ii. 18).

Jer-o-bo'am [the people become numerous].

1. An Ephraimite, who founded the kingdom of the ten tribes. His father was an official under Solomon, named Nebat, of the village of Zeredah in the Jordan valley; his mother's name was Zeruah, who was a widow at the time of his birth (1 Kin. xi. 26). As a young man he showed industry and ability; and Solomon, who was engaged in building operations at Jerusalem, made him overseer of the heavy work assigned to the house of Joseph (27, 28). One day as Jeroboam was walking outside of Jerusalem he was met by a prophet, Ahijah of Shiloh, clad in a new garment, who rent the cloth in twelve pieces, and gave ten to Jeroboam as a pledge that Jehovah destined him to be king over ten out of the twelve tribes. News of the transaction reached Solomon, who sought to kill Jeroboam, but he escaped to Egypt, and was kindly received by Shishak, its king (29-40).

When the refugee was notified that Solomon was dead and that an assembly of the tribes was to take place at Shechem to make Solomon's son Rehoboam king, he returned to attend the meeting. He put himself forward as spokesman of the people, and urged the alleviation of their burdens. Rehoboam denied the petition, returning a foolish and exasperating answer. Ten tribes thereupon revolted from the house of David and elected Jeroboam king. The prophecy of Ahijah had come true; yet Jeroboam resolved to depart from the counsel by which it had been accompanied. The prophet had exhorted him to remain true to Jehovah, in which case the crown should descend permanently in his family (37, 38). But he was afraid that if the people went up steadily to Jerusalem to worship they would be won back to the house of David and would reject and slay him. He therefore established a center of worship at each of the two extremities of his kingdom, Dan in the north and Bethel in the south. In defiance of the commandment which forbids the adoration of God by means of images, he set up a golden calf in each of the two places (xii. 26-30; 2 Chron. xiii. 8), and recommended the worship as not altogether new by using the familiar words of Aaron (Ex. xxxii. 4). It would seem that he still desired to worship Jehovah under the image of the calf. He not only thus established houses of high places which lacked the ark and the shekinah, but he made Israelites who were not of the tribe of Levi priests, doubtless because few or none of the lawful priests and other Levites consented to serve in the idolatrous and schismatic worship (1 Kin. xii. 31; 2 Chron. xi. 13-15, xiii. 9). He further decreed that the harvest festival, which was celebrated in Judah on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, should be observed in the northern kingdom on the fifteenth day of the eighth month (1 Kin. xii. 32, 33). The mass of the people conformed. Thus Jeroboam made Israel to sin. This abhorrent worship continued until the fall of the kingdom. The successive kings, with the possible exception of Hoshea, supported it and are accordingly described as walking in the way of Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin (1 Kin.

xv. 26, 34; xvi. 19, 31; xxii. 52; 2 Kin. iii. 3; x. 29; xiii. 2, 11; xiv. 24; xv. 9, 18, 24, 28) The idolatry established by Jeroboam was one cause which led to the carrying of the ten tribes into captivity to Assyria (2 Kin. xvii. 16); for it kept the Hebrew nation divided in twain and made two inferior kingdoms where there had been one strong united people; and, as it was a degradation of the lofty spiritual worship of Jehovah, it resulted in lowering the spiritual tone of the northern Israelites. Jeroboam was rebuked for his apostasy, first by an unnamed prophet from Judah, and then by Ahijah, the Shilonite, who had promised him the kingdom; but he continued to the end unrepentant (1 Kin. xiii. 1-xiv. 18). He fortified Shechem and Penuel, both sacred places. The former he made his residence, but seems to have taken up his abode later at beautiful Tirzah (1 Kin. xii. 25; xiv. 17; Song vi. 4). There was a desultory warfare between Jeroboam and Rehoboam (1 Kin. xv. 6), and a great battle was fought between Jeroboam and Rehoboam's son and successor, Abijah, in which the army of Israel was defeated with enormous slaughter, and Bethel, which was only 10 miles from Jerusalem, temporarily lost to Israel (7; 2 Chron. xiii. 1-20); see ABIJAH. Jeroboam was made king about 931 B. C., and reigned twenty-two years (1 Kin. xiv. 20). One son of his had died in infancy (1-17); another, Nadab, ascended the throne (20).

2. The son of Joash, king of Israel, and his successor on the throne of the ten tribes. He was of the dynasty of Jehu, and the third in descent from that ruler. He became king in Samaria about the year 790 B. C., and reigned forty-one years. He found the kingdom in a low state, but raised it again to prosperity, capturing Damascus, the capital of Syria, and Hamath, one of the Hittite towns, and restoring to Israel the country from Hamath to the Dead Sea. These successes had been predicted by Jonah (2 Kin. xiv. 23-28; cp. Deut. iii. 17). Amos also prophesied in Jeroboam II's reign (Amos i. 1). He drew a melancholy picture of the moral and religious state of Israel at the time (ii. 6-v. 27; vii. 4-6, etc.), and predicted judgment from God (vii. 1-9; viii. 7-10). For these prophecies of doom the priest at Bethel made a complaint against him to Jeroboam, but it does not seem to have brought any penalty on the prophet (vii. 10-17). Hosea also began his prophetic work in the northern kingdom during the lifetime of Jeroboam. The first three chapters pertain to that period. On the death of Jeroboam, his son Zechariah ascended the throne (2 Kin. xiv. 29).

Je-ro'ham [he findeth mercy].

1. A Levite, an ancestor of the prophet Samuel (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 27, 34).

2. A Benjamite, whose sons were chief men and dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chron. vii. 27).

See JEREMOTH 2. He may be identical with the following.

3. A Benjamite, father of Ibneiah who dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix. 8).

4. A priest of the house of Malchijah (1 Chron. ix. 12; Neh. xi. 12).

5. A Benjamite of Gedor, whose sons joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 7).

6. Father of the chief of the tribe of Dan in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxvii. 22).

7. Father of one of the captains who aided Jehoiada in putting Joash on the throne of Judah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

Jer'u-el [probably, founded by God]

A wilderness in Judah, adjacent to the cliff of Ziz, and therefore in the vicinity of Engedi (2 Chron. xx. 16). Exact situation unknown.

Je-ru'sa-lem [to the Hebrews it meant foundation of peace, secure habitation]

The sacred city and well-known capital of Judah, of Judaea, of Palestine, and of the Jews throughout the world. For the sake of convenient reference and clearness, the subject is presented under certain heads: I. Name. II. The city in itself. 1. Site, 2. Water supply, 3. Artificial defenses; 4. Notable buildings in the time of Christ. III. The history of the city. 1. The Canaanite city, 2. The city of the Hebrews, 3. The city since Titus. IV. Modern excavation.

I. The name. The earliest known name is Urusalim, i. e. Jerusalem. It was in use as early as the sixteenth century before Christ, long before the conquest of Canaan by the Hebrews under Joshua, being found in letters from its subject prince to Amenophis IV., king of Egypt, his lord Salem, of which Melchizedek was king, is a natural abbreviation of Jerusalem and not unlikely denoted this city. The place is mentioned as Jerusalem in the account of the conquest of Canaan, but in that narrative it is also referred to as Jebus; in fact, this latter name is frequent after the conquest during the occupation of the city by the Jebusites; but when David captured the city and made it his capital, the old name of Jerusalem, or abbreviated Salem (Ps. lxxvi. 2), became once more the sole designation. The pronunciation of the final syllable has been modified by the later Jews, so that it resembles a dual and quite appropriately suggests a double city.

II. 1. The site. Jerusalem is situated on a table-land on the crest of the central ridge of Palestine and at one of its highest points. It has the same latitude as the northern end of the Dead Sea. The portion of the table-land occupied by the city is isolated from the rest of the plateau, except on the north. On the other sides it is encompassed by deep ravines. This jutting promontory is itself cut by another valley which, followed upward from its mouth at the southeastern corner of the promontory at the junction of the southern and eastern ravines, trends like the arc of a circle for nearly a mile northward, midway sending a branch from its concave side due west. Such at least was the original configuration of the city's site; but in the course of centuries, through municipal improvements and the devastation of war, heights have been lowered and valleys filled. As a result of these ramifications, there are three principal hills, an eastern, a southwestern, and a northwestern. The eastern hill is a ridge extending for somewhat more than half a mile from north to south, which rises to a height of from 200 to 300 feet above its encompassing valleys, tapers to a blunt point at its southern extremity, and at its northern end is almost separated (the reference is to the ancient topography) from the table-land, of which it is a part, by a branch of the eastern ravine. This ridge attains a general altitude of 2400 feet above sea level. There is some evidence that a slight depression or valley, about 100 feet wide and in places 40 feet deep, lay athwart it toward the southern end from the so-called fountain of the Virgin northwesterly to the Tyropeon valley. The southwestern hill is much the largest of the three. In form it is oblong, with a spur thrown out on the northeastern corner toward the eastern ridge. It rises abruptly from the encircling valleys. Its broad summit begins at an altitude of about 2400 feet above the level of the sea and swells 150 feet higher, with its greatest elevation on the west. The third hill is rather a projection of the plateau than an isolated mound. It lies north of the one just described. The present elevation of that part included in the ante-Christian city is about 2450 feet. This triad of hills, with the protecting ravines, afforded a strong position for a city, although it is encircled beyond the ravines by hills which tower above it. The mountains are round about Jerusalem.

Jerusalem, viewed from the Northeast

The eastern ravine is the valley of the Kidron. The hill to the east, which faces and overlooks the hills of the city, is the mount of Olives. The long ridge which runs north and south is the temple hill, called at least in that portion of its extent where the sanctuary stood, mount Moriah. Its southern tapering extremity was known as Ophel. The pool in the valley at its extreme southern point is Siloam, and a pool just north of the temple area is Bethesda.

Which height was mount Zion? This question has received three principal answers: 1 Mount Zion was the southwestern hill. This view has prevailed since the fourth century (1) Zion was the city of David (2 Sam. v. 7-9), and Josephus says that the upper city, unquestionably the southwestern hill, was called the citadel by David (War v. 4, 1)

Pool of Siloam.

Strangely enough, however Josephus does not explicitly call it Zion. (2) Micah distinguishes Zion from the temple hill (iv 2). (3) Too much building is spoken of in Neh. iii for Zion to be part of the temple hill. (4) The sanctity of Zion is accounted for by the fact that it was for many years the abiding place of the ark, and was celebrated as such by David (2 Sam. vi. 12-18; 1 Kin. viii. 1-4; Ps. ii. 6). The name Zion thus became the title for Jerusalem as a whole in its quality as a holy city (Ps. xlviii.; lxxxvii.; cxxxiii 3). 2 Mount Zion was the northwestern hill (Warren). This hill is identified with that quarter of the city called by Josephus the Acra, which in Greek means hilltop or citadel. It is, indeed, styled by him the lower city, for so it was in his day; but originally it was much higher, and was cut down by Simon Maccabæus because it commanded the temple (Antiq. xiii. 6, 7). It was originally a suitable site for the Jebusite fortress. 3 Mount Zion was a portion of the temple hill. The main arguments for this view are (1) The temple hill is best adapted by nature for a stronghold (2) The temple could be reached by going from the fountain gate, up the stairs of the city of David, and past the water gate (Neh. xii 37), steps which may be those that have been discovered ascending the ridge from the pool at the southern end. (3) Zion is spoken of as holy in terms such as are never applied to Jerusalem, but are intelligible if Zion was the hill on which the temple stood. Zion is called the hill of the Lord, the holy hill, the dwelling place of Jehovah (Ps. ii 6, ix 11; xxiv 3, cxxxii 13) (4) In the First Book of the Maccabees Zion is the temple hill (i 33-38). The invariable distinction of the city of David from mount Zion and the sanctuary shows that the terms had undergone a change of meaning since 2 Sam. v 7. The simplest explanation is that mount Zion was part of the temple hill, and by synecdoche often used for the whole of it, whereas the designation city of David, which denoted the municipality of Jerusalem (2 Sam. v 7; Antiq. vii. 3, 2), was extended, with the growth of population, beyond the bounds of mount Zion and embraced the new suburbs on the city of David might then on occasion include the sanctuary or exclude it. The Syrians erected a fortress in the city of David, but Judas Maccabæus came and took possession of the sanctuary on mount Zion (1 Mac. i. 33 seq., iv. 36 seq.) According to this view, the stronghold captured by David occupied the northern part of the ridge on which the temple was afterwards built (Ferguson) or, as the advocates of the theory are coming in increasing numbers to believe, the southern part, south of the temple, south also of the transverse ravine (Klaiber, Guthe, Sayce).

Cisterns of Jerusalem

II 2 Water supply Although Jerusalem was often long and closely besieged and suffered grievous famine from having its supplies of food cut off, there is no record of the inhabitants having ever lacked water. In fact, it was the besiegers who were apt to want water, not the besieged. There is no spring north of the city, and none is known at present east, west, or south which was not commanded by the walls, except En-rogel. A living fountain to supply the Mamilla pool and the pool of the Sultan on the west has not been discovered. The southwestern hill is likewise without springs, so far as known, although the dragon's well may have been such (Neh. ii. 13). But the temple hill is well supplied (Tacitus, Hist. v. 12). The known living sources and their reservoirs are the fountain of the Virgin on the eastern side, with abundant water which was conducted by a subterranean channel to the pool of Siloam (see GICHON); the fountain of Siloam at the southern end of the hill, where also are to be sought, though their identification is difficult, the king's pool, the pool that was made, and Solomon's pool (Neh. ii. 14; neighboring hills, around which the protecting walls of the city were cast. The term

iii. 16, War v. 4, 1); on the western side of the ridge, directly west of the temple, the so-called healing baths, Hammam esh-Shifa, and just north of the ridge, Bethesda.

The springs were supplemented by cisterns. The towers, which were upon the city walls, contained immense reservoirs for rain water (War v. 4, 3); and numerous cisterns, of which not a few still exist, were found in all parts of the city (Tacitus, Hist. v. 12).

Besides the supply afforded by the springs and cisterns of the city, water was also brought from a distance. The Mamilla pool west of the city is probably the upper pool in the fuller's field and, as the name denotes, the serpent's pool (Is vii 3; xxxvi 2; War v. 3, 2). An aqueduct brought the water from it to the pool of the patriarch east of the Jaffa gate. This is known to tradition as the pool of Hezekiah, and is probably the pool Amygdalon—the pool of the almond or tower, mentioned by Josephus (War v. 11, 4). From it a subterranean conduit passes eastward. A reservoir was also constructed at a late period north of the temple area, in ground made where the small valley diverged westward from the Kidron. It was fed from the west. It is now known as the pool of Israel, and is probably identical with the pool Strouthios (pool of the sparrow or of soapwort, which was used for cleansing wool), which existed when Jerusalem was besieged by Titus, and lay in front of the tower of Antonia (War v. 11, 4). But the most extensive aqueduct was that which brought water to Jerusalem from beyond Bethlehem, see ETAM. It is believed to considerably antedate the Christian era.

II 3 Artificial defenses. Immediately after capturing Jerusalem, David took measures to enclose the city with a wall. The old Jebusite stronghold, henceforth called the city of David, already existed. David, in addition, fortified the city round about, from Millo even round about (2 Sam v. 9, 1 Chron xi. 8). Solomon built Millo and the wall of Jerusalem, closing up the gap in the city of David (1 Kin ix 15, 24, xi 27). Succeeding kings made repairs and additions, until eventually at least the wall passed near the present Jaffa gate on the west (2 Chron xxvi. 9), approached the valley of Hinnom on the south (Jer xix 2), ran near the pool of Siloam (2 Kin xxv 4), included Ophel (2 Chron. xxvii. 3; xxxiii 14), and on the north enclosed the suburb which grew up on the northwestern hill (2 Kin xiv. 13; 2 Chron xxxiii 14; Jer xxxi 38). This wall was razed to the ground by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kin. xxv 10).

Nehemiah rebuilt the wall out of the old material (Neh. ii. 13-15; iv 2, 7; vi. 15). It began, so to speak, at the sheep gate (iii. 1), which was near the pool of Bethesda (John v. 2). This pool has been discovered near to the church of St. Anne, about 100 yards from the gate now called St. Stephen's, and on what was originally the northern side of that branch of the Kidron valley which was interposed between the temple hill and the main plateau. The sheep gate stood, therefore, in this branch valley or on the slope of the plateau to the north or northwest. Near the sheep gate, in the direction away from the temple, were the towers of Meah and Hananeel (Neh. iii 1; xii. 39). Then came the fish gate, in the new or second quarter of the city (iii 3; Zeph i 10), and next the old gate (Neh iii 6; xii. 39). Some distance on from the latter point was the broad wall (iii 8; xii 38), and farther on the tower of the furnaces (iii 11; xii 38). To this there succeeded the valley gate, the technical designation of the valley on the west of the city being used (iii 13; cp ii. 13-15), then the dung gate (iii 14), then the gate of the fountain, the wall of the pool of Siloam by the king's garden, at the southeastern corner of the city, and the stairs that go down from the city of David (15), to the east of this point was the water gate [of the temple?], with a large open place before it (viii 1-3; xii 37). The wall next went past the sepulchers of David, the pool that was made, and the house of the mighty (iii 16); the going up to the armory, at the turning of the wall (19), the house of the high priest, Eliashib (20); then various points indicated by other houses unto the turning of the wall, the corner (24); the turning of the wall and the tower which standeth out from the king's upper house, that was by the court of the guard (25). Now the Nethinim dwelt here in Ophel from over against the water gate [of the temple?] toward the east and this tower that standeth out (26; cp xi 21). Then a piece of wall from this tower to the wall of Ophel (iii 27). The horse gate came next, above which the priests resided (28). It was on the eastern side of the city, overlooking the Kidron valley (Jer xxxi. 40). Then a portion of the wall over against the house of [the priest] Zadok, then a section repaired by the keeper of the east gate [of the temple, probably] (Neh. iii 29). Presently the house of the Nethinim; then a section from over against the gate of the Miphkad [which was probably a gate of the temple at the place where the sin offering was burned, called the Miphkad, cp Ezek. xliii. 21] to the upper chamber of the tower (Neh. iii 31); and, finally, the sheep gate, which was the starting point of the description (32).

Two important gates of the former wall are not mentioned, though one at least existed at this time, the corner gate (2 Kin xiv 13; 2 Chron. xxvi 9; cp. Zech. xiv. 10) and the gate of Ephraim (Neh viii. 16; xii. 39). The corner gate appears to have been the extreme northwestern point of the city (Jer. xxxi. 38), and it was distant 400 cubits from the gate of Ephraim (2 Kin. xiv. 13). Through this latter gate the road to Ephraim passed; presumably, therefore, it was in the northern wall of the city, and if so, then east of the corner gate. It was certainly west of the old gate (Neh xii 39). Beginning with the sheep gate and following the northern wall westward, the order of gates and towers is sheep gate, towers of Meah and Hananeel, fish gate, old gate, gate of Ephraim, corner gate. Whether the broad wall and tower of furnaces were beyond the corner gate is difficult to determine. It is to be observed that the gates of the corner and Ephraim occur in that part of the wall where it is recorded that "they left Jerusalem" (in 8, R. V. margin), as though the wall required no repairs at this point.

There was also a gate of Benjamin, through which the road to Benjamin passed (Jer xxxviii 7; Zech. xiv 10). This may have been but another name for the gate of Ephraim. After the fall of Samaria and the virtual disappearance of Ephraim from geographical parlance, the gate of Ephraim would naturally come to be known as the gate of Benjamin, and when the walls of the city were rebuilt, after the exile, to be called indifferently the gate of Benjamin or of Ephraim or, eventually, of Damascus.

they might be able to stand a siege (Ecclus. i 1-4; for need, cp. Antiq. xii. 1, 1). In 168 B. c. Antiochus Epiphanes had the walls of Jerusalem thrown down and a fortress with a great and strong wall and mighty towers erected in the city of David, perhaps a broad designation meaning the city as distinct from the temple (1 Mac. i 31, 33, 39, 2 Mac. v. 24-26). This fortress became celebrated as the Acra. It overlooked the temple (Antiq. xiii. 6, 7), and for twenty-five years was a menace to the Jews. About two years after the demolition of the city walls, Judas Maccabæus partly restored them, strengthening the outer wall of the temple, but only to have his work undone (1 Mac. iv 60; vi. 18-27, 62). His brother and successor, Jonathan, however, renewed the work, proposing additional fortifications and rebuilding and repairing the walls, particularly around the temple hill (1 Mac. x 10, xii 36, 37, Antiq. xiii 5, 11). His brother Simon carried the work to completion (1 Mac. xii 10; xiv. 37; Antiq. xiii 6, 4). Under this great priest-king, not only were the walls of the city built, but the foreign garrison was forced in the year 142 B. c. to evacuate the Acra (1 Mac. xiii 49-51).

Exterior of the Damascus Gate.

During the interval between Nehemiah and Christ the fortifications of Jerusalem suffered many vicissitudes. About 150 years after the building of Nehemiah's wall, the high priest, Simon the Just, found it necessary to fortify the temple and the city so that

After a time the fortress was demolished and the hill on which it had stood was graded down so as to be lower than the level of the temple (1 Mac. xiv. 36; xv. 28; Antiq. xiii. 6, 7). Simon appears also to have taken up his residence in the fortress Baris, which protected the temple on the north (1 Mac. xiii. 52; cp. Neh. ii. 8). In the reign of John Hyrcanus a portion of the fortifications of the city was dismantled by Antiochus Sidetes, but the ruin seems to have been repaired by John (Antiq. xiii. 8, 3; 1 Mac. xvi. 23). John also remodeled and strengthened the fortress Baris (Antiq. xviii. 4, 3; cp. xv. 11, 4). Pompey found the defenses of Jerusalem strong. On finally capturing the city in 63 B. C., he demolished the walls (Tacitus, Hist. v. 9; and next two references). Cæsar allowed them to be rebuilt (Antiq. xiv. 8, 5; War i. 10, 3 and 4). On the north they consisted of two walls which Herod and his Roman allies took in the year 37 B. C., but did not destroy (Antiq. xiv. 16, 2 and 4, cp. xv. 1, 2).

At the time of Christ, Jerusalem had the two walls aforementioned on the north, and shortly afterwards three. Josephus identifies the first and innermost wall as the work of David, Solomon, and succeeding kings. He describes it by reference to landmarks of his day as extending from the tower of Hippicus to the tower of Antonia, formerly called Baris, north of the temple (War v. 4, 2). Herod Agrippa I., who reigned over Judæa from A. D. 41 to 44, undertook a third wall in order to include within the city limits the unprotected suburb of Bezetha, which had grown up outside of the fortifications. After laying the foundations, however, he relinquished the work at the command of the emperor Claudius. It was finally completed by the Jews themselves. It began at the tower of Hippicus, extended northward to the tower of Psephinus, at the northwest corner of the city (War v. 3, 5, 4, 3), turned eastward and passed on to the women's towers, which stood west of the northern highway and near the monuments of Helena, queen of Adiabene (v. 4, 2; Antiq. xx. 4, 3), included the traditional site of the camp of the Assyrians (War v. 7, 3), passed the caves of the kings, bent southward at the corner tower, near the monument of the fuller, and joined the old wall at the valley of the Kidron (v. 4, 2). The circumference of the walls was 33 stadia, a little picus, which stood immediately south of the modern Jaffa gate at the northwest corner of the old city wall, eastward to the west cloister of the temple; and from the tower of Hippicus south and east by the pool of Siloam and Ophel to the eastern cloister of the temple (War v. 4, 2). It enclosed the southwestern and eastern hills. The second wall encompassed the northern and principal business quarter of the city (War v. 4, 2; for bazaars in this section, 8, 1; i. 13, 2; Antiq. xiv. 13, 3). It began at the gate Gennath, that is, by interpretation, the garden gate, which belonged to the first wall and stood not far east of the tower of Hippicus (War v. 4, 2; 3, 2 for gardens); and terminated at less than 4 miles (v. 4, 3). The defenses of the city were augmented by the fortress of Antonia at the temple, and by the palace of Herod with its adjacent towers on the western wall. All these fortifications Titus razed to the ground on his capture of the city in A. D. 70. He left only the group of three towers, Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne, and so much of the wall as enclosed the city on the west side. He spared this portion of the wall in order that it might afford protection to his garrison, and the towers that posterity might see what kind of a city it was which Roman valor had taken (War vii. 1, 1).

II. 4. Notable buildings in the time of Christ
Besides the walls which have been already described, there were many structures to awaken conflicting emotions in the pious and patriotic Israelite. Foremost was the temple. Adjoining it on the north, within its area and controlling it, was the fortress of Antonia occupied by a Roman garrison. west of it stood the council house, probably the place where the council of the nation or sanhedrin met; a little more to the westward, at the farther end of the bridge which sprang

1), and in the hippodrome men were confined (xvii. 9, 5; War i. 33, 6). Other buildings were the house of the high priest (Mat xxvi. 3, Luke xxi 54; War ii. 17, 6); the house of records, near the temple (War ii 17, 6; vi. 6, 3); the palace of the proselyte queen of Adiabene, Helena (ibid.)

III. 1 The city of the Canaanites If the Salem of Melchizedek be Jerusalem, as is probable, the city first emerges in history from the western cloister of the temple and spanned the Tyropæon valley, lay the gymnasium or xystos, an object of abhorrence on account of its demoralizing and heathenizing influence; above it, looking down into it and peering across the valley into the sanctuary, rose the palace of the Asmoneans, recalling the heroic achievements of the Maccabees. Or taking a wider circuit, to the north of the temple beyond the fortress of Antonia was the pool of Bethesda with its healing waters; away to the west, at the opposite side of the city from the temple, stood the magnificent palace of Herod with its impregnable towers, the residence of the procurators when in Jerusalem; around toward the south was the pool of Siloam, and not too far from it were the sepulchers of the kings (see the several articles). In this neighborhood may best be sought the very large amphitheater erected by Herod the Great in the plain (Antiq xv. 8, 1). It was, perhaps, the same as the hippodrome, which lay south from the temple (War ii. 3, 1), for chariot races as well as wild beast fights and gladiatorial combats seem to have taken place in it (Antiq xv. 8, in the days of Abraham, when it already had a king of the Semitic race, who was at the same time priest of the Most High God (Gen. xiv 18). Manetho, an Egyptian priest and historian of the third century before Christ, transmits a tradition, which may contain considerable truth and which chronologically belongs here, to the effect that the nation of the shepherd kings to the number of 240,000 were driven out of Egypt by Thoummosis [or Amosis, i e Aahmes (Eusebius, Chron. 15-17)], and fled toward Syria; but fearing the Assyrians, who had dominion over Asia, they built a city in the country now called Judæa of sufficient size to contain the multitude and named it Jerusalem (con Apion. i 14, 15). This expulsion of the shepherds took place, according to Manetho, several centuries before the exodus of the children of Israel, and must not be confounded with the later event (i 26 seq.). It occurred somewhere about 1600 B. C. The earliest mention of Jerusalem in a document of which the original is extant is about 1500 B. C., when it still has a Semite as its governor, but is subject to Amenophis IV., king of Egypt.

This was before the exodus. When the Israelites entered Canaan, Jerusalem was ruled by a king, still a Semite, and occupied by Amorites, or more definitely by Jebusites. Joshua defeated its king and his allies at Gibeon, drove them down the pass of Beth-horon, and slew them in the lowland (Josh. x.). But no attempt was made to enter the city. The Jebusites still dwelt in it. It was allotted to the tribe of Benjamin, but as it stood on the border of Judah, its castle commanded a portion of the territory of two tribes (Josh. xv. 8, xviii. 28). In the war which was waged by the several tribes against the Canaanites within their own bounds after the death of Joshua, Judah fought against Jerusalem, took it, and set it on fire (Judg. i. 8). But apparently Judah did not capture the citadel. Neither did Benjamin (21). Hence, when the city was rebuilt, it was still under the shadow of the Jebusite stronghold and its inhabitants were Jebusites. It was a city of foreigners and a reproach in the midst of the land (Josh. xv. 63; Judg. i. 21; xix. 11, 12). Such was the state of affairs when David began his career. When he had slain Goliath, he returned from the field of battle by way of Jerusalem and brought the head of the Philistine thither. Possibly he erected it on a spear in view of the city; at any rate he displayed it before the eyes of the Jebusites (1 Sam. xvii. 54). It was a prophecy to this stronghold of mocking foreigners of what awaited them. And when he became king of all Israel, and found a united and enthusiastic nation obedient to him, and the jealousy between Judah and Benjamin allayed, he at once led his troops against the border town, and in face of the derision of the inhabitants, who believed their walls to be impregnable, gained possession (2 Sam. v. 6 seq.). Henceforth for many centuries Jerusalem was a city of the Hebrews.

III. 2. The city of the Hebrews David made Jerusalem the capital of his kingdom, and took measures to make it the religious center also. The ark, which had had no dwelling place of its own since Jehovah forsook Shiloh, he brought to Jerusalem and pitched a suitable tent for it, and he began the collection of materials for a temple. The city shared in the prosperity of Solomon's reign. The walls were enlarged, the temple was erected on a scale of great magnificence, and surrounded by a wall which gave it the appearance of a fortress, and a royal palace was built not inferior to the temple in splendor. In the next reign, however, the army of Shishak, king of Egypt, entered the city and robbed the temple and the palace of their treasures (1 Kin. xiv. 25 seq.), and about eighty years later bands of Philistines and Arabs gained brief admission to the city and carried off plunder (2 Chron. xxi. 17). The population was in the meanwhile increasing, quarters of the city began to be distinguished

(2 Kin. xx. 4; xxii. 14), and before the beginning of the eighth century a suburb on the northwestern hill was enclosed by an addition to the city wall. This part of the city was the mercantile district, and continued to be such after the exile and until the destruction of the city by Titus (War v. 8, 1). Here were the sheep and the fish gates, and the quarter was skirted by the valley of the cheesemongers. In the reign of Amaziah a portion of the city wall was broken down, and temple and palace were despoiled of treasure by the northern Israelites (2 Kin. xiv. 13, 14). Uzziah and Jotham repaired the ruin, strengthened the walls, and erected new towers for defense (2 Chron. xxvi. 9, xxvii. 3). But they had perhaps other ruins to care for than those wrought by war, for in Uzziah's reign the city was visited by a memorable earthquake (Amos i. 1. Zech. xiv. 5; Antiq. ix. 10, 4). Under Abaz the city was besieged, but not taken, by the northern Israelites in alliance with the Syrians (2 Kin. xvi. 5), and shortly afterwards, by reason of the king's inclination to heathenism, the lamps of the temple were allowed to go out, the offering in the holy place ceased, and the temple was closed (2 Kin. xvi. 14 seq.; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 24 xxxix. 7). Hezekiah reopened the temple and restored the service, but he was obliged to empty the royal and the sacred treasures and to strip the plates of gold from the temple doors in order to raise a sum sufficient to purchase exemption from a threatened raid by the Assyrians, and even this relief was but temporary, for eventually Assyrian troops stood before the walls (2 Chron. xxxix. 3, 2 Kin. xviii. 15 seq.). The city was, however, delivered by the providential outbreak of pestilence in the camp of the enemy (2 Kin. xix. 35). When Manasseh returned from captivity he built walls for the city and strengthened the fortifications (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14). During the reigns of the sons and grandson of Josiah the city experienced its overwhelming calamities. Nebuchadnezzar besieged it in the days of Jehoiakim, entered it, bound but eventually released the king, and carried off costly vessels from the temple and a number of noble youth (2 Kin. xxiv. 1; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6; Dan. i. 1). Again he came, emptied the royal and the sacred treasures, seized the remaining vessels of gold and silver belonging to the temple, carried king Jehoiachin a prisoner to Babylon, and deported the best and most useful citizens (2 Kin. xxiv. 10 seq.). Nine years later, in the reign of Zedekiah, he laid siege to the city for the third time. The investment lasted two years. The misery within the walls was extreme. Finally a breach was made, the city was taken, the temple and the palaces were burnt, the wall was broken down, and the remnant of the population, save the poorest, was deported (2 Kin. xxv.). The city lay waste for fifty years. Zerub-babel and 50,000 followers returned to Jerusalem in 538 B. C., and at the beginning of the next year laid the foundation of the temple (Ezra ii. 64, 65; iii. 8). The walls of the city were rebuilt under Nehemiah about 445 B. C. The supreme power was then in the hands of the Persians, from whom it passed, under Alexander the Great, to the Macedonian Greeks. The city was taken by Antiochus the Great 203 B. C., retaken by the Egyptians in 199, and opened its gates again to Antiochus coming as a friend in 198. In 170 B. C. Antiochus Epiphanes took Jerusalem, subsequently desecrating the temple; see HISTORY. But the Maccabees arose, and in 165 B. C. Judas retook the city and purified the temple. The kings of the Asmonean race built near the temple a citadel called Baris or the tower. see ANTONIA, TOWER OF. Pompey captured Jerusalem 63 B. C., breaking down part of the wall, Crassus despoiled the temple in 54 B. C. and the Parthians plundered the city in 40 B. C. Jerusalem was taken again in 37 B. C. by Herod the Great, who repaired the walls, adorned the city with various edifices and rebuilt the temple on a scale of magnificence which markedly contrasted with the comparatively humble character of Zerubbabel's temple. The work began 20-19 B. C., and was not quite completed when our Lord was on earth. Herod also strengthened the citadel and called it Antonia (q. v.). When he passed away there were two walls, in whole or in part encompassing Jerusalem, against one in Solomon's time. A third wall was begun by Herod Agrippa (about A. D. 42 or 43) a dozen years after the crucifixion. In A. D. 70 the Romans, under Titus, took Jerusalem, the temple and nearly all

III 3. The city since Titus. Under the emperor Hadrian the Romans commenced to re-fortify Jerusalem as a gentile city, and hold it against its former inhabitants. This seems to have been one main cause of the Jewish revolt under Bar-cocheba (about A. D. 132 to 135). On its suppression, the rebuilding of the city was resumed and completed. The old name Jerusalem was discarded. It was called Colonia Ælia Capitolina. Colonia to denote that it was a Roman colony, Ælia in honor of Hadrian, whose prænomen was Ælius, and Capitolina because it was dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus. To this heathen deity a temple was dedicated on the spot where those of Solomon, Zerubbabel, and Herod had stood. The Jews were forbidden, on pain of death, to enter within its walls. The Christians were, perhaps, by this time sufficiently distinguished from the Jews not to come under the prohibition. The name Ælia continued for many centuries. The emperor Constantine first partially, and then completely, removed the prohibition against the Jews entering the Holy City. In 326 Helena, his mother, caused two churches to be built at Bethlehem and on the mount of Olives, and in 336 the emperor himself erected the first church of the Holy Sepulcher; see CALVARY. In June, 613, Jerusalem was taken by storm by the Persians under Chosroes II., thousands of the inhabitants were massacred and other thousands were carried off prisoners to Persia, and the church of the Holy Sepulcher was burnt down. In 628, on the death of Chosroes, Jerusalem was retaken by the Roman emperor, Heraclius. In 637 it surrendered on conditions to the Arabs under Omar. Soon the city having been burnt or otherwise destroyed during the siege. He broke down all the walls, with the exception of part of the western one and three towers, Hippicus, Phasaelus, and Mariamne, which he left to show posterity the nature of the defenses he had succeeded in capturing (War vii. 1, 1).

afterwards the conqueror built the Dome of the Rock, which Europeans call the mosque of Omar, upon, or very near, the site of the temple of Solomon. During the period that Jerusalem was ruled by the Saracens, the treatment of the Christian pilgrims who visited the sacred shrines varied. Once the church of the Holy Sepulcher was set on fire under a Fatimite ruler, but on the whole there was toleration. It was different when the Saracens were displaced by the Turks in A. D. 1077. The insults and oppression practiced by the semi-savages who had now gained power, threw all middle and central Europe into a ferment, and brought on the crusades. In the first of these religious expeditions Jerusalem was taken by storm on July 15, 1099, and a Christian kingdom established, which continued eighty-eight years. During the Christian occupation many fresh sites were considered to have been discovered, the buildings connected with the Holy Sepulcher were enlarged and made more splendid, and other edifices erected in the city. In 1187 it had to be surrendered to Saladin, sultan of Egypt and Syria, and with the exception of two short periods, when the Christians again possessed it, has remained in Mohammedan hands. Of late its population has largely increased. In 1863 it was estimated at 5000 Mohammedans, 3606 Christians, and 7100 Jews, total 15,706 (Keith Johnston). In 1892 Dr. Selah Merrill, United States consul at Jerusalem, reported to his government that the Jews alone amounted to 25,322. In this year also a railway was completed from Jaffa to Jerusalem. Ten years later the Jews had increased in number to 40,000.

IV. Modern excavation. "An inscription in Arabic over the Yafa [i e the Jaffa] gate," says Prof. Robinson, "as well as others in various places, records that the present walls of Jerusalem were rebuilt by order of sultan Suleiman in A. H. [the year of the Hegira] 948, corresponding to A. D. 1542. They appear to occupy very nearly the site of the former walls of the middle ages, which were several times thrown down and rebuilt during the crusades, a slight deviation only being visible around the northwest corner, on both the northern and western sides. The materials were probably those of the former walls: and are in great part apparently ancient" (Bib. Res. i. 384). The foundations are in some places built of very large stones, which may have formed part of the ancient walls. It may be asked also, May not fragments of the old first, second, and third walls have escaped destruction, even in places where they did not coincide in direction with the present city walls? The answer must be in the affirmative. Prof. Robinson, in 1838, found near the Damascus gate large ancient beveled stones, which had apparently never been disturbed since they were first put in position. He regarded them as probably belonging to the guardhouse defending a gate which existed prior to the days of Herod (Bib. Res. i. 463). Robinson also believed that he and Mr. Whiting found traces of the northwestern part of the foundations of Agrippa's wall (465), the observation having been confirmed by Hanauer before the remains were covered with buildings (Palestine Explor. Fund. Quarterly Statement, Oct., 1892, p. 295). Sir Charles Warren, under the auspices of the Palestine Exploration Fund, made extensive excavations in Jerusalem from Feb., 1867, till April, 1870, sinking shafts through the débris, which at one place was 125 feet deep, covering the ancient city. He found and traced for a considerable distance the wall of Ophel (Wilson and Warren, Recovery of Jerusalem, 286-289). Since then Mr. Henry Maudsley, C. E., traced the course of the first wall by relics of it still remaining on mount Zion (Twenty-one Years, 59). When, in 1885, an excavation was made for the foundation of the Grand New Hotel, a little north of Hippicus, a portion of the second wall was traced for about 120 feet. The work of excavation was continued by the Exploration Fund, with Dr. F. J. Bliss as director of the operations, and the remains of walls along the valley of Hinnom were discovered.

Je-ru'sha and Jerushah [possession]

Wife of Uziah, king of Judah, and mother of his successor, Jotham (2 Kin. xv. 33, 2 Chron. xxvii. 1).

Je-sha'iah, in A. V. twice Jesajah (1 Chron. iii. 21, Neh. xi. 7) [Jehovah is opulent, or Jehovah hath saved].

1 A son of Jeduthun, and a musician in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxv. 3).

2 A Levite, son of Rehabiah; he also was in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvi. 25).

3 A son of Hananiah, and a descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 21).

4 A son of Athaliah and head of the father's house of Elam, who, with seventy males, returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 7).

5 A Meranite Levite who returned in the same company (Ezra viii. 19).

6 A Benjamite, the father of Ithiel (Neh. xi. 7).

Jesh'a-nah [old].

A city in the hill country of Ephraim, wrested by Abijah from the northern kingdom (2 Chron. xiii. 19; cp. xv. 8). It is believed to be the village called Isanas, where Herod the Great defeated the general of Antigonus (Antiq. xiv. 15, 12). Clermont-Ganneau identified it with the modern village of 'Ain Sfnia, about 3 miles N. by W of Bethel. See SHEN.

Jesh-a-re'lah. See ASHARELAH.

Je-sheb'e-ab [father's dwelling].

A descendant of Aaron. His family became the fourteenth course of the priesthood (1 Chron. xxiv. 13).

Je'sher [probity, uprightness].

A son of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 18).

Jesh'i-mon [a waste, a desert].

1 A wilderness at the northeastern end of the Dead Sea, not far from Pisgah and Peor (Num. xxi. 20; xxiii. 28). Beth-jeshimoth was situated in it; see BETH-JESHIMOTH.

2 A wilderness to the north of the hill Hachilah and of Maon (1 Sam. xxiii. 19, 24; xxvi. 1, 3).

It is probable that Jeshimon in these passages is not a proper name, but should be rendered desert, as in R. V.

Je-shi'shai [pertaining to an old man].

A Gadite, descended from Buz (1 Chron. v. 14)

Jesh-o-ha'iah [perhaps, Jehovah doth humble].

A Simeonite prince (1 Chron. iv. 36).

Jesh'u-a, in A. V. once Jeshuah (1 Chron. xxiv. 11), an inconsistency not found in the original edition of A. V. [a late form of Joshua, Jehovah is salvation]

1. Joshua, the military leader in the wars of Canaan (Neh viii. 17)

2. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David and was made the ninth of the twenty-four courses into which David divided the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 6, 11)

3. One of the Levites in Hezekiah's reign who had to do with the receipt and distribution of the freewill offerings in the temple (2 Chron. xxxi. 15).

4. A high priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 2, Neh vii. 7). He was the son of Jozadak. He built the altar of burnt offering, and encouraged the workmen and the people generally to rebuild the temple (Ezra iii. 2-9). In Zechariah's prophecies he is called Joshua, and stands as the priestly representative of the returned exiles to whom divine support is given (Zech. iii. 1-10; vi. 11-13)

5. A man of the house of Pahath-moab, some of whose children returned with Zerubbabel and others from captivity (Ezra ii. 6; Neh vii. 11).

6. A Levite, head of a Levitical family, who, with members of the family, returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 40; Neh. vii. 43; xii. 8). He actively assisted Joshua, the high priest, in stimulating the workmen and people to rebuild the temple (Ezra iii. 9). The representative of the house bearing his name affixed his seal to the covenant (Neh. x. 9). From the last passage, it appears that Joshua was the son of Azaniah (9). In Neh. xii. 24 the word ben, the son of, after Joshua is probably a corruption; perhaps a corruption of Bani (cp ix. 4, 5). Not unlikely it was this Levite Joshua who was the father of the ruler of Mizpah, Ezer, who repaired a portion of the wall (iii. 19).

7. A Levite, probably of the aforementioned family, who aided Ezra in explaining the law to the people (Neh. viii. 7), and in preparing them for a more heartfelt worship of Jehovah (ix. 4, 5).

8. A village of southern Judah (Neh. xi. 26).

Jesh'u-run, in A. V. once Jesurun (Is. xlv. 2) [righteous one].

A name of endearment used in poetry for the nation of Israel with reference to the moral character which they were created to exhibit (Deut. xxxii. 15, xxxiii. 5, 26; Is. xlv. 2).

Je-si'ah. See ISHIAH.

Je-sim'i-el [God setteth up]

A prince of the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 36).

Jesse.

Son of Obed, family of Perez. He was descended from Nahshon, chief of the tribe of Judah in the days of Moses, and from Ruth the Moabitess (Ruth iv. 18-22). He was father of eight sons, the youngest of whom was David (1 Sam. xvii. 12-14). To judge from 1 Chron. ii. 15, one of them died without leaving posterity unless, as is less probable, Elihu (xxvii. 18) has been lost from the register. Jesse had two daughters, but by a different wife from David's mother (ii. 16, cp 2 Sam. xvii. 25). Jesse lived at Bethlehem, to which Samuel was sent to anoint a king from among his sons. After seven of them had been passed before him in the order of their birth, David was called from the flock which he was tending, and on his arrival was anointed king (1 Sam. xvi. 1-13). After Saul had become jealous of David he usually called him the son of Jesse (xx. 31; xxii. 7, xxv. 10), in order to emphasize David's humble origin. Saul ignored the fact that his own father was no more a king than was David's father. In the cave of Adullam David was joined by his father, his mother, and his brothers. He allowed his brothers to share the dangers of his wanderings, but placed his parents under the protection of the king of Moab, the native land of his ancestress Ruth, till he knew what God had in store for him in the future (xxii. 1-4). It is uncertain when Jesse died. Although of good ancestry and himself an able man, yet his station in life was lowly. This humble position of the family is alluded to by the prophets (Is. xi. 1, 10, cp Mic. v. 2; Rom. xv. 12), and was recalled by all who refused the rule of the house of David (2 Sam. xx. 1, 1 Kin. xii. 16, 2 Chron. x. 16).

Jes'u-i. See ISHVI.

Jes'u-run. See JESHURUN.

Je'sus, an imitation of the Greek form of Joshua, which in turn is a late form of Jehoshua or Joshua [Jehovah is salvation].

1. Joshua, the military leader in the wars of Canaan (A. V. of Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8); see JOSHUA.

2. An ancestor of Christ, who lived about four hundred years after David (Luke iii. 29). The A. V., following a different Greek text, calls him Jose.

3. In the Septuagint the name occurs several times in the Apocrypha. It was borne by the author of Ecclesiasticus, and twelve persons with this name are mentioned by Josephus outside of his references to Joshua and to Christ. It was a common name among the Jews of the Greek-speaking period.

4. A Jewish Christian, also called Justus, associated with Paul (Col. iv. 11).

5. The name of our Lord. See JESUS CHRIST.

Je'sus Christ.

Our Lord was named Jesus in accordance with the directions of the angel to Joseph (Mat. i. 21) and Mary (Luke i. 31). When given to ordinary children it merely expressed, if anything, the parent's faith in God as the saviour of his people, or their faith in the coming salvation of Israel. When given to Mary's child it was designed to express the special office he would fulfill: "Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins" (Mat. i. 21). Christ is from the Greek Christos, anointed, corresponding to the Hebrew Mashiach, anointed, Messiah. Jesus therefore was our Lord's personal name and Christ was his title (the Christ); though the latter was early used also as a proper name, as it is by us, either alone or with Jesus.

It is the object of the following article to sketch the progress of our Lord's life on earth, so as to place its principal events in their probable order and relation.

Chronology The exact dates of the birth, baptism, and death of Jesus cannot be absolutely demonstrated; but most scholars now agree within narrow limits. Our ordinary Christian calendar originated with Dionysius Exiguus, a Roman abbot who died A. D. 556. He first selected the year of the incarnation as that before and after which dates should be reckoned. He fixed, however, on the year of Rome, 754, as that in which Christ was born, and that year consequently equals A. D. 1. But the statements of Josephus make it clear that Herod the Great, who died shortly after Jesus was born (Mat. ii. 19-22), died several years before the year of Rome, 754. His death occurred thirty-seven years after he had been declared king by the Romans, which was in A. U. C. 714. This might be 751 or 750, according to whether Josephus counted fractions of a year as whole years or not. The year 750 is, however, made the more probable from the further statement of Josephus that shortly before Herod's death he put to death two Jewish rabbis, and that on the night of their execution there occurred an eclipse of the moon. Astronomical calculations show that in 750 there was a partial lunar eclipse on the night of March 12 or 13; but in 751 there was no eclipse. Josephus also narrates that Herod died shortly before the passover, which began in 750 on April 12. We may, therefore, with considerable confidence date Herod's death about April 1, in the year of Rome 750, which was 4 B. C. Before that date, therefore, we must place the events given in the gospels which occurred between the birth of Jesus and the death of Herod, for which a period of two or three months is probably required. Christ's birth, therefore, is to be placed at the close of 5 B. C. or beginning of 4 B. C. The observance of December 25th did not arise until the fourth century, so that it has no authority. It may, however, be accepted as an approximation to the truth, and then Christ's birth would be assigned to December 25, 5 B. C. This puts it five years earlier than in the calendar of Dionysius, who assigned it to December 25, A. D. 1. The date of the opening of our Lord's public ministry is to be obtained principally from Luke iii. 23, where it is said that at his baptism he was about thirty years of age. The expression is obviously indefinite; but, assuming that he was born December 25, 5 B. C., he would be thirty on December 25, A. D. 26. The traditional date of the baptism is January 6, and if we suppose at any rate that it occurred early in A. D. 27, Luke's expression, "about thirty years of age," would be correct. This date also is somewhat confirmed by the statement of the Jews (John ii. 20), made shortly after his baptism, "forty and six years was this temple in building." The rebuilding of the temple by Herod was begun, as might be shown, in 20-19 B. C.; so that the forty-six years, supposing them to have elapsed when the remark was made, would bring us again to A. D. 27. If, finally, "the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius" (Luke iii. 1), when John the Baptist began his ministry, be reckoned, as it properly may be, from the time when Tiberius was associated with Augustus in the empire (A. D. 11 to 12), it coincides with A. D. 26 and further agrees with our other calculations. It is true that all these items of evidence contain in them points on which opinions may not unreasonably differ; yet the dates we have given appear to be the most probable and to support one another. The length of Christ's ministry and consequently the year of his death are to be fixed by the number of passovers which John notes in his Gospel. If we had only the synoptic gospels (see GOSPEL), we might infer that his ministry was only a year in length, and this in ancient times a not uncommon opinion. But John's Gospel speaks of at least three passovers (i. 13; vi. 4; xiii. 1), and it is highly probable that the feast referred to in John v. 1 was also a passover. If so, Christ's ministry included four passovers, at the last of which he died; and, if he was baptized early in A. D. 27, his first passover was in April of that year, and he died in A. D. 30, when the passover festival began on April 7. Those who think that John v. 1 does not refer to a passover date Christ's death in A. D. 29. We thus obtain as the probable leading dates in Christ's life: birth, December 25 (?), 5 B. C.; baptism and beginning of his ministry, January (?), A. D. 27; death, April 7, A. D. 30.

Political condition of the Jews. When Jesus was born Herod the Great, an able but cruel man, was king of the Jews. His kingdom included Samaria and Galilee as well as Judæa. He was an Idumæan by descent, though professing the Jewish religion. His father, Antipater, had been made governor of Judæa by Julius Cæsar, and, after several changes of fortune, Herod had been declared king of the Jews by the Romans in 40 B. C. But, while an independent king in many ways, Herod ruled by the favor of and in dependence on the Romans, who had become the practical rulers of the world. On his death, 4 B. C., his kingdom was divided among his sons. Archelaus received Judæa and Samaria. Herod Antipas received Galilee and Perea. Herod Philip received the territory northeast of the sea of Galilee (Luke iii. 1). But in the tenth year of his reign Archelaus was deposed by Augustus, and from that date Judæa and Samaria were ruled by Roman governors, styled procurators, until the destruction of Jerusalem, with the exception of the years A. D. 41-44, when Herod Agrippa I was invested with the royal power (Acts xii. 1). During the ministry of Christ, therefore, Galilee and Perea, where he spent most of his time, were under the rule of Herod Antipas (Mat. xiv. 3; Mark vi. 14; Luke iii. 1, 19; ix. 7, xiii. 31, xxiii. 8-12), while Samaria and Judæa were ruled directly by the Romans through their governor, who at that time was Pontius Pilate. The rule of the Romans, whether direct or indirect, irritated the Jews exceedingly, and, during Christ's life, the land was in an almost constant state of political ferment. While the Romans sought to give the nation as much self-government as possible, so that their sanhedrim, or chief court, exercised jurisdiction in a very large number of cases, and while the conquerors granted many privileges to the Jews, especially in respect to their religious observances, yet the nation fretted under a foreign domination, which was very positive, when it wished to be so, and which did not intend ever to grant them their old liberty. The Jewish aristocracy, however, including most of the Sadducees, were not unfriendly to the Romans. The Pharisees, who comprised the strictest religionists, were disposed to devote themselves to the conservation of Judaism, while generally avoiding political complications. We read also of Herodians, who doubtless favored the claims of the Herodian family to the Jewish throne, while from Josephus we learn of political patriots who successively arose in the vain endeavor to throw off the Roman yoke. In such a condition of things, one who claimed to be Messiah would easily be involved in political difficulties. We shall see that Jesus carefully and successfully avoided these in order that he might proclaim the true, spiritual kingdom of God.

Religious condition of the Jews. As already implied, this was largely affected by the state of political affairs. So far as the official classes were concerned, the purely religious hopes of the Old Testament had been almost forgotten, and even among the people the idea of an earthly kingdom had nearly displaced that of a spiritual one. We meet in the gospels with two leading sects, the Pharisees and the Sadducees. The former were religious and had the greater influence among the people; but they had substituted theological and ceremonial tradition, as well as casuistic subtleties, for the word of God, and in their hands the religion of Moses and the prophets had become a narrow, barren, and unspiritual form. The Pharisees naturally opposed the spiritual and unconventional religion which Jesus taught, and especially his appeal from tradition to Scripture. The Sadducees, on the other hand, were the aristocrats. They included the high-priestly families. They were infected by gentle culture, rejected the Pharisaic traditions, and were more interested in politics than in religion. They were led finally to oppose Jesus, because they thought that his success would disturb the existing political relations (John xi. 48). Meanwhile the ceremonies of God's worship were carried on with much magnificence in the temple at Jerusalem, the people attended with fidelity and in great numbers the religious festivals, and the zeal of the nation for their religious privileges and traditions was never greater, while every now and then some outbreak of mingled patriotism and fanaticism fanned the embers of popular hope into a flame. Yet there were some who still preserved the spirit and faith of a pure religion. They were found mainly, though not wholly, among the humble classes. In them the expectation of a saviour from sin had not died out, and from the bosom of one of these pious circles did Jesus himself come. The Jewish people, therefore, in Christ's lifetime were still a religious people. They knew the Old Testament, which was read in their synagogues and taught to their children. The nation was in a state of religious interest as well as of political unrest. These facts explain to us the popular excitement caused by the preaching of John the Baptist and of Jesus, the opposition of the ruling classes to them both, and the success of the method which Jesus pursued in preaching his gospel, as well as the fate which he himself saw from the beginning to be, even humanly speaking, inevitable.

Life of Jesus. The circumstances of the birth of Jesus, as recorded in the gospels, were in accord with his dignity and the predictions of Messiah, yet such also as to harmonize with the lowly appearance which the Saviour was to make on earth. As Malachi (iii. 1; also iv. 5, 6) had prophesied that a herald, in the spirit and power of Elijah, should precede the Lord when he should come to his temple, so Luke tells us first of the birth of John the Baptist, the herald of the Christ. A certain pious priest, named Zacharias, who had no child and was far advanced in years, was discharging his duties at the temple. He was chosen by lot, as the custom was, to offer the incense, representing the prayers of Israel, on the altar in the holy place. To him the angel Gabriel appeared and announced that he was to be the father of the promised forerunner of Messiah. This was probably in October, 6 B C. After his term of service in the temple was over, he and his wife, Elisabeth, returned to their home in a city in the hill country of Judah (Luke i 39), and awaited the fulfillment of the promise. Six months later the angel appeared to Mary, a maiden probably of Davidic descent, who lived in Nazareth and was betrothed to Joseph, who was certainly descended from the great king of Israel (Mat. i. 1-16; Luke i. 27); see GENEALOGY. Joseph was a carpenter by trade, a man of humble station though of high descent, and a devout Israelite. To Mary the angel announced that she was to become the mother of Messiah (Luke i 28-38) by the power of the Holy Spirit working in her, and that the child, who was to be called Jesus, should have the throne of his father David. For her comfort also she was told of the pregnancy of Elisabeth, who was her kinswoman. When the angel left her, Mary hastened for protection and sympathy to the house of Zacharias. At their meeting, the spirit of prophecy came on these two women. While Elisabeth greeted Mary as the mother of her Lord, Mary, like Hannah of old (1 Sam. ii. 1-10), broke forth in a song of praise for the salvation of Israel that was coming and for the honor which had been conferred on her. It is evident that these strange events were regarded by them both in the spirit of strong faith and holy exaltation, the perfect expression of the historic hope of Israel. When the time drew near for Elisabeth to be delivered of the child which she had conceived, Mary returned to Nazareth. Her further protection against reproach was, however, secured by God himself. Joseph, seeing her condition, was disposed quietly to put her away without public accusation, but even this gentle treatment was forestalled. An angel revealed to him in a dream the cause of Mary's condition; told him that he was to have Messiah for his child; and that, as Isaiah had foretold, the latter was to be born of a virgin. With faith, equal to Mary's, Joseph believed the message and made Mary his legal wife. It was thus secured that Mary's child was born of a virgin, and at the same time that he had a legal human father and his mother was protected by the love and respectability of a husband. There can be little doubt that these facts were made known by Mary herself at a later time. The fact that neither Christ nor his apostles appeal to his miraculous conception in proof of his Messiahship occasions no reason for doubting the narrative. The event was not one which could be used as public proof. But the narrative of Christ's birth beautifully harmonizes with what we now know of his dignity and his mission upon earth. The Messiah was to be the perfect flower of Israel's spiritual life; and so Jesus was born in the bosom of this pious family circle where the pure religion of the O. T. was believed and cherished. The Messiah was to appear in lowliness; and so Jesus came from the home of the Nazarene carpenter. The Messiah was to be the son of David, and so Joseph, his legal father, and probably Mary, his actual mother, were descended from David. The Messiah was to be the incarnation of God, a divine person uniting to himself a human nature, and so Jesus was born of a woman but miraculously conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost.

After relating the birth of John and the prophetic song which burst from the long-sealed lips of his father Zacharias (Luke i 57-79), over the advent of Messiah's forerunner, the evangelist Luke explains how Jesus came to be born in Bethlehem. The emperor Augustus had ordered an enrollment of all the subjects of the empire, and although Palestine was under Herod, its inhabitants also were included in the decree. The enrollment of the Jews, however, evidently took place after the Jewish method, by which each father of a household was registered, not at his dwelling place, but at the place where his family belonged in view of its ancestry. Hence Joseph had to go to Bethlehem, the original home of David. Mary accompanied him. The lodging place, or khan, where strangers were permitted to sojourn, was already fully occupied when they arrived, and they only found shelter in a stable, which may have been, as early tradition affirms, in a cave near the town. Such caves were often used about Bethlehem for stables. We are not told that any cattle were occupying the stable. It may have been unused at the time. Nor would a stable in that country and among that people have seemed as offensive a lodging place as it might with us; but it was a lowly abode for the birthplace of Messiah. Yet such it was destined to be, for there Mary's child was born, and she laid him in a manger (Luke ii 7). But though born so humbly, he was not to be without attestation. That night shepherds in a field near Bethlehem were visited by angels, who told them of Messiah's birth and where he lay, and sang in the hearing of the shepherds: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men in whom he is well pleased" (Luke ii. 14, R. V.). The shepherds hastened to Bethlehem and saw the child. They related what they had seen and heard, and then returned again to their flocks. All this was again in striking harmony with the mission of Messiah. Yet we should remember that the event occurred in a circle of humble peasants, and that it made no noise in the busy world. For a while Joseph and Mary lingered in Bethlehem. On the eighth day the child was circumcised (Luke ii. 21) and the appointed name, Jesus, was given to him. Forty days after his birth (Lev. xii.) his parents took him, as the law directed, to the temple and Mary offered her gifts of purification and presented her child unto the Lord. The firstborn male child of the Hebrew mother was to be redeemed by the payment of five shekels (Num. xviii. 16), and this is meant when it is said that they brought him "to present him to the Lord." The mother was also to offer her thanksgiving, and it is specially noted by Luke that Mary gave the offering of the poor, "a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons." The modest circumstances of the family are thus further attested. Yet the lowly Messiah was not to leave his Father's house without recognition. An aged saint, Simeon by name, came into the temple and the spirit of inspiration fell upon him at sight of the child. He had been promised by God that he should not die till he had seen Messiah. Taking the infant in his arms, Simeon gave thanks and predicted the glory and sorrow of his life (Luke ii. 25-35). Anna also, a prophetess of great age, who continually dwelt in the temple, bore witness to the advent of the Christ (Luke ii. 36-38). But a more remarkable attestation was soon to follow. Shortly after Joseph and Mary had returned to Bethlehem, certain magi from the east appeared in Jerusalem and declared that they had seen Messiah's star in the heavens and were come to worship him. They had doubtless learned from the Jews scattered throughout the east of the expectation of a coming king in Judæa who would be man's great deliverer. They were doubtless also students of the stars, and God used their superstitious notions to make them witnesses of the gentile world, waiting in the half-light of natural religion for the coming of the Saviour, of whom they felt the need, but whose real character they did not understand. In the east they had seen a star which for some reason they considered to portend the birth of the Jewish king. Coming to Jerusalem, they inquired for him. Their message troubled the equally superstitious Herod, and summoning the scribes, he demanded where Messiah was to be born. When told that he was to be born in Bethlehem, Herod sent the magi there, but bade them promise to inform him if they found the child. On the way the magi saw the star again over Bethlehem, and, having found Jesus, offered him rare gifts of frankincense, gold, and myrrh. We can imagine with what renewed awe Joseph and Mary must have received these unexpected and strange visitors. They were another sign of the high destiny of the child. The magi, however, were warned of God not to return to Herod, for that wicked man only intended to use them to destroy the newly born king. They departed home, therefore, by another way. Joseph also was warned by an angel of the impending danger and instructed to take

Mary and the babe to Egypt, well out of Herod's reach. It was none too soon, for presently the cruel king, whose readiness to murder even his own sons is related by Josephus, sent soldiers to slay all the male children in Bethlehem who were less than three years old. He hoped thus to accomplish the object in which he had been foiled by the departure of the magi without informing him concerning the child they had sought. Bethlehem was a small place and the number of children slain may not have been large, but the act was cruel enough at the best. Jesus, however, had escaped. How long he was kept in Egypt we do not know. Probably it was a couple of months. There were many Jews there, so that Joseph could easily find a refuge. But in due time the angel informed him of Herod's death and directed him to return. It was apparently his first purpose to rear the child in Bethlehem, David's city. But his fear of Archelaus, Herod's son, made him hesitate. Again God gave him instructions, and in accordance with them Joseph and Mary sought once more their old home in Nazareth. In consequence of this, Jesus appeared among the people, when his public life began, as the prophet of Nazareth, the Nazarene. Such are the few incidents preserved in the gospels of the birth and infancy of Jesus. Wonderful as they appear to us, they attracted no attention at the time on the part of the world. The few persons concerned in them either forgot them or kept them to themselves. But when the church was founded we may suppose that Mary told them to the disciples. Matthew and Luke have related them to us quite independently of each other, the former to illustrate the royal Messiahship of Jesus and his fulfilment of prophecy; the latter to explain the origin of Jesus and the historical beginnings of his life.

After the return to Nazareth, nothing is told us of Jesus' life, except the one incident of his visit with his parents to the temple when he had become twelve years of age (Luke ii. 41-51). That incident, however, is instructive. It shows the continued piety of Joseph and Mary and the devout training which they sought to give the child. It shows also the early, spiritual development of Jesus, for he was already mainly interested in those religious questions on which the Jewish rabbis gave instruction to their pupils. We are not to imagine the boy of twelve as instructing the doctors, but as a pupil in one of their temple schools, and yet as showing by his questions a spiritual insight which amazed them. The incident also illustrates the natural, human life which Jesus led. He grew, we are told, "in wisdom and stature [or age], and in favor with God and men" (Luke ii. 52). The wonders of his infancy were doubtless kept a secret by Joseph and Mary, and Jesus appeared to his companions and the family in no wise a supernatural being, but only remarkable for his mental force and moral purity. Putting together, however, other facts incidentally mentioned in the gospels, we can form some idea of the circumstances in which the childhood and young manhood of Jesus were passed. He was a member of a family. He had four brothers and some sisters (Mark vi. 3, etc.). Some have supposed that these were the children of Joseph by a former marriage; others that they were Christ's cousins. It seems to us most natural and scriptural to believe that they were the children of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus. But at any rate, Jesus grew up in a family, experiencing the pleasures and the discipline of family life. He became, like Joseph, a carpenter (3), so that he was accustomed to manual labor. But mental discipline also was not wanting. Jewish children were well instructed in the Scriptures, and our Lord's familiarity with them is evident from his teaching. His parables also reveal a mind sensitive to the teaching of nature, and which must have delighted always to ponder the evidence of God's mind in the works of his hand. Nazareth, though somewhat secluded, was on the edge of the busiest part of the Jewish world and not far from some of the most famous scenes of Israel's history. From the cliff back of the town the eye could contemplate many places associated with great events. Not far off was the sea of Galilee, around which was gathered the varied life of the world in miniature. It was a period also, as has been said, of much political excitement, and Jewish homes were often agitated with the report of stirring events. There is no reason to suppose that Jesus grew up in isolation. We should rather imagine him keenly alive to the progress of events in Palestine. While the language commonly spoken by him seems to have been the Aramaic, which had displaced the older Hebrew among the later Jews, he must often have heard Greek used and may have been familiar with it. All this period of his life, however, the evangelists pass over. Their books were written not to give biographies of Jesus, but to report his public ministry. We can see enough, however, to prove the naturalness of our Saviour's human life, the fitness of his surroundings to prepare him for his future work, the beauty of his character, and thus the gradual unfolding of his humanity in expectation of the hour when he was to offer himself as God's Messiah to his people. That hour drew nigh when, perhaps in the summer of A. D. 26, John, the son of Zacharias, who had hitherto led a life of ascetic devotion in the desert (Luke i. 80), received from God his commission to summon the nation to repentance for their sins in preparation for Messiah's coming. John moved from place to place along the Jordan valley, and administered the rite of baptism to those who believed his message. He called both the nation and individuals to repentance for sin, spoke in the tone of the older prophets, especially of Elijah, and announced that Messiah was at hand, that he would purify Israel with judgments, and make expiation for the world's sin (Mat. iii; Mark i. 1-8; Luke iii. 1-18; John i. 19-36). The effect of his ministry was widespread and profound. Even from Galilee the people flocked to his preaching. The sanhedrin sent a deputation to inquire his authority (John i. 19-28). While the ruling classes were unmoved by his appeal (Mat. xxi. 25), popular wonder and excitement were aroused, and the purely religious character of his message led the truly pious to believe that the long-deferred hope of Israel was at last to be fulfilled. After John's ministry had continued for some time, perhaps for six months or more, Jesus appeared amid the multitude and asked the prophet to baptize him. The inspired insight of the Baptist recognized in him one who had no need of repentance, saw in him, in fact, no less than the Messiah himself. "I have need," he said, "to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?" (Mat. iii. 14). We are not to suppose that Jesus did not already know himself perfectly well to be the Christ. His reply rather shows the contrary. "Suffer it now for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness." The baptism meant for him, partly, self-dedication to the work which John had announced, and also the conscious taking upon himself of the sin of the people whom he had come to save. As he came from the baptism (Mark i. 10), John (John i. 33, 34) saw the heavens opened and the Spirit of God, in the form of a dove, descending and remaining on him, and a voice came from above: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (Mat. iii. 17). This was the full endowment of our Lord's human nature with spiritual power for his ministry. How truly human, as well as divine, he was through it all is shown by the temptation which immediately followed. He was not to enter on his work without adequate mental preparation. Realizing his vocation, he was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, doubtless for meditation. There the great tempter met him, and sought to pervert his purpose to selfish and worldly ends. Jesus must have himself related this experience to his disciples. While we are not to doubt the outward reality of the tempter and the physical features of the scene as described to us (Mat. iv. 1-11, Luke iv. 1-13), we should not forget that the power of the temptation lay in the subtlety with which the world was presented to Jesus as more attractive than the life of stern obedience to God, with its probably fatal close. For forty days the temptation lasted, and Jesus returned from it to the Jordan fully dedicated to the lowly, suffering lot which he knew to be God's will for his Messiah. Forthwith he began to call disciples. Yet with no loud proclamation of his advent did he inaugurate his work. The Baptist pointed him out to some of his own disciples as the Lamb of God (John i. 29, 36). Two, John and Andrew, followed the new teacher. Simon was soon added to the number (35-42). The next day Philip and Nathanael were invited (43-51). With his little band Jesus quietly returned to Galilee, and at Cana performed his first miracle, in which the disciples saw the first signs of his coming glory (ii 1-11). We must be impressed with the absence of any attempt to make a public display. The new movement began with the faith of a few obscure Galileans. But St John's account makes it clear that Jesus was fully sensible of who he was and what he had come to do. He was only waiting for the favorable moment to offer himself to Israel as her Messiah. That moment was naturally found in the approaching passover (April, A. D. 27). From Capernaum, whither he and his family and disciples had gone (12), he ascended to Jerusalem, and there proceeded to cleanse the temple of the traders who profaned it. It was an act worthy of a prophet to reform the flagrant abuses of God's service, but Christ's words, "Make not my Father's house a house of merchandise," indicate that he claimed to be more than a prophet (16). It was, in fact, a public summons of Israel to follow him in the work of religious reformation, for only when the Jews had rejected him would he proceed to organize the new church of the future; but he himself did not expect them to follow him. This is proved by his veiled prediction of his death at their hands (19), while in the conversation with Nicodemus he clearly brought out the necessity of a new birth and of his own suffering (iii 1-21), in order that any might enter the kingdom which God's love had sent him to establish. For our knowledge of this early Judean ministry of Jesus we are indebted to St. John (ii. 13-iv. 3). It lasted apparently about nine months. After the passover Jesus retired from the city to the Judean country, and having found the nation unwilling to follow him, he began to preach, as the Baptist was still doing, the necessity of repentance. For a while the two worked side by side. Not till John's providential mission was plainly over would Jesus begin an independent one of his own. Both labored together for the spiritual quickening of the nation. Jesus began finally to attract more disciples than John did. This led him to terminate his Judean ministry, for neither would he appear as a rival of his coworker (John iv. 1-3). He turned once more toward Galilee. On the way through Samaria occurred his memorable interview with the woman at Jacob's well (4-42). But he hastened northward. Arriving in Galilee, he found that his fame had preceded him (43-45). A nobleman from Capernaum sought him out, even in Cana, where he was stopping, and secured from him the cure of his son (46-54). It was clear that Galilee was the place where he should labor and that the fields were white to harvest (35). Then, it would seem, an event occurred which indicated that the hour for him to begin his proper work had indeed providentially arrived. The news came that John the Baptist had been cast into prison by Herod Antipas. The work of the herald was over. The old Jewish church had been sufficiently called to repentance and reformation, and she had refused to listen. Jesus began forthwith in Galilee to preach the kingdom of God, to announce the germinal principles of the new dispensation, and to gather the nucleus of the future church.

The great Galilean ministry of Jesus lasted about sixteen months. He took for his center the busy mart of trade, Capernaum. In Galilee he was in the midst of a population prevalently Jewish, yet in a region removed from interference by the religious authorities of the nation. His evident purpose was to set forth the true, spiritual kingdom of God, and by mighty works to convince men of his own authority and of the character of the kingdom. He asked for faith in himself. He unveiled the real character of God and his requirements of men. He did not apply to himself the name Messiah, for it would have been too easily misunderstood by carnal minds. He generally called himself the Son of man. He did not at first speak of his death. They were not ready to hear of that. He taught the principles of true religion, with himself as its authoritative expounder. His mighty works roused the greatest enthusiasm. He was thus enabled to attract wide attention, till the whole land was eager to see and hear him. But, as he foresaw, the final result was the disappointment of the people with his unworldly ideas. Only a little band faithfully clung to him. Yet by his teaching he laid down truths which that band of disciples were to carry, after his death, throughout the world. For the order of events in the lower or early Galilean ministry we refer to the harmony in the article GOSPEL. We can here only note the leading phases of the history. The first was that of the opening of the work. This was marked by startling miracles, by the summons to believe the gospel, and by the awakening of enthusiastic interest in Jesus on the part of the Galileans. It included the events in the harmony, beginning with the first rejection at Nazareth and ending with Levi's feast. The close of this phase of his work, which lasted perhaps four months, found Jesus the center of universal interest in Galilee, and gathered about him a little company of devoted followers. We are not told much about his teaching as yet; but from what we are told and from the significant miracles he performed—such as the cure of the demoniac (Mark i. 23-27), the healing of the leper (40-45), the cure of the paralytic (ii. 1-12), the miraculous draught of fish (Luke v. 1-12)—it is clear that the burden of his message was substantially that which he announced in Nazareth (iv. 18-21), "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the brokenhearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." The aspect of affairs, however, soon began to change, for opposition arose on the part of the Pharisees. This is the second phase of the Galilean ministry. Jesus visited Jerusalem (John v. 1) and there healed the impotent man on the Sabbath. At once conflict with the rulers and rabbis broke out. Yet the conflict seems to have been purposely provoked by Jesus, in order that through it the difference between the spirit of his teaching and that of current Judaism might appear. We see in him now the spiritual interpreter of the Old Testament, bringing out its real meaning, and doing so (v.) with express appeal to his own authority as the Son of God and the divinely appointed teacher of men. This phase included, besides John v., the incidents of plucking the ears of corn and the healing of the man with the withered hand; see GOSPEL. The conflict with the Pharisees and the continued advance of popular interest led next to the organization of his disciples, which constituted the third phase of this part of his ministry. He now appointed his twelve apostles, and, on one famous day, gave in the sermon on the mount a description of the character and life of the true members of God's kingdom. It is a sublime exhibition of a genuinely religious life, in joyful unison with its heavenly Father, and consecrated to his service in the salvation of the world, the real fulfillment of the old law, though utterly opposed to the formality and superficiality of Pharisaism, the ideal of trust and communion of man in relation to God. The sermon on the mount was not meant by Jesus to teach the way of salvation, nor did it constitute by any means his whole gospel. He, like the apostles, taught salvation through faith in himself. But in this sermon, over against Pharisaism and popular ignorance, he set forth that spiritual life which is the manifestation of the divine kingdom and to entrance into which faith in Jesus leads. The outlines of the new organization having thus been enunciated, we read, as the fourth phase, of a succession of miracles and tours through lower Galilee—Jesus being accompanied by his apostles—for the purpose of extending his influence. This phase extends in the harmony from the close of the sermon on the mount to the time when Herod inquired concerning the new teacher. During these months the popular interest in Jesus steadily increased, but the opposition of the Pharisees increased equally. The most notable point in the history just here is the great day of parables. The parable was a form of instruction in which Jesus was unrivaled. It was intended to convey truth to receptive minds, and yet to avoid such open expression of it as would give his enemies a plea for interfering with him. The appearance of parables in his teaching just at this period shows the increasing gravity of the situation, necessitating a certain reserve on Christ's part. We must, at the same time, admire the incomparable skill with which he embodied in these simple stories the profoundest truths concerning the origin and progress and perils and destiny of the spiritual kingdom which he was establishing in the world. At length, however, the work in Galilee came to a crisis. Herod Antipas began to inquire concerning Jesus, and the fact was a warning that complications, such as had already led to John's imprisonment, and still more recently to his murder, might ensue. A sufficient opportunity had, moreover, been given to the people to test their relation to the truth. Just then an event occurred which decided the matter. Jesus had sought temporary retirement with the twelve; but the multitudes had followed him to a desert place on the northeastern shore of the sea of Galilee, and, in compassion for their needs, he had miraculously fed them, five thousand in number, from five loaves and two fishes. The enthusiastic Galileans wished to take him by force and make him a king (John vi. 15); but that very fact proved that they had wholly misunderstood his mission. It was time to bring his work to a close. From the beginning he had intimated that he had come to die, and that only by dying could he be their Saviour (iii. 14, 15). It was now time to prepare for the sacrifice. On the next day after the feeding of the five thousand Jesus delivered in Capernaum the discourse, recorded in vi. 22-71, upon himself as the bread of life and on the necessity of eating his flesh and drinking his blood. Then, after some parting denunciation of the Pharisaic misrepresentations of religion (Mark vii. 1-23), he brought his public ministry in Galilee to a close by retiring with his disciples from the region in which he had hitherto been working.

The next great period in Christ's life is called the later Galilean ministry; see harmony, in article GOSPEL. It lasted about six months. In it Jesus went, for the only time in his life, into gentile territory, viz., the regions of Tyre and Sidon. Then, having apparently passed southward along the eastern side of the upper Jordan and the sea of Galilee, we find him in the region of Decapolis. Again he went far into the northern part of Galilee, and finally returned again to Capernaum. The period was mainly devoted to the preparation of his disciples for his death and for the extension of his gospel to all peoples. He preached little, and then mainly to gentiles or to the half-heathen people on the south and east of the sea of Galilee. Finally, near Cæsarea Philippi, at the base of mount Hermon, he elicited from Peter and the rest the full confession of his Messiahship, and, in connection therewith, he plainly told them of his coming death and resurrection, and of the necessity that every follower of his should be willing also to bear the cross. Shortly after occurred the transfiguration, in which three of his apostles beheld his glory, and in which, it would seem, he devoted himself finally, with sublime exaltation of spirit, to the sacrifice to which law and prophecy, as he was reminded by Moses and Elias, had looked forward. Afterwards he repeated the prediction of his death, and, having returned to Capernaum, further instructed his disciples (Mat. xviii) in that conception of God's service as one of humility, self-sacrifice, and love, of which his own great act of self-devotion was to be the permanent example.

It was now probably the early autumn of A. D. 29, and leaving Capernaum for the last time Jesus "steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem" (Luke ix. 51). The next period of his ministry is called the last journeys to Jerusalem. It is impossible to follow in exact order our Lord's movements, for St. Luke, on whom we are mainly dependent for the record of this period, does not follow a precise chronological method of narration. But the main features of the period are clear enough. Jesus now sought to attract the public attention of the whole land, including Judæa. He sent out the seventy to announce his coming. He visited Jerusalem at the feast of tabernacles (John vii), and again at the feast of dedication (x. 22), and on both occasions offered himself repeatedly to the people. He called himself the light of the world and the good shepherd of God's flock, and boldly contended with the rulers who opposed his pretensions. He also moved back and forth through Judæa and Peræa, and explained in popular discourse and with more beauty of illustration than ever before the true religious life and the true idea of God and of his service. Here belong the parables of the good Samaritan, the wedding-feast, the lost sheep, the lost coin, the prodigal son, the unjust steward, the rich man and Lazarus, the importunate widow, the Pharisee and the publican. Thus the announcement of the gospel became more complete, while the fierceness of the opposition of the rulers became more intense, until an event occurred which brought matters to a climax. Word was brought to Jesus of the sickness of his friend Lazarus in Bethany. Going to him, he found him already four days dead, and forthwith he eclipsed all his previous miracles by raising the dead man to life (xi. 1-46). The miracle was so stupendous and performed so near Jerusalem that it had a profound effect on the people of the capital; and the sanhedrin, under the lead of Caiaphas, the high priest, decided that the influence of Jesus could be destroyed only by his death (47-53). Forthwith Jesus retired from the vicinity (54), evidently determined that he should not die until the passover. As that drew near he began to approach the city through Peræa (Mat. xix.; xx.; Mark x; Luke xviii. 15-xix. 28), teaching as he went, but again predicting his death and resurrection, until he reached Bethany once more, six days before the feast (John xii. 1). At Bethany, Mary, the sister of Lazarus, anointed his head and feet while he was at supper, an event in which Jesus saw a silent prophecy of his coming burial. But the next day he made the triumphal entry on an ass's colt into Jerusalem. By that he invited the anger of the rulers, offered himself publicly as Messiah, and illustrated the peaceful character of the kingdom he had come to found. The next day he returned again to the capital, on his way cursing the barren, though blooming, fig tree, which was so apt an emblem of the barren, though pretentious, Jewish church. Then, as three years before, he cleansed the temple of the traders who profaned its courts, thus once more calling the nation to follow him in a purification of Israel. But though the pilgrims to the festival crowded about him and had hailed him at the triumphal entry as the Messiah, the rulers maintained their resolute enmity. On the next day (Tuesday) he again visited the city. Arrived at the temple, he was met by a deputation from the sanhedrin, which demanded his authority for his acts. This he refused to give, knowing that they were already resolved to destroy him, while, by the parables of the two sons, the wicked husbandmen, and the marriage of the king's son, he described their disobedience to God, the infidelity of Israel to her high trust, and the certain desolation of the faithless church and city. Forthwith he was questioned by a succession of parties who sought to find accusation against him or to weaken his reputation. The Pharisees and Herodians asked about the lawfulness of giving tribute to Caesar; the Sadducees about the resurrection; a lawyer about the great commandment; and he, having silenced each in turn, discomfited them by his question concerning David's address to Messiah as Lord, for the psalmist's language clearly implied that his own claim to be the Son of God and equal with God was not blasphemous. It was a day of bitter conflict. Jesus vehemently denounced the unworthy leaders of the people (Mat. xxiii. 1-38). When certain Greeks desired to see him he saw in their coming a presage of the Jews' rejection of him, and that the gentiles were to be his followers, and realized that the end was at hand (John xii 20-50). As he left the temple he sadly remarked to his disciples that soon the splendid building would be in ruins, and later on the same evening he gave to four of them his prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem, the spread of the gospel, the sufferings of his followers, and his own second advent, a prediction which shows to us that amid the lowering storm of Jewish hostility the vision of Jesus was clear, and that he moved on to his fate knowing it to be the appointed path to ultimate success. It is probable that on that very night the plot was formed to destroy him. Judas, one of the twelve, had, we may believe, long been alienated from the spiritual ideas of the Master. He was grieved also at Christ's refusal to seek a worldly kingdom; for Judas was, John tells us, an avaricious man. At the supper at Bethany he had become finally and fully conscious of his entire want of sympathy with Jesus, and as the disappointment which he felt over the failure of his hopes grew keener he resolved to wreak his anger on the Lord by betraying him to the rulers. His offer changed their plans. They had purposed to wait until the festival was over and the crowds had departed. But in the absence of any real charge against Jesus they were only too glad to avail themselves of the traitor's proposal. The next day (Wednesday) seems to have been spent by Jesus in retirement. He probably remained in Bethany. On Thursday afternoon the paschal lambs were to be slain, and after sunset the paschal supper, with which the seven-day feast of unleavened bread began, was to be eaten by all pious Israelites. On that day Jesus sent Peter and John into the city to prepare the passover for him and the twelve. He sent them, no doubt, to the house of a disciple or friend (Mat. xxvi. 18); but by the device of telling them to follow when they entered the city a man whom they would meet bearing a pitcher of water, he kept the place of assembly secret from the rest of the disciples, for the purpose no doubt of preventing Judas from betraying it to the rulers, and thus possibly interfering with the last precious interview with the apostles. When evening came he observed with them the passover supper. For the order of events during the evening, see again the harmony. The view of some that according to John's Gospel (xiii. 1, 29, xviii. 28; xix. 31) Jesus was crucified on Nisan 14th, the day on which the paschal lamb was slain, and therefore that he did not eat the passover supper at the regular time, but anticipated it by a day, appears to be quite inconsistent with the language reported by Matthew (xxvi. 17-19), Mark (xiv. 12-16), and Luke (xxii. 7-13, 15), and the expressions appealed to in John may be explained on the hypothesis which we are following.* It should be noted that in all probability Judas withdrew before the establishment of the eucharist, and that Jesus twice predicted the fall of Peter, once in the upper room and again while on the way to Gethsemane. John's Gospel does not relate the establishment of the eucharist, but it gives the Lord's last discourses with the apostles, in which he comforted them in view of his departure from them by revealing the unchangeable spiritual union between himself and them, and the mission of the Spirit which would bring to fruition their relation to him. It records also his sublime high-priestly prayer (xvii.) On the way to Gethsemane Jesus further warned the disciples that they would soon be scattered, and appointed a meeting with him, after his resurrection, in Galilee. The agony in the garden was his final and complete surrender of himself to the last great act of sacrifice. It was interrupted by the coming of Judas with a company of soldiers, obtained doubtless from the garrison near the temple on the ground that a seditious person was to be arrested (John xviii. 3, 12), together with some of the Levitical guard and servants of the chief priests. Judas knew that Jesus was wont to resort to Gethsemane. Some suppose, however, that he had first gone to the upper room and, finding that Jesus had departed, followed to Olivet, at the base of which the garden lay. Jesus, after a brief expostulation, submitted to arrest; whereupon his disciples fled. The captives took him first to Annas (13), the father-in-law of Caiaphas, where he had a preliminary examination while the sanhedrim was being convened (13, 14, 19-24). It is not improbable that Annas and Caiaphas lived in the same palace, for Peter's denials are said to have occurred in the court of the palace, both while this examination before Annas and the later one before the sanhedrim were taking place. At the first examination Jesus refused to answer the inquiries, and demanded that evidence against him be produced. He was sent bound, however, to the apartments of Caiaphas, where the sanhedrim had hastily assembled. No harmonious evidence of blasphemy, which was the crime they sought to prove against him, could be found; so that the high priest was forced to solemnly adjure him to say if he were Messiah. Thereupon Jesus made the claim in the most explicit manner, and the angry court condemned him as worthy of death for blas-recorded in ch. xiii was "before the feast of the passover," but is an introductory remark describing the loving spirit in which the fatal passover was entered upon by Jesus, xiii. 29, "buy those things that we have need of against the feast," may refer to things necessary for the next day, on which the freewill offerings of the people were presented, xviii. 28, "that they might eat the passover," may mean simply "keep the paschal festival," xix. 31, "the preparation," was not the preparation for the passover, but for the Sabbath.

* John xiii. 1 does not mean that all that is

phemy. The unjust spirit of his judges appeared in the ribald mockery to which he was subjected. It was, however, the law that the decisions of the sanhedrin must be made in the daytime. Hence very early in the morning the court convened again and the same formalities were gone through (Luke xxii 66-71), and then, since permission of the governor was required for the execution of a criminal, they hastened with Jesus to Pilate. The indecent haste of the whole proceeding shows their fear that the people might prevent his destruction. Pilate probably resided in Herod's palace on the hill of Zion. But the distance from the high priest's house was not great, and it was still very early when the governor was summoned forth to hear their request. They wished him at first to grant permission for the execution without inquiring into the charges, but this he refused to do (John xviii. 29-32). Then they accused Jesus of "perverting the nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Cæsar, saying that he himself is Christ a king" (Luke xxiii 2). After Jesus had acknowledged to the governor that he was a king (3), Pilate examined him privately (John xviii 33-38), and discovered the wholly non-political and harmless character of his claims. He forthwith declared that he found no fault in him and that he would let him go. But the governor was in reality afraid to thwart the will of his dangerous subjects, and when they fiercely demanded the crucifixion of Jesus he fell back on various weak expedients to shift the responsibility. Having learned that Jesus was from Galilee, Pilate sent him to Herod Antipas (Luke xviii 7-11), who also was then in Jerusalem; but Herod refused to exercise jurisdiction. Meanwhile the crowd had increased, and the governor appealed to them to say what prisoner he should release, as his custom was, at the passover. He evidently hoped that the popularity of Jesus would rescue him from the chief priests. But the latter persuaded the rabble to ask for Barabbas. The message of his wife further increased Pilate's anxiety to release Jesus, but though he several times appealed to the multitude in his behalf, they were unplaceable and bloodthirsty. The governor was afraid to act on his own convictions and weakly gave permission for the execution. Yet while the scourging which always preceded crucifixion was in progress in the hall of his palace he could not rest. Again he sought to satisfy the Jews by the spectacle of Jesus bleeding and thorn-crowned, but they, made bold with success, cried out that he ought to die because he made himself the Son of God (John xix. 1-7). This, however, increased Pilate's superstitions, so that again he examined Jesus privately and again sought to release him (8-12); but the Jews finally appealed to his political ambition and practically accused him of disloyalty to Cæsar in abetting a rival king. This decided the matter. Pilate had the grim satisfaction of hearing the Jews proclaim their supreme allegiance to the emperor (13-15), and therewith he handed Jesus over for execution. Jesus thus died for no crime and without any real legal process. His death was literally a judicial murder. The execution was carried out by four soldiers (John xix 23) under charge of a centurion. With him also two common robbers were led to death. The victims usually carried their crosses, either the whole of them or the transverse portion. Jesus seems to have carried the whole, since he fainted under it. The place of crucifixion was a short distance outside the city, see GOLGOTHA. The victim was usually nailed to the cross on the ground and then the cross was placed upright in the hole prepared for it. The crime of the offender was written on a tablet and placed over his head. In Jesus' case the accusation was written in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. Its longest form is given by John (xix 19), "Jesus of Nazareth, the king of the Jews." Mark tells us that it was "about the third hour" (i e 9 A M) when the crucifixion was completed. If we remember that the proceedings began "as soon as it was day" (Luke xxii 66), their completion about nine o'clock will not seem incredible. It is moreover in accord with the hate which had characterized the action of the Jews from the beginning.

Into the incidents which the gospels have preserved as occurring during the crucifixion we cannot go here. Such sufferers often remained alive for several days; but the already exhausted frame of Jesus did not endure the agony so long. At the ninth hour he expired with a great cry. The words spoken from the cross, however, indicate that he retained his consciousness to the end, and that he fully realized the significance of all that happened. When he died there seem to have been but few present. The crowd which followed him at first had returned to the city. The mocking priests also had left him. A few disciples and the soldiers are all that we know to have been present at the end. The rulers were, therefore, not aware that he had died. Unwilling to have the bodies hanging on the cross over the Sabbath, they went to Pilate and asked that their legs might be broken, but, when the soldiers came to Jesus for this purpose, they found him already dead. One, however, pierced his side to make sure, and John, who was near, saw blood and water issue from the wound (xix 34). Jesus seems to have died literally of a broken heart. Meanwhile Joseph of Arimathea, a secret disciple of Jesus, though a rich man and a member of the sanhedrin—who, however, had not consented to his Master's condemnation (Luke xxiii. 51)—knowing that death had come, had begged for the body of Jesus. By him and a few others it was laid in a garden of Joseph's, in a new tomb hewn out of a rock.

Now it is clear that the disciples were wholly disconcerted and overwhelmed by the sudden arrest and death of their Lord. Though he had on three recorded occasions forewarned them of his death and of his resurrection on the third day, they were too distressed to have any hope. Though he had told them to go to Galilee to meet him, they lingered in Jerusalem. Their conduct will not seem incredible nor the narrative doubtful to those who know the prostration which often accompanies bitter disappointment and sorrow. Hence Jesus appeared to them in Jerusalem and its vicinity. The resurrection narratives in the gospels are not intended, however, to be complete accounts of the events. They do not pretend to marshal the evidence for the reality of the resurrection. That consisted in the testimony of apostles to whom he repeatedly appeared (1 Cor. xv. 3-8). In the gospels we have a number of incidents preserved either because of their intrinsic interest or for the sake of the spiritual instruction which they provided to believers. The order of events seems to have been nearly the following: Early in the morning of the first day of the week two companies of pious Galilean women proceeded to the sepulcher to anoint the body of Jesus for permanent burial. The one company consisted of Mary Magdalene, Mary the mother of James, and Salome (Mark xvi. 1). Joanna and other unnamed women were probably in the second party (Luke xxiv. 10, which is a general statement, including the report of all the women). The first party saw the stone rolled away from the tomb, and Mary Magdalene, supposing that the body had been stolen, returned to Peter and John with the news (John xx 1, 2). Her companions went on, and entering the tomb heard from the angel the news of the resurrection and the message to the disciples (Mat. xxviii. 1-7; Mark xvi. 1-7). As they hastened away, we may suppose that they met the other company of women, and that all returned again to the tomb, but only to receive from two angels a more emphatic assurance and direction (Luke xxiv 1-8). The women then hastened toward the city with the news and on the way Jesus met them (Mat. xxviii. 9, 10). Meanwhile Mary Magdalene had reported to Peter and John that the tomb was empty, and they had run thither and found it even so (John xx 3-10). She had followed them and, when they departed from the garden, she remained, and to her also did Jesus appear (11-18). All the women finally returned to the disciples and reported the wonderful news. It was not, however, on the testimony of these women that faith in the resurrection of Jesus was to rest. During the day he appeared to Peter (Luke xxiv 34; 1 Cor. xv. 5), later to two disciples journeying to Emmaus (Luke xxiv. 13-35), and in the evening to all the eleven except Thomas (36-43; John xx. 19-23). At that time he ate before them, proving the reality of his physical resurrection. Since, however, Thomas even yet would not believe, the disciples still lingered in Jerusalem, and on the following Sunday Jesus again appeared to them, and proved to the doubting apostle that he had indeed risen (John xx. 24-29). Then, it would appear, the apostles returned to Galilee. We next read of seven of them fishing in the sea of Galilee and of the Lord's appearance to them (John xxi.). By appointment also he met them on a mountain of Galilee and gave to them "the great commission," with the assurance of his power and presence (Mat xxviii 16-20). This may very probably have been the occasion when five hundred disciples were present (1 Cor. xv 6). Soon after he appeared also to James (7), but where we know not. Finally he brought the apostles again to Jerusalem, and leading them out to the mount of Olives to a place where Bethany was in sight (Luke xxiv. 50, 51) he was taken up into heaven and a cloud received him out of their sight (Acts i. 9-12). We have thus ten appearances of the risen Saviour recorded in the New Testament, while Paul properly adds the appearance to him on the way to Damascus (1 Cor. xv. 8). There were doubtless, however, other appearances not recorded. Luke says (Acts i. 3) that "he showed himself alive after his passion by many proofs, appearing unto them by the space of forty days" (R V). Yet he did not continue with them in constant intercourse as he had done before. He rather manifested himself to them (John xxi 1, R V). The forty days between his resurrection and ascension formed evidently a transitional period, intended to train the disciples for their future work. It was necessary to give ample, repeated, and varied proof of the resurrection, and this was done as we have seen. It was necessary to give them instruction concerning the necessity of his death and the character of the kingdom which through their labors he was to establish. It was requisite to point out to them the fulfillment of Scripture by his death and resurrection, for thus alone would they see the continuity of the new dispensation with the old. For this instruction they had not been ready before his death, but it is repeatedly referred to as having been given during these forty days (Luke xxiv. 44-48; John xx 21-23; xxi 15-22; Acts 1 3-8). And finally the experiences of the forty days trained the disciples to think of their Master as absent and yet living; as invisible and yet near them; as risen to a new life and yet retaining the old nature and even the old, though now glorified, body, which they had loved; as exalted but still the same, so that they were prepared to go forth and proclaim him as the glorified Son of God and crowned king of Israel, yet also the Man of Nazareth and the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world. Meanwhile the Jews affirmed that his disciples had stolen his body. Fearing this, they had on the day of his death requested from Pilate a military watch to guard the tomb. When the resurrection occurred, accompanied, as we are told, by the descent of an angel who rolled the stone from the tomb, the soldiers were overcome with fright and afterwards fled. Superstitious pagans as they were, they doubtless were little more affected by what they had seen than ignorant men usually are by what they consider ghostly appearances. But the rulers, who may possibly have accounted for the soldiers' report by supposing a trick on the part of the disciples, gave the men money to keep the matter quiet, and thus the report was given out that the body had been stolen while the soldiers slept (Mat. xxviii. 11-15). When, however, the apostles began, on the day of Pentecost, to give their testimony to the resurrection, and the number of believers in it grew rapidly (Acts ii, etc.), it was by attempts at force, not by proofs, that the chief priests tried to silence their witness and subdue the growing sect (Acts iv).

We have not sought in this article to exhibit the teaching of Jesus, but the outward framework and historic movement of his life. In the latter there appears, as we gather it from the gospels, a gradual progressive revelation of himself and of his message, which constitutes one of the strongest evidences of the truthfulness of the accounts on which our knowledge is based. The reality of the humanity of Christ made it possible for him thus to appear as a real character of human history, related to a particular environment, and to present in his life a career which moved naturally, yet steadily, forward to a definite goal. His was a genuinely human life and, therefore, capable of historical treatment. At the same time Jesus knew and declared himself to be more than man (e. g. Mat. xi. 27; John v. 17-38 x. 30, xvii. 5, etc.). As his self-revelation advanced his disciples realized his divine dignity (Mat. xvi. 16; John xx. 28). Then later reflection and experience, under the illumination of the Spirit, made his divinity still more evident to them, until the last surviving apostle was led to become the fourth evangelist and to present in his Lord's earthly career the incarnation of the personal divine Word. Yet St. John never forgot nor obscured the real humanity of Jesus. He gives us the full truth concerning the person of the great Master. "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" (John i. 1), and "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father), full of grace and truth" (14). "These [things] are written," he concludes, "that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name" (xx. 31).

Je'ther [abundance, eminence, excellence].

1. A descendant of Judah through Jerahmeel. He died childless (1 Chron. ii. 32; cp. 26, 28).

2. A man registered among the descendants of Judah, but the lineage is not traced beyond his father, Ezra (1 Chron. iv. 17).

3. An Asherite, apparently the same as Ithran, son of Zophah (1 Chron. vii. 37 with 38).

4. A form of Jethro, Moses' father-in-law (Ex. iv. 18, R. V. margin).

5. The firstborn son of Gideon. His father bade him fall upon the captives, Zebah and Zalmunna, and slay them; but the youth shrank from the deed, and they escaped the disgrace of dying at the hands of a boy (Judg. viii. 20, 21).

6. The father of Amasa, Absalom's commander-in-chief (1 Kin. ii. 5). See ITHRA.

Je'theth.

A chieftain of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 40; 1 Chron. i. 51).

Jeth'lah. See ITHLAH.

Je'thro [his preeminence, his excellence].

A priest of Midian and Moses' father-in-law (Ex. iii. 1). He is called Reuel (ii. 18; Antiq. iii. 12, 1). Reuel, which means friend of God, seems to have been his personal name, and Jethro, his excellence, to have been his honorary title. His seven daughters tended his flocks, and Moses, who had fled from Egypt, rendered them a service which led to his introduction to Jethro's family and marriage with Zipporah, one of the daughters. Moses kept his father-in-law's flocks for about forty years (Ex. iii. 1, 2; Acts vii. 30). When called by God to return to Egypt and achieve the emancipation of the Hebrews, Moses obtained Jethro's permission to depart, and took with him his wife Zipporah and his two sons (Ex. iv. 18-20), but he afterwards sent her and her two sons temporarily back to her father's house (24-26, xviii. 2). See ZIPPORAH. After the passage of the Red Sea, which conducted the Israelites into the vicinity of Jethro's country, the Midianite priest brought his daughter and her two sons back to Moses (xviii. 1-7). He rejoiced in the deliverance of the Israelites, offered sacrifices to Jehovah, and suggested the appointment of judges when he saw that the Hebrew leader was wearing himself out by deciding even trivial cases personally (8-27). See HOBAB.

Je'tur [possibly, nomad or nomadic camp].

A people descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31; v. 19). See ITURÆA.

Je'u-el [perhaps, treasure of God].

1. A man of Judah, family of Zerah. At one period he, with 690 of his clan, lived at Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix. 6).

2. A Levite, a descendant of Elizaphan.

He took part in the reformation under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 13, in A. V. Jeiel).

3 A contemporary of Ezra who with members of his family returned from Babylonia with the scribe (Ezra viii. 13, in A. V. Jeiel).

Je'ush, in A. V. once Jehush (1 Chron. viii. 39) [perhaps, hastening]

1 A son of Esau by his wife Oholibamah (Gen. xxxv. 5) He became a chieftain in Edom (18).

2. A Benjamite, son of Bilhan (1 Chron. vii. 10).

3. A Levite, family of Gershon and a son of Shimei (1 Chron. xxiii. 10, 11).

4. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 39)

5. A son of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 19)

Je'uz [counseling]

A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. viii. 10).

Jew [from Latin Iudæus, Greek Ioudaios, Hebrew Y'hudi].

One belonging to the tribe or to the kingdom of Judah (2 Kin xvi 6; xxv. 25). Then the meaning was extended, and the word was applied to any one of the Hebrew race who returned from the captivity; and finally it comprehended any one of that race throughout the world (Esther ii. 5; Mat. ii. 2). For their history while they were in Palestine, see HISTORY. Their present state is a fulfillment of prophecy (Lev. xxvi. 33, 39, Deut. iv. 27; xxviii. 25, 36, 37, 64-68); they are scattered over all gentile lands, but nowhere in the world, not even in Palestine, have they a land where they can live under a government of their own. The Jews' language (2 Kin. xviii. 26; Neh. xiii. 24) was Hebrew Jez-a-ni'ah; in full Jaazaniah (2 Kin. xxv. 23) [Jehovah doth hearken].

A captain of the forces, son of Hoshaiah, a Maacathite (2 Kin. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 7, 8; xlii. 1). He came with his men to pay his respects to Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had appointed governor of Judah after the capture of Jerusalem. Jezeaniah had no complicity in the subsequent murder of Gedaliah, and seems to have taken a prominent part in attempting to bring the perpetrators to justice. He joined in appealing to Jeremiah, the prophet, to ask advice of God concerning the purpose of the remnant of the Israelites to migrate to Egypt (xlii). He was a brother of Azariah, or more probably Azariah is a corruption of Jezeaniah (xliii. 2).

Jew'e-bel [unmarried, chaste].

1. Daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians and former priest of Astarte (1 Kin. xvi. 31; con. Apion. i. 18). She became the wife of Ahab, king of Israel. She was a woman of masculine temperament and swayed her husband at will. She was a devoted worshiper of Baal, and intolerant of other faiths. To please her, Ahab reared a temple and an altar to Baal in Samaria, and set up an Asherah (1 Kin. xvi. 32, 33). Though legally only the king's consort, and not the ruler of the country, yet she slew all the prophets of Jehovah on whom she could lay hands (xviii. 4-13). When she planned the death of Elijah (xix. 1, 2), and afterwards effected the judicial murder of Naboth, she similarly ignored the king's authority, though he condoned the deed (xxi. 16-22). On account of these murders and other violations of the moral law, the divine sentence was pronounced against her that the dogs should eat Jezebel by the wall of Jezreel (23). The prophecy was fulfilled. When, eleven years after Ahab's death, Jehu executed pitiless vengeance on the royal household, Jezebel painted her face, tied her head, and, looking out at a window, called to him as he approached: "Had Zimri peace, who slew his master?" Jehu looked up at the window and said: "Who is on my side? who?" Two or three eunuchs looked out. "Throw her down," he cried, and they unhesitatingly obeyed. She fell in front of his chariot, which he intentionally drove over her, and her blood bespattered the horses and the wall. About an hour later, recalling that the dead woman was a king's daughter, he gave directions to bury her, but it was found that dogs, the scavengers of oriental cities, had anticipated him, and had left of her nothing but the skull, and the feet, and the palms of the hands (2 Kin. ix. 7, 30-37).

2. A woman at Thyatira who called herself a prophetess, and seduced some members of the Christian church there to commit fornication and eat things sacrificed to idols. It is probable that Jezebel is a symbolic name. If so, it was given because of a resemblance between her and Ahab's idolatrous and wicked queen (Rev. ii. 20, 23).

Jez-ra-hi'ah [Jehovah shineth forth]

Jez're-el [God soweth].

1. A fortified town (1 Kin. xxi. 23, wall; 2 Kin. ix. 17, tower; x. 7, 8, gate), in the territory of Issachar (Josh. xix. 17, 18), not far from mount Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 1-5 with xxix. 1 and 2 Sam. iv. 4). The Israelites encamped at a fountain in its vicinity just before the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxix 1, cp 2 Sam. iv. 4), the Philistines following them to the same locality (1 Sam. xxix 11). Ish-bosheth ruled over Jezreel among other places (2 Sam. ii. 9); and it was one of the capitals of Ahab (1 Kin. xviii 45), and also of his son (2 Kin. viii 29). Naboth was a Jezreelite, his vineyard was in close proximity to Ahab's palace, and he was stoned outside the city (1 Kin. xxi. 1, 13). Jezebel met her violent death in Jezreel (23, 2 Kin. ix 30, 35). The heads of Ahab's seventy sons were piled at the gate of Jezreel by order of Jehu (x 1-11). The bloodshed in these sanguinary transactions is called by Hosea "the blood of Jezreel," and he prophesied that it should be avenged (Hos 1 4). The crusaders correctly identified Jezreel with the Parvum Gerinum, now the village Zer'in. The discovery lapsed into oblivion, and was not revived till 1814. The identification is now universally ac-descent, of 100 feet or more, toward the north-east, with a splendid view all the way to the Jordan. The fountain of Jezreel, which is below the village, is copious and good. It is called 'Ain el-Meyiteh. Another and yet more copious one, 'Ain Jâlûd, is at no great distance. The ancient vineyards seem to have been to the east of the city, where rock-cut wine presses now exist.

The valley of Jezreel is either the great plain intersecting Palestine immediately north of Carmel, or, better, that part of it which, adjacent to Jezreel, descends from Jezreel eastward to the Jordan (Josh. xvii. 16; Hosea i. 5). In Gideon's days the Midianites and Amalekites pitched within its limits (Judg. vi. 33). The whole central plain is now called the plain of Esdraelon, a slight modification of Jezreel (cp. Judith i. 8; iv. 6; vii. 3). Through all by-gone time it has been a battlefield of nations.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 56). It seems to have been from this place that David obtained his wife Ahinoam the Jezreelitess (1 Sam. xxv. 43; xxvii. 3). Exact situation unknown.

3. A man of Judah, descended from Hur (1 Chron. iv. 3).

4. A son of the prophet Hosea. So named because Jehovah had declared that he would avenge the blood of Jezreel on the house of Jehu (Hos. i. 4, 5).

Jo'ab [Jehovah is father].

1. Son of Seraiah and descendant of Kenaz, who was reckoned with the tribe of Judah. He was the father of the inhabitants of the valley of craftsmen (1 Chron. iv. 13, 14).

2. A son of Zeruiah (2 Sam. viii. 16), David's half sister (1 Chron. ii. 16; cp. 2 Sam. xvii. 25). Joab was, therefore, David's nephew. He was the second of three brothers, Abishai, Joab, and Asahel, all men of heroic type. He first appears in public life at the head of David's soldiers in the war with Ish-bosheth. He commanded at the battle which followed the tournament at Gibeon, and was victorious (2 Sam. ii. 12-32). Abner, Ish-bosheth's commander-in-chief, after a quarrel with his royal master, had an interview with David. Joab reproved the king for allowing Abner to depart in peace, denounced Abner as a spy, recalled him, and, with the connivance of Abishai (iii. 30, 39; cp. ii. 24), assassinated him at a nominally friendly interview. Joab committed the murder in vengeance for the death of his younger brother Asahel at the hands of Abner at the battle of Gibeon (iii. 30).

where, however, Abner had acted reluctantly and strictly in self-defense. Probably, also a second reason was the apprehension (cp. Joab and Abishai) that Abner might be given the command of the army. David felt himself politically too weak to bring them justice, yet he never condoned the crime (2 Sam. iii. 6-39). In the assault on the Jebusite stronghold on mount Zion Joab was the first to enter the fortress, and as a reward was made the commander of the armies of all Israel (2 Sam. iv. 8, with 1 Chron. xi. 6). He soon afterwards repaired a portion of the city (8). After David's conquest of the Edomites (2 Sam. viii. 13, 14; 1 Chron. xvii. 12), Joab remained in Edom with the army for six months, cutting off every male (1 Ki. xi. 14-17). He commanded in the war with the confederate Syrians and Ammonites (1 Sam. x. 1-14, 1 Chron. xix. 1-19), and pressed the siege of Rabbah so successfully that he could have taken the town by storm but instead of doing so he sent for David that the king might have the credit of the victory (2 Sam. xi. 1; xii. 26-29; cp. Chron. xx. 1-3). He obeyed David's order to put Uriah in the forefront of the battle that he might be slain (2 Sam. xi. 6-27). Joab was who sent to David the wise woman of Tekoa to induce him to forgive Absalom (xiv. 1-27); but he did not interfere further in the case until his barley field had been set on fire by the prince (28-33). When Absalom rebelled Joab remained loyal to David, and led one of the three divisions of the royal forces which defeated the rebels (xviii. 1, 2). Then, in defiance of the king's command, he thrust three darts through the heart of the revolting prince, terminating his life (9-17) and afterwards he spoke some plain though not unwise words to the king on his extravagant grief at the death of a rebellious son (xix. 1-8). David shortly afterwards appointed Amasa to be captain of the host in the room of Joab (13), and when Sheba rebelled Amasa was employed to lead the force sent to crush the revolt. Joab was overthrown by jealous hate, and at an avowedly friendly interview, stabbed him dead just as he had killed Abner in similar circumstances; but this time there was no pretense of a blood feud between the parties. Then Joab and Abishai put down the rebellion (xx. 1-22). Joab thus again became commander-in-chief (23; cp. also 1 Kin. ii. 34, 35). He was opposed to David's numbering the people, and intentionally did the work imperfectly (1 Sam. xxiv. 1-9; 1 Chron. xxi. 1-6). When Adonijah set himself up for king Joab went with him (1 Kin. i. 7), but, with his other supporters, deserted him on hearing that Solomon had been proclaimed king (28-49). David on his deathbed indicated his wish that Joab should be brought to justice for the murders of Abner and of Amasa. Solomon carried out the sentence. Joab, clinging to the horns of the altar in the court

Jo'ah [Jehovah is brother]

1. A son of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xxvi. 4).

2. A Levite, son of Zimnah and a descendant of Gershom (1 Chron. vi. 21). Perhaps he was the Levite, son of Zimnah and descendant of Gershom who assisted at the religious reformation under king Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 12).

3. A son of Asaph. He was the recorder under king Hezekiah (2 Kin. xviii. 18, 26; Is. xxxvi. 3, 11, 22).

4. A son of Joahaz. He was recorder under king Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 8).

1. A man of Judah, family of Shelah (1 Chron. iv. 22).

2. A man of Manasseh, family of Abiezer and father of Gideon (Judg. vi. 11, 15). He lived at Ophrah, and was apparently a man of substance. He had reared an altar to Baal and an Asherah. These Gideon was directed to throw down, and he did so. The idolaters demanded that Joash should surrender his son to be put to death for the sacrilege, but Joash shrewdly said: "If Baal is a god, let him plead for himself" (Judg. vi. 11-32).

3. A Benjamite of Gibeah who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 3).

4. A son of Ahab (1 Kin. xxii. 26; 2 Chron. xviii. 25).

5. Son of Ahaziah, king of Judah. When Athaliah, the mother of Ahaziah, heard that her son had been slain, she massacred all the seed royal except Joash, and ascended the throne. Joash, then only an infant, escaped by the artifice of the late king's sister Jehoshabea, wife of the high priest. He was hidden with his nurse for six years in the temple. In the seventh year, Jehoiada, the high priest, summoned five captains of the royal bodyguard, put them under oath, and showed them the king. Five companies of armed men were arranged for (2 Kin. xi. 5-7), probably consisting of three companies of the guard and two courses of Levites with spears from the temple arsenal; and on a Sabbath day these five bodies were drawn up across the court of the temple in front of the altar, representative men of the nation assembled by appointment, and the king was brought into their midst, crowned, and greeted with loud acclaim. Athaliah, hearing the noise, hurried into the temple; but, by the high priest's orders, she was at once ejected and slain, leaving Joash now without a rival. Then Jehoiada framed two covenants: the one that the youthful ruler and his people should serve Jehovah, and the other that they should discharge their mutual duties as king and subjects. Then they proceeded to the house of Baal, and broke it down, destroying the images and killing the officiating priest (2 Kin. xi. 1-20; 2 Chron. xxiii. 10-21). Joash ascended the throne 835 B. C., but was the only legitimate king since 842, and his reign was apparently dated from this year, with 841 as his first regnal year. So in England, the Commonwealth was ignored and the first year of Charles II.'s actual reign was called the twelfth: king de jure on the death of Charles I., January 30th, 1648-49, king de facto at the Restoration, May 29th, 1660. Joash was seven years old at his coronation and he reigned forty years. While a child, the character of his rule depended wholly on his advisers. Happily, he was under the direction of the high priest, Jehoiada, and as long as that wise and pious counselor lived, Joash did well, one notable measure of his being the repair of the temple, though the people still continued generally to worship at the high places (2 Kin. xii. 1-16). But on the death of Jehoiada both the king and his people apostatized from Jehovah, and began to set up Asherim and other idols. Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, denounced judgment upon the evil doers, on which Joash gave orders for his murder; and the multitude, breaking out into riot, stoned him to death (2 Chron. xxiv. 15-22; Mat. xxiii. 35). Soon afterwards Hazael, king of Syria, having captured the Philistine city of Gath, threatened Jerusalem, and had to be bought off with the contents of the temple treasury. When the invaders departed, Joash was suffering from sore diseases. Amaziah, his son, conducted the government; and in the course of three years, as it would appear, the servants of Joash slew him in his bed in revenge for the murder of Zechariah (2 Kin.

xii. 20; 2 Chron. xxiv. 25); see CHRONOLOGY. He was buried in the city of David, but not in one of the proper sepulchres of the kings. Joash was an infant in 842 B. C. and was seven years old in 835 (2 Kin. xi. 21), and his son Amaziah was twenty-five years old in 804 (xiv. 2). The son was accordingly born in 828, in Joash's fourteenth or fifteenth year. In oriental life this is physically possible and is readily paralleled. The early marriage of Joash was desirable and was doubtless urged by the high priest Jehoiada, since Joash was the sole survivor of his family and in his offspring lay the only hope that so great a calamity would be averted as the extinction of the direct line of David.

6. Son of Jehoahaz, king of Israel. He began to reign about 805 B. C., and reigned sixteen years. He continued the worship of the two calves at Bethel and Dan. Nevertheless he felt veneration for Elisha, and sorrowed when the great prophet lay dying. Elisha told him to open the window eastward and shoot out an arrow. He did so. The prophet then bade him take arrows and smite upon the ground. He did so, smiting the ground thrice. The arrows symbolized victories which he was to gain over the Syrians; and had he struck six times instead of three, the number of victories would have been doubled (2 Kin. xiii. 14-25). Afterwards he furnished 100,000 mercenaries to Amaziah, king of Judah, for an Edomite expedition. A prophet directed them to be sent home. Though they had been paid in advance for the services which they were not allowed to render, yet they departed in a rage, and plundered the territory of Judah as they went along (2 Chron. xxv. 6-10, 13). Perhaps on this account, Amaziah sent Joash a challenge to fight. Joash remonstrated, but Amaziah would not forbear. A battle took place at Beth-shemesh, in which Joash was victorious; and he followed up his success by breaking down a part of the wall surrounding Jerusalem, and carrying off the treasures of the temple and the palace, with hostages as guarantees against further disturbance of the peace. On the death of Joash, his son, Jeroboam II., ascended the throne (2 Kin. xiv. 8-16; 2 Chron. xxv. 17-24).

Job, I. (Gen. xli. 13, A. V.). See JOB

Job, II. [one ever returning to God (Ewald). If derived from 'ayeb, it denotes not one persecuted (Gesenius), but rather one characterized by hostility].

An O. T. saint who dwelt in the land of Uz (Job i. 1). He is mentioned for the first time elsewhere by Ezekiel (xiv. 14, 16, 20).

He lived under patriarchal conditions, in some district to the east of Palestine and near the desert, at a time when the Chaldeans made raids in the west (i. 17). There is no reason to doubt that he is an historical personage and that he passed through the remarkable experiences which are described, albeit with poetic license, in the book which bears his name. These experiences brought the question to the forefront, 'Why does God permit the righteous to suffer?' and afforded the material for a magnificent philosophical poem.

The book of Job is a poetic book of the O. T. which gives an account of the sufferings of Job, of the argument carried on between himself and his friends concerning the reasons for his sufferings, and of the solution of the problem. It is not known whether the poem was written during the lifetime of Job or later. The prologue (i.-iii. 2), the introductions to the various speeches and especially to Elihu's speech (xxxii. 1-5), and the epilogue narrating the prosperity of Job in his latter days under Jehovah's blessing (xli. 7-17), are in prose.

In the opening of the book, Job is represented as being very prosperous, possessing many flocks and herds, a large number of servants, and a numerous family. Satan is permitted to try Job's faith in God, first by causing him to be despoiled of his possessions, and to be bereaved of his family; when this means fails, Satan is further permitted to cause Job much suffering in body. Job's faith triumphs over all difficulties, and he is finally restored to more than his former prosperity.

The book between the introduction and conclusion may be divided into three main parts, each of which may be again divided into three minor parts. The introduction describes Job's prosperity and happy condition. In part first, first subhead, we find Job's first affliction described, the loss of his property and family; under the second head comes the second stage of the affliction, the attack on Job's person, and under the third head, the coming of his three friends to condole with him. Part second contains the argument between Job and his three friends, this being threefold, each friend speaking three times (except the third, who speaks twice), and Job replying to each. This forms the principal part of the book. The three friends argue on the basis that affliction is always and necessarily a result of sin, and as Job accepts this general principle, but denies its application to himself, misunderstandings result, and the speakers are as far from a solution of the situation in the end as in the beginning. Firstly, Eliphaz begins the argument by expressing in general the sinfulness of man and hinting at, rather than boldly asserting, Job's special sinfulness. Job answers, declaring his innocence. Secondly, Bildad continues in the same strain, insisting that the Lord cannot be unjust, therefore man must be at fault. Job answers as before that he is innocent, appealing to God to lighten his burden of affliction. Thirdly, Zophar follows with the same argument, implying more directly that Job must be a sinner. The second series of speeches (xii-xx) now begins. The same arguments are gone over by the speakers in the same order, the friends becoming more vehement and impatient of what they consider Job's obstinacy. In the third series (xxi-xxxii) Eliphaz openly accuses Job of secret sin. After Job's earnest denial, Bildad falls back on the first position, and Zophar remains silent.

During the whole course of this argument Job has been profoundly conscious of his own uprightness, yet he cannot understand God's apparent harshness to him. His inward struggle becomes more intense as his outward situation appears more hopeless, but he remains firm in his determination that whatever befall him still will he trust in God. Then the thought bursts upon him that some time, in God's own pleasure, he will be justified. It may not be in this life, but it will certainly come. That carries with it a conviction of immortality, and with the statement, "I know that my redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand up at the last upon the earth, and after my skin hath been thus destroyed, yet from my flesh shall I see God," Job reaches a foundation from which nothing can afterwards move him (xix 25, 26).

In the third part of the book, Elihu, who until this time has been a silent listener, proposes to argue out the matter upon a different basis. Instead of regarding the afflictions of men as a punishment for sin, he declares that they are often sent as a means of strengthening and purifying the children of God. They are not, then, the expression of an angry and implacable God, but the chastening of a loving father. In this Elihu appears as the messenger of the Lord, preparing the way for his coming, and offering an argument which Job could dispute or accept. Job accepts this view (xxxii-xxxvii). Then Jehovah speaks and shows to Job that man knows far too little to justify him in attempts fully to explain the mysteries of God's rule; and Job humbles himself before the Lord (xxxviii 1-xliii 6). Finally, Job is restored to double his former prosperity, and his family is restored to the same number as before (xlii 7-17).

The consistent progress of the argument is strong evidence for the literary unity of the book. The assumption of interpolations or supplements is needless so far as the dramatic development is concerned. But whether the poem has been supplemented by the addition of chapters xxxii-xxxvii, and xxxviii-xlii, as many students of it contend, or not, these chapters are the work of a master mind and gifted poet, to whom God had spoken, and who with clear insight removed the errors of the popular doctrine that distorted the view of the moral question, and to the primary truths which Job had discovered added a fuller disclosure of the truth, though not the final one (xxxii-xxxvii.), and directed attention to the humble position which it behooves ignorant and impotent man to take before God and the mysteries of the divine government (xxxviii-xli). Behind the seen is the unseen (as shown to the reader in the two opening chapters, i 6-12; ii 1-6), and the disputants had argued in total ignorance of the reasons for God's action and of the compensation for the sufferer which God had in store (as made known to the reader in the closing chapter, xlii). In fact this outcome of the argument (chap. xxxviii 1-xliii 6) would seem to have been in the author's thought when he wrote the opening passage to his poem, for it accounts for his introduction of Satan into the plot and his intimation thereby that reasons may exist for God's procedure which lie beyond the ken of man.

Jo'bab [shouting, trumpet call, howling, a desert].

1 An Arabian tribe descended from Joktan (Gen x 29. 1 Chron i 23). It is not known what district they occupied.

2 A king of Edom. He was the son of Zerah of Bozrah (Gen xxxvi 33, 1 Chron i 44, 45).

3 A king of Madon, who entered into the northern confederacy against Joshua, but, with his allies, was totally defeated at the waters of Merom (Josh xi 1; xii 19).

4 and 5 Two Benjamites, a son of Shabnam and a remoter descendant (1 Chron. viii 9, 18).

Joch'e-bed [Jehovah is glorious, or Jehovah is the great one].

A daughter of Levi, who married her nephew Amram and became the ancestress of Miriam, Aaron, and Moses (Ex. vi. 20; Num. xxvi. 59); see EGYPT iii 3.

Jod, in A. R. V. Yodh.

The tenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. English I and its modification J come from the same source, and both are used to represent it in anglicizing Hebrew names, as in Jechoniah. It stands at the head of the tenth section of Ps. cxix in several versions, in which section each verse begins with this letter. It was often confused by readers with vau (q v.).

Jo'da.

An ancestor of Christ, who lived near the time of the exile (Luke iii. 26). A. V., following a different reading, has Juda—i. e., Judah.

Jo'ed [Jehovah is witness].

A Benjamite, descended from Jeshaiah (Neh. xi. 7).

Jo'el [Jehovah is God].

1. A Levite, family of Kohath, and an ancestor of Samuel the prophet (1 Chron. vi. 36 with 34, 38). Probably he is not identical with Shaul (24), but belongs to the collateral line descended through Zephaniah from Tathath.

2. The elder son of Samuel the prophet and father of Heman the singer (1 Sam. viii. 2, 1 Chron. vi. 33; xv. 17). Called once in the Hebrew text and A. V. Vashui (vi. 28). This name the R. V. relegates to the margin, placing Joel in italics in the text.

3. A Gershonite Levite, who with 130 of his brethren, of whom he was the head, aided in bringing up the ark from the house of Obed-edom to the city of David (1 Chron. xv. 7, 11, 12). He seems to have been the son of Ladan (1 Chron. xxiii. 8), and guardian of the treasures dedicated to God (xxvi. 21, 22).

4. A man of Issachar, and a chief of that tribe. He was descended through Uzzi (1 Chron. vii. 3).

5. One of David's valiant men, a brother of Nathan (1 Chron. xi. 38); see IGAL.

6. Son of Pedaiiah and ruler of western Manasseh in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 20).

7. A chief of the Gadites in Bashan prior to the reigns of Jotham king of Judah and Jeroboam II. king of Israel (1 Chron. v. 12; cp. 17).

8. A Reubenite (1 Chron. v. 4), probably he whose family had much cattle in Gilead (8, 9).

9. A Kohathite Levite, son of Azariah, who aided in cleansing the temple during Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxix. 12).

10. One of the Simeonite princes who seized pasture land at Gedor (1 Chron. iv. 35-43).

11. A son of Nebo, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 43).

12. A Benjamite, son of Zichri, overseer at Jerusalem during the government of Nehemiah (Neh. xi. 9).

13. Son of Pethuel, and the author of the second among the minor prophetic books (Joel i. 1). His history is unknown.

The book opens with a description of dire distress caused by a plague of locusts and apparently aggravated by drought (i. 4-12, 17-20; cp. Amos. vii. 1, 2, 4). Locusts are a natural figure for an invading army (Rev. ix. 3-11); and the oldest interpreters of the prophecy regard them in it merely as symbols of Israel's foes. An actual devastation by these insects may, however, be intended in chap. i.; and probably in chap. ii. also, where they are likened to an army, for swarms of locusts occasionally come into Palestine from the northeast, and they quite frequently perish in the sea (cp. ii. 20). If locusts were actually wasting the country, the event served the prophet as a type of the dreadful day of the Lord and as an occasion for his message.

The book consists of a sublime address, comprising, first, a twice repeated tale of judgment, followed in each instance by a call to repentance and prayer (i. 2-ii. 17), and, secondly, an announcement of the blessings, near and remote, material and spiritual, that follow upon repentance (ii. 18-iii. 21 [Hebrew text, iv. 21]). The prophecy thus falls into four parts:

1. The prophet depicts the distress that has occurred or is impending, and calls upon the inhabitants to mourn (i. 2-12) and to repent and cry unto Jehovah (13, 14).

2. The prophet explains the event. The day of Jehovah is at hand, and shall come as destruction from the Almighty (15). A day of affliction: a people great and strong, like an irresistible army, executing the will of Jehovah (ii. 1-11). But even now repentance may avail (12-17).

3. The result of repentance. Jehovah, jealous for his land, promises to destroy the spoilers, to give seasons of plenty which shall make good the first suffering and loss, and not to allow that his people be again put to shame (18-27).

4. This deliverance is the herald of deliverance "afterward." Having poured out the rain to make the earth bring forth abundantly, Jehovah will pour out his spirit upon all flesh. The sun shall, indeed, be darkened, symbolical of the wrath of God, before the terrible day of Jehovah cometh (as described in iii. 14-17); and whosoever calleth on the name of Jehovah shall be saved, for in mount Zion shall be those that escape (ii. 28-32). In those days, when Jehovah shall bring back the captivity of Judah, all enemies of the kingdom shall be brought to judgment. In one picture Joel exhibits God's successive judgments of the nations, and the final, universal judgment, culminating in the establishment of Zion forever (iii. 1-21 [Hebrew text, iv. 1-21]).

What is the date of the prophecy?

1. Joel cites earlier prophecy (ii. 32). Part of the declaration is found verbally in Obadiah (Ob. 17), and Joel may have quoted from that book. He may, however, be alluding to a previous announcement of his own; or he may have had Is. iv. 2, 3 in mind, where the thought and the several words occur.

2. The book mentions the scattering of Israel among the nations (iii. 2), but the reference is not to the ten tribes specifically, but to the children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, God's people and heritage, and is moreover a prophecy. So, too, the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem is mentioned (iii. 1), but likewise prophetically in the spirit of Deuteronomy (xxviii.) or Hosea (vi. 11) or of Micah (iii. 12; iv. 10). For the prophet and people are in Judah, Zion exists (Joel ii. 1, 15), the temple is standing (i. 14; ii. 17), and the service is regularly conducted, although the meal and drink offerings have been cut off by reason of the destruction of vegetation (i. 9-13; cp. ii. 14).

3. The reference to past events begins with the last clause of iii. 2 [Hebrew text, iv 2], as the grammatical construction seems to indicate. Hostile nations had parted Jehovah's land among them, cast lots for the captives, plundered the temple of its silver and gold, sold children of Judah to the Greeks, and shed innocent blood (2-6, 19). The allusions are not to the period after the exile, nor to the time between the first deportation of the Jews and the fall of the city, nor to the earlier period when the Assyrians were invading the land, for (a) Judgment is not pronounced against Assyria or Babylon or later enemies, but only against Judah's foes, Tyre and Sidon, Philistia, Edom, and Egypt (iii 4, 19). Tyre and Sidon had forgotten the brotherly covenant (4; Amos 1 9), and had purchased Jewish captives from the Philistines and sold them to the remote Greeks. Philistia and Edom had done violence to Judah (Joel iii 4, 19; 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17; xxviii. 17, "again").

(b) There is no reference to Syria, from which Judah scarcely suffered before the reign of Ahaz (2 Kin. xii. 17). During and after the reign of Ahaz, the prophets of Judah frequently refer to Syria as a hostile power (Is vii. 8, viii. 4; xvii; Jer. xlix 23-27; Zech ix. 1).

(c) Nor is any mention made of the Assyrians, who did not come into conflict with Judah until after the time of Ahaz, and who for a half century preceding Ahaz's reign had not been active in western Asia.

(d) There is reference to the Greeks, not as present in Palestine or as hostile to Judah, but simply as a nation afar off to whom the Phœnicians and Philistines had sold captive children of Judah, and as contrasted with the men of Sheba, a nation at another extremity of the earth, to whom Judah shall sell captives taken from Philistia and Phœnicia (Joel iii 1-8). Accordingly the opinion has found a general, though not a universal acceptance, with commentators, that the prophecy was uttered before the time of Ahaz. The position of the book as second among the minor prophets indicates that the belief was current at the time of forming the canon that Joel began to prophesy after Hosea had commenced his prophetic labors and before Amos had entered upon his, that is, during the reign of Uzziah, king of Judah, and while Jeroboam was on the throne of Israel (Hos i. 1; Amos i. 1; vii 10).

Jo-e'lah [possibly, let him help].

A son of Jeroham of Gedor. He joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 7).

Jo'e-xer [Jehovah is help].

A Korahite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 6).

Jog'be-hah [lofty].

A town of Gad (Num xxxii. 35; Judg viii. 11). Its name still lives in Jubeihah, a village, 6 miles northwest of Rabbath Ammon on the road from es-Salt and the Jordan.

Jog'li [led into exile].

Father of Bukki, of the tribe of Dan (Num. xxxiv. 22).

Jo'ha.

1. A Benjamite, son of Beriah (1 Chron. viii. 16).

2. A Tizite, son of Shimri and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 45).

Jo-ha'nān [Jehovah is gracious].

1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 4).

2. The eighth of the Gadites who did so. He was made a captain in David's army (1 Chron. xii. 12, 14).

3. A member of the high-priestly line, who lived about 800 B. C. (1 Chron. vi. 10).

4. An Ephraimite (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

5. The eldest son of king Josiah (1 Chron. iii 15). He seems to have died young.

6. A captain, son of Kareah. He and his men made their submission to Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar set as governor over Judah (2 Kin. xxv. 22, 23; Jer. xl. 8, 9). He warned Gedaliah of the plot to murder him (13, 14); and when the governor, neglecting the warning, was assassinated, he led the force which went to avenge his death (xli. 11-15). He afterwards counseled and carried out a removal of the Jewish remnant to Egypt, against the advice of Jeremiah (16-xliii 13).

7. A son of Elioenai (1 Chron. iii 24).

8. A son of Hakkatan, of the clan of Azgad. With 110 males, he accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii 12).

9. Son of Eliashib, but scarcely of the high priest Eliashib. Ezra went to Johanan's chamber, and, refusing to eat or drink, mourned over the sin of those who had contracted foreign marriages (Ezra x. 6, in R. V. Jehohanan).

10. Son of Tobiah, the Ammonite, who married a Jewess in the days of Nehemiah (Neh vi 18, in R. V. Jehohanan).

11. A high priest (Neh xii 22), grandson of Eliashib (23; cp 11). In ver. 11, the name appears as Jonathan, doubtless through corruption of the text. The Jews at Elephantine opposite Syene in Egypt, whose temple was destroyed in 411 B. C. by the command of a local official at the instigation of the Egyptian priests, at once sent word of the outrage to Johanan in the hope that he might be able to secure them redress (Elephantine Papyri). Josephus, who correctly calls him John, says that he killed his brother Jesus in the temple, believing that he was about to supersede him in the high priesthood. This murder was committed in the reign of Artaxerxes Mnemon, 405-362 B. C. (Antiq. xi. 7, 1; cp 5, 4).

John [Greek Iōannēs, from Hebrew Yōhānān, Jehovah hath been gracious].

1. Father of Mattathias, the instigator of the Maccabean revolt (1 Mac. ii. 1).

2. Eldest son of Mattathias (1 Mac. ii. 2, in

A. V. Joannan). He was surnamed Gaddis (in A. V. Caddis), a word of unknown meaning. He was slain by the children of Jambri, about 160 B. C. (ix 36, 38, 42; and 2 Mac. viii 22, where he is erroneously called Joseph)

3 A man who obtained special privileges for the Jews from Antiochus the Great (2 Mac. iv 11) He was son of Accos and father of Eupolemus (1 Mac. viii 17)

4. Son of Simon, the Maccabee (1 Mac. xiii. 53; xvi. 1). He became known as John Hyrcanus. About 142 B. C. he was appointed by his father commander-in-chief of the army (xiii 53). He met and defeated Cendebeus in battle near Jamnia (xvi 1-10). When his father and two brothers were murdered in 135 B. C., and he himself was marked for destruction, he took the offensive against his adversary and drove him from Judæa (Antiq. xiii. 8, 1). He exercised the office of high priest and civil governor from 135 to 105 B. C. Antiochus Sidetes, king of Syria, invaded Judæa, and in the fall of 134 B. C. laid siege to Jerusalem. After a year, the Syrians took the city and dismantled its fortifications (xiii 8, 2 and 3) The death of Antiochus afforded John an opportunity to enlarge his domains, and he conquered Samaria and Idumæa He also renewed the alliance with the Romans and thereby secured the restoration of Joppa and other towns to Jewish authority He also repaired the walls of Jerusalem (1 Mac. xvi 23) The civil war which broke out in Syria in 125 B. C. and a succession of Syrian kings from whom, for one reason or another, he had nothing to fear, enabled John to maintain his independence without difficulty He favored the Pharisees at the first, but when they unreasonably clamored for his resignation of the high-priesthood, he went over to the Sadducees With his death in 105 B. C. the power of the Maccabees and, with it, of Israel rapidly waned See MACCABEES

5 John the Baptist. The immediate forerunner of Jesus, whose way he was sent to prepare. John was born of godly parents, and was of full priestly descent, both his father Zacharias and his mother Elisabeth being descendants of Aaron (Luke i 5) At the same time Elisabeth, the Levite, was cousin to the Virgin Mary, who belonged to the tribe of Judah (36). The residence of John's parents was at a town in the hill country of Judæa (39), perhaps Juttah or the priestly city of Hebron. When Zacharias, in the performance of his priestly duties, was burning incense in the temple at Jerusalem, the angel Gabriel appeared to him, promised that he should become the father of a son, directed that the child should be named John, and be brought up as a Nazirite, like Samson and Samuel, and foretold that he should be filled with the Holy Spirit from birth and prepare the people for the Lord (Luke i. 8-17). John was born in the year 5 B. C. He spent his early years in seclusion in the wilderness near his home, west of the Dead Sea (80). In A. D. 26 he appeared as a preacher in the wilderness adjoining the Jordan His ministry is believed to have been exercised during a Sabbatic year (iii 1, 2), in which the people were relieved of labor in the fields and had leisure to attend John's preaching. He came to announce a new dispensation, proclaiming the advent of the kingdom of God and the baptism of the Holy Spirit (Mat. iii 2, 11), to prepare the people in intellect and heart for the reception of Christ (3, 8), to point out the Christ in the person of Jesus (John i. 15), and to show the union of the two dispensations in the Christ, as the Lamb of God (29, 36). He addressed himself with great earnestness and plainness of speech to the immense multitudes who repaired to him from all quarters He urged the necessity of immediate and sincere repentance, the special reason assigned being that the kingdom of heaven was at hand The penitents, after confessing their sins, were baptized by John in the Jordan, and he became distinguished from others of the name by being called the Baptist The baptism by water which he administered typified cleansing from sin He did not regard it as enough, but directed his hearers to One who should come after him, whose shoe-latchet he was not worthy to unloose, and who would baptize them with the Holy Ghost and fire (Mat. in. 5-12). Notwithstanding this confession of inferiority to Jesus, our Lord sought baptism at his hands John remonstrated, which shows that he knew Jesus to be the Messiah; but he obeyed, for he recognized his own subordinate position (13-17) He knew Jesus from the teaching of his parents, and the correctness of this information was confirmed to him by the visible descent of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus at his baptism. By this sign he was authorized to declare Jesus to be the Christ (John i. 32, 33) Malachi had foretold the appearance of Elijah, the prophet, before the great and terrible day of the Lord, to turn the heart of the fathers to the children and the heart of the children to their fathers. John denied that he was Elijah in person (John i. 21); he defined his own mission and characteristics by simply quoting Is. xl. 3. But John came in the spirit and power of Elijah (Mal. iv. 5, 6, with Luke i. 17), he was the messenger sent to prepare the way before Christ (Mal. iii. 1, with Mark i. 2), and Jesus applied these predictions to John (Mat. xi. 10, 14; xvii. 12, 13). There was a resemblance between the two men also in their cheap and coarse attire, which they wore to symbolize the renouncement of ease and luxury, and in their blunt manners, which rendered them fitter for the wilderness than for kings' courts (2 Kin. i. 8, and Mat. iii. 4; xi. 8; Mark i. 6). John had said of Jesus, "He must increase, but I must decrease;" and without jealousy he saw the fulfilment of his prediction (John iii. 25-30). His public ministry was short, but his popular success was immense. At length, toward the close of A. D. 27 or in the early part of 28, having with his usual fidelity reproved Herod the tetrarch for living in sin with his brother Philip's wife, he was committed to prison (Luke iii. 19, 20). While there, perplexed and impatient at Christ's method of developing his work, and perhaps feeling that he was forgotten while others were helped, he sent two of his disciples to ask if Jesus were the promised Messiah. In reply Jesus pointed to his works. When the two disciples departed, Jesus took the opportunity of passing a high panegyric on John (Mat. xi. 2-15). John was the greatest of the prophets in that he was privileged to prepare the people for the Christ's appearance and to point out the Christ to them. The vindictiveness of the adulteress Herodias caused John's death. She persuaded her daughter, who had pleased Herod by her dancing, to ask the head of the Baptist. It was given her, and the headless body was soon afterwards removed by John's disciples and buried. Finding their master gone, they remembered his testimony to the Lamb of God, and became disciples of Jesus (Mat. xiv. 3-12; Mark vi. 16-29; Luke iii. 19, 20). Josephus attributes the death of John the Baptist to Herod's jealousy of his great influence with the people. He says also that the destruction of Herod's army in the war with Aretas, which soon after occurred, was generally considered a divine judgment on the tetrarch for the murder of John. The historian makes the place of the Baptist's imprisonment and death the fort of Machærus (Antiq. xviii. 5, 2). Machærus, now called Mekkaur, is situated in the mountains on the eastern side of the Dead Sea, about 5 miles north of the Arnon, and on the top of a conical hill 3800 feet above the Dead Sea. The wall of circumvallation of the old stronghold still remains clearly traceable, while inside are a deep well and two dungeons. One of the latter may have been the prison in which John was confined.

6 Father of the apostle Peter (John i. 42; xxi. 15-17, both R. V.). He is called Jonah in Mat. xvi. 17. See JONAH.

7. John the apostle. A son of Zebedee, and brother of that James who suffered martyrdom under Herod Agrippa I (Mat. iv. 21; Acts xii. 1, 2). It is reasonably inferred that he was younger than James, and that his mother was named Salome and was sister to the mother of Jesus; see JAMES. His father was a master fisherman on the sea of Galilee, and his two sons aided him in his occupation (Mark i. 19, 20). John had attended the preaching of the Baptist at the Jordan, and was evidently the unnamed disciple to whom and Andrew John the Baptist pointed out Jesus as the Lamb of God (John i. 35-40). He doubtless accompanied Jesus back to Galilee, and attended the wedding at Cana (ii. 1-11). But he had not been summoned yet to permanent fellowship with Jesus, and he resumed his work on the lake, sometimes together with his brother in partnership with Peter (Luke v. 10). From their business Jesus called James and John to follow him (Mat. iv. 21, 22; Mark i. 19, 20). Later they were appointed apostles (Mat. x. 2). Jesus named them Boanerges, sons of thunder (Mark iii. 17), evidently because of their vehemence. The impetuosity of their natural temperament, not yet fully chastened by grace, was shown when John rebuked one who cast out demons in Christ's name, but did not follow Christ in the company of the disciples (Luke ix. 49); and when, finding their Master rejected in a Samaritan village, they wished to call down fire from heaven on the inhabitants (52-56). They showed selfishness even in joining with their mother to ask for the places of honor beside Jesus in his future kingdom; but at the same time their zeal was manifested, for they declared themselves ready to face death for him (Mat. xx. 20-24; Mark x. 35-41). But the natural defects of their character were overcome, and their very vehemence, chastened by grace, became an element of strength and a glory. John was a man of deep spiritual insight and loving disposition, and in consequence he was the disciple whom Jesus peculiarly loved. He was one of the three apostles whom Jesus chose to be with him at the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mark v. 37; Luke xiii. 51), at the transfiguration (Mat. xviii. 1; Mark ix. 2; Luke ix. 28), and at the agony in the garden (Mat. xxvi. 37; Mark xiv. 33). At the last supper he occupied the place next to Jesus at the table (John xiii. 23). He followed Jesus from Gethsemane into the palace of the high priest, to whom he was known, and to the place of crucifixion; and on the cross Jesus commended his mother Mary to John's loving care, and he accepted the trust (xviii. 15; xix. 27). When the tomb of Christ was reported to him to be empty, he ran with Peter to the sepulcher to investigate, and learned by what he saw that Christ had risen (xx. 1-10). With the other disciples he saw the risen Christ the same evening and again a week later (Luke xxiv. 33-43; John xx. 19-30; 1 Cor. xv. 5), and like them John went to Galilee, as Jesus had directed, and again saw the Lord (Mat. xxvi. 32; xxviii. 10, 16; John xxi. 1-7). While there, through a misunderstanding of an utterance of Jesus, the idea got abroad among the brethren that John was not to die (John xxi. 22). After the ascension, he abode for some time with the ten other apostles in an upper room at Jerusalem (Acts i. 13), and after Pentecost he became Peter's colleague in active missionary work (iii. 1). Both were imprisoned by the Jewish authorities, and witnessed a good confession (iv. 19). Both were sent by their fellow-apostles to Samaria to aid in the work begun by Philip (viii. 14). John was one of the apostles who remained in Jerusalem during the persecutions that soon assailed the infant church, and he was still there, a pillar of strength, when Paul visited the city after his first missionary journey (xv. 6; Gal. ii. 9). Five books of the N. T. are ascribed to him—the Fourth Gospel, three epistles, and the book of Revelation. In the title of the last-named work the author is called St. John the Divine. Tradition fixes on Ephesus as the scene of his later ministrations, and it is probable that the seven churches of Asia enjoyed his care (Rev. i. 11). When he penned the Revelation, probably in A. D. 95, he was in the island of Patmos, an exile for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus (Rev. i. 9). The accession of Nerva is said to have freed him from danger and enabled him to return to Ephesus. Polycarp, Papias, and Ignatius were his pupils. Polycarp's disciple Irenæus states that he continued to reside at Ephesus until his death in the reign of Trajan.

8. John Mark. Mark the evangelist. Mark, however, was only the surname; John was the proper, and probably the earlier, name (Acts xii. 12, 25). See MARK.

9. A Jewish dignitary who took part with Annas, Caiaphas, Alexander, and as many as were of the kindred of the high priest, which perhaps he was himself, in calling the apostles Peter and John to account for their preaching (Acts iv. 6).

John, E-pis'tles of.

The First Epistle of John is evidently by the author of the Fourth Gospel. The same characteristic phraseology is found in both works and the same way of constructing sentences. The epistle moreover plainly supposes the readers' acquaintance with the gospel. Both were evidently sent primarily to the same churches, and in the opinion of many the epistle was an accompaniment of the gospel. The opening words of the epistle suggest at once the gospel's prologue, and parallels between the two books may be found in nearly every verse of the epistle. The epistle, moreover, has in view the world as the antagonist of the church and the field of its operations (ii. 2, 15-17, iv. 3-5; v. 4, 5, 19), and warns against heresies which struck at the integrity of Christ's person (ii. 18-26; iv. 1-3; v. 6-10). These features harmonize with the date and purpose of the gospel. The two works therefore clearly came from the same hand and at about the same time. The epistle seeks to apply to Christian life the truth whose historical revelation is recorded in the gospel. It, no less than the gospel, claims to be by an apostle. The writer was one of those who had lived in personal contact with Christ (i. 1-3, 5; iv. 14) and writes in an authoritative manner as became an apostle (i. 4; ii. 1; iv. 6, 14). How deeply he had absorbed the teaching of his Lord is proved by the similarity of phraseology and thought between the epistle and Christ's discourses in the gospel. The Johannine authorship of the epistle is vouched for by Irenæus and the Muratori Fragment; while earlier quotations by Polycarp, Papias, etc., prove its use in the church from the beginning of the second century. Its train of thought may be outlined as follows: After the introduction (i. 1-4), in which John declares the purpose of his ministry to be the declaration to men of the manifestation of the life-giving, divine Word, in order that they may have joyful fellowship in him with the original apostles, he teaches that the character of God, as learned from Christ, must determine the character of the Christian's inward and outward life (i. 5-ii. 6); hence he urges to love of the brethren, warns against love of the world and heretical teaching (ii. 7-27). He next insists (ii. 28-iii. 24) on the necessity of doing righteousness, and so of abiding in God, in view of the coming second advent of Christ; since at it our divine sonship will be fully manifested and that sonship is distinguished by obedience and love. Then he reminds his readers (iv.) that the test of having the Spirit of God is to be found in the true confession of Christ as the incarnate Son of God, in adherence to apostolic teaching, and in love; and that right faith in Jesus is the condition of the whole spiritual life of love (v. 1-12). In the conclusion (v. 13-21) he tersely summarizes the purpose of the epistle as intended to confirm them in faith and communion with God, and solemnly recites the historical and spiritual facts on which their eternal life steadfastly reposes.

The Second Epistle of John. Quite in accord with the reserve shown by the apostle John, the author of the second epistle calls himself "the elder," a designation used by Peter of himself (1 Pet. v. 1) and given by Papias to all the apostles. The author writes to "the elect lady and her children," expressing his joy at the Christian life of her children and warning her against heretical teachers. The brevity of the epistle easily explains the paucity of references to it in the earliest writers. In fact, the external evidence is larger than would be expected. The most ancient historical testimony ascribes the epistle to the apostle John. Clement of Alexandria was acquainted with at least one shorter epistle by the apostle, and Irenæus quotes 2 John 10, 11, as coming from John the disciple of the Lord. Moreover, the Johannine authorship is abundantly proved by the remarkable coincidences of language and thought with 1 John and no motive can be imagined for its forgery. Some have supposed that by the elect lady was meant a church; others suppose her an individual named Kuria (the Greek for lady). It is probably best to leave the name indefinite.

The Third Epistle of John. Another brief letter addressed by the elder to Gaius the well-beloved, expressing joy at the hospitality to the brethren which Gaius had shown, and urging his friend to continue to imitate that which is good. Reference is also made to a certain Diotrophes who had opposed the writer; and on the other hand to a Demetrius who is praised. It is impossible to identify this Gaius with any of that name mentioned in the N. T., see GAIUS 3. He appears to have been a prominent man in one of the churches of Asia, but not an officer of the church. This epistle is remarkably like the first and second in style and thought, so that there is no reason to doubt that the three were by the same writer.

All John's epistles, with those of James, Peter, and Jude, are frequently included in the number of the so-called "catholic" or "general" epistles, i. e. those addressed not to particular churches or persons, but to large or many communities. I John was no doubt sent to the churches of Asia, among which the Fourth Gospel was first issued. To 2 and 3 John, however, this title does not apply, nor are they styled "general" in A V or R V. They were probably placed among the "general" epistles simply because, being brief, they were attached to 1 John.

John the Divine, The Revelation of St.
See REVELATION.

John, Gos'pel according to St.

The title prefixed to the Fourth Gospel, in accordance with the universal belief of the early church that the book was written by the apostle John. Like the other gospels it does not mention the writer's name, but both internal and external considerations support the traditional belief.

I. Internal evidence. (1) The writer was one of the apostles. This appears from his use of the first person plural (i. 14 and perhaps xxi. 24) and from many items of minute description, especially concerning the impression made on the disciples by events in Christ's life, etc. (i. 37; ii. 11, 17; iv. 27, 54; ix. 2; xi. 8-16; xii. 4-6, 21, 22; xiii. 23-26; xviii. 15; xix. 26, 27, 35; xx. 8), and from the explicit statement in xxi. 24. (2) He mentions a "disciple whom Jesus loved" (xiii. 23; xix. 26; xx. 2; xxi. 7, 20, 21) who, in xxi. 24, is said to be the author. All the apostles, however, are mentioned by name in the book except Matthew, James the son of Alphaeus, Simon Zelotes, and the sons of Zebedee. The three former did not belong to the narrower circle of intimate disciples, to one of whom this title would alone be applicable, and James the son of Zebedee died early (Acts xiii. 2). John, therefore, alone remains. (3) That the writer was a Jew is proved incontestably by the strongly Hebraistic character of his style in writing Greek. (4) He shows intimate acquaintance with the geography, history, and customs of the Jews during Christ's ministry (e. g. i. 21, 28, 46; ii. 6, iii. 23; iv. 5, 27, R. V.; v. 2, 3, vii. 40-52; ix. 7, x. 22, 23; xi. 18; xviii. 28; xix. 31), and his book gives more personal details than any of the gospels. The internal evidence thus harmonizes strikingly with the Johannine authorship. Nothing stronger could be asked, short of an explicit statement. The latter, in fact, is almost given in xxi. 24, for, according to the unanimous testimony of early Christian history, John was the only apostle who lived long enough to give rise to the belief that he would survive till the second advent. Chap. xxi. is evidently an addition by the author to his work, which was originally intended to close with chap. xx. It amounts substantially to an affirmation that St. John was the author of the whole treatise.

II. External evidence. The testimony of Irenaeus (born about A. D. 115-125 and bishop of Lyons in the last part of the second century), who was a disciple of Polycarp, who was a disciple of St. John, is explicit that John wrote this Gospel in Ephesus after the other gospels had been issued. This is of itself sufficient evidence. It is confirmed, however, by a line of testimonies from the very close of the apostolic age. The First Epistle was plainly written by the author of the Gospel, and its apostolic authority is attested by its use by Polycarp (A. D. 110) and Papias (A. D. 130-140). The Ignatian epistles (A. D. 100) show that the Gospel was familiar and authoritative to the churches of Asia Minor at the beginning of the second century. Justin (A. D. 150) used it freely, and quotes from it, evidently considering it one of "the memoirs of the apostles," which he says were called gospels, and were written by the apostles and their companions. In the Teaching of the Apostles the use of the Fourth Gospel is thought by many to be implied, and, while that is perhaps doubtful, the more recently recovered apocryphal Gospel of Peter shows that the Fourth Gospel formed with the other three the narrative upon the basis of which the pseudo-Peter wrote. Tatian's Diatessaron was a harmony of the gospels used in the churches, and is a combination of our four. The MS of Syriac gospels, recently found by Mrs. Lewis, proves that in the second century our four gospels were the accepted ones in the Syrian church. Finally, it is certain that even the earliest heretics (Gnostic) of the second century accepted the Fourth Gospel as apostolic. Thus external evidence amply confirms the belief that the Fourth Gospel was written by St. John, and, as such, was received as authoritative by the church from the very beginning of the post-apostolic age. The evidence also points to its composition in Asia Minor (tradition says Ephesus) in the last quarter of the first century. The opponents of Jesus are called simply the Jews (i. 19; ii. 18;

v. 10; vii 15, etc.), explanations are given about the Jewish feasts (vi. 4; vii 2; xi. 55; xix. 31), the sea of Galilee is explained by its gentile name, sea of Tiberias (vi 1), and the designation in the prologue of Christ as the Word of God points to a period when Christianity was confronted with such philosophical tendencies as we know existed in Asia Minor. This explains also the apparent purpose of the book. It was to give Christ's testimony to himself as the incarnate Son of God and Saviour of the world (xx 30, 31). It assumes acquaintance with the other gospels and intends to supplement them, see GOSPEL. They had not given those great discourses of the Lord, in which he had replied to the attacks of the Jews upon his divine claims or had unfolded to his disciples the mysteries of his being and their spiritual relations to himself. This self-testimony of Jesus John determined to set down, especially since heresies had risen which denied some aspects of the person of Christ. With this he combined also, as was natural, many items of personal reminiscence. The result was to provide the church with a complete portrayal of her divine-human Lord.

John's Gospel begins with a prologue (i 1-18), in which the apostle summarizes the great truth about to be shown in the life of Christ, viz. the existence of a second divine person whose office it is to reveal God and who is, therefore, called the Word, who, besides being the universal source of life and light to creation, became incarnate as Jesus Christ, and thus to those who believed, revealed God and imparted salvation. He then relates, 1. The opening testimonies to Jesus given by John the Baptist and by Jesus himself to his first disciples (i 19-i 11). 2. Christ's revelation of himself in a series of acts and, still more, of discourses addressed to inquirers or to his adversaries (ii 12-xii. 50). This includes (a) his testimony at his first passover (ii 12-25), and the discourse with Nicodemus (iii. 1-21), together with the renewed testimony of the Baptist (22-36); (b) the conversation with the woman of Samaria (iv 1-42); (c) the second miracle in Galilee (43-54); (d) Christ's defense to the Jews of his divine dignity and authority (v); (e) his presentation of himself as the bread of life (vi); (f) his renewed defense of his authority and dignity at the feast of tabernacles (vii., viii.); (g) the healing of the blind man and parable of the good shepherd (ix. 1-x. 21); (h) Christ's final testimony to the Jews (22-42); (j) the raising of Lazarus and its consequences (xi); (k) the testimony given at Bethany, in the triumphal entry, and at the visit of the Greeks (xii). 3. Christ's revelation of himself in connection with his death and resurrection (xiii. 1-xxi 25). This includes (a) his last discourses with his disciples (xiii-xvii.); (b) his arrest, trial, and crucifixion, in which he bore witness, particularly before Pilate, to his person and work (xviii., xix.); (c) his resurrection and certain testimonies connected with it (xx, xxi). The result is to show that in the human Jesus there was the eternal Son of God, who by his person, teaching, and redeeming work has revealed God and secured eternal life to those who receive him. St. John thus represents the mission of Jesus as the climax of God's self-revelation and as the procurement for believers of that light which consists in knowledge of the highest truth and of that life which consists in spiritual union with God, which together constitute the perfect good and the everlasting salvation. "These [things]" he says, "are written, that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name" (xx. 31).

G. T. P.

Joi'a-da [Jehovah bath known].

1. A son of Pasaah, who repaired a gate of Jerusalem (Neh iii. 6; in A V Jehonada).

2. A high priest, great grandson of Jeshua (Neh xii. 10). One of his sons married a daughter of Sanballat, the governor of Samaria, and for thus defiling the priesthood was expelled, probably from Jerusalem, by Nehemiah (xiii 28).

Jo'a-kim [Jehovah doth establish].

A high priest, son of Jeshua (Neh xii. 10, 12, 21-26), in the reign of [Artaxerxes (Antiq xi 5, 1)].

Joi'a-rib or Jehoiarib, the two forms freely interchanging in Hebrew [Jehovah defends].

1. A descendant of Aaron. See JEHOIARIB.

2. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh xii 6, 7). In the next generation a father's house bore this name (19, cp 1 Mac ii 1, Joarib being the Greek form).

3. A man of understanding who was returning from Babylon with Ezra and was sent with others from the encampment on the river of Abava to secure Levites and Nethinim for the service of the temple (Ezra viii 16, 17).

4. A man of Judah, descended from a certain Zechariah (Neh. xi. 5).

Jok'de-am [perhaps, possessed by people].

A town in the mountains of Judah (Josh. xv. 56). Site unknown.

Jo'kim.

A man of Judah, family of Shelah (1 Chron. iv 22).

Jok'me-am [the people is brought together].

A town of Ephraim (1 Chron. vi 68), apparently near Abel-meholah (1 Km iv 12, where A. V., contrary to the Hebrew text, calls it Jokneam). The Kohathite Levites were given residence in it (1 Chron. vi 66, 68). Instead of this town, Kibzaim is given in Josh. xxi 22, and is commonly believed to be another name of the same place.

Jok'ne-am [the people is permitted to possess, or it is allowed to possess people]

1. A town on or near mount Carmel (Josh. xii. 22). The boundary line of the tribe of Zebulun extended to the river that is before Jokneam (xix. 11). It was given with its suburbs to the Merarite Levites (xxi. 34). The identification proposed by Eli Smith and Robinson is generally accepted, namely Tell Keimûn, probably the 'Yamon of Judith vii. 3, on the southern margin of the plain of Esdraelon, on the slopes of Carmel, a little south of the Kishon, and about 15 miles northwest by west of Jezreel. It commands the main pass from the western portion of Esdraelon to the more southern plain.

2. A place mentioned in A. V. of 1 Kin. iv. 12, but see JOKMEAM.

Jok'shan [perhaps, a fowler].

A tribe and its progenitor descended from Abraham by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 1, 2). From Jok'shan sprang Sheba and Dedan (3). Exact place of settlement unknown.

Jok'tan [Hebrew Yoktan, little, small].

A person or rather tribe descended from Shem through Eber and from whom thirteen tribes of Arabia sprang (Gen. x. 25, 29. 1 Chron. i. 19-23). The Mussulmans correctly or incorrectly call Joktan Kahtân.

Jok'the-el [probably, subjection to God or it is made to serve God].

1. A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 33, 34). The identification with the ruin Kutlâneh, about four miles east by south of Ekron and 4 west-southwest of Gezer, is groundless.

2. A name given by Amaziah, king of Judah, to Sela, now Petra, when he had taken it in war (2 Kin. xiv. 7, R. V.).

Jo'na. See JONAH 2.

Jon'a-dab and Jehonadab [Jehovah is bounteous].

1. Son of David's brother Shimeah (2 Sam. xii. 3).

2. A son of Rechab, the Kenite (Jer. xxxv. 6, cp. 1 Chron. ii. 55). He became head of the tribe and gave character to it by his rule requiring his people to dwell in tents, refrain from agriculture, and abstain from wine (Jer. xxxv. 6, 7) in order to preserve primitive simplicity of manners. Jehu, finding that Jonadab sympathized with his work of suppressing Baal worship, took him to Samaria, where he aided Jehu in putting out of Baal's temple all who were not priests of that god, in preparation for the massacre which was to ensue (2 Kin. x. 15, 23).

Jo'nah, in A. V. of N. T. Jonas, twice Jona, the Greek genitive case (Mat. xvi. 17; John i. 42) [a dove].

1. A prophet of Israel, a son of Amittai, and citizen of Gath-hepher in Galilee, who before the close of the reign of Jeroboam II. foretold Israel's recovery of its borders from the entering of Hamath to the sea of the plain (2 Kin. xiv. 25; Jon. i. 1).

The book of Jonah is the fifth in order of the minor prophetic books in the Hebrew original and in the English version. In the Septuagint it is the sixth; not, however, in all editions. It may be divided into three sections —
